Among commentaries on Halevi’s philosophical activity are Sirat, Strauss, Pines, and Silman. SIRAT’s presentation of Halevi’s thought occupies a section of the most comprehensive English introduction to the history of Jewish medieval philosophy available. The study identifies the significance of Halevi’s Kuzari for the history of Jewish thought, without elaborating on the role the text played in future anti-rationalistic movements. After explaining in a clear and thorough way the main lines of debate between various religions presented in the Kuzari, Sirat analyzes Halevi’s approach to the problem of universalism as opposed to particularism and the central position Halevi attributed to Israel. Sirat additionally examines Halevi’s proposal that the way to God is through prophecy, not philosophy. She maintains that Halevi chose in many points the most particularist interpretations of Judaism, even when Jewish tradition included other more liberal or inclusive opinions. The chapter offers a clear and precise exposition of Halevi’s central ideas. Written very objectively, it is recommended for readers of all kinds.

STRAUSS’s essay on the “Law of Reason” in the Kuzari is part of a celebrated volume on the relationship between philosophy and politics in Jewish thought. The problematic has to do with the ius naturale and the distinction between “rational laws” and “revealed laws.” Strauss argues that the Kuzari, addressed to naturally pious people in a state of doubt, is primarily a defense of Judaism against philosophy, because Halevi thought that a true philosopher can never become a genuine convert to Judaism. The main part of the study is dedicated to the philosopher’s and religionist’s evaluations of the Law of Reason. These rational laws are a complete theologico-political code—the religion of philosophers and the rules of conduct that a philosopher must observe in order to become capable of contemplation. Halevi’s basic objection to philosophy was not particularly Jewish: rather, it was a defense of morality, which, he believed, is necessarily connected to revealed religion. This article remains a valuable analysis of the problem seen from a general philosophical perspective, even if other experts would prefer a more historical treatment, with references to Arabic sources.

PINES, another colossus of the history of philosophy, discusses some of the main terms employed by Halevi in the conceptual framework of the Kuzari. Pines argues that these terms appear with the same (or very similar) meanings in Shi‘ite, and more concretely in Ismai‘li, texts. Although it is not clear how and where Halevi came to know these concepts, what is clear is that they influenced him very deeply. Pines proves also that while book one of the Kuzari seems to invoke ibn Bajja’s theories, some sections of book five are based on Avicenna’s conception of the soul, which suggests a considerable interval of time between the redaction of the two parts of Halevi’s book. Pines’s very technical study requires a good background in Arabic and Jewish philosophy for full comprehension, but it must be considered a turning point in the study of the philosophical conceptions of Halevi’s apologetic and polemical work.

SILMAN investigates the Kuzari from a historical point of view, trying to distinguish Halevi’s earlier and later thought. Offering a very acute analysis, Silman identifies at least three distinct strata in the development of Halevi’s thought. The first is a kind of Aristotelian position that predates the writing of the book. The second is an early anti-Karaite stage, in which Halevi still maintained an Aristotelian point of view, trying to interpret Jewish tradition from this perspective. This stage is reflected in some parts of the Kuzari (part three and certain sections of parts one and two). Finally, there is a later strand to his thought, represented in other sections of the book (parts four and five, along with the rest of parts one and two), that emphasizes concrete human experience, and in particular the historical experience of the Jewish people. In the last stage, Halevi abandoned the principles of Aristotelian philosophy in an effort to resolve the tensions and internal contradictions of his system. Although he catalogs these clearly defined stages of evolution, Silman defends (in a rather artificial way) the internal dialectical unity of Halevi's book. This is a very systematic study of Halevi's thought, in spite of all Halevi's vacillation and inconsistencies. However, the division that Silman proposes is not the only possible one, and the different attitudes of Halevi toward philosophy could also be interpreted (in a quite different chronological sequence) as an answer to his Arabic sources. Still, this is important reading for adequately prepared readers.

Brann, Hamori, and Scheindlin all have much of importance to say about Halevi's poetry. BRANN investigates in this article, as he does in his excellent book The Compunctious Poet (1991), a well-known topos in Arabic and Hebrew literature: the "compunctious poet." By this term, he alludes to the poet's contradictory attitudes toward poetry, which he interprets as a sign of the conflicts inherent in living in two quite different worlds. Hebrew poets tried to be true to Jewish tradition without renouncing the ideals of Arabic education. This cultural ambiguity is reflected in the phenomenon of the repentant poet, who regrets in his old age that he composed poetry in Arabic style when young, but who never ceases to write. Brann applies this general theory to Halevi, presenting an alternative to the traditional views (based on the "conversion theory"), which posit that Halevi was the darling of Andalusian Jewish society in his youth but began to renounce the ideals of al-Andalus and determined to set out for Palestine and a life of religious devotion when he was about 50 years old. Brann demystifies the conventional view of Halevi's posture with respect to poetry, showing the poet's ambivalent attitude toward Hebrew verse. Until the last days of his life, Halevi remained an Andalusian and a compunctious Hebrew poet conflicted about the ambiguity of his literary identity. Brann performs an excellent analysis of the sources, succeeding in finding a new and deeply perceptive interpretation of the texts.

HAMORI, a notable scholar in the field of Arabic and Hebrew poetry, comments on a poem by Halevi in which a physical odyssey and a spiritual journey run parallel courses, with the description of a storm and the calm that follows reassuring both the actual and the mental traveler. Some images of purification and illumination and the final allusion to the conjunction of the heart with nature are symbolically and philosophically interpreted by Hamori. He compares these images with some assertions of the philosopher and the rabbi in the Kuzari, and he shows how Halevi turned a Neoplatonic series of images, known among Arabic thinkers, into poetry. This study is an ingenious and attractive discovery of coincidences between the poetic and the philosophic work of Halevi.

Scheindlin, a great expert on Jewish medieval poetry, has translated and commented on several secular and liturgical poems of Halevi in his two splendid books, Wine, Women and Death (1986) and The Gazelle (1991). In SCHEINDLIN, he contrasts the individual vision and religious experience reflected in Halevi's liturgical poetry with that of ibn Gabirol. The comparison of poems of the two authors, who employed very similar words, reveals that although both were grounded in Neoplatonic psychology, they were in fact far removed from each other's thinking. Ibn Gabirol's speaker was active and bitter, while Halevi's voice was much more submissive and accepting. Halevi attributed greater importance than ibn Gabirol did to the distance between God and humanity, or divine transcendence. Without abandoning the rabbinic religious ethos, Halevi introduced in his poems a climate of tranquil confidence in God, a passive acceptance of his will, that seems to have its main sources in Arabic religious poetry. Scheindlin's precise and appealing analysis shows in a very convincing way that Halevi was influenced by Sufism and the Islamic pietism of his age.

ANGEL SÁENZ-BADILLOS

Judah Loew ben Bezalel c.1525–1609

Talmudist, theologian, and rabbi of Prague

- Bokser, Ben Zion, From the World of the Cabbalah: The Philosophy of Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague, New York: Philosophical Library, 1954; London: Vision, 1957; as The Maharal: The Mystical Philosophy of Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1994
- Buber, Martin, "The Beginning of the National Idea: The High Rabbi Liva," in On Zion: The History of an Idea, translated by S. Godman, New York: Schocken, and London: East and West Library, 1973
- Elbaum, Jacob, "Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague and His Attitude to the Aggadah," Scripta Hierosolymitana, 22, 1971
- Goldsmith, Arnold, The Golem Remembered, 1909–1980: Variations of a Jewish Legend, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1981
- Kleinberger, Aaron Fritz, "The Didactics of Rabbi Loew of Prague," Scripta Hierosolymitana, 13, 1963
- Kulka, Otto Dov, "Comenius and Maharal: The Historical Background of the Parallels in Their Teaching," Judaica Bohemica, 27, 1991
- Safran, Bezalel, "Maharal and Early Hasidism," in his Hasidism: Continuity or Innovation? (Harvard Judaic Texts and Studies, 5), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1988
- Sherwin, Byron L., Mystical Theology and Social Dissent: The Life and Works of Judah Loew of Prague (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1982

Judah Loew ben Bezalel (called Maharal) was one of the leading thinkers of 16th-century Judaism. He is also an enigmatic and paradoxical figure, and interpretations of his thought differ widely. Furthermore, he is the hero of a well-known legend, the story of the Golem of Prague. GOLDSMITH discusses the origins of this legend, and its many versions in 19th- and 20th-century Jewish literature. Titles discussed, however, will focus on the historical rather than the legendary Maharal.

SHERWIN provides the best survey of the known facts of Maharal's life, which are relatively few. Sherwin also surveys Maharal's formal theology and shows Maharal's dependence on medieval Spanish Kabbalah. He demonstrates conclusively the links between Maharal's kabbalistic theology, particularly his belief in a metaphysical difference between Jews and non-Jews, and his stringent halakhic views concerning non-Jews. Sherwin also argues (as the historian Yizhak Baer did concerning Moses de Leon and other kabbalists in late 13th-century Spain) that Maharal's kabbalistic theology was linked to a critique of the wealthy leaders of the local Jewish community.

BOKSER's attempts to contextualize Maharal in 16th-century history, whether Jewish or European, are not accurate. Moreover, his survey of Maharal's life and thought has in most respects been superseded by Sherwin's biography. In one respect, however, Bokser's biography is still superior: namely, it gives the reader a good sense of the range of Maharal's thinking, including such topics as the nature of man, the nature of the Jews and the Jewish nation, education, the meaning of Jewish history, the problem of miracles, the messianic age, and the interpretation of the Bible and talmudic legends. Like Sherwin, Bokser points to the roots of Maharal's theology in Kabbalah. His interpretations of Maharal's kabbalistic views, however, tend to make them sound like those of a good-hearted, liberal Jew of the 1950s (that is to say, like Bokser himself).

BUBER places Maharal in a very different context and emphasizes another aspect of his thought. The crucial dimension in Maharal's thinking, according to Buber's interpretation, is his understanding of the Jews as a physical as well as a metaphysical people and of the return to Zion as a natural as well as a miraculous process. Since the land of Israel is the natural home of the Jewish people, Maharal argued, the state of exile is in some sense unnatural and, therefore, temporary. Buber compares Maharal briefly to certain Christian political thinkers of the 16th and 17th centuries and points to certain resemblances between Maharal and Jean Calvin. Maharal insisted rationally, Buber claims, on the rights of all nations and on that basis on the rights of the Jewish nation, including its right to independence. He believed superrationally in the unique holiness of the Jewish people and the land of Israel. For Buber (whose career as a Zionist had important links to Prague), Maharal was a forerunner of the "spiritual Zionism" that Buber believed in and developed.

KLEINBERGER surveys Maharal's proposed reforms of Jewish education and points to the many resemblances between Maharal's views and those of the famous Czech educational reformer of the 17th century, Johann Comenius. Kleinberger is the only one of the writers discussed here who ignores the superrational and kabbalistic elements of Maharal's teachings. He argues that Maharal, like Comenius, adhered strictly to a natural view of education, that is, one in which the method and the subject matter are chosen in light of the nature of the individual student, and in particular are graded according to the student's abilities.

KULKA's essay supplements both Buber's and Kleinberger's. Kulka suggests that the Protestant sect known as the Moravian Brethren may have been the proximate source of some of Maharal's novel ideas on education and nationality. In spite of Maharal's antagonism toward Christianity and his stress on the differences between Jews and non-Jews, Kulka suggests that his contacts with non-Jews, and with Brethren in particular, may have been extensive.

ELBAUM discusses another phase of Maharal's creative reinterpretation of Judaism: his allegorical reading of talmudic legends. Maharal polemicized against those who interpreted the legends as merely accurate or, worse still, inaccurate historical accounts. As Elbaum illustrates, Maharal reinterpreted each detail, nearly each word, of each talmudic legend as a part of his ethical, theological, and mystical system. Elbaum locates the roots of this hermeneutical stance in the kabbalistic tradition and, more distantly, in Maimonides.

SAFRAN's essay is the most adequate study of Maharal's mysticism as well as of his later influence. Safran explicates Maharal's vision of the mystical path. It is based on a distinction between a "natural" and a "supernatural" frame of vision. The shift from the former to the latter leads ultimately to the annihilation of the sense of self. Stemming from that defeat of the egotistical, judgmental self is an ethics of humility, patience, and charity. Safran then shows the influence of Maharal's thought on certain 18th- and early 19th-century hasidic leaders.

JOSEPH M. DAVIS

Judaism, Introductions to

- Blau, Joseph L., Modern Varieties of Judaism (Lectures on the History of Religions Sponsored by the American Council of Learned Societies, new series, no. 8), New York: Columbia University Press, 1966
- Fackenheim, Emil L., What Is Judaism?: An Interpretation for the Present Age, New York: Summit, 1987
- Garber, Zev (editor), Methodology in the Academic Teaching of Judaism (Studies in Judaism), Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1986; London: University Press of America, 1987
- Garber, Zev (editor), Academic Approaches to Teaching Jewish Studies, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1999
- Hertzberg, Arthur (editor), Judaism (Great Religions of Modern Man), New York: Braziller, and London: Prentice-Hall International, 1961; new edition, New York: Washington Square, 1963
- Heschel, Abraham Joshua, The Sabbath: Its Meaning for Modern Man, New York: Farrar, Straus, and Young, 1951
- Holtz, Barry W. (editor), Back to the Sources: Reading the Classic Jewish Texts, New York: Summit, 1984
- Jaffee, Martin S., Early Judaism, Upper Saddle River, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1997
- Neusner, Jacob, The Way of Torah: An Introduction to Judaism, Belmont, California: Dickenson, 1970; 6th edition, Belmont, California: Wadsworth, 1997
- Seltzer, Robert M. (editor), Judaism: A People and Its History (Religion, History, and Culture), New York: Macmillan, and London: Collier Macmillan, 1989

Sherwin, Byron L. and Seymour J. Cohen (editors), How to Be a Jew: Ethical Teachings of Judaism, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1992

Siegel, Richard, Michael Strassfeld, and Sharon Strassfeld (editors), The Jewish Catalog: A Do-It-Yourself Kit, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973

Wouk, Herman, This Is My God: The Jewish Way of Life, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1970; London: Collins, 1973; revised edition, New York: Pocket Books, 1974; London: Fontana, 1976

Different disciplines have their own patterns of thinking, inquiry, and information processing. Scientific inquiry, for example, calls for classification, explanation of technical processes, detailed statements of fact often containing a definition or statement of principle, problem solving, and experiment reporting, which involves discriminating observation, careful explanation, and considered conclusions. The academic study of Judaism exposes the reader to an appreciation of the Jewish religious heritage in all its aspects and helps foster an understanding of the contributions of that heritage to world civilization in general, and to Western culture in particular. As such, the Jewish religious tradition addresses peoplehood, worldview, and lifestyle, and "Introductions to Judaism" is an instructional form of the humanities characterized by that branch of learning's emphasis on reading, writing, and reasoning. How and why are explained and discussed at length by GARBER (1986 and 1999).

SIEGEL, STRASSFELD, and STRASSFELD write out of a commitment on the part of the editors and contributors to raise Jewish consciousness and to explore how Jews can find meaningful ways to express and experience Jewish religious identity and values. The work suggests that Jewish norms, traditions, and culture have been compromised massively by American Jews in their attempt to assimilate; that Judaism is often seen as no longer an option by assimilated Jews, which requires analysis of the problems that Jewishness presents in contemporary society; and that the Jewish heritage can be saved in the diaspora by stressing personal involvement and the aesthetic value of Yiddishkeit over abstract philosophical and metaphysical discussions. The spirit of the articles, with many accompanied by relevant illustrations, range from sublime and learned to humorous and pop. The barely hidden agenda—namely, to push the idea that being Jewish is enjoyable and that Jewish renewal is possible by the transmission of Judaism through living experiential role models—is by and large successful and contagious. The prime audience for this comprehensive guide in "how to" Judaism is neither the totally committed nor the lost of the Jewish community but the very large group of younger Jews who are open to an appreciation of their people's vast cultural heritage—however defined. The criticism of the Jewish establishment, with its preference for outer image tied to progress over inner essence defined by tradition, makes for a Jewish subculture, if not counterculture. In sum, these volumes are a reflection of and guide to a new quest for an old identity through Jewish Americana.

Whereas other manuals of "how to" Judaism suggest involvement in aesthetic Judaism to counter assimilation, SHERWIN and COHEN, following the direction of 16th-century Jewish mystic Judah Loew of Prague (Maharal) and the late-16th- and early-17th-century Polish talmudist Samuel Edels (Maharsha), discuss personal, religious, and moral virtues in three sections (God, Self, Self and Others), each containing five chapters. Combining selections from classical and modern ethicists with comments of their own, the authors examine a plethora of Jewish values, such as belief, Torah, repentance, health, death, parenthood, philanthropy, and sexual ethics. They suggest that Jewish ethical literature offers a "road map for the individual committed to the creation of the supreme art-form—one's own life." As pointers toward this goal, Sherwin and Cohen provide a vocabulary for "how to be—alive as—a Jew" (i.e., guidance in the basic understanding of explicit and implicit traditions of Jewish moral principles and practice). The message conveyed is akin to what the prophets taught: the Jewish people living according to the plan of the Torah demonstrates the surest proof of God's ethics, Israel's uniqueness, and man's humanity.

The Koran speaks of the Jews as a "People of the Scripture," but in the modern period Jews have largely lost direct contact with the Bible and the classical literature of Judaism that has emanated from it. HOLTZ's guide to these classics is an impressive step toward rectifying this lacuna. In a series of reader-friendly, hands-on teaching sections, American scholars write on selected passages from the Bible, Talmud, midrash, medieval biblical exegesis and medieval philosophy, Kabbalah, Hasidism, and the liturgy. What is of value here is not so much the corpus of facts or descriptive data presented but the invitation to learn by engaging the primary source material on its own terms and in the context of sacred Jewish literary tradition. Learning involves not only information given and received but the recipient's discovery of what that knowledge means. The learning exchange would be incomplete if one were to prevail without the other. This thoughtful book captures the excitement when both prevail.

HERTZBERG's handbook, part of the Great Religions of Modern Man series, is an account of the origin and development of key ideas of Judaism extrapolated from an extensive selection of Jewish writings dating from the biblical era to our own. His chapters are a synthesis of ideas and beliefs that describe the parameters of the Jewish value system: God, Torah (teaching and commandments), people (chosen and covenant), land (holy and home), doctrine (life and death, man, messiah, morality, etc.), holy space and time, and prayer. He does not present a comprehensive discussion of items and issues, and what he does say has been superseded by others. Nonetheless, his grasp of what is meant by Jewish religion and traditions, and what can be learned from them, is commendable.

WOUK, Pulitzer Prize-winning author of The Cain Mutiny and other epics, explores the central teachings of Judaism against a brief historical background. The author's goal is to explain the ancient traditions of the religion and their contemporary meanings. Wouk invites the reader, Jew and non-Jew alike, not only to read about the faith of the Jews but also to confront the process itself. He moves through Jewish ethics and symbols (e.g., clothing, diet, shelter), rites of passage, and the liturgical year painlessly, pausing whenever he wishes to illustrate a lesson, taking what appears to be a detour and then bringing the reader back to the true course, enhanced by the sights seen. Though Wouk recognizes in the modern era multiple forms of dissent from the biblical consent of na'aseh ve-nishma (we shall do and obey), he argues that the point of departure for all of these voices is the classical teaching from Sinai. He offers a strong testimony of Orthodox faith, which reasons that Torah and Western culture are compatible.

FACKENHEIM's interpretation of Judaism is founded on profound knowledge of Jewish habits and customs, doctrines and practices, values and ideals, outlook and philosophy. After discussing the religious situation of the contemporary Jew, he examines concepts, issues, and meanings gleaned from both the religious and secular spheres of the Jewish experience: God, Torah, peoplehood, Zionism, antisemitism, prayer, repentance, and the meaning of Messiah for today's Jew. In Fackenheim's view, the theme of transition from homelessness to homeland is particularly real and important, and a major section of the volume is devoted to the Jewish State where generations of Jewish thought and practice are being digested, accepted, challenged, preserved, and renewed day by day. This is a salutary work whose commitment to unity is marked by creative diversity.

The age of European Enlightenment and emancipation brought a radical departure from traditional thought patterns and aspirations. Emancipation destroyed the authority of the Jewish community, and the Enlightenment offered an ideological justification for the surrender of the authority of Jewish tradition in modern Jewish history. BLAU's volume successfully reviews the many adjustments that Judaism has made in response to the challenge of modernity, including changes in the kehillah (community) and the synagogue as well as in ideological approaches, doctrinal and educational viewpoints, leadership, and the basic dynamics of European and American Judaism. His thesis that all varieties of Jewish religion and Jewish nationalism are responses aiming to avoid destroying continuity with tradition (e.g., Jews in a free society remain attached to Torah more in morality than in ritual) amounts, however, to a Western cross-cultural exploration of Jewish beliefs and practices.

SELTZER attempts to give some much-needed direction to important problems that arise in a serious study of Judaism in the context of phenomenology and the history of religions. The articles, reprinted from The Encyclopedia of Religion (Macmillan, 1987), examine "religious behavior, thought, literature, symbolism, and society" and are arranged in five groups of essays. Each chapter is topically focused and shares a number of methodological directives: identify the problem, search for different schools of interpretation, elucidate advantages and disadvantages connected with each school, and provide an agenda and annotated bibliography for further study and discussion. Careful scholarship and useful information, albeit extremely compressed, can benefit college-oriented classes and informed adults, the readers toward whom this anthology is directed.

NEUSNER is one of the 20th century's great Judaic scholars, whose prolific publishing on the literature of the talmudic era has earned him worldwide acclaim. His careful step-by-step form-critical methodology portrays the history and structure of Judaism academically with little room for partisanship. Immanence and transcendence within Judaism are depicted in categories of the shape of faith—God, man, rites of passage, festivals, community—and the dynamics of faith—religious commitment and social problems, contemporary values and the present state of Jewish belief. Neusner does not see Judaism "merely [as] the evanescent culture of the Jewish group." Rather, he maintains that Judaism, the religion, can and must be discussed and analyzed by the same accepted methods and procedures applied to other religions. His history of religion approach provides an alternative to the school of "ethnic Judaism" in understanding the Jewish religious experience.

JAFFEE presents the development of Judaism from the end of the Israelite epoch (c.450 B.C.E.) to the start of the Middle Ages (c.650 C.E.). The book's participatory style permits the reader to confront the dynamics of text and traditions in the political and social history of the Jews in and outside the Land of Israel during this time. Each chapter presents ideas and issues, charts and illustrations, notes and reference material. Taking the position that early Judaism was a mosaic of worldviews struggling to be Israel in a world created and governed by the God of Israel, Jaffee demonstrates that serious scholastic inquiry may be iconoclastic and even troubling, but it is ultimately liberating and invigorating.

HESCHEL, identified by Neusner as the single most influential theologian of Judaism of the 20th century, asserts the centrality of God to all life and God's need of humans ("Divine Pathos"). He maintains that revelation in the Jewish religion is expressed in terms of mattan Torah (the giving of Torah) by God in consonance with "the receiving of Torah" voluntarily by the people. Heschel's brief monograph (136 pages), written in image-laden cadences and considered one of the most important of his writings, captures eloquently the intent and spirit of the sabbath as understood in rabbinic, kabbalistic, and hasidic writings and especially as practiced by religiously observant Jews of Eastern Europe—an ethos all but destroyed in the Shoah. He explains how the sabbath emerged as a bulwark against the passage of time, including death, and has become an echo of eternity. His aphoristic essay is poetic, philosophical, and quotable. As an institution the sabbath represents the quintessential introduction to Judaism, and Heschel expresses powerfully its values of amity not animosity and conformity not conflict between humankind and nature as recorded in the Torah of Moses and taught by the sages of Israel.

ZEV GARBER

Judeo-Arabic Literature

- Blau, Joshua, The Emergence and Linguistic Background of Judaeo-Arabic: A Study of the Origins of Middle Arabic (Scripta Judaica, 5), London: Oxford University Press, 1965; 2nd edition, Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute, 1981
- Blau, Joshua and Simon Hopkins, "On Early Judaeo-Arabic Orthography," Zeitschrift für Arabische Linguistik, 12, 1984
- Blau, Joshua and Simon Hopkins, "Judaeo-Arabic Papyri: Collected, Edited, Translated and Analysed," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam, 9, 1987

- Drory, Rina, "Bilingualism and Cultural Images: The Hebrew and Arabic Introductions of Saadia Gaon's Sefer ha-Egbron," in Language and Culture in the Near East (Israel Oriental Studies, 25), edited by Shlomo Izre'el and Rina Drory, New York: Brill, 1995
- Halkin, Abraham S., "Judeo-Arabic Literature," in The Jews: Their History, Culture, and Religion (The Gitelson Library), edited by Louis Finkelstein, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1949; 3rd edition, London: Owen, 1961; 4th edition, New York: Schocken, 1970
- Hary, Benjamin, Multiglossia in Judeo-Arabic: With an Edition, Translation and Grammatical Study of the Cairene Purim Scroll (Études sur le judaïsme médiéval, 14), New York: Brill, 1992
- Steinschneider, Moritz, An Introduction to the Arabic Literature of the Jews, London: 1901
- Stillman, Norman, The Language and Culture of the Jews of Sefrou, Morocco: An Ethnolinguistic Study (Journal of Semitic Studies Monograph, 11), Manchester, Greater Manchester: University of Manchester, 1988

A major concern of scholarship on Judeo-Arabic has been the points of contact between it and other languages such as Classical Arabic, Colloquial Arabic, Hebrew, and Aramaic. To a large extent, the continuing debate over whether Judeo-Arabic constitutes a distinct language hinges on the precise nature of these relationships. Late 19th- and early 20th-century scholars maintained that the Arabic used by Jews was in its essentials undifferentiated from that employed by Muslims. More recently, however, this view has been challenged by Blau and others who maintain that Judeo-Arabic represents a linguistic development all its own. Often such assessments have repercussions for the broader question concerning Jewish participation in the general culture of Arabic-speaking societies.

STEINSCHNEIDER's lectures, originally published in serial form, are a natural outgrowth of the great bibliographer's incomparable mastery of the manuscript collections of Europe, coupled with his lifelong concern with the history of Jewish participation in Islamic culture. Unlike other pioneers of the Wissenschaft des Judentums, Steinschneider emphasized Judaism's embeddedness within the surrounding non-Jewish environment, in particular that of the Islamic world. "Arabic and German are the only languages and nationalities which have been of essential and continuing influence on Judaism," he insists. Steinschneider devotes the first part of his work to an exhaustive catalog of the Arabic names borne by Jews, which he painstakingly culls from the printed and manuscript resources at his command. In the second part, he offers some general observations on the position of Jews within medieval Muslim society, the major genres represented in Judeo-Arabic literature, and some of the salient features of the Arabic used by Jews. In this volume, as in all of his work, Steinschneider's dry exposition is amply compensated for by his remarkably fastidious attention to detail.

HALKIN provides a useful introduction to some of the main genres of Judeo-Arabic literature, including Bible translations, commentaries, grammatical treatises, halakhic monographs, and philosophical works. However, Halkin's description is heavily colored by a somewhat outdated supposition that the orientation of medieval Jewish culture in Spain and the East was predominantly rationalist. This bias is apparent in his emphasis on the philosophical works written in that period and in his sweeping dismissal of the literature produced in the post-medieval period. Moreover, unlike Blau (who stresses the distinctness of Judeo-Arabic from classical Arabic and, by implication, the cultural separation of Jews and Muslims), Halkin sees in Judeo-Arabic an expression of the close affinity that existed between the two cultures: "[T]his unhesitating readiness to write in a language other than Hebrew demonstrates of course an identification with environment which was not reached in other lands."

BLAU's work gives a linguistic history of classical (i.e., medieval) Judeo-Arabic that focuses on its emergence within the context of the general development of the Arabic language. Blau considers Judeo-Arabic to be a manifestation of Middle Arabic, which emerged after the Arab conquests of the seventh century in the newly founded urban centers of the Near East. Accordingly, Blau emphasizes the importance of Judeo-Arabic for a proper appreciation of the development of modern Arabic dialects from classical Arabic. At the same time, Blau insists that because of its unique orthographic, linguistic, and thematic features, Judeo-Arabic "must be accorded the status of a language in its own right." He draws sociological conclusions about the interaction between Jewish and Muslim society on the basis of this linguistic distinctiveness, asserting that "[t]he general use of Hebrew script clearly shows the barrier that separated the bulk of the Jewish population from Arab and Islamic culture."

Blau and Hopkins's pair of articles examine a number of ninth-century Judeo-Arabic papyri that exhibit an orthographic tradition different from that used almost universally in works written after the tenth century. Unlike Classical Judeo-Arabic Spelling, which is based on "a more or less mechanical transfer of classical Arabic orthography into Hebrews letters," this newly discovered orthographic system, which the authors designate Early Vulgar Judeo-Arabic Spelling (EVJAS), exhibits "a phonetic rendering of the Arabic sounds through the medium of Hebrew script." EVJAS's freedom from classical Arabic orthography leads Blau and Hopkins to the conclusion that it was a system used primarily by uneducated members of the Jewish community "who lacked accomplishment in literary Arabic." The authors attribute the disappearance of EVJAS after the tenth century to the enormous popularity of Saadya's Pentateuch commentary, which used classical Judeo-Arabic orthography and exerted a profound cultural influence on all strata of contemporary Jewish society. The general conclusions of this study are succinctly described in BLAU and HOPKINS (1984), while transcriptions, translations, and annotations of the papyri can be found in BLAU and HOPKINS (1987).

STILLMAN's book is the fruit of an intensive study of the dwindling Jewish community of Sefrou, Morocco, conducted in 1971 and 1972. While the centerpiece of the book is a close analysis of the unique dialect of Judeo-Arabic spoken by Sefrou's Jews, Stillman's concerns go beyond the parameters of pure linguistics. Assuming the "intimate, indeed inseparable, link between culture and language," he considers the distinctive Judeo-Arabic dialect of the Sefrou community as an important window onto its cultural life. The second part of the book is a collection of orally transmitted texts, in transliteration and translation, which help to fill out the sketch of the Sefrou Jewish community and its language as drawn in the book's first section.

HARY's study is a pioneering attempt at incorporating the wealth of Judeo-Arabic literature produced after the Middle Ages into the purview of scholarly research. Hary bemoans the general neglect of what he terms Later and Modern Judeo-Arabic—even among leading scholars of the field—out of a preference for the classical Judeo-Arabic of the medieval period. Building on linguistic research in Arabic, Hary emphasizes the element of multiglossia in Judeo-Arabic and identifies five distinct stages, each with its own multiglossic structure. The centerpiece of Hary's book is a critical edition, translation, and analysis of the Cairene Purim Scroll, a Judeo-Arabic text commemorating the miraculous deliverance of Cairo's Jewish community in 1524. Hary's grammatical study of the Purim Scroll locates that work within the multiglossic history of Judeo-Arabic that he proposes.

DRORY's brief but interesting article explores the cultural context underlying the bilingualism of Jewish literature in the medieval Islamic world. She begins with what she regards as the deliberate choice of Jewish writers to use either Arabic or Hebrew in their works, contending that this choice was determined by "a clear-cut division of functions . . . between the two languages." Arabic, she argues, was used for straightforward expression, serving what Roman Jakobson has termed the "referential function." Hebrew, on the other hand, filled a "literary-aesthetic function" and was used to produce texts that would arouse admiration. Moreover, she insists that each language was laden with its own unique "repertoire of culturally constructed images." As an illustration, Drory compares the Hebrew and Arabic introductions to Saadya's Sefer ha-Egron and shows how in each case the choice of language suggested wholly different models of reality.

ARNOLD FRANKLIN

Judeo-Spanish see Ladino Literature; Languages, Jewish

Judges, Book of

Alt, Albrecht, "The Settlement of the Israelites in Palestine," and "The Formation of the Israelite State in Palestine," in his Essays on Old Testament History and Religion, translated by R.A. Wilson, Oxford: Blackwell, 1966; Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1967

Boling, Robert G. (editor), Judges (Anchor Bible Series, vol. 6A), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1975

Burney, C.F., The Book of Judges: With Introduction and Notes, London: Rivingtons, 1918, 2nd edition, 1920; as The Book of Judges, with Introduction and Notes, and

Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Book of Kings, with an Introduction and Appendix, New York: Ktav, 1970

Fishelis, Avraham and Shmuel Fishelis, Judges: A New English Translation (Judaica Books of the Prophets Series), edited by A.J. Rosenberg, New York: Judaica Press, 1983

Klein, Lillian R., The Triumph of Irony in the Book of Judges (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 68), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1988

Malamat, Abraham, "The Period of the Judges," in The World History of the Jewish People, vol. 3: Judges, edited by B. Mazar, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, and London: Allen, 1971

Slotki, Judah J., "Introduction and Commentary on Judges," in Joshua and Judges (Soncino Books of the Bible Series), edited by A. Cohen, London: Soncino, 1950

Soggin, J. Alberto, Judges: A Commentary (Old Testament Library), translated by John Bowden, Philadelphia: Westminster, and London: SCM, 1981

Seventh of the 24 books of the Hebrew Bible, according to the traditional Jewish count, the Book of Judges is the second book of the "Nevi'im Rishonim" or "Historical Prophets." Judges covers the period from the death of Joshua to the eve of the monarchy. The date of the historical events it describes is much debated, but they probably took place sometime between 1300 and 1000 B.C.E. The "judges" of the book are political, military, or prophetic leaders who arise in time of political crisis in order to save one or more of the Israelite tribes from enemy oppressors. The book narrates the careers of six such leaders in detail and six others much more briefly. These judges differ from kings in that they are nondynastic and attain leadership solely because of popular support. The units in chapters three to 16 frequently follow a cycle: the Israelites worship idols rather than God, an enemy oppressor gains the upper hand, and the Israelites cry out to God, who sends a judge to redeem them. Freed from oppression, the Israelites resume their sinful ways. Chapters one and two of the book contain a recapitulation of the conquest, and chapters 17 to 21 contain narratives of particular tribes. The Gideon and Abimelech stories in chapters six to 11 argue strongly against monarchy as an institution. In contrast, chapters 17 to 21 describe political chaos using the refrain "in those days there was no king in Israel."

BOLING has written an omnibus commentary, dealing with philological as well as theological and archaeological issues. The work is well structured, containing a translation followed by a section of largely philological notes, followed by a "comment" section dealing with thematic and theological issues. This division makes the work useful both to interested but casual readers and to advanced students. The introduction deals with the historical background, describing society in the land of Israel as it might have looked at the time of the judges, based on ancient Near Eastern sources. Throughout, Boling uses current knowledge of ancient Near Eastern society to highlight theological messages in the text.

KLEIN shows how important the technique of irony is in the Book of Judges. Because this technique is so pervasive in Judges, she covers most of the issues of literary art in this biblical book. Influenced by modern narratology, she reads Judges not as an ancient Near Eastern historical text but as literature, to be investigated for its narrative craftsmanship. The ancient Near Eastern context is referred to only to provide background for the irony in the book. Klein is concerned with wordplay and other subtle ways in which irony is present in the story, when subjected to a close reading. This work is useful for casual readers and serious students.

ALT attempts to relate the early history of Canaan (known from extra-biblical sources) to the political structures described in Judges. Many of Alt's conclusions cannot be proven, but the essays are useful summaries of what is known about Canaan in the period described in Judges. Alt argues that the Israelite tribes absorbed many non-Israelite city-states in the monarchy period, and that this was decisive in changing the political character of Israel.

MALAMAT's essay provides more solid treatment of the relationship between the Book of Judges and ancient Near Eastern texts. He recognizes that in fact there is "a complete lack of extra-biblical sources directly pertaining to the historical events of the period of the Judges." He focuses on reconstructing the history of this period by distinguishing between historical and ahistorical sections of the book, arguing that the original story is often historical, but that it is edited into a theological (and ahistorical) framework in order to serve didactic purposes.

SLOTKI provides the best Jewish commentary on Judges available in English, designed to make the text accessible and acceptable to contemporary Jewish readers with little background in Bible. He draws primarily on traditional Jewish commentators and secondarily on modern non-Jewish commentators. His comments focus on difficult words or unfamiliar terms in the text, on points where the plot seems disjointed, and on passages that might be found objectionable by the modern reader, such as Judges 1:6, which speaks of the mutilation of a Canaanite king by the tribe of Judah: "Mutilation does not otherwise seem to have been practised by the Israelites. The same cannot be said for other nations of antiquity. . . ." His commentary also notes verses of particular significance to postbiblical Jewish tradition, for example the connection between Judges 21:19 and the celebration of the 15th of Av. The commentary is brief and well written.

The work of FISHELIS and FISHELIS is primarily an English summary of midrashic, didactic, and homiletical material collected from rabbinic sources and the popular Judeo-

Spanish anthology, Me'am Lo'ez. It tends to shy away from the classic medieval Jewish pashtanim (plain-sense interpreters) who are the mainstay of other volumes in this series, and whose comments elucidate genuine difficulties in the text. Like the other books in this series, however, it does present the Hebrew text of the Bible, along with Targum Pseudo-Jonathan, Rashi, Kimhi, Gersonides, and the Metsudot (the commentaries contained in the Lublin Rabbinic Bible) and on the facing page, an English translation of the biblical text, together with an English digest of traditional Jewish commentary. This particular volume's approach to its selection of commentary is foreshadowed by the simplistic approach expressed in the introduction: "The main lesson of the book, in short, is to teach us that we are completely under God's supervision." One wonders why 21 chapters of highly sophisticated prose and two millennia of interpretation are necessary if the plain sense of the narrative can be adequately distilled in this one-sentence moral lesson.

BURNEY's commentary is a classic product of early-20th-century biblical scholarship. He is concerned with determining authorship of different sections of the book, with the book's structure, and with establishing the "original" text of Judges. He also devotes much space (chiefly in the introduction) to "external information bearing on the period." He summarizes a great deal of ancient Near Eastern research, some of which is really more relevant to Kings, and much of which was only thought to be relevant at all in the excitement that accompanied 19th-century discoveries of Assyrian, Babylonian, and Egyptian texts. Several useful maps integrating then-new knowledge of biblical geography are included, showing sites thought in 1918 to be identifiable with events of Judges.

SOGGIN's commentary is chiefly of use to those versed in academic biblical scholarship. It contains extensive discussions aiming to establish the "correct" text of Judges, based on the Septuagint and other ancient versions. Discussions are often philological or structural and tend to ignore narrative studies and theology. The commentary integrates some material from ancient Near Eastern studies. The book contains a translation, a verse-by-verse commentary, and a discussion of each chapter's structure.

SHAWN ZELIG ASTER

Justice see Sanhedrin, Semikhah, and Rabbinate

K

Kabbalah: Translations

- Dan, Joseph and Ron Kiener (editors), The Early Kabbalah (Classics of Western Spirituality), New York: Paulist, 1986
- Englander, Lawrence A. with Herbert W. Basser, The Mystical Study of Ruth: Midrash HaNe'elam of the Zohar to the Book of Ruth (South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism, no. 75), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1993
- Fine, Lawrence, Safed Spirituality: Rules of Mystical Piety, the Beginning of Wisdom (Classics of Western Spirituality), New York: Paulist, 1984
- Gikatilla, Joseph ben Abraham, Gates of Light/Shā'are Orāh (Bronfman Library of Jewish Classics), translated by Avi Weinstein, San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994
- Ginsburg, Elliot K. (editor), Sod ha-Shabbat/The Mystery of the Sabbath: From the Tola'at Yāaqov of Meir ibn Gabbai (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989
- Green, Arthur, Keter: The Crown of God in Early Jewish Mysticism, Princeton, New Jersey, and Chichester, West Sussex: Princeton University Press, 1997
- Krassen, Miles (editor), The Generations of Adam (Classics of Western Spirituality), New York: Paulist, 1996
- Matt, Daniel Chanan, Zohar: The Book of Enlightenment (Classics of Western Spirituality), New York: Paulist, and London: SPCK, 1983
- Matt, Daniel Chanan, The Essential Kabbalah: The Heart of Jewish Mysticism, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995
- Scholem, Gershom, Zohar: The Book of Splendor (Schocken Library, 19), New York: Schocken, 1949; London: Rider, 1977
- Sperling, Harry, Maurice Simon, and Paul P. Levertoff (editors), The Zohar, 5 vols., London: Soncino, 1931–1934; New York: Bennet, 1958; 2nd edition, London: Soncino, 1984
- Tishby, Isaiah and Yeruham Fischel Lachower, Mishnat ha-Zohar, 2 vols., Jerusalem: Mosad Bialik, 1969; translated by David Goldstein as The Wisdom of the Zohar, 3 vols., Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991
- Verman, Mark, The Books of Contemplation: Medieval Jewish Mystical Sources (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992
- Wald, Stephen G., The Doctrine of the Divine Name: An Introduction to Classical Kabbalistic Theology (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 149), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988

Kabbalistic texts are difficult. They are often characterized by dense, allusive writing styles. The central kabbalistic work, the Zohar, is written in a particularly obscure Aramaic, so that from the very first century of its circulation, sections of it were translated into Hebrew for the edification of larger segments of the populace. As the Zohar and other works circulated through the West during the Renaissance, they were the object of intense interest. Italian Neoplatonists, working in conjunction with kabbalists who were flirting with apostasy, translated the Zohar, Joseph Gikatilla's Gates of Light, and other important works into Latin. In all these cases, the simple assumption was that if the canon of Jewish mysticism were only translated, it would thereby become accessible. In fact, this has seldom been the case, and certain source texts in Kabbalah may arguably be untranslatable, owing to their various levels of nuance, pun, and concrete poetic meaning. Nonetheless, ever since the Renaissance, issues of style have not prevented a few idealists from attempting to render the teachings of Jewish mysticism in various other vernaculars.

Today, with the flowering of interest in spiritual traditions, the process of translation continues unabated. The following comprise a selection of some of the better translations of kabbalistic works. In referring to them as such, it must be stressed that an important body of mystical writings, namely the literature of Hasidism, falls outside of this category and rightfully occupies a niche all its own in Jewish literature.

The literature of the early Kabbalah is represented in three studies. Mark VERMAN's edition of The Books of Contemplation was the first critical edition in any language of these important works. Selections from these works as well as the most representative texts of the first flowering of Kabbalah in Provence and Gerona are available in DAN and KIENER's The Early Kabbalah, which also has impressive notes. GREEN's Keter is an important study of the process through which ancient postbiblical motifs of the divine monarch gave way to the theoretical portrayal of this realm of monarchy as synonymous with the highest emanation (sefirah) of existence, the aforementioned Keter. Verman and Green's translations are academic studies in their own right, while Kiener and Dan's work represents a popular edition with scholarly proprieties, in line with the editorial policies of the Paulist Press Classics of Western Spirituality series.

SPERLING, SIMON, and LEVERTOFF's translation of the Zohar, the central work of Jewish mysticism, covers about half the full work and features some erroneous translations. It seems that the translators' understandings of the work's symbolic nuances were incomplete. Far superior is TISHBY and LACHOWER's The Wisdom of the Zohar, which includes extensive topical introductions and excellent translations of a number of sections. MATT (1983) and SCHOLEM have produced popular editions, each of which consists of short, widely circulated sections. Matt's work is distinguished by a readable introduction and excellent notes. WALD provides a good translation of an obscure yet important passage from the Zohar; this work also serves as the first critical edition of any Zoharic text. ENGLANDER's translation of the Zohar on Ruth presents a previously unavailable section of that work. GIKATILLA's aforementioned Gates of Light, a work from the same medieval milieu as the Zohar, has been rendered in an excellent translation, with good notes, by Weinstein.

The vast literature of the period following the publication of the Zohar has been particularly neglected by the academy. Three volumes are of particular importance, in that they reproduce works influenced by the Zohar. GINSBURG's translation of Meir ibn Gabbai's Sod ha-Shabbat (The Mystery of the Sabbath) is the first example of post-Zoharic mysticism to reach a general audience. FINE's book has made available a number of writings of the Safed mystics, highlighting the severe and bleak asceticism that lay at the heart of much of their thought. KRASSEN has produced an important translation of a section of Shenei Luhot ha-Berit (The Two Tablets of the Covenant, also known as Shelah), a widely circulated early 17th-century work drenched in the teachings of the Safed renaissance. Finally, for the reader wishing to take a few first steps in the mystical orchard, MATT (1995) provides the best introduction to the texts.

PINCHAS GILLER

See also Kabbalah: Introductions; Zohar

Kabbalah: Introductions

- Fine, Lawrence (editor), Essential Papers on Kabbalah (Essential Papers on Jewish Studies), New York: New York University Press, 1995
- Ginsburg, Elliot K., The Sabbath in the Classical Kabbalah (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989
- Halamish, Mosheh, An Introduction to the Kabbalah (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999
- Halperin, David, The Faces of the Chariot: Early Jewish Responses to Ezekiel's Vision (Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum, 16), Tübingen: Mohr, 1988
- Idel, Moshe, Kabbalah: New Perspectives, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1988

- Liebes, Yehuda, Studies in Jewish Myth and Jewish Messianism (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993
- Scholem, Gershom, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (Hilda Stroom Lectures), New York: Schocken, 1941; 3rd edition, New York: Schocken, 1954; London: Thames and Hudson, 1955
- Scholem, Gershom, Ursprung und Anfänge der Kabbala, 1962; translated by Allan Arkush as Origins of the Kabbalah, edited by R.J. Zwi Werblowsky, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1987
- Scholem, Gershom, On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism, New York: Schocken, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1965
- Scholem, Gershom, Kabbalah (Library of Jewish Knowledge), New York: Quadrangle/New York Times, 1974
- Scholem, Gershom, On the Mystical Shape of the Godhead: Basic Concepts in the Kabbalah, New York: Schocken 1991
- Wolfson, Elliot, Through a Speculum That Shines: Vision and Imagination in Medieval Jewish Mysticism, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994
- Wolfson, Elliot, Along the Path: Studies in Kabbalistic Myth, Symbolism, and Hermeneutics, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995
- Wolfson, Elliot, Circle in the Square: Studies in the Use of Gender in Kabbalistic Symbolism, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995

Among the major achievements of Jewish studies has been the reintroduction of Kabbalah to the spiritual and scholarly discourse of modernity. Kabbalah was much maligned by Heinrich Graetz and other exponents of the Wissenschaft school of thought characteristic of 19th-century Jewish scholarship. Hasidism, which Graetz viewed as a melange of superstition and social recidivism, was reappraised by the existentialist philosopher Martin Buber and by Hillel Zeitlin, martyr of the Warsaw ghetto. Kabbalah was similarly due for reappraisal, and a redeemer arose in the mid-20th century in the form of Gershom Scholem of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

SCHOLEM (1941) is a seminal linear presentation of the development of Jewish mysticism, tracing Kabbalah from its origins in the mystery traditions of antiquity through its flowering in the Zohar and the teachings of the Safed mystics into the present-day hasidic movement. Scholem's elegant study is undisputedly the prerequisite work for the beginning student of Kabbalah.

Scholem's 1941 work, however, neglects the mysterious recrudescence of Kabbalah in 12th-century Provence and Catalonia and it does not discuss the influence of the mysterious book Bahir, the subject of Scholem's doctoral thesis. These desiderata were rectified in SCHOLEM (1962). SCHOLEM (1974) reproduces all the articles Scholem contributed to the Encyclopaedia Judaica, and, as a monograph, this compilation may be too dense for the lay reader. Two English works, SCHOLEM (1965) and SCHOLEM (1991), together translate Scholem's Hebrew work Essential Chapters in the Understanding of the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism.

After Scholem's death, a new generation of scholars began to reexamine his portrayal of kabbalistic history and to develop some new ideas. The first and most self-conscious reassessment is that of Moshe Idel. Idel has written extensively on the neglected oeuvre of the 13th-century kabbalist Abraham Abulafia. In his comprehensive statement on Kabbalah, IDEL questions the historiographical premises of Scholem's work, particularly the latter's portrayal of later Kabbalah as a messianic juggernaut fueled by a response to history. Idel elevates the theoreticians of mystical speculation, whom Scholem considered somewhat ancillary, to a central role in kabbalistic history, emphasizing the influence of figures such as Abulafia, Moses Cordovero, and Menahem Recanati. He argues for the continuing relevance of these mystics in such later phenomena as Hasidism.

A more traditional approach to continuing Scholem's research is evident in LIEBES. Liebes has chosen the central canonical traditions of Kabbalah, namely the Zohar, the Lurianic tradition, and the best known hasidic masters, as his areas of specialization. His research posits a messianic tradition whose origins are in the Zohar itself. This tradition extends through the Safed renaissance, the Sabbatian heresy, and into Hasidism. In Liebes's view, this tradition bifurcates into a continuing struggle between light and darkness, in which Shabbetai Tsevi's mystical heresy evolved into a satanic force that vanquished such original hasidic masters as the Ba'al Shem Tov and Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav.

Wolfson has adopted Scholem's method of examining given ideas and phenomena as they evolve through the historical processes of Jewish thought. WOLFSON (1994) is a sweeping work that moves toward identifying an underlying myth in Kabbalah that is sharply divergent from the portrayals of earlier scholars. In this work as well as in the articles collected in WOLFSON (1995a and 1995b), one may chart his progress towards this understanding. According to Wolfson, the inner mystique of Kabbalah is the process in which enlightenment brings on a crossing of gender boundaries, so that the masculine becomes the feminine and vice versa. This process of "oracular phallocentrism" comprises at the very least a crucial dimension of Jewish esotericism.

HALAMISH provides an overview of Kabbalah with particular attention to the philosophical issues. Halamish's approach is phenomenological and serves as a refreshing counter to the historiographical thinking so prevalent among Scholem's students. This work addresses aspects of the kabbalistic tradition in light of their relationship to general Jewish thought, as opposed to their role in the phenomenology of mysticism, collecting important sources from across the historical development of Kabbalah.

FINE includes a number of important essays by distinguished contributors to the contemporary discourse on Jewish mysticism. Two key essays included in this collection are Daniel Chanan Matt's inquiry into the concept of the mystical void in Jewish mysticism, "Ayin: The Concept of Nothingness in Jewish Mysticism," and an excellent article by Chava Weissler on Ashkenazi women's spirituality.

Certain studies provide cogent introductions to specific areas within the field of Kabbalah broadly conceived. HALPERIN is an engrossing portrayal of the early period of Jewish mysticism rooted in contemplation of the merkabah, the chariot described in the oblique first chapter of the Book of Ezekiel. Halperin's work portrays the merkabah tradition as the esoteric core of Pharisaism and analyzes the revelation experience of these talmudic mystics of Roman Palestine in bold psychological terms.

GINSBURG reviews the mystical underpinnings of traditional Jewish sabbath observance. His study concludes before the innovations of the Safed renaissance, concentrating on the teachings of the Zohar and of the mystics of the first generations after the Zohar's appearance. Ginsburg defines the mystical conception of the sabbath and its rituals in terms of the creation of sacred space, a notion that has had considerable resonance in the study of world religions.

PINCHAS GILLER

See also Kabbalah: Translations; Zohar

Kahane, Meir 1932–1990

American-born Israeli vigilante and political activist

Cohen-Almagor, Raphael, The Boundaries of Liberty and Tolerance: The Struggle against Kahanism in Israel, Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994

Dolgin, Janet L., Jewish Identity and the JDL, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1977

Friedman, Robert I., The False Prophet: Rabbi Meir Kahane, from FBI Informant to Knesset Member, Brooklyn, New York: Lawrence Hill, and London: Faber and Faber, 1990

Mergui, Raphaël, Meir Kahane: Le rabbin qui fait peur aux juifs, 1985; translated by Philippe Simonnot as Israel's Ayatollahs: Meir Kahane and the Far Right in Israel, London and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Saqi, 1987

Shamir, Michal, "Kach and the Limits to Political Tolerance in Israel" in Israel's Odd Couple: The 1984 Knesset Elections and the National Unity Government, edited by Daniel Judah Elazar and Shmuel Sandler, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1990

Sprinzak, Ehud, The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right, New York: Oxford University Press, 1991

Meir Kahane was born Martin David Kahane into a rabbinical yet highly nationalist family. His father adhered to Revisionist Zionism rather than the more moderate Religious Zionism of the Mizrahi movement. Kahane grew up in the subculture of Betar, the Revisionist Zionist youth group, and idolized its founder, Vladimir Ze'ev Jabotinsky, the archetypal fin de siècle Jewish intellectual. Jabotinsky had been a role model for a generation of youth including Menahem Begin and Avraham Stern. His advocacy of a proud nationalism, his celebration of military prowess, his promotion of badar ("dignity") and ritual, and his elevation of individualism attracted them. Betar, however, had become far more radical than its mentor and was heavily influenced by a Zionist far right as well as the authoritarianism of statist European regimes of the 1930s. Kahane's coming of age coincided with the revelations of the Holocaust and the struggle for an independent Jewish state. All of this helped to forge a social container for his insecurities and aimlessness, endowing him with a sense of purpose as well as delusions of political grandeur.

FRIEDMAN documents these early years in a revealing account in the tradition of investigative journalism. Friedman is particularly illuminating in detailing Kahane's alternate life as the bareheaded, secular Michael King, provider of information for the Federal Bureau of Investigation and intrepid sexual explorer. Friedman also documents the sources of financial support for Kahane's activities and projects, including the comedian Jackie Mason and New York's Syrian Jewish community.

It was perhaps his admiration for Jabotinsky that drew Kahane toward the world of journalism and polemicism. In the 1960s he began a long association with the ultraorthodox, far-right Brooklyn-based Jewish Press. His regular broadsides against liberals, leftists, assimilationists, secularists, opponents of orthodoxy, and perceived enemies of the Jewish people made a significant contribution in developing the paper's popular appeal.

Half of MERGUI's journalistic account is devoted to a long interview with Kahane, concentrating in particular on Kahane's views on Israel as a Torah state and his assertion that Judaism and democratic values are in opposition. In the 1980s Kahane wrote several tracts on relations between Jews and non-Jews, but long before, in 1968, he had founded the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in response to an explosion of black militancy with its demand for affirmative action and community control.

Kahane's talent for public relations and the marketing of images and slogans as well as the vigilante character of the JDL attracted large numbers of youth. It propelled Kahane and his approach into the national arena and offered a magnetic alternative to the pedestrianism of the Jewish establishment. DOLGIN argues cogently that this approach provided a way of life, a mindset, and an identity for many disaffected young Jews from a variety of backgrounds. By 1970 the JDL had embarked on a campaign of hit-and-run violence, which included plans to bomb Soviet institutions and black community centers, assassinations of PLO officials, and the hijacking of an Egyptian airliner. The retaliation by the authorities to these events led many members of the JDL, including Kahane, to depart for Israel.

SPRINZAK's book on the Israeli far right contains the best analysis in English of Kahane's sojourn in Israel and his Kach party. Sprinzak writes that Kahane was able to "attract bitter and insecure people who project a sense of failure: failure in the Israeli economy, failure to identify with the nation's symbols of legitimacy." Sprinzak examines Kahane's theory of revenge and the call for Jewish isolationism, catastrophic messianism, xenophobia, social Darwinism, and racist symbolism. Kahane's election to the Knesset in 1984 came at a time when the idea of "transferring" the Palestinians out of Israel and the West Bank was beginning to gain political credence. SHAMIR details the political constellation of social forces in the 1984 election, which permitted Kach—a quasi-fascist movement, according to Sprinzak—to gain national legitimacy with a seat in the Knesset. Although opinion polls indicated growing support for Kahane, the Central Elections Committee disqualified Kach two weeks before the 1988 election. This move relegated Kach once more to a vociferous extra-parliamentary group. Even so, its activities in the 1980s aroused the increasing concern of intellectuals and educators who viewed Kahanism as a racist pollutant in Israeli life. These activities also provoked profound discussions in legal circles on the status of such a movement in the Jewish state, an issue that COHEN-ALMAGOR expounds at length. As all non-hagiographic studies indicate, Kahane was an unstable figure who did not possess the intelligence of Jabotinsky or the political ability of Begin. Despite his undeniable charm, Kahane exuded a propensity to fantasize and possessed an inability to work as a team player. Inevitably, he disagreed and argued with those who could have assisted him and his movement to gain legitimacy and power.

COLIN SHINDLER

Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem 1881–1983

Lithuanian-born American rabbi, founder of the Reconstructionist movement

- Breslauer, S. Daniel, Mordecai Kaplan's Thought in a Postmodern Age (South Florida-Rochester-Saint Louis Studies on Religion and the Social Order, vol. 8), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1994
- Goldsmith, Emanuel S., Mel Scult, and Robert M. Seltzer, The American Judaism of Mordecai M. Kaplan (Reappraisals in Jewish Social and Intellectual History), New York: New York University Press, 1990
- Gurock, Jeffrey S. and Jacob J. Schacter, A Modern Heretic and a Traditional Community: Mordecai M. Kaplan, Orthodoxy, and American Judaism, New York: Columbia University Press, 1996
- Libowitz, Richard, Mordecai M. Kaplan and the Development of Reconstructionism (Studies in American Religion, vol. 9), New York: Mellen, 1983
- Scult, Mel, Judaism Faces the Twentieth Century: A Biography of Mordecai M. Kaplan (American Jewish Civilization), Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1993

Mordecai Kaplan's life and thought have recently been the subject of renewed interest, following a period of quiescence immediately after his death in 1983. The Reconstructionist Jewish movement that he started has expanded to become a fourth denomination in North American Jewish life, and as the movement has evolved in new directions, a number of studies have examined Kaplan's unique American Judaism.

Kaplan's program of Reconstructionism represented a uniquely American approach to the problems of adjusting Judaism to the modern, secular, and scientific norms of the 20th century. He remained ambivalent throughout his life about whether his program constituted the seeds of a fourth Jewish denomination alongside Reform, Conservatism, and Orthodoxy or was instead a "school of thought" designed to be applied across the spectrum of the existing movements. But Kaplan was unambiguous and unrelenting in his insistence that a supernatural Judaism could not survive. His thinking proceeds from the assumption that Judaism is the evolving religious civilization of the Jewish people rather than the supernatural revelation of God. All of the specific categories of Kaplan's thought and program flow from this fundamental and radical revision of the claims of inherited tradition.

SCULT's biography investigates the life and thought of Kaplan through 1934. Scult describes Kaplan's family of origin and his adult relationships, adding vivid private details to the better-known story of Kaplan's public and intellectual life. Scult's extensive use of Kaplan's diaries is a major strength of this sympathetic treatment, for these diaries reveal Kaplan's feelings of insecurity, uncertainty, and apprehension regarding his literary abilities and his chosen professional path. Scult's treatment of Kaplan's acceptance, vacillation, and then rejection of his appointment to head the Jewish Institute of Religion sheds new light on a well-known career crisis in Kaplan's life. The author's analysis represents a revision of several commonly held assumptions about Kaplan, both in intellectual and personal terms. For example, Scult disputes arguments that Kaplan's thought was derivative of the work of Emile Durkheim and John Dewey. In general, the author argues that Kaplan's thought was original and that he was an intellectual pioneer, rather than the eminent synthesizer of emerging intellectual trends typically described in other accounts.

LIBOWITZ's insightful study offers an intellectual analysis of the major streams of Jewish and general academic thought that were synthesized in the emerging Kaplan program of Reconstructionism. While Scult argues for the originality of Kaplan's thinking, Libowitz supports the more common view that he was a derivative albeit creatively synthetic thinker; for example, Libowitz argues that Kaplan relied on the sociology of Emile Durkheim, a hypothesis that Scult challenges.

GUROCK and SCHACTER, writing from the perspective of contemporary Orthodoxy, are less sympathetic than Scult and Libowitz toward Kaplan's naturalistic treatment of Judaism as the product of the Jewish people and his rejection of the doctrine of scriptural revelation. The study covers the early years of Kaplan's rabbinic career, follows him through his gradual break with Orthodoxy between 1915–1922, and then argues that Kaplan and the leadership of Orthodoxy continued to interact thereafter. Kaplan maintained an almost unique position as an English-speaking, Orthodox-trained rabbi who was able to speak to the children of Orthodox immigrants, and this fact partially explains why certain Orthodox lay leaders indulged Kaplan's increasingly public deviance from traditional thought and practice.

BRESLAUER's book challenges the common assumption that Kaplan's thought is uncritically steeped in the assumptions of modernity and consequently only interesting as a particular example of an eclipsed era in U.S. Jewish thought. Breslauer asserts that the framework and content of Kaplan's thought are uniquely open to the insights of postmodernism, an intellectual movement that Kaplan anticipated by several generations.

GOLDSMITH, SCULT, and SELTZER have edited a comprehensive analysis of the major categories of Kaplan's thinking, with contributions from 19 scholars under five headings:

"Contexts," "Stages in a Life," "Intellectual Contemporaries," "Reinterpreting Judaism," and "The Ideologist." This anthology complements Ira Eisenstein and Eugene Kohn's earlier study, Mordecai M. Kaplan, An Evaluation (1952); read together, these two texts chronicle Kaplan's life and explain his very considerable influence on 20th-century U.S. Judaism.

RICHARD HIRSH

Karaites

Ankori, Zvi, Karaites in Byzantium: The Formative Years, 970–1100, New York: Columbia University Press, 1959

Birnbaum, Philip (compiler), Karaite Studies, New York: Hermon, 1971

Gil, Moshe, A History of Palestine, 634–1099, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992

Mann, Jacob, Texts and Studies in Jewish History and Literature, vol. 2: Karaitica, Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1931

Miller, Philip E., Karaite Separatism in Nineteenth-Century Russia: Joseph Solomon Lutski's "Epistle of Israel's Deliverance," Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1993

Nemoy, Leon, Karaite Anthology, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1952

Polliack, Meira, The Karaite Tradition of Arabic Bible Translation, New York: Brill, 1997

Wieder, Naphtali, The Judean Scrolls and Karaism, London: East and West Library, 1962

The Karaites are a Jewish sect whose teachings reject the authority of Rabbanite tradition and leadership, refuting the concept of the Oral Law and talmudic literature and recognizing the Hebrew Bible as the only divinely revealed authoritative source for law. Karaism emerged, along with a number of other non-rabbinic Jewish groups, in the Islamic Middle East during the eighth and ninth centuries, and the sect posed a serious challenge to Rabbanite leadership in the tenth and 11th centuries. Subsequently, small but flourishing Karaite communities were found at various times in Constantinople, the Crimea, and Poland-Lithuania. Karaism still exists, mainly in Israel. Most significant contemporary studies of Karaism are published in journal articles, but there are a number of important books on the topic.

MANN's massive collection presents a wide range of studies covering all periods of Karaite history, accompanied by Karaite texts in English translation. Avoiding the difficult question of Karaite origins, the book is divided into three major sections. In the first section, Mann deals with the important early period, from the ninth through the 11th century, when Karaites settled in Palestine (especially Jerusalem) and developed a "keen intellectual rivalry [with the rabbis] concerning the theological ideas of Judaism and the interpretations of the Bible." Section two investigates the Karaites of Byzantium, Turkey, and the Crimea, focusing on the 16th through the 18th century. The third section discusses the Karaites in Lithuania and Poland, with special attention given to communal organization, economics, and relations with the Rabbanites. This book remains a foundation for serious inquiry into Karaism.

NEMOY's book is the best introduction to Karaism, both for the general and the academic reader. Its chapters on individual Karaite thinkers are arranged in chronological order, starting with the eighth-century figure Anan ben David, who is acknowledged by many Karaites as the movement's founder, and concluding with the 15th-century codifier of Karaite law, Elijah Bashyazi. Each chapter introduces a Karaite author and provides a selection from his texts in English translation. This work is Nemoy's only book on Karaites, although his journal articles are among the most important in the field.

WIEDER tackles the difficult problem of possible connections between the Dead Sea Scrolls and Karaite religious thought, noting their similar ideologies, exegetical methods, and phraseologies. According to Wieder, these correspondences suggest that contributors of the first-century C.E. Qumran community survived into the ninth century and influenced early Karaites. Wieder's theory has influenced some subsequent scholarship, but it remains controversial. This is the best book-length treatment of the subject.

GIL's book on Palestine covering the period from the rise of Islam until the Crusades covers much more than the history of the Karaites, but his chapter titled "Karaites and Samaritans" is the only up-to-date, synthetic treatment of Karaite florescence in the early period. In addition to this chapter, references to the Karaites abound throughout this major work. Gil presents the problem of Karaite origins with care, demonstrating the issue's complexity by identifying many possible antecedents to fully developed medieval Karaism. His carefully researched footnotes provide the reader with a complete introduction to scholarship on Karaites.

POLLACK focuses on Karaite translation of the Bible into Arabic in the early period, while directing the reader's attention to large ideological issues. She demonstrates that the methodology of Karaite translators reflected scripturalist attitudes toward the biblical text and rejected much traditional (usually rabbinic) biblical interpretation. The Karaites valued direct interrogation of the text, while reacting against Rabbanite interpretive notions and translation techniques. These Karaite attitudes led to a kind of medieval individualism based upon technical linguistic expertise, which resulted in multiple voices within Karaism. Pollack also argues that these methods have antecedents in pre-Karaite Jewish traditions. This important contribution to Jewish Bible studies in the Middle Ages assumes of the reader an acquaintance with classical Hebrew grammar background.

ANKORI investigates the transfer of Karaite scholarship and leadership from the Islamic world to the Orthodox Christian domains of the Byzantine Empire. Drawing from primary sources that range from the tenth through the 15th century, he interprets several Karaite manuscripts that had been overlooked by other scholars. Ankori demonstrates that Byzantine conquests of Muslim territories in the tenth century led to an influx of Karaite Jews into Constantinople, where they embarked on a massive "Hebrew literary project" to translate their texts from Arabic into Hebrew and to transform their ideology. He carefully contextualizes this centuries-long process against the background of Christian dominion and Rabbanite dominance. Sometimes very technical in its presentation, this is an important work of Karaite studies and requires careful reading.

MILLER's work is the only book-length study in English that deals with the Karaites of Eastern Europe in a balanced manner. The Eastern European Karaites' movement away from Jewish identity since the early 19th century has inspired an apologetic and polemical literature based on questionable scholarship. Miller critically examines the beginnings of Russian Karaite separatism in the wake of the partition of Poland in 1795, demonstrating that the widening of the rift originated when Simhah Babovich, a Crimean Karaite leader, traveled to St. Petersburg in 1827 to seek an exemption for the Karaites from czarist anti-Jewish legislation. The successful outcome of this mission laid the foundations for Karaite institutional separation from Rabbanite Judaism, which in the 20th century encouraged the Karaites to assimilate their religion to European models and establish an ethnic identity based upon non-Judaic characteristics.

BIRNBAUM collects seven of the most important journal articles on Karaism into his volume. Three of these essays, including the book-length article "The Karaite Literary Opponents of Saadia Gaon," are by Samuel Poznanski, the founder of 20th-century Karaite studies. Other topics covered here include Karaite liturgy and the reading of the Torah (by Jacob Mann); the historical evidence for Anan ben David (by Leon Nemoy); and a comparison of Karaite halakhah with the halakhah of the Sadducees, the Samaritans, and Philo (by Bernard Revel). Birnbaum's volume is essential to Karaite studies.

FRED ASTREN

Kashrut see Dietary Laws

Kaufmann, Yehezkel 1889–1963

Ukrainian-born Israeli biblical historian

Greenberg, Moshe, Studies in the Bible and Jewish Thought (JPS Scholar of Distinction Series), Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1995.

Kaufmann, Yehezkel, Toldot ha-Emunah ha-Yisre'elit, 1937; translated and abridged by Moshe Greenberg as The Religion of Israel: From Its Beginnings to the Babylonian Exile, Chicago: University of Chicago, and London: Allen and Unwin, 1960

Kaufmann, Yehezkel, Ha-Sipur ha-Mikra'i 'al kibush ha-arets, 1955; translated by M. Dagut as The Biblical Account of the Conquest of Canaan, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1985

Kaufmann, Yehezkel, History of the Religion of Israel, vol. 4: From the Babylonian Captivity to the End of Prophecy, translated by C.W. Efroymson, New York: Ktav, 1977

- Kaufmann, Yehezkel, Christianity and Judaism: Two Covenants, translated by C.W. Efroymson, Jerusalem: Magnes, 1988, 2nd edition, 1996
- Knohl, Israel, Mikdash ha-demamah, 1992; translated by Jackie Feldman and Peretz Rodman as The Sanctuary of Silence: The Priestly Torah and the Holiness School, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1995
- Levenson, Jon, "Yehezkel Kaufmann and Mythology," Conservative Judaism, 36(2), 1982
- Potok, Chaim, "The Mourners of Yehezkel Kaufmann," Conservative Judaism, 18(2), 1964
- Schwarz, Leo (editor), Great Ages and Ideas of the Jewish People, New York: Random House, 1956
- Talmon, Shemaryahu, "Yehezkel Kaufmann's Approach to Biblical Research," Conservative Judaism, 25(2), 1971
- Tigay, Jeffrey, You Shall Have No Other Gods: Israelite Religion in the Light of Hebrew Inscriptions (Harvard Semitic Studies, 31), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1986

Yehezkel Kaufmann, a leading scholar of Bible and Jewish history and professor of Bible at the Hebrew University in the last years of his life, exerts a vast influence on modern Jewish biblical scholarship. His eight-volume magnum opus, Toldot ha-Emunah ha-Yisre'elit (History of Israelite Religion), published between 1937 and 1957, has been central in setting the agenda of Israeli biblical criticism. The first seven volumes of this work (covering the period from Israel's origins to the beginning of the Babylonian exile—that is, up until the prophet Ezekiel) are abridged and translated in KAUFMANN (1960). The last volume (covering the late exilic and postexilic era—that is, from Deutero-Isaiah through the end of the biblical canon) is translated in its entirety in KAUFMANN (1977). A convenient summary of Kaufmann's approach appears in his own contribution to SCHWARZ's collection, and a portrait of this lonely but much admired scholar emerges from the touching article by POTOK.

Kaufmann's thesis in his classic work is in part a response to earlier biblical critical theories, especially those associated with the seminal work of Julius Wellhausen. Kaufmann maintains that Israelite religion was monotheistic from a very early period. He rejects the view that monotheism emerged only in the exilic period as the result of a long development from paganism. According to Kaufmann, even Israelite folk religion was monotheistic well before the period of the monarchy. By monotheism, Kaufmann means not only the belief in one God, but moreover the belief that this one God is supreme over nature, unaffected by magic, and beyond mythology. So unfamiliar were Israelites with paganism that they completely misunderstood the nature of idolatry, thinking that pagans actually worshiped wood and stones rather than the gods represented by them. The many biblical diatribes against foreign religions testify to the completely monotheistic religion of the Israelites precisely because these diatribes misrepresent the worship and faith of Israel's neighbors; had the Israelites actually participated in that worship, they could not possibly have portrayed it so inaccurately. Because he insists that Israelites were so little tainted by paganism, Kaufmann must deny the portrayal of backsliding Israelites found in many biblical texts.

The prophets and the authors of Kings exaggerate the extent of polytheism among Israelites, partly as a result of their need to justify the punishment the Israelites faced. While Kaufmann asserts that monotheism's emergence represented a revolutionary change rather than an evolutionary process, he emphasizes an evolution within Israelite monotheism from early priestly texts to later prophetic ones. Earlier texts do not fully develop the implications of monotheism, but classical prophets such as Isaiah and Jeremiah espouse ideas that follow from the radical monotheism of the Bible, such as the eventual recognition of the one God by all humanity and the primacy of morality over cult.

Kaufmann departs from earlier and contemporary biblical critics especially in one other way: he dates all the sources of the Pentateuch to the preexilic period. Wellhausen and his followers viewed the priestly sections as the Pentateuch's latest strand, reflecting the degeneration of pristine prophetic religion into dry and lifeless legalism. Kaufmann critiques the proofs Wellhausen used to support his late dating and consequently views priestly texts as among the very earliest Israelite documents that have survived. Thus these clearly monotheistic texts help testify to the original and central role that monotheism played throughout Israelite history.

Another aspect of Kaufmann's insistence on the absolute separation between Israelite religion and its pagan neighbors appears in KAUFMANN (1955). There he argues that the general picture in the Book of Joshua is accurate: the Israelites entered Canaan from the outside and conquered its highlands in a swift military campaign. Consequently, relatively little intercourse between Israelites and Canaanites took place at the outset of Israel's history, and thus the Israelites knew little of paganism.

Kaufmann's proposals have been variously received. Many contemporary scholars agree that priestly material is early, but a majority continue to view it as late. KNOHL presents what amounts to a synthesis of the two positions: he shows that the central stratum of priestly legislation and narrative is early, but he also identifies a distinct stratum in Leviticus and Numbers that was composed during the late preexilic and exilic periods. Much of Wellhausen's evidence for the lateness of priestly texts in fact comes from this separate document. Knohl's work also contains a useful bibliography on the voluminous literature relating to the dating of priestly material in the Pentateuch. Kaufmann's insistence (in conflict with both modern scholarship and the testimony of prophets such as Hosea and Jeremiah) that few Israelites actually prayed to gods other than YHWH has received support from TIGAY. He notes that archaeological evidence does not support the claim that ancient Israelites were polytheistic; Israelite names found on ancient artifacts and documents refer often to YHWH but almost never to non-Israelite gods. Nonetheless, Kaufmann's notion of an absolute break between paganism and monotheism is probably overstated. LEVENSON points out that the inaccuracy of biblical portrayals of idolatry may result not from ignorance but from the tendentious and polemical nature of these texts. Moreover, he shows that elements of mythology are more common in the Bible than Kaufmann acknowledges. Kaufmann's assertions regarding the conquest of Canaan have found few adherents.

Helpful discussions of Kaufmann's work on the Bible, its contributions and its limitations, appear in TALMON and in GREENBERG.

Earlier in his life, Kaufmann wrote a four-volume work, Golah ve-Nekhar ("Exile and Alienation"), published in 1929–1930, which examines the life of the Jewish people in exile from a sociological and philosophical point of view. Three chapters of this work are available in English in KAUFMANN (1988). While Golah ve-Nekhar as a whole discusses the reasons for the survival of the Jews as a nation during the exile (due to the "iron barrier" of their religion), the chapters translated by Efroymsen focus on Christianity and Islam. These two religions continue Judaism's fight against paganism, and Kaufmann acknowledges the integrity of the religious polemics of each of these three monotheistic faiths. He examines the origins of Christianity as a Jewish messianic movement and its separation from Judaism. In the last chapter, he examines the nature of Jewish identity in its ethnic and religious dimensions, the relationship of Judaism and Greek culture, and the persecution of Jews at the hands of Christians and Muslims.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Ketubbah

Davidovitch, David, The Ketuba: Jewish Marriage Contracts through the Ages, Tel Aviv: Lewin-Epstein, 1968; New York: Adama, 1985

Diamant, Anita, The New Jewish Wedding, New York: Summit, 1985

Epstein, Louis M., The Jewish Marriage Contract: A Study in the Status of the Woman in Jewish Law, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1927

Friedman, Mordechai Akiva, Jewish Marriage in Palestine: A Cairo Genizah Study, vol. 1: The "Ketubba" Traditions of Eretz Israel, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1980

Friedman, Mordechai Akiva, Jewish Marriage in Palestine: A Cairo Genizah Study, vol. 2: The "Ketubba" Texts, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1980

Gaster, Moses, The Ketubah, Berlin: Rimon, 1923; 2nd edition, New York: Hermon, 1974

Leifer, Daniel I., "On Writing New Ketubot," in The Jewish Woman: New Perspectives, edited by Elizabeth Koltun, New York: Schocken, 1976

Sabar, Shalom, Ketubbah: Jewish Marriage Contracts of the Hebrew Union College Skirball Museum and Klau Library, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1990

Sabar, Shalom, Mazal Tov: Illuminated Jewish Marriage Contracts from the Israel Museum Collection, Jerusalem: Israel Museum, 1993

Satlow, Michael, "Reconsidering the Rabbinic Ketubah Payment," in The Jewish Family in Antiquity (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 289), edited by Shaye J.D. Cohen, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1993

The ketubbah (plural, ketubbot) is the Jewish marriage contract, traditionally written in Aramaic and presented by the groom to the bride as a guarantee of her maintenance and conjugal rights during marriage and financial support at its end, whether by divorce or death of the husband. The wife is granted a stipulated sum secured by a lien on the husband's property, and the fact that the wife may collect the sum in the event of divorce generally has been interpreted as protection for women against hasty divorce action by husbands. Although talmudic sources debate whether the ketubbah's general authority is rooted in biblical law or is a rabbinic enactment, the rabbinic texts agree that its implementation in the particular form of a lien on the husband's property can be attributed to Simeon ben Shetah in the second century B.C.E. More recent scholarship, however, has questioned this attribution. Once a "live" contract between the parties stipulating carefully negotiated financial details of the marriage (such as dowry), the use of the traditional ketubbah in Jewish weddings has become largely symbolic since medieval authorities prohibited divorce without the wife's consent and still more so since Jews have generally come to accept secular laws regulating marriage. Some modern Jews, however, are attempting to revive the contract's significance by creating new, personalized ketubbot.

GASTER's work is marked by dated assumptions regarding gender roles and relations, the reliability of rabbinic narratives as sources for history, and the moral superiority of Jews and Jewish marriage practices. Gaster's description of the history of the ketubbah has influenced later works, but the author's main interest is the ketubbah as a potential source for historians, not the history of the ketubbah itself. The bulk of his work is dedicated to highly overstated, but not completely inaccurate, claims about the usefulness of ketubbot for the study of Jewish settlement patterns, onomastics, genealogy, economic and material conditions, art history, and other topics.

EPSTEIN's book represents the most comprehensive single work about the ketubbah. The book is a legal history, rather than an exploration of the religious significance of the ketubbah, and most of the text is dedicated to detailed explorations of provisions long out of use. The study is dated in ways similar to Gaster's monograph but with far less detriment to its scholarship. Thus, Epstein, like Gaster, relies heavily on the authority of rabbinic sources (accepting the facticity, for example, of the rabbinic accounts of Simeon ben Shetah's institution of the ketubbah), but Epstein's analysis of those sources is commendably thorough, as he weaves the multiple accounts into a plausible composite.

FRIEDMAN (1980a, 1980b) has analyzed fragments of 65 ketubbot found in the Cairo Genizah and dating to the tenth and 11th centuries. The first volume of the study contains the analysis; the second offers the documents themselves in Hebrew and English translation. Friedman reconstructs early Palestinian ketubbah traditions in which the text was far more fluid than the formulaic document of Babylonian tradition, thus creating a seriously altered picture of the history of the ketubbah. (Previous scholars, who were generally unaware of or unfamiliar with the Cairo documents, frequently assigned the standardized formulation of Babylonia to a very early date.) Moreover, there are elements in the Cairo documents that take the form of a mutual contract between husband and wife and include provisions for divorce initiated by the wife, thereby calling into question the picture of gender relations presented in other studies.

SATLOW, reviewing earlier scholars' reliance on rabbinic traditions regarding the origins of the ketubbah, states that "to move from the traditions' understanding of history to history itself is a logical leap not justified by the evidence." Instead, Satlow dates the institution of the ketubbah (as opposed to other forms of marriage payments such as bride price or dowry) to the rabbis themselves, in the period just following the destruction of the Second Temple. He notes that no earlier Jewish document (biblical, apocryphal, or Greco-Roman) refers to a "ketubbah," and he argues that most of a number of earlier examples of Jewish marriage contracts only contain references to dowries; at a minimum, he shows that none of the earlier documents can be proven conclusively to include ketubbah payments.

As demonstrated by Davidovitch and Sabar, ketubbot were often lavishly illuminated, and these documents therefore constitute a significant part of the corpus of Jewish art. The collections reproduced in these authors' studies include ketubbot from a variety of places and times (other fine collections are excluded from this essay because of their parochial focus), many in vivid color. The most extensive historical introduction appears in SABAR (1990), which emphasizes Italian ketubbot. In this volume and in SABAR (1993), which takes the fascinating tack of arranging materials and discussion by common artistic motifs rather than provenance, the author exhibits caution, refusing to affirm that the ketubbah as now known has antecedents prior to the talmudic period in Babylonia. DAVIDOVITCH's introduction appears to have been written in Hebrew and then translated into English (versions in both languages appear, at opposite ends of the book); the author draws the history of the ketubbah primarily from Gaster (itself problematic) and quotations from that work are retranslations of the Hebrew translation rather than citations of the original English. All three of these volumes discuss the development and transmission (or lack thereof, in some locales) of Jewish decorative arts as evidenced in the ketubbah; notable for the length and depth of its text is Sabar's second volume. Davidovitch's book includes the fewest plates of the three.

LEIFER outlines three reasons for drafting a new form of ketubbah: the lack of mutuality and equality of legal status [in the traditional ketubbah]; the change in a woman's economic and social situation; and the legal irrelevance of the economic aspects of the traditional ketubah. Leifer, a rabbi who worked with a number of couples to create ketubbot, suggests some personal and subjective guidelines for those wishing to do likewise, and he offers two examples in Hebrew and English. Because of the highly individualistic and personalized nature of this new practice, there is no organized collection of these texts available. DIAMANT includes several examples in her book, a guide for Jewish brides and grooms, in the section dedicated to the ketubbah. Unfortunately, the cited texts appear only in English, and Diamant gives no indication if Hebrew versions are available.

GAIL LABOVITZ

Khazars

- Barthold, W. and P.B. Golden, "Khazars," in The Encyclopaedia of Islam, New Edition, vol. 4, Leiden: Brill, 1979
- Brook, Kevin A., "A Brief History of the Khazars," in The Kuzari: In Defense of the Despised Faith, by Judah ha-Levi, translated and annotated by N. Daniel Korobkin, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1998
- Dunlop, D.M., The History of the Jewish Khazars, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1954
- Golb, Norman, Jewish Proselytism: A Phenomenon in the Religious History of Early Medieval Europe, Cincinnati, Ohio: Judaic Studies Program, University of Cincinnati, 1987
- Golb, Norman and Omeljan Pritsak, Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1982
- Golden, Peter B., Khazar Studies: An Historico-Philological Inquiry into the Origins of the Khazars, 2 vols., Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1980
- Pritsak, Omeljan, "Khazars," in Dictionary of the Middle Ages, vol. 7, edited by Joseph R. Strayer, New York: Scribner, 1986

In the middle of the tenth century, the mysterious story of the conversion to Judaism of the Khazars, nomads and seminomads of the Caspian steppes, became known to Jewish communities from Constantinople to Spain. In the 12th century, the great poet and philosopher Judah Halevi penned Kuzari (or the Khazarian Book), a series of dialogues between the Jewish scholar and the Khazarian king in which the scholar aims to persuade the king that Judaism is the highest form of religion, superior to Islam and Christianity. Since then, Jewish authors have frequently addressed the subject of the Khazars.

A new wave of research into the Khazars and Khazaria commenced in the second half of the 19th century, especially after the discovery of Hebrew correspondence between Umayyad vizier Hasdai ibn Shaprut of Cordova and the Khazarian king Joseph of Atil (c.960). The development of oriental studies in the 19th century resulted in the publication of many additional sources on the Khazars and Khazaria in the languages of Central Asia, the Caucasus, and Middle East, reflecting the fact that the Khazars interacted with neighbors, allies, enemies, and traders, many of whom left records of Khazaria in their chronicles. During the 19th and 20th century, some research about the Khazars was motivated by political or antisemitic reasons: for example, the Karaites sought to avoid disabilities imposed on Jews by the Russian czarist government and to escape Nazi persecution by claiming that they were descendants of Khazarian or Turanian (i.e., non-Semitic) people. After World War II, certain scholars and pseudoscholars tried to disconnect Ashkenazi Jews from the rest of the Jewish community by asserting that Ashkenazim are descendants of Khazars and therefore have no hereditary title to the land of Israel.

There are tremendous obstacles to study of the Khazars. First, few archaeological artifacts from Khazarian societies are available. Second, it is very difficult to locate Khazarian cities, battlefields, or other relevant places, and excavations of those sites that have been found have not provided much definitive evidence of Khazarian history. Third, very few words are preserved from the Khazars' language, and many of these words are only preserved in descriptions in other languages, which may have corrupted the terms and names they cite. Nevertheless, today the literature on the Khazars is voluminous, is written in many languages, and covers different aspects of Khazarian history and culture. Most scholarship occurs in nations that historically had contact with the Khazars (including Russia, China, Bulgaria, Ossetia, Georgia, Armenia, Daghestan, Azerbaijan, and Turkey), although Western scholars have also investigated some issues, particularly those that relate to Arab, Byzantine, and Iranian sources. This essay focuses on recent English-language studies based on primary sources.

DUNLOP presents the first full-scale history of the Khazars, based on different groups of historical sources. He discusses the place of the Khazars in history, noting that predecessors of this group prevented the advance of the Arabs over the Caucasus Mountains in the seventh century and stemmed the eastward spread of Byzantium. The author analyzes the theory of the Uigur origin of the Khazars, and he examines hypotheses concerning the consolidation of the Khazar state in the middle of the seventh century. He also traces the Khazar-Arab wars; the Khazar conversion to Judaism; the 200 years in which the Khazar Empire flourished and expanded; relations between Khazars and Russians; and the decline and fall of the Khazar state.

BARTHOLD and GOLDEN's article concisely presents research findings up to 1978. They discuss the emergence of the Khazar tribe in the sixth century, the rise of the Khazar Empire, its wars and political relations with neighboring communities (including the Byzantine Empire), the Khazars' conversion to Judaism near the beginning of the ninth century, their economic activities, and their language. In Barthold and Golden's analysis of the Khazars' conversion, the authors explore a variety of sources that present conflicting accounts about the dates of the conversion and the number of people involved.

GOLB discusses several instances in which Gentiles converted to Judaism in the Middle Ages; he seeks to explain through the investigation of Hebrew manuscripts the attraction of non-Jews to Jewish monotheism. Golb divides his discussion into six sections. In the first five, he describes separate cases of conversion recorded in the manuscripts of the Cairo Genizah, and in the sixth section, he provides an account of the conversion of the Khazars and rebuts the views of several writers who use Khazar history to advance such political agendas as anti-Zionism. Golb also criticizes scholars who suggest that conversion to Judaism was limited only to the Khazar king's court or to residents of the capital city; he argues that manuscript evidence clearly demonstrates that rabbinic Judaism was widely practiced in Khazaria and that Jewish teachers emigrated to Khazaria from Palestine, Babylonia, Iran, Byzantium, and other lands. He also cites Abraham ibn Daud (c.1160), who met Khazar rabbinic scholars who traveled to Toledo.

GOLB and PRITSKAK publish and discuss a previously unknown document, the letter of a rabbinic Jewish community of Kiev that was written in archaic Hebrew, with the words transcribed in Turkic runes. Six Khazarian Turkic personal names are intermingled with the signatures of Hebrew names on this letter. Golb discusses Hebrew evidence, while Pritsak deals with Turkic references. Pritsak concludes that the Kievan letter was written while the Khazarian administration was still in effect, that is, before the Rus' conquest of Kiev, which Pritsak tentatively dates by comparing different Russian chronicles. Based on documentary evidence, he dates the letter to around 930.

In the second part of the book, Golb presents a new edition of the diplomatic correspondence of Hasdai ibn Shaprut of Cordova edited by P.K. Kokovcov in 1932, as well as S. Schechter's version of the text and a historical and geographical evaluation of the Schechter text.

GOLDEN's comprehensive and penetrating historico-philological research is exemplary. He delves into the complex questions concerning the identification and etymology of all Khazarian words and names preserved in multiple sources and written in a variety of languages. He also supplies complete texts of these sources. The author not only employs medieval sources and modern Western research, but also refers to some Eastern European publications. This work is one of the most valuable resources available to philologists, linguists, and anthropologists studying the Khazars.

PRITSKAK offers an overview of the history of the Khazars that differs in some respects from that presented in the Barthold and Golden study. For example, he places the first seat of the Khazars in Daghestan, and he identifies the Iranian Varaz tribe as the group that founded the dynasty of kings to which King Joseph, the correspondent of Hasdai ibn Shaprut, belonged. Pritsak calls the first Khazarian king who converted to Judaism "the majordomo" (he came from a social group from which majordomos to Khazarian kings were recruited) and hypothesizes that the date of his private conversion was 731, decades before he imposed the Jewish religion on the kaghanate at the end of the eighth century. Pritsak examines the ideological foundations for the conversion, explains the empire's sources of wealth, evaluates the factors that led to the empire's collapse, and investigates the fates of the various factions that emerged after the empire fragmented.

In his introduction to Halevi and in his subsequent monograph, The Jews of Khazaria (Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1999), BROOK summarizes very accessibly the history of the Khazars from their settlement in the steppes north of the Caucasus sometime before the fifth century. Formerly nomadic, the Khazars adopted a settled lifestyle and were occupied with fishing, crafts, and agriculture. They harvested grapes, barley, rice, wheat, and vegetables. Other members of the tribe maintained the Turkic warrior tradition of expert horseback archery. Brook also considers their conversion to Judaism, discusses their relationships with Turkic tribes of the Caucasus and Central Asia, and offers exceptionally clear information about the decline of the Khazar state, its intermingling with other Turkic tribes, and the final destruction of the Khazar kingdom by Mongols in the 1230s. Brook apparently accepts most of Judah Halevi's book as a reliable historical source, incorporating statements from the philosopher's presentation into an exposition of Khazarian history based on the work of more recent historians.

Kibbutz

- Ben Rafael, Eliezer, Crisis and Transformation: The Kibbutz at Century's End (SUNY Series in Israeli Studies), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997
- Infield, Henrik, Cooperative Living in Palestine (Rural Settlement Institute Research Series on Cooperation), New York: Dryden, 1944
- Kats, Yosef, Between Jerusalem and Hebron: Jewish Settlement in the Hebron Mountains and the Etzion Bloc in the Pre-State Period, Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1998
- Kimmerling, Baruch, Zionism and Economy, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Schenkman, 1983
- Leon, Dan, The Kibbutz: A New Way of Life (The Commonwealth and International Library), New York and Oxford: Pergamon, 1969
- Maron, Stanley, Kibbutz in a Market Society, Israel: Yad Tabenkin, 1993
- Near, Henry, The Kibbutz Movement: A History (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), 2 vols., Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992–1997
- Shafir, Gershon, Land, Labor, and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914 (Cambridge Middle East Library, 20), Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989; updated edition, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996

Since the beginning of the 20th century, the kibbutz has been one of the most important symbols of the ethos and practice of the Zionist resettlement of Palestine. Born on the shores of the Sea of Galilee in 1910 out of a desire of Jewish laborers to “be autonomous and work without overseers or external control” (as a founder of the first kibbutz described it), by 1940 there were 82 kibbutzim with more than 26,000 members; by 1992 the number had reached 269, with a population of 128,000. Throughout its history, what distinguished the kibbutz from other forms of cooperative Jewish agricultural settlement, such as the moshav and moshav-ovdim, has been the notion of “complete collectivism” in property, production and labor, consumption, and living arrangements.

Analyzing the roots and ramifications of this collectivist ideology has long been a central goal of scholarship on the kibbutz. An early example of this focus is INFIELD. This book exhibits several characteristics of kibbutz historiography, including detailed descriptions of and statistics about the kibbutz way of life as a guide to explaining the movement's success, discussions of the relationship between the major kibbutz federations and the Zionist agencies, and comparisons with the moshav and moshav-ovdim. Moreover, Infield provides an early example of the focus on education and the “remodeled family” (i.e., sexual equality and innovative methods of child-rearing) that is common to most analyses of the kibbutz, while his discussion of the contradictions inherent in the “Arab dilemma” illustrates how kibbutzniks early on experienced the discontinuity between their socialist and nationalist visions, which led some to “despair of building their new home on the basis of social justice.”

LEON appeared just as the growing industrialization of the kibbutz economy was fundamentally changing consumption patterns, living standards, and lifestyles on the kibbutz. It thus presents a good snapshot of the late 1960s socioeconomic and ideological position of the kibbutz within Israeli society. Focusing on the largest of the four national kibbutz federations, Kibbutz Artzi-Hashomer Hatzair, Leon's discussion of the “dominant question” of women and their work roles and his argument that sexual equality and separate children's quarters had achieved the “destruction . . . of the patriarchal foundation of the family” epitomize the classic Jewish historiography of the kibbutz during this period.

NEAR's two volumes undoubtedly constitute the most comprehensive study of the phenomenon in English. Volume one examines the origins and growth of the kibbutz movement during the years 1909 to 1929. The emergence of kibbutz-type settlements out of the early communes of the second aliyah is described in detail, as is the crystallization of three interrelated groups (kevutsot) focused on defense, work, and settlement—the central components of kibbutz ideology and praxis by the end of the “experimental stage” of smaller scale settlements. Also documented thoroughly is the recognition of the kibbutz as an integral part of the yishuv in the 1920s. Near explains that an important reason for the growth of the kibbutz was its relationship to the pioneering youth movements in the diaspora, which encouraged thousands of young, trained immigrants to join the kibbutzim by the 1930s, just when rising rates of Jewish-Palestinian violence and the possibility of partition between the two groups increased the importance of the kibbutz as a means to “create facts” on the ground in Palestine.

Near's second volume investigates the crises and achievements of the kibbutz movement during the years 1939 to 1995. The first half documents the political, strategic, and military roles of the kibbutz (particularly in the growth and activities of the Haganah) during the last decade of the British Mandate, from World War II through the War of 1948. While the kibbutzim served as vital training and supply areas for the Haganah during the War of Independence, Near explains that their vaunted strategic function as facts on the ground in Arab regions was a failure, as 71 kibbutzim were left in Arab territory in the final UN Partition Plan. The second half of the volume deals with the crisis that arose with the “end of pioneering” in the 1950s, when the kibbutzim failed to absorb or integrate the new immigrant population, instead becoming embroiled in the ideological and political turmoil that plagued the Mapai and Mapam parties (with whom most kibbutzim were affiliated) during the next decade.

Near concludes with a discussion of developments during the last 30 years of the 20th century that can only be regarded as cursory. More general problems with both volumes are their overly descriptive (as opposed to analytical) style and an avoidance of sources and studies critical of the traditional Labor Zionist historiography (even hagiography) of the kibbutz. As a result, it is difficult for the reader to process the vast information Near presents or to understand how the dynamics of earlier periods have influenced, and can help contemporary scholars understand, the challenges currently before the kibbutz movement.

KATS is perhaps the only monograph in English to examine the features of the religious kibbutzim in significant detail. The book deals with the debates surrounding the establishment and subsequent experiences of several religious kibbutzim in the Hebron mountains and the region south of Bethlehem (the Etzion bloc) during the last decade of the Mandate period. These settlements were part of the effort by Jewish land-purchasing bodies such as the Jewish National Fund to move beyond the historical focus on settling the coastal plains and to begin purchasing large tracts of land in the hilly regions of central Palestine, home to the bulk of Palestine's Arab population.

As Kats explains in rich detail, the initial reluctance by settlers to move to this seemingly harsh territory "gradually gave way to a genuine sense of attachment" as they became acclimated to their surroundings and achieved sometimes impressive successes in making the kibbutzim economically and socially viable enterprises. His detailed descriptions of the hard work needed to reclaim the land for farming paint a vivid portrait of the daily life of the settlers, including their economic and political struggles both with the national Zionist bodies and the local Arab populations. Most importantly, Kats's analysis also demonstrates that however much kibbutz ideology was predicated on agricultural pioneering, from the beginning geographical and political circumstances forced the settlers to move into nonagricultural activities, such as stone quarrying and summer guest housing for religious Jews, in order to survive. This transformation would be repeated by secular kibbutzim as the Israeli economy liberalized in the decades after achieving sovereignty.

Kats draws from many underutilized archives associated with religious Zionism to shape his narrative, but he does not examine the relations between these religious settlers and their secular kibbutz counterparts. Furthermore, because he used no non-Jewish sources (such as the United Kingdom's Public Records Office or the Palestinian Arab press), British and Arab voices never appear to add context or provide an alternative point of view to his protagonists. Moreover, like the other works discussed here, Kats uncritically accepts the traditional Zionist/Israeli description of Palestine, and specifically the territory on which kibbutzim were established, as neglected and stagnant prior to its "reclamation" by Jews. Research of the last two decades of the 20th century, however, has shown this description to be both inaccurate and ideologically motivated.

Despite the absence of their voice in the narrative, however, Arabs remain a constant presence—for example, in the centrality of the theme of security or the importance of road-building (today's "bypass roads") to enhance settlement activity. But a different methodological and even epistemological grounding is required to reveal the constitutive role played by the indigenous Palestinian population and its implied yet conflicted relationship with the burgeoning Jewish community in the creation and development of the kibbutz as a socioeconomic, political, and military institution. Kimmerling and Shafir both provide this alternative perspective, examining the etiology and transformation of the kibbutzim from a critical political economy perspective. SHAFIR's analysis focuses on the pre-World War I era, which he sees as the formative period for the ideology and practice of the Labor movement out of which the kibbutz was born. His investigation demonstrates that the need for collective agricultural settlement resulted from the difficulties individual settlers had adapting to strenuous agricultural labor and from the struggles of Jewish laborers against both the low wages paid by the Jewish planters and the Palestinian workers who accepted them. Out of these struggles the concept of kibbush 'avodah ("conquest of labor") was born, in which the incipient Labor movement struggled to secure large-scale employment of Jews in the existing Jewish-bourgeois economy. Yet by 1909—one year before the establishment of the first kibbutz—this strategy had proven an "abysmal failure." The labor movement began to understand that it could only secure jobs for Jewish workers within a socioeconomic system under its control, which in turn necessitated control over a defined territory in which such an economy could be established. Thus, the object of conquest was transformed from the labor market to the land itself, and the ideology of kibbush karka' or the "conquest of land," was born. The kibbutz soon emerged as a central player in the struggle to conquer both land and labor for Jewish workers.

KIMMERLING examines the dominant strains of Zionist economic ideology and the Zionists' interaction with the actual economic reality in Palestine/Israel, and he reaches a similar conclusion to that of Shafir. Kimmerling's analysis of the kibbutz begins with the industrial revolution in the kibbutzim that commenced in the late 1950s. This resulted not just from the changing demography and human geography of the country that accompanied the influx of hundreds of thousands of immigrants from Middle Eastern countries; more specifically, the process emerged from the aging of the kibbutz population, the need to find less physically demanding occupations for that population, and the need to raise standards of living and preserve the kibbutz's socioeconomic status as Israel industrialized.

This process of industrialization represented a major departure from the historic kibbutznik denigration of manufacturing as a primary cause of the unequal distribution of resources and undemocratic social hierarchy characteristic of modern capitalism. Kimmerling also demonstrates how the shift to industry signified the diminished ideological position of the kibbutz—and thus Labor Zionism—within Israeli society, which culminated in the 1977 Likud victory and accelerated the marketization and consumerization of Israeli society.

Maron and Ben Rafael both describe the roots and ramifications of these transformations in the kibbutz and Israeli society at large. MARON's study examines how the kibbutz system has adapted to an increasingly consumerist and market-oriented culture and political economy in Israel while remaining true to its collectivist roots. According to Maron, the kibbutz emphasis on rootedness and continuity has conflicted with the stress on personal mobility and individual movement inherent in contemporary market societies. This conflict has led to several adaptations in the kibbutz organization, such as the expansion of personal (versus communal) budgets, and more significantly, the development of a more "family friendly" atmosphere (in contrast to the earlier belief that the discrete familial unit was a threat to the solidarity of the kibbutz), which has in turn transformed the educational system and the position of the ideological bellwethers of the kibbutz—its women.

BEN RAFAEL similarly describes the "malaise" suffered by the kibbutz community in the late 1980s and 1990s and the “de-collectivization” that has occurred as members no longer interact with the same frequency and intimacy as they did, for example, when parents met nightly in the now-abandoned “children’s houses.” His review of the great body of contemporary anthropological field work on the kibbutz reveals that today there is less fraternity and more instrumentalism in the way members treat each other than there was previously; moreover, the “kibbutz capitalism” that has emerged during the last several decades and the concomitant “embourgeoisement” of kibbutzniks have been fraught with contradictions that have further strained the system, leading central kibbutz institutions such as children’s houses, schools, and collective dining rooms to lose their unique kibbutz character.

Despite these problems, Maron argues that the kibbutz continues to offer an important “alternative to the city” as Israel, like so much of the world, becomes more urbanized and more market- and consumer-oriented. Maron and Ben Rafael’s discussions highlight both the obstacles that the kibbutz will face in coming decades and the potential of the kibbutz to constitute an alternative ideological, socioeconomic, and political model for Israeli society.

MARK LEVINE

Kimhi Family

- Chomsky, William (editor), David Kimhi’s Hebrew Grammar (Mikhlol) Systematically Presented and Critically Annotated, Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1933
- Kimhi, Joseph, The Book of the Covenant, translated by Frank Talmage, Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1972
- Kimhi, Moses, Commentary on the Book of Job (South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism, no. 64), edited by Herbert Basser and Barry D. Walfish, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1992
- Talmage, Frank Ephraim, David Kimhi: The Man and the Commentaries (Harvard Judaic Monographs, 1), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1975
- Talmage, Frank Ephraim, Apples of Gold in Settings of Silver: Studies in Medieval Jewish Exegesis and Polemics (Papers in Mediaeval Studies), edited by Barry Dov Walfish, Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1999

The Kimhi family immigrated from Spain to Provence in the mid-12th century, in the wake of the Almohade persecutions, and established themselves in Narbonne. The family brought with them the rationalist intellectual tradition that they had absorbed in their native land. The father, Joseph (c.1105–c.1170), and his two sons, Moses (who died c.1190) and David (c.1160–c.1235), dedicated their scholarly lives to three areas of study: grammar, exegesis, and polemics. Joseph wrote a polemic, The Book of the Covenant, which seems to have been directed at apostates from Judaism in an attempt to convince them to return to the fold. His grammar books, Sefer Zikaron and Sefer ha-Galui, laid the foundation for the work of his son David. Moses wrote commentaries on the Books of Proverbs and Job as well as a grammar book, Mahalakh shevilei ha-da’at (The Course of the Paths of Knowledge). David attained the greatest renown, as a grammarian, biblical exegete, and as representative of the rationalist tradition in medieval Jewish intellectual circles. He was a staunch defender of Maimonides and even undertook a strenuous journey in his later years to plead the cause of his master during the first Maimonidean Controversy in 1232.

A number of 19th- and early 20th-century scholars studied the Kimhi family, but no one devoted more energy to them than Frank Talmage, who served as a professor at the University of Toronto until his death in 1988. Talmage wrote his dissertation on David Kimhi, and many of his early publications were devoted to David and his father Joseph.

Talmage’s introduction to his translation of Joseph KIMHI’s polemic situates the work in its time and in relation to other medieval polemical literature. It also summarizes the basic biographical and bibliographical information on Joseph. TALMAGE (1999) reprints several of the author’s important articles about the members of Kimhi family. In “Rabbi Joseph Kimhi: From the Dispersion of Jerusalem in Sepharad to the Canaanites in Zarephath,” Talmage concentrates on a single aspect of Joseph’s intellectual persona—his extreme biblical purism—and shows how this factor influenced his exegesis and his reading of the text of the prayerbook. This analysis shows clearly the cultural differences between the Jews of Spain and those of France, including southern France where the Kimhis settled. As an immigrant, Joseph must have had a particularly difficult time adjusting to a milieu that did not share his values in linguistic and other intellectual matters.

Other essays in Talmage’s 1999 collection help round out the picture of the family. “David Kimhi and the Rationalist Tradition” provides a detailed discussion of the philosophical background of David’s work and analyzes his views on a number of key issues, explaining how he was thoroughly grounded in Maimonidean Aristotelianism. A second essay on the same subject, “David Kimhi and the Rationalist Tradition, II: Literary Sources,” examines the rationalist sources David used in his commentaries and provides a picture of his intellectual formation. The essay on “R. David Kimhi as Polemicist” discusses David’s commentaries in the context of other polemical literature of the period. The very fact that he incorporated polemical material in his commentaries assured their availability and popularity in religious debates. Much evidence exists to demonstrate the continued popularity and use of his work throughout the Middle Ages and the Renaissance.

TALMAGE (1975) supplies additional insights into David’s life and work in an excellent intellectual biography of this important representative of the rationalist school in medieval Judaism. A child of Joseph’s old age, David lost his father at the age of ten. His brother Moses, who was considerably older, became his surrogate father and directed his education. The first chapter describes the cultural milieu in Narbonne and gives a detailed portrait of David’s educational curriculum. Chapters two and four discuss his views on the exile, redemption, and eschatology. Chapter three, the largest chapter, is devoted to a detailed and masterly exposition of David Kimhi's exegetical methodology, especially his relationship to rabbinical midrash.

Those interested in learning about David Kimhi's grammatical work would profit from consulting CHOMSKY's book, a reorganized annotated edition of David's Mikhol, a highly influential Hebrew grammar. The introduction to this work gives a fair assessment of Kimhi's achievement as a grammarian.

The little that is known about the elder son, Moses KIMHI, is summarized in Walfish and Bassler's introduction to his commentary on the Book of Job. The introduction also gives some insight into Moses' exegetical methodology.

BARRY D. WALFISH

Kings, Book of

- Aharoni, Yohanan, Erets-Yisra'el bi-tekufat ha-Mikra: ge'ografyah historit, 1962; translated and edited by Anson F. Rainey as The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, London: Burns and Oates, 1962; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1967; 2nd edition: London: Burns and Oates, 1978; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1979
- Bright, John, A History of Israel, Philadelphia: Westminster, 1959; London: SCM, 1960; 3rd edition, 1981
- Cogan, Mordechai and Hayim Tadmor, II Kings: A New Translation (Anchor Bible Series, vol. 11), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1988
- Gray, John, I and II Kings: A Commentary (Old Testament Library), Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963; London: SCM, 1964; 2nd edition, Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970; 3rd edition, London: SCM, 1977
- Hochberg, Reuven and A.J. Rosenberg, I Kings: A New English Translation (Judaica Books of the Prophets), New York: Judaica Press, 1980
- Montgomery, James A., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Kings (International Critical Commentary, vol. 10), edited by Henry Snyder Gehman, Edinburgh: Clark, and New York: Scribner, 1951
- Rosenberg, A.J., II Kings: A New English Translation (Judaica Books of the Prophets), New York: Judaica Press, 1980
- Slotki, I.W., Kings: Hebrew Text and English Translation (Soncino Books of the Bible, vol. 4), London: Soncino, 1950; New York: Soncino, 1978; revised edition, 1990
- Thiele, Edwin R., The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1951; revised edition, Exeter, Devon: Paternoster, 1966; new revised edition, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Kregel, 1994
- Walsh, Jerome T., 1 Kings (Berit Olam Series), edited by David W. Cotter, Collegeville, Minnesota: Liturgical Press, 1996

Ninth of the 24 books of the Hebrew Bible (according to the traditional Jewish count), the Book of Kings is the fourth book of the Prophets and the last of the "Nevi'im Rishonim" or "Historical Prophets." Kings, appearing nowadays as First and Second Kings, is first found divided in the Septuagint. It recounts the political history of Israel from David's death to the destruction of the first temple, roughly 960 to 586 B.C.E. First Kings chapters two to 11 tells of Solomon's reign and the building of the first temple; after Solomon's death, the kingdom split into the northern kingdom of Israel and the southern kingdom of Judah. First Kings 12 through Second Kings 17 details the political and military history of the divided kingdoms and the careers of Elijah and Elisha, the northern prophets. In 722 B.C.E, the kingdom of Israel came to an end. Second Kings chapters 18 through 25 depicts the last 140 years of Judah. History in Kings is consistently recounted with a didactic and theological slant, aiming to prove that loyalty to the God of Israel leads to political success. Much modern research on Kings is supplemented by Assyrian, Babylonian, and North-West Semitic texts discovered by archaeologists that assess the history of this period from the point of view of the nations surrounding Israel.

COGAN and TADMOR have produced what is undoubtedly the best modern commentary on the Book of Kings. The volume, which is devoted to Second Kings, includes an English translation, while the accompanying commentary focuses primarily on textual and historical problems. Information gleaned from Assyrian, Babylonian, and other ancient Semitic cultures is brought to bear on the text, and the chronology of Kings is correlated with that of the kings of Assyria and Babylonia. The wealth of comparative Semitic material in this volume makes it more useful to the scholar than to the layperson, but the work can effectively introduce the interested nonspecialist to the comparative method. A complete bibliography is included. The book's only shortcoming is that literary studies of the narrative sections of Kings are not as well integrated into the text as they might have been. The Anchor Bible volume on First Kings has not yet appeared.

WALSH, conversely, covers only First Kings. His book proves a valuable complement to Tadmor and Cogan, as he focuses exclusively on "literary art" and ignores nearly all of the historical and archaeological issues in Kings, as well as many of the theological ones. The commentary provides a good close reading of the narrative in Kings, highlighting points of irony, structure, language, and perspective that might escape the casual reader but are central to the message and ideology of the book. The volume does not supply the biblical text itself.

AHARONI's work is by no means a commentary on Kings, but the last third of his book deals with the archaeological and epigraphic evidence for the period covered by Kings. Aharoni integrates biblical sources with ancient Assyrian, Egyptian, Israelite, and other extra-biblical texts, and he carefully surveys the history of the period. One of his prime concerns is to locate accurately the sites of particular events and in so doing to create a "historical geography" of the Bible.

BRIGHT's work is a popular summary of biblical history and chapters six to eight deal with the period covered by Kings. Bright presents history as a running narrative, includes social history, and is eminently readable. Unfortunately, some of Bright's data come from texts while some conclusions are based on deduction, and he does not always distinguish clearly between the two approaches.

THIELE presents a particularly original and unusual study of the chronology in Kings. Working with the biblical text, as well as with ancient Assyrian sources, he provides dates for the reigns of all the biblical kings that accord with both the biblical and extra-biblical data.

The volumes by HOCHBERG and ROSENBERG and by ROSENBERG present the best available summary for the non-specialist of 2000 years of Jewish interpretation of Kings. These works present the Hebrew text of Kings, together with Targum Pseudo-Jonathan and the commentaries of Rashi, Kimhi, Gersonides, and the Metsudot (reproduced from the Lublin Rabbinic Bible), while an English translation of the biblical text, together with a digest of the traditional commentaries, appears on the adjacent page. The selection from the commentaries focuses on points in the text that the modern reader is likely to see as difficult. Most of the commentators selected concern themselves with contextual, plain-sense interpretation, and the rabbinic sources on which these medieval commentators draw are also presented. The different commentaries are well-translated, and they are organized so as to form a coherent discussion without obscuring differences of opinion between commentators. Reasons for the traditional commentators' differing views are discussed in Rosenberg and Hochberg's notes. These are extremely useful works for those interested in explaining traditional commentary.

SLOTKI aims at the Jewish layperson, integrating some material from studies of the ancient Near East with traditional Jewish commentary. The Hebrew text is presented together with a good English translation and a brief but helpful commentary that relates passages in Kings to other biblical passages and tries to make the biblical idiom comprehensible to the modern reader.

GRAY's work contains an English text and commentary, and it is generally a model of critical Bible scholarship. His commentary confronts questions of authorship and philological and theological issues. The commentary integrates some material from ancient Near Eastern studies, but these sources are not a prime focus of the commentary, as they are in Cogan and Tadmor's work. Gray uses ancient Near Eastern texts to note similarities between royal behavior in Israel and in neighboring countries, a point often ignored by other writers. This is a comprehensive commentary, covering everything except narrative studies and traditional Jewish interpretation. Gray footnotes some of the more important scholarly works on related questions, but he provides too few suggestions for further reading to be very useful to the advanced student. The commentary is most useful to readers with some basic knowledge of Hebrew.

MONTGOMERY's commentary extensively analyzes "lower criticism," attempting to establish the original version of the text of Kings by reference to the Septuagint and other ancient versions. He uses some material from the ancient Near East to show parallels between biblical and ancient Near Eastern practices, but he does not discuss chronologies or correspondences between the events of Second Kings and events described in Assyrian and Babylonian texts, nor is there much sophisticated concern with issues of literary art.

SHAWN ZELIG ASTER

Kingship

- Goodblatt, David, The Monarchic Principle: Studies in Jewish Self-Government in Antiquity (Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum, 38), Tübingen: Mohr (Siebeck), 1994
- Grabbe, Lester L., Priests, Prophets, Diviners, Sages: A Socio-Historical Study of Religious Specialists in Ancient Israel, Valley Forge, Pennsylvania: Trinity Press International, 1995
- Halpern, Baruch, The Constitution of the Monarchy in Israel (Harvard Semitic Monographs, no. 25), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1981
- Ishida, Tomoo, The Royal Dynasties in Ancient Israel: A Study on the Formation and Development of Royal-Dynastic Ideology (Beiheft zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, 142), New York: de Gruyter, 1977
- Polish, David, Give Us a King: Legal-Religious Sources of Jewish Sovereignty, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1989
- Whitelam, Keith, The Just King: Monarchical Judicial Authority in Ancient Israel (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 12), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1979

It is a historical fact that during the better part of four centuries, monarchs governed biblical Israel. However, scriptural attitudes toward monarchy seem to range from outright disdain (1 Samuel 8:7–18; Hosea 3:4, 13:10–11) to enthusiasm bordering adulation, notably in the so-called royal Psalms (e.g., Psalms 45, 110). The ambivalence is epitomized in the talmudic dispute (Sanhedrin 20b) regarding the significance of the king provisions of Deuteronomy 17:14–20. Should these passages be read as promoting, or even commanding, the appointment of a king, or does the appointment of a monarch indicate nothing more than a concession to a misguided Israel? Modern scholars recognize the dissonance between royalist and antiroyalist stances in the biblical literature, and historians have attempted to map out the respective evolutions of the two positions as well as their relationship to one another, while at the same time paying due attention to the wider socioreligious context, including attitudes toward kingship in Israel's ancient Near Eastern environment.

GRABBE emphasizes the Israelite king's cultic function. The author dedicates only one of eight chapters on an assortment of religious specialists to the king, but because the source material is meager, Grabbe is able within that brief space to marshal all important references to kings performing sacrificial duties. He brings to the reading and analysis of the texts a declared skepticism akin to that of scholars such as Robert Carroll, Philip R. Davies, and Niels Peter Lemche, contending that "we cannot be sure that the Israel of the texts was historical, or to . . . what extent the historical people of central Palestine corresponded with the entity described in the biblical literature." Even as he recognizes the limitations of the textual evidence of the king's priestly role, however, he also identifies enough references (including such difficult readings as "David's sons were priests" [2 Samuel 8:18]) to suggest that prior to the exile, when priesthood became monopolized by Aaronites, Israelite kings officiated at the altar as a matter of course.

POLISH's aim is not primarily history for its own sake. Rather, he delves into ancient sources in search of an explanation for the contemporary Israeli kulturkampf regarding the nature of Jewish sovereignty. As he sees it, as a modern Jewish state becomes a reality, "Suddenly the theoretical speculations of ancient scholars take on compelling and intimidating relevance." He traces the roots of modern debates about political authority from the Bible's ambivalence toward kingship, through Pharisaic and talmudic attitudes to the Hasmonians, and beyond. At the heart of this age-old tension, Polish identifies a fundamental question—is the state supreme, or is it always subservient to what the rabbis called the Kingdom of Heaven? In the process of exploring this issue, he provides a comprehensive overview of Jewish sociotheological evaluations of kingship, particularly as they relate to hopes for the ideal messianic king. Whether or not one accepts its central hypothesis, this book is a mine not merely of invaluable source material but also of some acute insights.

HALPERN seeks "to isolate the structure of the ascension process in Israel and to coordinate it with the sacred concepts that informed it." The first two chapters are especially rewarding, as Halpern discusses the tension between the position advocating the establishment of a royal dynasty and the position supporting the election of individuals to fill the office of king. (This tension is epitomized in the pentateuchal king law that insists that the king shall be an individual divinely chosen [Deuteronomy 17:15] but then goes on to envisage a royal line [verse 20].) For instance, Halpern charts the process of election through the evolution of the title nagid, concluding that "the forms of dynasty enforced in Israel a reduction of 'divine' influence over the succession." Much of the in-depth philological discussion is obviously oriented toward specialists in the discipline. Overall, this book is an ambitious work that somehow manages to tackle the nitty gritty while keeping a constant eye out for the underlying concepts. There is plenty here for serious students to get their teeth into—and mastication will be amply rewarded.

ISHIDA concentrates on the topic of dynasty, in a study that complements Halpern's treatment of the hereditary aspect of kingship. Like Halpern, Ishida asks, what room is there for divine election once a royal dynasty has been established? In the case of Assyria, Ishida suggests, "One of the reasons for laying stress on divine election in Assyria can be found in the custom that the right of primogeniture was not regarded as the absolute basis for royal succession." The author also investigates why the throne of the Northern Kingdom of Israel (as well as the Edomite throne [Genesis 36: 31–39]) was marked by such frequent changes of royal line, thus contradicting the supposition that kingship is inherently hereditary. Ishida acknowledges the views of those scholars who believe that "the principle of dynastic succession was not acknowledged as licit by the people of Israel . . . since monarchy was based on 'charismatic leadership'," although he favors alternative explanations. He surveys dynastic styles not just of Mesopotamia, but also of Egypt and the Hittite empire.

WHITELAM ensures that the king's judicial role is not overlooked. Throughout history, many kings have eschewed the responsibility of adjudication and been satisfied with a military or military-cum-ceremonial function, but Whitelam cites ample biblical and extrabiblical sources (Mesopotamian, Syro-Palestinian, and Egyptian) to show that in the ancient Near East "it was the king's primary duty to guarantee the true administration of justice throughout the land." Drawing from the available evidence, the author explains in socioreligious terms why certain cultures would expect more direct judicial involvement on the part of their king than would other cultures. A helpful feature of his work is its end-of-chapter summaries.

The inclusion here of GOODBLATT may seem odd, for the title of his work does not refer to the kingship of biblical Israel. Rather, the author primarily investigates the postexilic high priesthood and the patriarchate and exilarchate of rabbinic times. His work is relevant, however, because he argues that these hieratic leaders enjoyed in their day an acclaim and loyalty parallel to that of the biblical kings. He demonstrates that "the hope for a restoration of Davidic kingship can be traced in literature of the Second Temple period," and he contends that "we can discover in certain sources an ideology justifying priestly monarchy and bestowing on it a legitimacy in terms of Judean concepts."

ISAAC SASSOON

Klezmer see Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music

Kook, Abraham Isaac 1865–1935

Latvian-born mystic and chief rabbi of Palestine

Agus, Jacob B., Banner of Jerusalem: The Life, Times, and Thought of Abraham Isaac Kook, the Late Chief Rabbi of Palestine, New York: Bloch, 1946

Ben Shlomo, Yosef, Poetry of Being: Lectures on the Philosophy of Rabbi Kook, Tel Aviv: MOD, 1990

Gellman, Ezra (editor), Essays on the Thought and Philosophy of Rabbi Kook, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1991

Kaplan, Lawrence and David Shatz (editors), Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook and Jewish Spirituality (Reappraisals in Jewish Social and Intellectual History), New York: New York University Press, 1995

Neriah, Moshe Zvi, Mo'ade ha-Re'iyah, 1979; translated by Pesach Jaffe as Celebration of the Soul: The Holidays in the Life and Thought of Rabbi Avraham Yitzchak Kook, Jerusalem: Genesis Jerusalem Press and Feldheim, 1992

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook was the first chief rabbi of Palestine and a renowned halakhist, mystic, poet, and public figure. He was born in Grieve, Latvia, and spent the formative years of his scholarly training at the famed yeshivah of Volozhin, studying under Rabbi Naphtali Tsevi Yehudah Berlin. Kook's rabbinic career took him from the small towns of the Russian Pale of Settlement to Jaffa, London, and eventually to Jerusalem, where he reorganized the rabbinate. Kook was a critical figure in the Jewish community of mandatory Palestine in virtue of his fusion of profound Zionist and Orthodox commitments. His vision of the future of the land of Israel had secular pioneers playing as crucial a role as the religious community in the rebirth of the Jewish nation in its homeland.

AGUS, who was rabbi of a large Conservative congregation in suburban Baltimore, is the author of the classic biography of Rabbi Kook. It remains the best place to begin, both for its wealth of details and for its delightfully clear style. The first half of the work is dedicated to the details of Kook's extraordinarily active life, while the second half focuses on his intellectual endeavors (insofar as there can be any hard-and-fast division between the two subjects). The more strictly biographical chapters provide a colorful picture of Kook's young life in the Pale of Settlement and his development into a celebrated Talmud scholar and budding Zionist activist. A brief intellectual history of the period of his youth follows, and Agus explains how such trends as the "Jewish Enlightenment" and 19th-century nationalism influenced Kook's thought. Chapters three and four conclude the biographical account with Rabbi Kook's activities as a leader in Palestine, featuring discussions of some of his most controversial opinions, his most vociferous opponents, and his hopes for a united Jewish community in the land of Israel. The latter portion of the work introduces the reader to Kook's mystical and philosophical insights, covering a wide variety of topics including the "nearness of God" and its central role in spiritual life, Torah, Israel (the people and the land), prayer, evil, and evolution. While Agus argues that one should not "expect to discover a complete system of philosophy in Kook," this biography certainly conveys the depth and breadth of Kook's contribution to Jewish thought.

BEN SHLOMO is a professor of Jewish philosophy at Tel Aviv University, and his book is based on a series of radio lectures that he gave as part of the Broadcast University's offerings. Unlike Agus, Ben Shlomo maintains that underneath the unsystematic surface of Rabbi Kook's writings lies a unified philosophy that can indeed be described as a system. This system is a dialectical one that allows all aspects of existence to have a positive role in the ongoing perfection of the universe; even phenomena that at first appear dark or evil are actually catalysts for the development of their more positive counterparts. Ben Shlomo develops this central theme throughout his book, with discussions ranging from the role of the divine will in creation to the unified multiplicity of the natural world, the existence of evil, and the final redemption of humankind.

GELLMAN's book is a collection of previously published essays by academics, rabbis, and independent scholars. Also included at the end of the book are two excerpts from Kook's own writings, on the renewal of the Jewish people and on the commandments. Gellman's goals for the volume were "to include those essays which touched upon the broader and more universal aspects of Rabbi Kook" and to provide the reader with "the basics of his philosophy." In line with these aims, the collection opens with an essay by Norman Lamm stressing the kabbalistic concept of unity as an overarching theme of Rabbi Kook's philosophy. This piece turns out, as expected, to define the tenor of the rest of the collection, inasmuch as unity in all its forms (cosmic, religious, and national, to name but a few) appears as an important element in the discussions of almost every subject. The contextualization of Rabbi Kook's ideas within the various streams of traditional Jewish thought (see especially Yaron's article) and analysis of Kook's ideas as they relate to the spiritual and national situation of Jewry in the 20th century both receive secondary emphasis.

KAPLAN and SHATZ have compiled an excellent group of academic studies on Kook, many of which have not appeared elsewhere. The work is divided into three topical sections and ends with a comprehensive bibliography of primary and secondary materials. The authors represented in this collection present often differing interpretations of Kook's thought, providing a glimpse of some of the major hermeneutical problems regarding his work. Part one treats Rabbi Kook's relationship to Jewish traditions, with essays on his transformations of Kabbalah and Hasidism, his relationship to the legacy of Maimonides, and his contributions as poet and halakhist. As evident from Agus, Ben Shlomo, and Gellman, Kook's notions of unity and the dialectical processes of history and spiritual life figure largely in his thought, and part two is dedicated to discussions of how these elements appear in his thinking on tolerance, the sacred and the profane, belief, and the overcoming of death. Part three, the shortest section of the book, is titled "Zionism, Messianism, and the State of Israel," and it explores the role of Kook's dialectics in his thought on the land of Israel as well as the practical implications of his views for the Jewish polity.

NERIAH, in contrast to all of the authors reviewed above, gives the reader an "insider's" view of Rabbi Kook. His book is organized thematically, each chapter focusing on a different holiday or period of the Jewish year. The chapters are comprised of quotations from Rabbi Kook's writings and speeches together with a multitude of anecdotes about him told by his followers and friends. They transmit a sense of Kook's powerful personality and the impact he had on those who came under his spell. A glossary of Hebrew and Aramaic terms is provided, along with an appendix of short biographies of leading protagonists in the story of his life.

VICTORIA WATERS

Kotsk, Menahem Mendel of see Menahem Mendel of Kotsk

Krochmal, Nachman 1785–1840

Galician idealist philosopher of history and Wissenschaft scholar

Cooper, Eli Louis, Am Segullah: A Treasured People, New York: Vantage, 1983

Harris, Jay, Nachman Krochmal: Guiding the Perplexed of the Modern Age (Modern Jewish Masters Series), New York: New York University Press, 1991

- Rotenstreich, Nathan, Jewish Philosophy in Modern Times: From Mendelssohn to Rosenzweig, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1968
- Schechter, Solomon, "Nachman Krochmal and the 'Perplexities of the Time'," in his Studies in Judaism, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1915
- Schorsch, Ismar, "The Philosophy of History of Nachman Krochmal," Judaism, 10, 1961
- Schorsch, Ismar, "Zunz as Krochmal's Editor," Leo Baeck Institute Yearbook, 31, 1986
- Spiegel, Shalom, Hebrew Reborn, New York: Macmillan, 1930; London: Benn, 1931

Nachman Krochmal was one of the first Jewish thinkers to integrate the study of history into his philosophical system. In Moreh Nevukhei ha-Zeman (Guide to the Perplexed of Our Time), edited by Leopold Zunz and published posthumously in 1851, Krochmal describes the eternal essence of the history of the Jewish people using the vocabulary of contemporary idealist philosophy. Much of the literature on Krochmal and his work has been sparse and haphazard. Some scholars have discussed Krochmal within the context of larger studies covering many modern Jewish thinkers, often drawing on just one aspect of his philosophy in order to support a particular thesis. Others have focused primarily on the secular philosophical influences on Krochmal. Harris offers the most comprehensive treatment of Krochmal's intellectual legacy to date.

Although only an impressionistic sketch, SCHECHTER's pioneering article was one of the earliest works on Krochmal. His engaging prose provides a glimpse of Krochmal's life and his conception of history. Schechter explains why Krochmal's unprecedented foray into the field of Jewish history earned him the title Father of Jewish Science.

SPIEGEL analyzes Krochmal's work in the context of numerous other works written in Hebrew during the period of the Haskalah and thereafter. Taking a Zionist perspective, he claims that all Hebrew writings, even those whose authors were heretics, have religious content and lead "slowly but surely towards a revival of Jewish religious values." Krochmal's Moreh serves as an example that proves this theory. Although Krochmal was an observant Jew, his use of secular philosophy and treatment of contemporary issues removed his thinking from the realm of tradition. Nevertheless, Spiegel maintains that Krochmal's introduction of a historical sense into Jewish thought and his empirical study of Jewish rites and practices were aimed at preserving tradition. Spiegel argues that Krochmal "provided a foundation for Judaism in the empirical reality of all the spiritual creations of the Jewish genius."

SCHORSCH (1961) provides an important contribution to the discussion of Krochmal's intellectual heritage. He argues that although clearly influenced by Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, Krochmal's philosophy of history is not identical to that of his German predecessor. The article explores Krochmal's attempt to resolve the tension between tradition and history through a philosophic concept of immanence that states that the resolution of all conflicts is inherent in the Torah as given at Sinai. Schorsch compares Krochmal's Absolute Spirit and Hegel's World Spirit, pointing out several crucial distinctions.

According to Hegel, there is an end to history—a point at which man can escape it and achieve a complete understanding of the spirit. Krochmal, however, did not believe that most humankind would ever be able to comprehend the infinite spirit. The nation of Israel, nonetheless, was the one people that was not entirely controlled by these patterns of history. Because Israel's national spirit is the Absolute Spirit, the "study of Jewish history has become the door into the nature of the Absolute Spirit."

ROTENSTREICH is interested in the "transfer of philosophical concepts to traditional religious discourse" that results from the confrontation between traditional religious trends and philosophical systems. Rotenstreich's discussion of Krochmal is included within his discussion of Solomon Formstecher and Samson Raphael Hirsch because all three consider Judaism a religion of the spirit. Unlike the latter two thinkers, however, Krochmal's conception of spirit is transcendent, encompassing ethics. For him, Judaism, like all religions, does not occupy its own sphere; rather, it is subsumed by the greater totality of the Absolute Spirit. According to this view, explains Rotenstreich, "the religious sphere is a transitional stage on the road to complete, philosophical knowledge, just as the religious concept of God is a transitional stage to the perfect concept of God, that is, the 'absolute spiritual.'" Perfection is achieved only through the comprehension of the absolute spiritual, which is expressed through history. Rotenstreich's discussion is somewhat cumbersome, however, particularly because his treatment of Krochmal relies on his discussion of Formstecher and Hirsch.

COOPER uses Krochmal's philosophy of history in order to support his thesis that the Jews are an eternal people and that the basis for their perseverance is the human-divine relationship. In this short book, he adopts Krochmal's assertion that the Jews are an eternal people and sees in Hasidism an instructive example of their characteristic endurance through history. Although his discussion is ideologically driven by a preconceived understanding of the eternal relationship between God and the Jewish people, Cooper does provide the most detailed overview of Krochmal's summary of the cycles of Jewish history.

SCHORSCH (1986) moves away from analysis of the intellectual content of Krochmal's writings and provides a refreshing perspective on his work. Because Krochmal died before completing his manuscript, Leopold Zunz, whom Krochmal personally requested to be his editor, faced the difficult task of organizing his work. In this article, Schorsch prints 29 letters connected to the preparation and publication of Krochmal's Moreh, which he found in Zunz's papers taken out of Germany in 1938. The letters themselves are written in German and Hebrew, but in his English-language introductory article Schorsch discusses the value of these letters in helping to identify Zunz's contributions to the original manuscript as well as in pointing to the concerns and influence of Krochmal's family members. Although none of these letters were penned by Krochmal himself, they contribute significantly to a vivid picture of the man and his intellectual legacy.

HARRIS has written "a biography of the mind that produced the great work," meaning, the Moreh. He accomplishes this task by challenging Krochmal's ideas with the philosophies of the thinkers whose ideas contested the traditional Jewish understanding of God, history, the Bible, rabbinism, and the aggadah (Harris devotes one chapter to each of these topics). Harris is very clear in his presentation of the theories of these fashionable European thinkers, demonstrating how they contest traditional views and then explaining how Krochmal resolved these conflicts. He emphasizes repeatedly Krochmal's unique approach in which he subverts the very language and criteria of his opponents in order to support his own claims. Thus Krochmal, while accepting Herder's and Hegel's notion of historical cycles in which each nation experiences an era of supremacy and is then superseded, aims to demonstrate, through his lengthy discussion of the Jewish renaissance during the Second Commonwealth, how the Jewish people can never be superseded. Harris organizes Krochmal's ideas clearly and vividly depicts the Jewish and European intellectual milieu to which he was reacting. As a conservative 19th-century Wissenschaft thinker, Krochmal advises the perplexed of his time to embrace new intellectual currents because all of modern scholarship is contained within traditional Jewish thought.

ADINA L. SHOULSON

This page intentionally left blank

L

Labor see Social Ethics

Ladino Literature

- Alexander, Tamar, "A Judeo-Spanish Traditional Play (Salonica, 1932)," in The Jewish Communities of Southeastern Europe: From the Fifteenth Century to the End of World War II, edited by Ioannes K. Chasiotes, Thessaloniki: Institute for Balkan Studies, 1997
- Altabé, David Fintz, "Konsezhō a Tomar: A Haskalah Work in Judeo-Spanish," Tradition, 15(4), Spring 1976
- Altabé, David Fintz, "The Romanso, 1900–1933: A Bibliographical Survey," Sephardic Scholar, 3, 1977–1978
- Altabé, David Fintz, "Parallels in the Development of Modern Turkish and Judeo-Spanish Literatures," in Studies on Turkish-Jewish History: Political and Social Relations, Literature, and Linguistics: The Quincentennial Papers, edited by Altabé, Erhan Atay, and Israel Katz, New York: Sepher-Hermon for the American Society of Sephardic Studies, 1996
- Altabé, David Fintz, "Reflections of Sephardic Life in the Ottoman Empire in Two Judeo-Spanish Novels," in Studies on Turkish-Jewish History: Political and Social Relations, Literature, and Linguistics: The Quincentennial Papers, edited by Altabé, Erhan Atay, and Israel Katz, New York: Sepher-Hermon for the American Society of Sephardic Studies, 1996
- Angel, Marc D., "The Pirkei Abot of Reuben Eliyahu Israel," Tradition, 11(4), Spring 1971
- Angel, Marc D., "Judeo-Spanish Drama: A Study of Sephardic Culture," Tradition, 19(2), Summer 1981
- Angel, Marc D., La America: The Sephardic Experience in the United States, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1982
- Armistead, Samuel G., "Judeo-Spanish Traditional Poetry in the United States," in Sephardim in the Americas: Studies in Culture and History (Judaic Studies Series), edited by Martin A. Cohen and Abraham J. Peck, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1993
- Armistead, Samuel G. and Joseph H. Silverman, The Judeo-Spanish Ballad Chapbooks of Yacob Abraham Yoná (Folk Literature of the Sephardic Jews, vol. 1), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971
- Armistead, Samuel G. and Joseph H. Silverman, "Sephardic Folkliterature and Eastern Mediterranean Oral Tradition," Musica Judaica, 6(1), 1983–1984
- Armistead, Samuel G., Joseph H. Silverman, and Israel J. Katz, Judeo-Spanish Ballads from Oral Tradition (Folk Literature of the Sephardic Jews, vol. 2), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986
- Armistead, Samuel G., Joseph H. Silverman, and Israel J. Katz, Judeo-Spanish Ballads from Oral Tradition II: Carolingian Ballads (1): Roncesvalles (Folk Literature of the Sephardic Jews, vol. 3), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994
- Benardete, Mair José, Hispanic Culture and Character of Sephardic Jews, New York: Hispanic Institute in the United States, 1953; 2nd corrected edition edited and augmented by Marc D. Angel, New York: Sepher-Hermon, 1982
- Benmayor, Rina, "Social Determinants in Poetic Transmission: The Sephardic Romancero," in The Sepharadi and Oriental Jewish Heritage: Studies, edited by Issachar Ben-Ami, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1982
- Bunis, David M., "Pyesa di Yaakov Avinu kun sus izus (Bucharest 1862): The First Judezmo Play?," in History and Creativity in the Sephardi and Oriental Jewish Communities, edited by Tamar Alexander, Abraham Haim, Galit Hasan-Rokem, and Ephraim Hazan, Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim, 1994
- Bunis, David M., "Modernization and the Language Question among Judezmo-Speaking Sephardim of the Ottoman Empire," in Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jewries: History and Culture in the Modern Era, edited by Harvey E. Goldberg, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996
- Cohen, Judith, "Women's Role in Judeo-Spanish Song," in Active Voices: Women in Jewish Culture, edited by Maurie Sacks, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995
- Cohen, Judith, "Evolving Roles of Women in Judeo-Spanish Song," in Hispano-Jewish Civilization after 1492, edited by Yom Tov Assis and Galit Hasan-Rokem, Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim, 1997
- Díaz Más, Paloma, Los Sefardíes, 1986; translated by George K. Zucker as Sephardim: The Jews from Spain, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992
- Filippis, Dimitrios, "An Introduction to the Sephardic Language and Literature of the Spanish-Speaking Jews of Thessaloniki," in The Jewish Communities of

- Southeastern Europe: From the Fifteenth Century to the End of World War II*, edited by Ioannes K. Chasiotes, Thessaloniki: Institute for Balkan Studies, 1997
- Halio, Hank, Ladino Reveries: Tales of the Sephardic Experience in America, New York: Foundation for the Advancement of Sephardic Studies and Culture, 1996
- Hemsi, Alberto, Cancionero Sefardí (Yuval Music Series, 4), Jerusalem: Jewish Music Research Centre, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1995
- Kobrin, Nancy H., "Holocaust Literature in Judeo-Spanish, Portuguese and Spanish," Tradition, 18(3), Fall 1980
- Lévy, Isaac Jack, And the World Stood Silent: Sephardic Poetry of the Holocaust, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989
- Loewenthal, Robyn Kay, "Elia Carmona's Autobiography: Judeo-Spanish Popular Press and Novel Publishing Milieu in Constantinople, Ottoman Empire, Circa 1860–1932," Ph.D. diss., University of Nebraska-Lincoln, 1984
- Mirrer, Louise, "Reinterpreting an Ancient Legend: The Judeo-Spanish Version of the Rape of Lucretia," Prooftexts, 6(2), May 1986
- Mirrer, Louise, "Adultery, Intermarriage, and the Theme of Group Destruction in the Judeo-Spanish Ballad Tradition of Seattle and Los Angeles," in History and Creativity in the Sephardi and Oriental Jewish Communities, edited by Tamar Alexander, Abraham Haim, Galit Hasan-Rokem, and Ephraim Hazan, Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim, 1994
- Nar, Albertos, "Una pastora yo ami: An Oriental Sephardic Folksong and Its Origins," in The Jewish Communities of Southeastern Europe: From the Fifteenth Century to the End of World War II, edited by Ioannes K. Chasiotes, Thessaloniki: Institute for Balkan Studies, 1997
- Rafael, Shmuel, "The Judeo-Spanish 'Romance': The Characteristics and Uniqueness of the Genre in Salonica," in The Jewish Communities of Southeastern Europe: From the Fifteenth Century to the End of World War II, edited by Ioannes K. Chasiotes, Thessaloniki: Institute for Balkan Studies, 1997
- Romero, Elena, "Literary Creation in the Sephardi Diaspora," in Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy, vol. 2, edited by Haim Beinart, Jerusalem: Magnes Press, Hebrew University, 1992
- Salama, Messod, "Rabbinical Exegesis in the Judeo-Spanish Romancero," in Hispano-Jewish Civilization after 1492, edited by Yom Tov Assis and Galit Hasan-Rokem, Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim, 1997
- Vidakovic Petrov, Krinka, "Sephardic Folklore and the Balkan Cultural Environment," in History and Creativity in the Sephardi and Oriental Jewish Communities, edited by Tamar Alexander, Abraham Haim, Galit Hasan-Rokem, and Ephraim Hazan, Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim, 1994
- Vidakovic Petrov, Krinka, "The Sephardim in Yugoslavia: Playwrights, Plays, and Performances," in Hispano-Jewish Civilization after 1492, edited by Yom Tov Assis and Galit Hasan-Rokem, Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim, 1997
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, "Musico-Poetic Genres in the Repertoire of the Saloniki Sephardic Jews," in The Jewish Communities of Southeastern Europe: From the Fifteenth Century to the End of World War II, edited by Ioannes K. Chasiotes, Thessaloniki: Institute for Balkan Studies, 1997
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, "Stylistic Features of the Sephardi Copla," in Hispano-Jewish Civilization after 1492, edited by Yom Tov Assis and Galit Hasan-Rokem, Jerusalem: Misgav Yerushalayim, 1997

Research into Ladino literature, conducted mostly in Spain and Israel, is a field of study all but unexplored before the late 20th century. Older publications were essentially bibliographies or anthologies. The first monograph dealing with a large body of Judeo-Spanish literature was published in Spanish only several years ago (Elena Romero's La creación literaria en lengua sefardí, Madrid: Mapfre, 1992). Only a few English-language studies exist, and they are generally confined to only one literary work or one aspect of literature, most often the Sephardi ballads known as romances. The works reviewed in this essay are recent studies in English on Eastern Judeo-Spanish literature. Readers are cautioned that this survey does not cover the full breadth of the literary production of Spanish-speaking Sephardim. Nor does this essay consider works on Western Sephardi literature, because such works were not written in Ladino but in Castilian Spanish or in Portuguese.

ALEXANDER presents her literary analysis of Shlomo Merkado Reuben's play Ester (Esther), which was written and performed in Salonika (Thessaloniki) in 1932. Alexander begins by discussing the tradition of biblical dramas in Jewish society and provides background material about forms of Purim celebration. She also provides a biographical sketch of Reuben. She discusses the play's music, the original choreographer, and the circumstances of the play's production. She also analyzes different versions of the text, the structure of the play, its performance, and the sources Reuben drew from in writing the play. She concludes by discussing French playwright Jean Racine's influence on Reuben.

ALTABÉ (1976) analyzes an anonymous autobiographical story printed serially in a Ladino journal in Vienna. The story takes place in about 1880 and is set in Istanbul. It describes the first 35 years of the author's life in a traditional Sephardi community. The author paints a vivid yet critical portrait of the society and its superstitions. Altabé summarizes the contents and compares the ideas of the author with the aims of the Alliance Israélite Universelle.

ALTABÉ (1996a) compares events in Turkey and in Sephardi communities during the 17th to 19th centuries. Around 1840 the first Turkish and the first Judeo-Spanish newspapers began to appear. Translations of French literature became available in both cultures as well. In 1873 the first patriotic Turkish play was staged. Similarly, Sephardi communities began performing Judeo-Spanish plays, religious dramas, and secular plays (mostly those of Molière or Racine) at the Alliance schools. Outstanding original Judeo-Spanish playwrights included Abraham Capon and Shabbetai Djaen of Yugoslavia.

Two other works of Altabé are worthy of note. ALTABÉ (1996b) discusses the novel Rafael i Miryam by B. Sacerdote (possibly a pseudonym of B. Hakohen) and the autobiography of Elia Carmona, which not only uses the devices of fiction but in many ways resembles a picaresque novel. ALTABÉ (1977–1978) lists original Judeo-Spanish works and translated novels published from 1900 to 1933 and provides statistical data.

ANGEL (1971) offers a biographical sketch of Rabbi Reuben Eliyahu Israel of Rhodes, bibliographic information on his works, and literary analysis. Angel praises his subject's translation of Mishnah Avot, published in 1924, and discusses some of his translation methods.

ANGEL (1981) describes the beginnings of the modern study of Sephardi culture in Spain as a prologue to his review of Elena Romero's important 1979 study of the dramatic literature of the Eastern Sephardim, El Teatro de los Sefardies orientales. Romero lists 684 original and translated plays. Angel summarizes Romero's research and notes that the dramatic repertoire of Judeo-Spanish theaters in the United States should be added to this list.

ANGEL (1982) is a biography of Moise Gadol, the editor of La America, the first Judeo-Spanish newspaper published in the United States (1910–1925). Gadol and his newspaper played a central role in New York City's Sephardi community, and the newspaper reported on and documented the community's activities and concerns. Using La America as his main source (other sources include interviews with Gadol's friends and acquaintances), Angel chronicles Gadol's life in the larger context of the Sephardi immigrant community. Most of the Judeo-Spanish intellectuals living in the United States from 1910 to 1941 are mentioned in the book, as are other Judeo-Spanish newspapers, particularly La Vara, a major competitor of Gadol's paper.

ARMISTEAD, one of the most distinguished American researchers of Judeo-Spanish folk literature, presents a short description of an ambitious team project he carried out with Joseph H. Silverman and ethnomusicologist Israel J. Katz. He supplies introductions to and examples of each genre of the literature in romanized Judeo-Spanish and in English translation. ARMISTEAD and SILVERMAN (1983–1984) provide a useful introduction to the study of Judeo-Spanish folklore, concentrating mostly on ballads and coplas and their connections with Greek, Turkish, and Serbo-Croat counterparts.

In the introduction to their study, ARMISTEAD and SILVERMAN (1971) make a serious attempt to compile a biography of the poet and collector of Judeo-Spanish folk poetry, Jacob Abraham Jona of Salonika (Thessaloníki). They supply a list of his chapbooks and a bibliography of the romances published in these pamphlets. In the introduction to ARMISTEAD, SILVERMAN, and KATZ (1986), the authors consider the traditional types of Sephardi ballad and their importance in research on medieval Spanish balladry. They describe how they collected and collated versions of texts as they conducted their fieldwork from 1957 to 1978 in different Sephardi communities. They also compare their findings to Ramon Menendez Pidal's collection of ballads from the Iberian Peninsula and review most other published collections. In the introduction to ARMISTEAD, SILVERMAN, and KATZ (1994), the authors discuss separate thematic aspects of the traditional ballads of the Sephardim, going back to Carolingian ballads and their Spanish derivatives, connected to the defeat of the French at Roncesvalles. The authors discuss particular ballads and their forms, tracing their evolution from medieval Spain to versions current among their Balkan Sephardi informants.

BENARDETE presents a useful introduction to Judeo-Spanish culture and provides historical and social background for the emergence of Judeo-Spanish literature, as well as documenting Sephardi contacts with Spain and tracing the decline of Sephardi communities. He examines the role of Hebrew and Judeo-Spanish languages in Jewish society, noting the influence of Sephardi Hebrew literature on the emerging Judeo-Spanish literature and arguing that Hebrew stood in the way of Judeo-Spanish evolving as a literary language. He discusses some early Sephardi and Marrano literati of the Ottoman Empire, such as Rabbi Moses Almosnino and Amatus Lusitanus. Other topics he covers include Judeo-Spanish books from the first half of the 16th century, the composition of the popular homiletical digest Me'am Lo'ez, translations of the Bible dating from before the expulsion as well as later translations of the 18th century, the impact of the establishment of modern schools by the Alliance Israélite Universelle, and Judeo-Spanish newspapers. He asserts that Christian missionaries played a positive role in educating Jewish boys and girls and by translating the Bible into Judeo-Spanish. Benardete concludes with a discussion of Sephardi communities in the United States and their social and cultural problems.

BENMAYOR analyzes the modern study of Sephardi ballads (romances), noting differences in methodology and goals, and calls for an integration of the research. She outlines key social issues confronting the Sephardim in the Ottoman Empire, the role oral poetry played in social functions, and how social factors influenced the history of folk literature.

BUNIS (1996) describes the language problems that began to arise in Sephardi communities in the Ottoman Empire as the influence of Western culture increased. Bunis notes that debates published in the Judeo-Spanish press are very important both to the study of the sociology of the Sephardim and to the study of the literary process in Judeo-Spanish literature. The article discusses two aspects of these debates: arguments regarding replacement of the language and arguments regarding normalization of the language. To help illustrate the differing attitudes toward Judeo-Spanish, Bunis notes that the same language was known by different names (e.g., Judezmo) and that its scripts and orthography were extremely varied.

BUNIS (1994) discusses Moshe Shemuel Kofino's play Pyesa di Yaakov Avinu kun sus izus, which was performed in Bucharest in 1862 and which the author contends may be the first Judezmo play. The play dramatizes the biblical story of Joseph being sold into slavery by his brothers. Bunis analyzes the play's language, content, and literary features and also includes a transcription of the play.

COHEN (1995) discusses women in their role as performers and transmitters of Judeo-Spanish songs. Previous researchers dealt with text or music only. Cohen outlines various genres of Judeo-Spanish song, and then she describes the function of each genre. She also describes the almost spontaneous process of "dechristianization" and adaptation of non-Jewish content to make it reflect Jewish values. Cohen also acknowledges the role recent scholars have played in the reshaping of the Judeo-Spanish repertoire, particularly the cadre of women scholars who both conduct ethnomusicological research and also act as consultants to performers. COHEN (1997) describes women's role in the selection, performance, and preservation of the character of Judeo-Spanish songs and compares and contrasts the heroines of these songs with modern women performers.

Chapter four of DÍAZ MÁ'S book offers the most complete English-language survey of Judeo-Spanish literature to date, although it still does not cover the entire spectrum. The chapter is an excellent place for beginners to gain a familiarization with the literature. The chapter is divided into the following subsections: "The Bible and Religious Literature," "The Coplas," "Traditional Genres: Proverb, Popular Story, Ballad," and "'Adopted Genres': Journalism, Narrative, Theater, Autograph Poetry."

FILIPPIS sets down some basic facts on the Judeo-Spanish of Salonika (Thessaloníki) and discusses the names of the language and its elements, speech, and scripts. He also discusses literary genres of Judeo-Spanish literature and their relationship to Balkan literatures. He discusses Me'am Lo'ez and other literary works, the influence of the Alliance Israélite Universelle on education and literary tastes, and the development of a prolific Judeo-Spanish press. The author notes the influence of translations of Western novels and of the modernization of Sephardi life, especially after the Greek annexation of the city in 1912, on Judeo-Spanish literature. Filippis concludes by outlining the causes of the crisis in Sephardi society—the disintegration of its traditional structure, the community's identity crisis, the language problem, and finally the consequences of the Holocaust.

HALIO's book is a collection of his columns published in the Sephardic Home News beginning in 1986, when the Judeo-Spanish language was dying and some older Sephardim, mostly born in the United States, demonstrated a curiosity about their parents' or grandparents' native tongue. Halio writes on a wide variety of subjects including the history of Spanish Jews, the identity of the Sephardim, the beauty of Judeo-Spanish, Ladino proverbs, poetry, fables, loan words in Judeo-Spanish (e.g., from Turkish or English), and the difficulties Sephardi immigrants experienced in learning English.

In a new edition of HEMSI's collection of Judeo-Spanish folk songs of the eastern Mediterranean region, Edwin Seroussi evaluates the compilation, citing the opinions of such experts as Samuel G. Armistead and Joseph H. Silverman and ethnomusicologist Israel J. Katz. He describes the original layout and its genre and thematic divisions, followed by a description of the present edition. Seroussi also discusses the history and conception of Hemi's collection, including some quotes from Hemi's autobiographical writings, and evaluates Hemi as a musicologist. Introducing the liturgical section of the collection, Seroussi comments on seven songs included in the section and cites their sources. The songs he discusses were all translated from Hebrew or Aramaic and became traditional through their performance on holidays. Paloma Díaz Más provides the historical background for Hemi's work and ranks him among other researchers of Sephardi romances. She analyzes his methods and the ways in which he built his collection. Then she examines the content, themes, and motifs of the romances in the collection and discusses the originality of the ballads. José M. Pedrosa discusses versions of songs recorded by Hemi and notes their value for researchers. He finds in the collection the following genres: birth songs, lullabies, love songs, wedding songs, entertainment songs, and death songs. Pedrosa considers the relationship between romanceros (ballads) and canciones (songs) and also discusses the geographical or ethnic origins of songs. Elena Romero introduces coplas (rhymes). She points out that coplas were written down, whereas romanceros and canciones were transmitted orally. She mentions that coplas owe less to Hispanic influences and may be viewed as original Sephardi creations. She discusses coplas with biblical themes and a few that are of religious or national interest. One of the coplas contains a reference to the false messiah Shabbetai Tsevi. In his discussion, Armistead notes the value of the Hemi collection and the importance of the present edition. He observes that the collection preserves numerous Turkisms and Balkanisms. Regarding the literary process in oral poetry, the collection is valuable for the study of contamination (combining diverse components of unrelated narrative poems). He illustrates the ethnically varied character of Sephardi songs by pointing out loan words borrowed from Greek, Turkish, and Albanian.

KOBRIN brings to light some neglected works of Holocaust literature. Among the works she discusses are Isaac Benrubi's El Sekreto del mudo, a novel about two Sephardi inmates in Auschwitz, and a communal history, Zikhrón Saloniki: Grandeza i Destruyición de Yeruchalayim del Balkan, edited by David A. Recanati. Although only a very small part of Zikhrón Saloniki is written in Judeo-Spanish, even this part is not original.

In the preface and introduction to his anthology of poetry, LÉVY brings together historical and literary data related to the fate of those who were part of the Sephardi diaspora during World War II, particularly those living in Greece. In a special introductory chapter "Hatred Hurt Them into Poetry," he analyzes poems written by Sephardi inmates of Auschwitz and other camps and Sephardi survivors of the Holocaust and identifies the poems' principal ideas and motifs. The anthology itself includes poems in the original Judeo-Spanish with parallel English translations.

LOEWENTHAL presents a biographical sketch of Elia Carmona, a major figure among modern Sephardi writers and journalists. She also provides an introduction to the history of the Judeo-Spanish press and transliterates Carmona's autobiography.

MIRRER (1986) analyzes an old Judeo-Spanish ballad based on the ancient Roman legend of Lucretia, the virtuous Roman matron, and the Roman king Tarquin. In all the Sephardi versions of this ballad, Lucretia is a Jewish queen and Tarquin is a Christian king who attempts to seduce her. Pride in Jewish identity prompts Lucretia to give up her life rather than dishonor her kinsmen. Mirrer uses this romance as an example of how literary processes may reshape history.

MIRRER (1994) suggests the vividness with which Sephardim continue to view the Spain of their ancestors as a point of reference. She discusses a particular group of romances, involving themes of adultery and intermarriage, that are sung in Seattle and Los Angeles. She argues that these medieval texts serve a contemporary social function because adultery and intermarriage are major threats to the stability of the American-Sephardi subculture.

NAR discusses one of the best-known Sephardi folk songs, “Una pastora yo ami,” providing its original Judeo-Spanish text and an English translation. He traces the song’s origins to the Greek poem “The Kiss” by the 19th-century Greek poet Georgios Zalokostas. Nar discovers that the poem became popular through theatrical performances and was then reworked into a Judeo-Spanish context.

REFAEL concentrates on ballads. He summarizes the results of his research on some 356 ballads of Salonika (Thessaloníki), discussing their classification and the tasks of his project.

ROMERO surveys Judeo-Spanish literature from the 16th through the 19th centuries. She discusses biblical translations and liturgical works, religious ethics and halakhah, the works of Rabbi Abraham Asa and Me’am Lo’ez, the Judeo-Spanish press from the mid-19th century to the present, and Judeo-Spanish theater, a field in which Romero is a pioneering researcher. Romero concludes by discussing the factors that brought about the decline and demise of Judeo-Spanish literature in the 20th century.

SALAMA criticizes earlier scholars for concentrating on Spanish sources of Judeo-Spanish ballads and neglecting Jewish ones. He discusses the biblical romances and their popularity in different Jewish communities. Salama suggests that rabbis or learned laymen may have extemporized midrash-based elaborations of the original Iberian Peninsula romances. These midrashic interpretations were later memorized by female singers and became a major source of popular literature. Most of the rabbinic material were borrowed from Me’am Lo’ez or from Pirke Avot; the rest comes largely from Sefer ha-Yashar and Pirke de Rabbi Eli’ezer. Salama asserts that almost all of the deviations or additional details in biblical romances can be explained by finding the sources in this midrashic literature.

VIDAKOVIC PETROV (1994) describes the ethnic diversity of the Balkan peninsula and the social conditions of the Sephardi communities and how these circumstances influenced Sephardi popular literature. The beliefs, superstitions, and popular customs of Balkan gentiles found their way into Judeo-Spanish oral and literary texts. Vidakovic concludes with a discussion of two Sephardi documents, a manuscript from Bosnia dated 1820 and a notebook of David Kamhi of Sarajevo. Both documents show that the Sephardim were bilingual, at home in Serbo-Croat as well as Spanish, and familiar with local folklore. Processes of assimilation and interaction had been at work all through the Ottoman period, and they intensified during the middle of the 19th century. By the end of the 19th century, some Sephardi writers wrote in Serbo-Croat, while others continued to write in Judeo-Spanish until World War II.

VIDAKOVIC PETROV (1997) is a survey, beginning in 1625, of dramas performed among the Sephardim of Italy and Yugoslavia. Most of the plays—comedies and tragedies—were biblical narratives related to particular holidays such as Purim or Passover. Vidakovic also discusses a number of theaters, actors, and playwrights in Yugoslavia.

WEICH-SHAHAK (1997a) discusses Judeo-Spanish romanceros, cancioneros, and coplas. The emphasis in her article is on the classification and definition of these genres. She analyzes the social function and the prosody and literary features of the poems in conjunction with their musical structure. She also notes Eastern influences. WEICH-SHAHAK (1997b) defines the Sephardi copla genre and analyzes content, structure, versification, rhyme schemes, and musical structure.

HAYIM Y. SHEYNIN

Lamentations

Hillers, Delbert R. (editor), Lamentations (Anchor Bible, 7A), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1972, 2nd edition, 1992

Provan, Iain, Lamentations (New Century Bible Commentary), Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, and London: Pickering, 1991

Rosenberg, Abraham J., The Five Megilloth, vol. 2: Lamentations and Ecclesiastes, New York: Judaica, 1992

Salter, Robert B., Jonah and Lamentations (Old Testament Guides), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1994

Westermann, Claus, Lamentations: Issues and Interpretation, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, and Edinburgh: Clark, 1994

The Book of Lamentations is a collection of five poems, traditionally held to be the work of the prophet Jeremiah; indeed, the Greek translation of the book has a superscription that identifies not only the author but the time in which the book was written: just after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.E. This identification is further emphasized by the location of the book within the Greek Bible, where it is juxtaposed with Jeremiah. Four of the five poems are in acrostic form, while the fifth, although not an actual acrostic, has 22 lines (the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet). The questions that arise in the book are those of origin, authorship, function, background, and theology, and some of the publications described below deal with these issues. The traditional view that Jeremiah was the author has been abandoned by all but the most conservative biblical scholars, but there are those who would argue that the book is, nevertheless, a unity, whoever the author was.

WESTERMANN’S highly interesting book is true to its subtitle: the text covers the issues and provides interpretation. While there is a translation and a commentary on the text, there is also an invaluable section (chapter two) that puts the reader in the picture by tracing the history of the interpretation of Lamentations from the turn of the century up to 1985. Westermann then deals with the date of composition, the place of composition (probably Judah), the question of authorship, and the unity of the book (several authors and not a unity). Westermann’s first chapter is a discussion of various views on the idea that Lamentations may be modeled on a foreign (Sumerian) lament over the city of Ur and so is a literary construction. The argument that prevails is that the genre of the five poems is largely that of the communal lament seen in various ancient Near Eastern cultures and most familiarly in the Book of Psalms. Westermann holds that the acrostic pattern has been imposed on the poems, thereby giving the impression that there is a unity of sorts, but that the sentiments are, for the most part, a collection of actual expressions of grief and lamentation from those who witnessed the fall of Jerusalem. In a section titled "The Theological Significance of Lamentations," he observes that God is depicted as directing history—not just the history of Israel but that of all peoples, at least in their relation to Israel. The book also shows that the authors, who attribute the fall of Jerusalem to the sins of the people of Judah, are in agreement with the prophetic message represented by Jeremiah.

SALTERS's book is not a commentary; it is a guide to Lamentations and is primarily aimed at the general reader or student. Salters believes that all five poems have as their starting point the tragedy of the fall of Jerusalem and its aftermath, and he feels it is important to offer a chapter on the historical background to this event—the rise of the kingdom of Babylon, the rebellion by Zedekiah, etc.—to set the scene. He also supplies an outline of the book before discussing traditional issues such as authorship (not Jeremiah and probably not one author), the acrostic phenomenon (employed as an artistic device and not as an aid to memory or to teach the alphabet), and the poetry in the book. He believes that the book was written and used to commemorate the disaster of 586 B.C.E.—the fact that the poems differ from the laments in the Book of Psalms points to the sheer magnitude of the tragedy, calling forth a special kind of composition.

In the second edition of HILLERS's commentary, he says that he writes "primarily for the general reader," and this is indeed so, although it should be noted that Hillers does provide technical support both for his views and for his translation. Subsequent to the publication of the first edition, a fragment of the Hebrew text of Lamentations was discovered among the documents of the Dead Sea Scrolls, and in the second edition Hillers discusses its quite considerable divergences from the Masoretic Hebrew text. Hillers is a cautious scholar, but this is one of the very best English-language treatments of Lamentations.

PROVAN's book is a good traditional commentary. The main difference from, say, Hillers' lies in Provan's belief that the poems may not have originated in the aftermath of 586 B.C.E. He argues that others have accepted the traditional standpoint (at least in part) without proper examination of the evidence. There are no dates or names given in the book to link the poems with any period in particular. The author, he argues, is given to hyperbole, which makes any attempt at interpretation a risky business.

ROSENBERG's book may, at first sight, alarm the general reader, but in fact a lot of what he says is quite digestible. It is true that the Hebrew text is accompanied by the Targum and several medieval Hebrew commentaries, but it is not necessary to read Hebrew or Aramaic to understand much of the accompanying material. Rosenberg offers a new English translation of Lamentations and a translation of the commentary by the medieval exegete Rashi (a valuable contribution in itself), which is supplemented with quotations and observations from midrashim and other medieval works, some of which are not available elsewhere in English translation. If the reader is searching for a modern approach to Lamentations this is not the place to look—Rosenberg simply assumes that Jeremiah is the author and that the fall of Jerusalem and its aftermath has caused him to write in this way—but Rosenberg approaches the text in such a way that the mood of lament comes across vividly to the reader. In fact, the medieval emphasis makes this book a good complement to Westermann's history of modern interpretation.

ROBERT B. SALTERS

Languages, Jewish

- Ahroni, Reuben, "Some Observations on the Judeo-Arabic Dialect of the Jews of Aden," in his The Jews of the British Crown Colony of Aden: History, Culture, and Ethnic Relations, New York: Brill, 1994
- Avishur, Yitzhak, "Some New Sources for the Study of the Text and Language of Saadya's Translation of the Pentateuch into Judeo-Arabic," in Genizah Research after Ninety Years: The Case of Judaeo-Arabic: Papers Read at the Third Congress of the Society for Judaeo-Arabic Studies, edited by Joshua Blau and Stefan C. Reif, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Besso, Henry V., "Judeo-Spanish: Its Growth and Decline," in The Sephardi Heritage, edited by R.D. Barnett, New York: Ktav, 1971
- Birnbaum, Salomo, "Jewish Languages," in Essays in Honour of The Very Rev. Dr. J.H. Hertz, edited by I. Epstein, E. Levine, and C. Roth, London: Goldston, 1942
- Blau, Joshua, The Emergence and Linguistic Background of Judaeo-Arabic, London: Oxford University Press, 1965; 2nd edition, Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute for the Study of Jewish Communities in the East, 1981
- Blau, Joshua, "On a Fragment of the Oldest Judeo-Arabic Bible Translation Extant," in Genizah Research after Ninety Years: The Case of Judaeo-Arabic: Papers Read at the Third Congress of the Society for Judaeo-Arabic Studies, edited by Joshua Blau and Stefan C. Reif, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Blau, Joshua and Simon Hopkins, "On Early Judeo-Arabic Orthography," in Blau's Studies in Middle Arabic and Its Judaeo-Arabic Variety, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1988
- Bunis, David M., "The Language of the Sephardim: A Historical Overview," in Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy, vol. 2, edited by Haim Beinart, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1992
- Bunis, David M., "Judezmo and Its Hebrew and Aramaic Component: An Introduction," in his A Lexicon of the Hebrew and Aramaic Elements in Modern Judezmo, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University [and] Misgav Yerushalayim, 1993

- Chetrit, Joseph, "Judeo-Arabic and Judeo-Spanish in Morocco and Their Socio-linguistic Interaction," in Readings in the Sociology of Jewish Languages, edited by Joshua A. Fishman, Leiden: Brill, 1985
- Cohen, D. and Joshua Blau, "Judeo-Arabic," in The Encyclopaedia of Islam, edited by E. van Donzel, B. Lewis, and Ch. Pellat, vol. 4, new edition, Leiden: Brill, 1978
- Drory, Rina, "'Words Beautifully Put': Hebrew Versus Arabic in Tenth-Century Jewish Literature," in Genizah Research after Ninety Years: The Case of Judaeo-Arabic: Papers Read at the Third Congress of the Society for Judaeo-Arabic Studies, edited by Joshua Blau and Stefan C. Reif, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Fishman, Joshua A. (editor), Never Say Die!: A Thousand Years of Yiddish in Jewish Life and Letters, New York: Mouton, 1981
- Fitzmyer, Joseph A., A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays, Missoula, Montana: Scholars Press, 1979
- Greenfield, Jonas C., "The Genesis Apocryphon: Observations on Some Words and Phrases," in Studies in Hebrew and Semitic Languages Dedicated to the Memory of Prof. Eduard Yehezkel Kutscher, edited by Gad B. Sarfatti et al., Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1980
- Harris, Tracy K., Death of a Language: The History of Judeo-Spanish, Newark: University of Delaware Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1994
- Jerusalmi, Isaac, "Ladino, Our Language," in his From Ottoman Turkish to Ladino: The Case of Mehmet Sadik Rifat Pasha's Risâle-i Ahlâk and Judge Yehezkel Gabbay's Buen Doctrino (Ladino Books), Cincinnati, Ohio: Jerusalmi, 1990
- Komlosch, Yehudah, "The Etymological Basis of Certain Translations in the Targum Jonathan to the Twelve Prophets," in Studies in Hebrew and Semitic Languages Dedicated to the Memory of Prof. Eduard Yehezkel Kutscher, edited by Gad B. Sarfatti et al., Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1980
- Kutscher, Edward, "Aramaic," in Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 3, Jerusalem: Keter, 1971
- Kutscher, Edward, Hebrew and Aramaic Studies, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1977
- Lazard, G., "Judeo-Persian: Language," in The Encyclopaedia of Islam, edited by E. van Donzel, B. Lewis, and Ch. Pellat, vol. 4, new edition, Leiden: Brill, 1978
- Paper, Herbert H. (editor), Jewish Languages: Theme and Variations, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Association for Jewish Studies, 1978
- Schussman, Aviva, "An Iraqi Judeo-Arabic Version of Ma'aseh Avraham: Some Literary and Linguistic Features," in Genizah Research after Ninety Years: The Case of Judaeo-Arabic: Papers Read at the Third Congress of the Society for Judaeo-Arabic Studies, edited by Joshua Blau and Stefan C. Reif, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Shaked, Shaul and Amnon Netzer (editors), Irano-Judaica, 3 vols., Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute for the Study of Jewish Communities in the East, 1982-1994
- Shy, Hadassa, "Taqdir and Its Counterparts in Mediaeval Judeo-Arabic," in Genizah Research after Ninety Years: The Case of Judaeo-Arabic: Papers Read at the Third Congress of the Society for Judaeo-Arabic Studies, edited by Joshua Blau and Stefan C. Reif, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Sokoloff, Michael, "Notes on the Vocabulary of Galilean Aramaic," in Studies in Hebrew and Semitic Languages Dedicated to the Memory of Prof. Eduard Yehezkel Kutscher, edited by Gad B. Sarfatti et al., Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1980
- Weinreich, Max, History of the Yiddish Language, translated by Shlomo Noble with the assistance of Joshua A. Fishman, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980
- Wexler, Paul, "Recovering the Dialects and Sociology of Judeo-Greek in Non-Hellenistic Europe," in Readings in the Sociology of Jewish Languages, edited by Joshua A. Fishman, Leiden: Brill, 1985
- Zafrani, H., "Judeo-Berber," in The Encyclopaedia of Islam, edited by E. van Donzel, B. Lewis, and Ch. Pellat, vol. 4, new edition, Leiden: Brill, 1978

Jewish languages is not a well-established linguistic category. Not all linguists accept this division on the grounds that this group includes languages that belong to different families. Many linguists resent classification of languages according to religious criteria. In addition, the Hebrew script cannot be the sole criterion, because the form is secondary to the language structure. Most modern scholars accept the idea of studying "languages of the Jews" as sociolects, while some others prefer to see the so-called Jewish languages as dialects of the languages of the majority in a particular geographic region; thus they see in Judeo-Spanish a dialect of Castilian, in Yiddish a dialect of German, in Judeo-Persian a dialect of Persian. There is more consensus in relation to European Jewish languages, although scholars are divided in identifying and counting these languages. Some think they number more than a dozen, while others count more than two dozen. The assessment of primary data is still in its infancy. From time to time, new Jewish languages and dialects are reported (e.g., Judeo-Persian dialects of the Jews of Arbîl and Hamadân or different dialects of Judeo-Arabic in Iraq, which were recognized during the 1980s). The disagreements relate also to the names of languages. Not all Jewish languages have been investigated to the same degree, some have not been researched at all, and others are known only in general. Very little of the linguistic research has concerned itself with the history of all Jewish languages, with even the best studies limited to a description of one or a group of Jewish languages or dialects. The greatest number of research works on the subject are in Hebrew, German, French, Italian, Spanish, Dutch, Czech, Hungarian, Russian, and Polish; some recent studies have also appeared in Arabic, Persian, Turkish, and Japanese. This essay, however, focuses on a limited selection of relatively recent English works and stresses the better-known Jewish languages.

BIRNBAUM deals with the classification of Jewish languages. He discusses different categories that linguists in the past ascribed to them. He rejects the categories "mixed languages” or “creolized languages” as irrelevant in relation to Jewish languages, stating that most known languages can be regarded as mixed. The term dialects is less derogatory to Jewish languages, but it implies a connection to a particular geographic area. The terms formed with Judeo- prefixed to the name of the non-Jewish majority language, for example, Judeo-Aramaic, Judeo-Greek, and Judeo-Spanish, are not linguistically and sociologically precise. Scholars still use these terms, but they are gradually being replaced by names such as Judezmo and Yiddish. Birnbaum himself suggests names such as Jevanic for Judeo-Greek, Zarphatic for Judeo-French, Italkian for Judeo-Italian, Farsic for Judeo-Persian, Maaravic for the Judeo-Arabic of the Maghreb, and Arvic for the Judeo-Arabic of western Asia, although by the close of the 20th century it appeared that only one of his suggestions—Farsic—was (partially) accepted, because it happened to approximate the name the language’s speakers used. In the rest of the article, Birnbaum discusses factors involved in the formation of the entire group of Jewish languages and considers and rejects such factors as race and national spirit. He notices common trends in the group, namely, conservatism on many levels of the language and both phonological and lexical archaisms. He mentions the influence of religion and script on Jewish languages, noting, however, that religion and script alone do not define the language. He also notes that some of the Jewish languages are largely secularized.

PAPER’s collection considers a number of Jewish languages: Hebrew, Aramaic and its dialects, Yiddish, Judeo-Romance languages, Ladino language and literature, Judeo-Persian, medieval Judeo-Arabic, and the languages used in Palestine from 200 B.C.E. to 200 C.E.

Semitic (Afro-Asian) Languages

Judeo-Aramaic

KUTSCHER (1972), the most important scholar of Aramaic, provides a survey of the entire Aramaic branch of Semitic languages. Among different languages and dialects, many are Judeo-Aramaic. Among the earliest Jewish texts in Aramaic are long passages in the biblical books of Ezra and Daniel (fourth to second centuries B.C.E.), which represent varieties of ancient and official Aramaic. Another significant group includes ancient Aramaic texts that originated in Elephantine (a Jewish colony in southern Egypt that flourished during the sixth and fifth centuries B.C.E.) and in other areas of Egypt (e.g., Hermopolis, fifth century B.C.E.) and Jerusalem inscriptions dating from the Second Temple period. Kutscher discusses Judeo-Aramaic varieties together with non-Jewish Aramaic.

KUTSCHER (1977) is a collection of the author’s linguistic studies. Kutscher discusses the language of many ancient texts in Judeo-Aramaic, for example, Jerusalem inscriptions and the Genesis Apocryphon (a long midrash on Genesis found among the Dead Sea Scrolls). Kutscher reviews Aramaic influences on mishnaic Hebrew; the Jerusalem Talmud and aggadic midrashim; Samaritan Aramaic; and major research tools (especially lexicographic works). GREENFIELD clarifies some Aramaic terms used in the Genesis Apocryphon in two particular semantic fields: legal terminology and exorcism terminology.

KOMLOSH illustrates the various ways in which Targum Jonathan has been translated. Sometimes the translation is literal, sometimes associative, sometimes contextual (translating a word so that it fits in the context of the preceding and the following words), sometimes midrashic.

SOKOLOFF discusses a number of Aramaic words from the Vatican codex of Bereshit Rabbah and interprets the passages in which these words appear. Some of the words cited have never been registered in any dictionaries and some are written differently from the known forms. In cases in which there are parallels in other Aramaic dialects, Sokoloff cites them. This work clarifies the semantics of many words and is a useful aid in understanding Aramaic texts.

There are several relevant essays in FITZMYER’s collection. In the chapter on the languages of Palestine, he describes materials written in Palestinian Aramaic dating from the first century B.C.E. to the second century C.E. The materials include scrolls found in Khirbet Qumran: the Genesis Apocryphon, the Prayer of Nabonidus, the Description of the New Jerusalem, the Elect of God text, parts of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Pseudo-Daniel, Targums of Job, Tobit, Targum of Leviticus, a text mentioning “the Son of God” and “the Son of the Most High,” legal documents from the wadis Murabba’at, Habra, and Seiyâl. He also discusses phases of the Aramaic language and traces linguistic developments.

Judeo-Arabic

In COHEN and BLAU’s entry on Judeo-Arabic in The Encyclopedia of Islam, Cohen summarizes the results of research in Judeo-Arabic dialects. He stresses that there is no one form common to all Arabic-speaking Jews. Judeo-Arabic dialects are as varied as those characteristic of different groups of Muslims. In most of the regions of the Near East, the differences between Muslim and Jewish dialects are minor, sporadic, and unstable, except in southern Iraq and the Maghreb. Cohen demonstrates the peculiarities of the Baghdadi Judeo-Arabic dialect on phonetic and morphological levels. He then presents details of several Maghrebine dialects (those of Fez, Marrakesh, and Debdou in Morocco as well as those of Tlemcen [Algeria] and Tunisia). Cohen attempts to find explanations for the differentiation of the speech between Muslims, Christians, and Jews. Blau, one of pioneers in research of medieval Judeo-Arabic, clarifies the origins of Judeo-Arabic immediately after the great Arab conquests. As soon as Muslim citizens of the towns started to speak Middle Arabic, the Judeo-Aramaic speakers of the same towns also started to speak Arabic, although preserving some elements of their Aramaic speech. In writing, the Jews employed different languages for different purposes: prose was written in Judeo-Arabic, poetry in Hebrew, and the liturgy in Hebrew and Aramaic. Literary Judeo-Arabic is based mainly on Middle Arabic with some blending of Classical Arabic. Most of the features of Judeo-Arabic are also characteristic of Middle Arabic dialects.

The general use of Hebrew script clearly shows the barrier that separated the bulk of the Jewish population from Arab and Islamic cultures. Judeo-Arabic writers tended to feel that they were writing in a language separate from Arabic. BLAU (1981) summarizes the results of the author’s research in written Judeo-Arabic. He stresses that Jews, like Christians, were less inclined to use Classical Arabic than their Muslim contemporaries; their writing contains features of Middle Arabic mixed with some Classical Arabic elements. The most prominent features of medieval Judeo-Arabic are the disappearance of final vowels and the weakening of short vowels, the weakening and disappearance of the glottal stop, the reduction of status constructus, and the replacement of the dual form by the plural.

BLAU (1992) attempts linguistic analysis of the Cambridge Genizah fragment T-S Ar. 53.8, whose orthography is archaic and influenced by Hebrew orthography rather than by Arabic. After comparison to other Judeo-Arabic texts, Blau concludes that this fragment is older than Saadia's translation and that it is apparently the oldest Judeo-Arabic translation extant. Blau offers examples of the peculiarities of the orthography and includes annotations on the text.

BLAU and HOPKINS considers spellings in Judeo-Arabic before 1000 B.C.E., which they term Early Vulgar Judeo-Arabic, based on early Judeo-Arabic papyri (documents and private letters). The spellings found in these papyri differ from those of Classical Judeo-Arabic in that they do not follow the letter rendering of Arabic script but rather represent a phonetic transcription of the sounds of the speech.

In his study of Saadia's Judeo-Arabic translation of the Pentateuch, AVISHUR asserts that there is no adequate edition of this text. The language of Saadia is so rich that it is necessary to compare many sources fully to understand his words and constructions. In the Yemenite manuscripts used by most editors, the Persian words that abound in Egyptian, Iraqi, and Syrian manuscripts were replaced by Arabic words. To determine the form and meaning of these words, Avishur suggests that both Persian lexicography and the Judeo-Persian translations need to be consulted. Avishur makes the important point that Persian words entered Judeo-Arabic in three different ways. Some entered from literary Arabic, others came from spoken Iraqi Arabic, and still others first entered the Aramaic language and from there entered Saadia's language. Avishur also points out that in addition to his use of literary Arabic, Saadia used some dialectal forms. Because Saadia was exposed to Arabic in three different parts of the Near East—Egypt, Palestine, and Iraq—he heard three different Judeo-Arabic dialects. Noting that the Iraqi elements of Saadia's language are often not recognized, Avishur attempts to address this by offering some examples.

DRORY presents the actual linguistic situation in tenth-century Mesopotamia and notes a language shift from Aramaic to Arabic. At the time, the tension between Aramaic and Hebrew was being replaced by a tension between Arabic and Hebrew. She describes Hebrew/Aramaic and Hebrew/Arabic diglossia, noting a division of functions between Hebrew and Arabic.

SHY studies the use and meaning of several technical terms in Judeo-Arabic exegetical literature. She exemplifies her points by citing the works of Classical Judeo-Arabic writers including Saadia ben Joseph Gaon, Ibn Janah, Gikatilla, Judah ibn Bal'am, Maimonides, and Tanhum ha-Yerushalmi.

SCHUSSMAN analyzes a late Iraqi version of Ma'aseh Abraham (the Abraham-Nimrod legend) printed in Baghdad in 1890. She states that the language of this folk text is closer to literary Judeo-Baghdadi than it is to colloquial speech. She notes as well some peculiarities of this dialect.

AHRONI, himself a speaker of the Judeo-Arabic dialect of Aden, studies native speakers of the dialect who live in Israel and England. Among his observations he notes the wide divergence of this dialect from other Judeo-Arabic dialects, including the dialects of the Yemenite Jews. It is so interspersed with Hebrew and Aramaic words and phrases that it is not intelligible to non-Jewish Arabic-speakers. He also describes the multilingual roots of this dialect. Ahroni's glossary demonstrates his points and describes some of the typical ways spoken Jewish languages of Semitic stock have developed.

Hellenic Languages

Judeo-Greek

WEXLER traces Judeo-Greek dialects in Greek and formerly Greek-dominated areas. He also discusses the relationship of Judeo-Greek to other Jewish languages in the region. Then he explains how Judeo-Greek elements made their way into different families of Jewish languages.

Romance Languages

Judeo-Spanish (Ladino, Judezmo)

BUNIS (1992) briefly traces the history of Judeo-Spanish, discussing the complex web of contacts of the Sephardim with their Muslim and Christian neighbors and the names of the language, alphabet, and writing system. Then he speaks about different varieties of Judeo-Spanish and classifies the language at different stages of its development according to particular phonetic, morphological, or lexical changes. He also points out how Judeo-Spanish differs from Castilian.

BUNIS (1993) provides a historical overview of Judeo-Spanish. He traces the survival and development of the language for nearly 500 years in the Ottoman Empire and North Africa, observing a gradual bifurcation of the Ottoman and North African varieties. The latter developed into a full-fledged independent Jewish language (Haketia), while Ottoman Judeo-Spanish survived in many dialects, albeit forming two groups: those used in southeastern (modern Turkey and Greece) and northwestern (the former Yugoslavia) areas. In addition, he describes distinctive Israeli and Middle Eastern dialects. According to Bunis, the history of the language may be divided into distinct periods: Old Judezmo (current from the 11th century to about 1547), Middle Judezmo (c.1547 to 1820), and Modern Judezmo (c.1820 to the present). He discusses the characteristic linguistic features of each period.

Although BESSO considers questions similar to those explored in Bunis's 1992 article, the two works are complementary because they consider different sources and cite different examples. Bunis's article is more systematic and centers on language development, while Besso offers readers a broader overview.

HARRIS's work, based on her doctoral dissertation, is the only English-language book on the history of Judeo-Spanish, although her emphasis is on the social history of the language rather than its linguistic history. Taking as her focus the "death of a language" phenomenon, Harris discusses the history of Judeo-Spanish in parallel with the history of its speakers in Spain before the time of the expulsion and in the Sephardi diaspora up to the present. She makes exhaustive use of the historical, statistical, demographic, and sociological data of recent researchers. Harris notes that in the Ottoman Empire the Sephardim spoke a regional dialect, but a Castilian dialect was accepted as the official language. Linguistic unity was achieved about half a century after exile (i.e., dialect differences were reduced or assimilated into Castilian). Harris discusses the various scripts used for Judeo-Spanish. Although “rabbinic” semicursive or “Rashi script” (ketav Rashi) was generally used for writing and for printing Judeo-Spanish texts, Harris demonstrates how extensively other scripts were also used: quadrate script (ketav merubba) was employed in the printing of some books and for handwritten official documents, while the solitreo script was used for notes and letters. The connection between Rashi, the archetypical Ashkenazi, and distinctively Sephardi script is also explained: the semicursive handwriting now known as Rashi script was a Sephardi manuscript hand that had been in use for a century or two before the first dated Hebrew printed book appeared in Reggio di Calabria (1475). The book in question was Rashi’s Torah commentary, the type selected emulated Sephardi handwriting, and the association stuck.

As a factor in the development of Judeo-Spanish, Harris notes the isolation of Judeo-Spanish speakers from Spain and points out the various independent formations and transformations influenced by local and foreign languages. During the migrations from region to region, local words and expressions, as well as morphological and syntactic influences, began to infiltrate Judeo-Spanish speakers’ speech. Thus Turkish, Greek, Slavic, and Arabic words expressing new concepts entered Judeo-Spanish. Harris also documents the influence of Western languages such as Italian and French, entering Judeo-Spanish through the schools in which Sephardi children were educated. In the Balkans, Judeo-Spanish remained the principal language of the Sephardim from the settlement in 1492 to World War II. However, as a result of the Greek annexation of Salonika in 1912 and unfavorable socioeconomic conditions from the 1920s onward, Sephardim from the Balkan countries began to immigrate to the United States, Latin America, and Palestine. The second wave of Sephardi immigration occurred after World War II when survivors of the Holocaust went to the United States and Israel. Most Judeo-Spanish speakers today live in Israel and the United States, and most are over 50 years old. According to Harris’s estimation, in the 1990s not more than 60,000 people still spoke the language. Since it is not being passed on to younger generations, the author concludes that the language is dying. Harris devotes significant attention to the different names of the language and the social conditions of the use and decline of the language, noting circumstances such as the rise of nationalism in Turkey and the Balkan countries, the rise of Zionism, and Western educational influences in Sephardi communities. According to Harris, the final blow was the Holocaust, during which many Judeo-Spanish speakers perished.

JERUSALMI’s piece is part of the introduction to a volume containing a Judeo-Spanish translation of a book on moral values. Nevertheless, it offers a significant amount of information about the Ladino language and its history. Jerusalmi points out that for half a millennium Ladino speakers were isolated from outside Hispanic influences. He suggests that during this time conscious efforts were made to maximize the interchangeability between Hebrew/Aramaic and Ladino. Jerusalmi refutes the opinions of scholars who assert that these efforts resulted in extremely literal Ladino translations of the Bible. Jerusalmi contends that this extreme literalness is due to a desire to approximate “la verdad Hebrayca” (the truth behind the Hebrew). Jerusalmi also discusses the Ladino characteristic of coining new words to parallel Semitic concepts. He maintains that Hebrew script did not fit the language and that it impeded learning and reading for pleasure and endorses the switch to Roman script that followed in the wake of Atatürk’s eurocentric realignment of Turkish. Jerusalmi argues against making a sharp distinction between Ladino and Judeo-Spanish and against the use of both the terms Judeo-Spanish and Judezmo. He asserts that Ladino is the traditional and ideal name for the language, justifying his opinion by quoting 12 prominent rabbis, authors, and translators. In a section on grammar, Jerusalmi points out some linguistic patterns in the text that differ greatly from newer texts influenced by French or other Western European languages.

Germanic Languages

Yiddish

Of all the Jewish languages, Yiddish—the Jewish language of the Ashkenazim—has received the most scholarly attention. It also achieved the widest dissemination. Before the Holocaust Yiddish was spoken by more than 11 million people, throughout most of Europe and the Americas, with the highest concentration of speakers in Eastern Europe. WEINREICH describes the emergence and development of Yiddish in the Rhine Valley (the Jewish name for the area is Loter) among local Gallic and Germanic tribes around the year 1000. He describes how different tribes in Europe were assimilated and absorbed into a new ruling majority following conquests or migrations. The same patterns can be seen in Jewish communities. The Jews arrived in an area with a vernacular and acquired a new language based on the language of the ruling majority, but also incorporating elements of their vernacular. Subsequent migrations brought them into contact with other tribes, resulting in further modifications in the language. Weinreich insists that one of the major factors in the development of Yiddish was “the way of the ShaS” (i.e., the idiom and cadences of Talmud study). The center of Ashkenazi settlement gradually moved toward Eastern Europe, and by the 17th century most Ashkenazim lived on Polish lands. Weinreich also points out that the history of Yiddish reflects the history of the Ashkenazim. Weinreich identifies four periods in the development of Yiddish: Earliest Yiddish (c.1000–1250); Old Yiddish (1250–1500); Middle Yiddish (1500–1750); and Modern Yiddish (1750–present). Analogy was very important in the shaping of the language at different stages of its development. It worked on many levels of the language but is most recognizable in the formation of words using particular models and morphemes, especially suffixes. Weinreich also touches upon the formation of Yiddish dialects and the development of the language through literature and social change.

FISHMAN's collection contains many essays on multiple aspects of Yiddish. Weinreich's "The Reality of Jewishness versus the Ghetto Myth: The Sociolinguistic Roots of Yiddish" and Yudel Mark's "The Yiddish Language: Its Cultural Impact" both offer important data on the history of the language. Weinreich suggests that exploring the historical development of linguistic processes in different Jewish ethnic groups will reveal many analogies and similarities. According to Weinreich, the persistence of the ghetto throughout early modernity and into the 19th century was chiefly responsible for the divergence of the Yiddish language from standard German. Weinreich demonstrates how autonomous Jewish communal institutions not only contributed to the vitality of ghetto society but also played an important role in the development of Yiddish.

Judeo-Iranian Languages

Judeo-Persian

LAZARD discusses the great value of Judeo-Persian texts for researching the history of Persian and for the study of its dialects. Lazard notes that the Jewish texts are very close to the language of everyday speech and that Judeo-Persian literature is not linguistically homogeneous. Lazard delineates the dialectal differences in four groups of Judeo-Persian texts: (1) the Dandan-Uylik letter is remarkable for its archaisms (e.g., the use of the idafa particle to denote the relative, as in Middle Persian), the paucity of Arabic words and the presence of some Sogdian words; (2) a group of Bible translations and paraphrases (e.g., British Library manuscripts of a commentary on Ezekiel and the story of Daniel, a translation of the Pentateuch preserved in the Vatican, and a few other texts) reflect dialects of the south of Iran (Khūzestan and Fārs); (3) literature, especially poetry (14th to 18th centuries), is generally free from dialectal characteristics; (4) the literary and exegetic texts produced in Bukhara (primarily 17th to 19th centuries) are written in Judeo-Tajik, which is very similar to modern Tajik.

SHAKED and NETZER's series deals with Jewish-Iranian relations in a broad sense. Among the materials presented in these collections are literary and folkloric Judeo-Persian texts. In volume three of the series, Haide Sahim's article, "The Dialect of the Jews of Hamedan," deals with the spoken Judeo-Persian of Hamedan (otherwise known as Hamadan, ancient Ecbatana, capital of Media). The author discusses the biblical record of the transfer of the northern kingdom of Israel's population in 721 B.C.E. to this area. He notes that Israelites most likely settled there long before that date, or at the very least, caravans of Israelite merchants passed through the city. Until 1900, the city was home to a Jewish population larger than those in Teheran or Isfahán. Today almost all native speakers of this dialect have emigrated from the city, many to Teheran, and the dialect seems on its way to extinction. Sahim's research was conducted with informants before 1970, when there were still about 350 speakers of the dialect in the city. The residents of Hamedan referred to their language as 'Ebri (i.e., Hebrew), or ancient Persian. According to Sahim, however, the language contains very few Hebrew words.

Berber Languages

Judeo-Berber

ZAFRANI reports on the dialects of the Berber-speaking Jews (Shleuh) who lived in secluded communities in the valleys of the Anti-Atlas mountains in the region near the Wadi Sous and on the fringe of the Sahara Desert. Most of the residents of these communities immigrated to Israel. While a majority of these communities were bilingual (Berber and Arabic), others were strictly Berber speaking, as at Tifnut. In the valley of the Todgha (Tinghir) and elsewhere, Berber was used not only for communication among families and in economic transactions but also as a language of culture and traditional instruction and alongside Hebrew in religious life, giving rise to traditional translations of sacred texts, liturgies, and especially the Passover Haggadah.

CHETRIT describes the interaction of three Jewish languages in Morocco: Judeo-Berber, Judeo-Arabic, and Judeo-Spanish (Haketia). He explores such phenomena as bilingualism and migration, noting especially the impact on North Africa of successive waves of Spanish refugees, as major factors in the development of Moroccan Jewry's polyglot diversity.

HAYIM Y. SHEYNIN

Latin America and the Caribbean

- Avni, Haim, Argentina and the Jews: A History of Jewish Immigration, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1991
- Cohen, Robert, Jews in Another Environment: Surinam in the Second Half of the Eighteenth Century, Leiden and New York: Brill, 1991
- Elkin, Judith L., Jews of the Latin American Republics, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980; 2nd edition as The Jews of Latin America, New York: Holmes and Meier, 1998
- Emmanuel, Isaac and Suzanne Emmanuel, History of the Jews of the Netherlands Antilles, 2 vols., Cincinnati, Ohio: American Jewish Archives, 1970
- Lesser, Jeffrey, Welcoming the Undesirables: Brazil and the Jewish Question, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995
- Levine, Robert M., Tropical Diaspora: The Jewish Experience in Cuba, Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1993
- Mirelman, Victor A., Jewish Buenos Aires, 1890–1930: In Search of an Identity, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1990

Jewish life in Latin America and the Caribbean spans half a millennium, from the time of the conquistadors to the present, and also a vast geographical area, from Mexico to the southern tip of Argentina and Chile. It includes large countries with substantial Jewish minorities as well as small island nations with a tiny Jewish presence.

ELKIN has written a very inclusive one-volume description of Jewish life in the region that gives a taste of the range of experiences throughout successive periods and in the various countries. The work is largely based on secondary sources but manifests a comprehensive understanding of the issues. After a short chapter on the colonial period, the book presents important survey chapters on Jewish immigration to the different independent republics, the development of Jewish agricultural colonies, the economics of Jewish life in the continent, and a survey of Jewish cultural and religious endeavors. Of considerable interest is the last section, which places Jewish life in Latin America within several contexts, such as the culture of each independent state and interrelationships with world Jewry, Zionism, and Israel.

While there was in effect no Jewish life in the Spanish and Portuguese colonial territories in Latin America because Jews were prohibited from entering them, there were centers of Jewish life in the Dutch domains. Chief among these was the island of Curaçao, and EMMANUEL and EMMANUEL have provided a detailed history of internal developments within the Jewish settlement there, as well as in the other Dutch islands, most importantly St. Eustatius. Migrations, the economy, religious life, including the appointment of rabbis and cantors, and especially the links with the mother community in Amsterdam are narrated in abundant detail. COHEN's work is more narrowly focused, limiting itself to describing Jewish life in Surinam, a Dutch colony on the South American mainland facing the Caribbean, specifically during the second half of the 18th century. He places the Jews, a small community throughout the period, in the context of the life of the general population, dwelling on issues such as immigration; the environment and the deep effects it had on the economy and health of the immigrants; the urbanization and impoverishment of the plantation owners (both Jews and non-Jews); relations between Sephardi Jews and their mulatto children; and the colony's sudden but short-lived cultural life. Cohen's comparative approach helps clarify the role of the Jews of Surinam among white plantocrats and slave owners.

The Jewish presence in Argentina is by far the largest and most vibrant in Latin America. The studies by Avni and Mirelman are based on thorough research in the most pertinent archives in Argentina, Israel, the United States, and Europe. They focus, however, on different issues. AVNI gives a detailed history of Jewish immigration to the country from its wars of independence from Spain to the 20th century, placing it in the context of Argentine and world history. The various chapters deal with the issue of legitimization of the Jewish presence in the country, reaction to the promotion of Jewish immigration at various times, the attitudes of established Jews to the newly arrived, and efforts to integrate them into their adoptive country. Legal impediments and stumbling blocks due to antisemitic postures are analyzed. Important chapters deal with the periods of large Jewish immigration during the two decades before and the two decades after World War I, including the establishment of Jewish agricultural colonies in the hinterland under the sponsorship of the Jewish Colonization Association, the closing of the gates during the Nazi era, and the trickle of Jewish newcomers in the aftermath of World War II. The epilogue reveals that immigration gave way to emigration, due on the one hand to ideological motivations such as settling in Israel, and on the other to political reasons such as the growing antisemitism during the Eichmann capture and trial, the Proceso and Dirty War years, and the economic stagnation that ensued.

MIRELMAN's work concentrates on Jewish life in the capital city of Buenos Aires, where the vast majority of the Jews finally made their homes. It is also limited to the major formative period of Jewish Buenos Aires, which ended in 1930. While the book contains major chapters on immigration and Jewish-gentile relations, including the week of physical violence against Jews during the Semana Trágica of 1919, its emphasis is on internal Jewish developments. There are significant discussions of the various Sephardi groups and their involvement in all aspects of Jewish life. Chapters deal with religious institutions and observances; Zionist and leftist activities; Jewish education along ideological lines; the development of Jewish culture in Yiddish, Hebrew, and Spanish; the rise of the first generation of Jews educated in the country; and the valiant fight against coreligionists involved in prostitution and the white slave traffic. A final chapter describes the centralizing forces in the Jewish community and the development of the Kehilla, a major characteristic of Jewish political organization not only in Argentina but also throughout Latin America.

LEVINE, basing his study mainly on secondary sources and an impressive array of interviews, explores in some detail the major aspects of the Jewish experience in Cuba up until the present. Aware of the contrasts with other Latin American diasporas, Levine makes interesting comparisons with Mexican and Argentine Jewries. There are vivid descriptions of the way the relatively small Jewish community was affected by major issues in Cuban history. Important chapters are devoted to the St. Louis incident in 1939, the question of refugees during the Nazi period, and the way in which Cuban Jewry weathered World War II. Internal Jewish matters, such as the tensions between religion and secularism and between Zionism and socialism, are also discussed. The question of antisemitism and reactions to the Castro revolution and its aftermath are also dealt with in some detail.

Brazil is the largest and most populous country in Latin America, and its Jewish community is second only to Argentina's in size. LESSER, in a study based on research carried out in archives in the United States, Israel, England, and Brazil, presents a detailed account of Brazilian immigration policy from the interwar period to the immediate postwar years. He amply describes the cultural context, the political calculations, and the practical results of a policy that welcomed Jewish immigrants in spite of an order prohibiting the issuance of visas to people of Semitic origin. Using comparative methods to gauge racial considerations, Lesser interprets dictator Getulio Vargas's strategy regarding immigration as intent on not stirring up criticism among nativists and at the same time gaining favor with the Vatican, the United States, and Britain.

All the works cited include elaborate bibliographies in their respective fields.

VICTOR A. MIRELMAN

See also Inquisition

Leone Ebreo see Abravanel, Judah

Levi ben Gershom 1288–1344

Provençal astronomer, Aristotelian philosopher, and biblical commentator

- Bleich, J. David, Providence in the Philosophy of Gersonides, New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1973
- Eisen, Robert, Gersonides on Providence, Covenant, and the Chosen People: A Study in Medieval Jewish Philosophy and Biblical Commentary, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995
- Goldstein, Bernard R., The Astronomy of Levi ben Gerson (1288–1344): A Critical Edition of Chapters 1–20 with Translation and Commentary, New York: Springer-Verlag, 1985
- Levi ben Gershom, The Commentary of Levi ben Gerson (Gersonides) on the Book of Job, translated by Abraham L. Lassen, New York: Bloch, 1946
- Levi ben Gershom, The Wars of the Lord, translated by Seymour Feldman, 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1984–1999
- Levi ben Gershom, Commentary on Song of Songs, translated by Menachem Kellner (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 28), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1998
- Manekin, Charles H., The Logic of Gersonides: A Translation of Sefer ha-Heqqesh ha-Yashar (The Book of the Correct Syllogism) of Rabbi Levi ben Gershom, Dordrecht and Boston: Kluwer, 1992
- Samuelson, Norbert Max (editor and translator), Gersonides' The Wars of the Lord, Treatise 3: On God's Knowledge (Mediaeval Sources in Translation, vol. 19), Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1977
- Staub, Jacob J., The Creation of the World According to Gersonides, Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1982

Levi ben Gershom, known in English as Gersonides and in Hebrew by the acronym Ralbag, was one of medieval Judaism's most creative and wide-ranging thinkers. A native of Provence and a critical admirer of both Maimonides and Averroës, he was a philosopher, exegete, halakhist, and logician, as well as an astronomer and mathematician of major historical significance. In philosophy he wrote an independent treatise, Wars of the Lord, and many supercommentaries on the commentaries of Averroës to Aristotle. His Bible commentaries went through many editions and several of them are included in standard rabbinic Bibles.

BLEICH translates the fourth treatise of Gersonides' Wars of the Lord, devoted to the question of providence. His introduction places Gersonides' discussion in its philosophical context, and his many annotations make Gersonides' often difficult text much clearer. Gersonides presents a very mechanistic vision of providence, according to which human beings who perfect themselves intellectually protect themselves thereby from the evils that befall the ignorant and can thus be said to be providentially guided and protected without any actual divine intervention.

EISEN studies the problem posed for Gersonides by the notion of the chosen people. Providence, Gersonides holds, attaches only to individuals and in varying degrees, depending upon their intellectual attainments. How, then, can it guide and protect a whole nation? A detailed study of Gersonides' Bible commentaries, especially those on Genesis and Exodus, leads Eisen to Gersonides' idea of "inherited providence," according to which the people of Israel are protected by the special providence extended to the Patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

GOLDSTEIN has pioneered the study of Gersonides' astronomy. Gersonides' major work in astronomy was included in the medieval manuscripts as the first section of part five of Wars of the Lord, but the printed editions of the work never included it. Goldstein rescued the work from oblivion, and in this book he provides an edition of the Hebrew text of the first 20 (of 136) chapters, noteworthy for the description of the observational instrument invented by Gersonides, the Jacob Staff, which came into general use by mariners. In his introduction, Goldstein situates Gersonides in the history of astronomy, examining the influence of his predecessors upon him and his influence upon later astronomers.

LEVI BEN GERSHOM (1998), Gersonides' commentary on Song of Songs, is perhaps the most philosophical of all his Bible commentaries. This is a consequence of Gersonides' claim that of the whole biblical canon, only Song of Songs has no benefit for the masses. Other biblical books teach philosophy, but they also teach history, ethics, and, of course, law. Song of Songs teaches only philosophy, its surface meaning having no benefit to the reader. Gersonides reads Song of Songs as a handbook in epistemology, describing the hylic intellect's great desire to reach perfection and the stages of study (mathematics, physics, and metaphysics) that lead to that perfection. Kellner's translation includes an introduction placing the commentary in the context of Gersonides' life and times, and extensive annotations on the text.

LEVI BEN GERSHOM's (1984–1999) magnum opus, The Wars of the Lord, contains six treatises devoted to human immortality, prophecy, God's knowledge, providence, astronomy and astrology, and creation and miracles. Never previously translated in its entirety into any language, this high-water mark of Jewish Aristotelianism is handsomely served by Feldman's clear, idiomatic English, which hides much of the gracelessness of the Hebrew original. Feldman has added to his translation long introductions and an important appendix on Gersonides' exegesis. Feldman's work is also, in effect, a critical edition of the Hebrew text, since he includes lists of variant readings that underlie his translation.

LEVI BEN GERSHOM (1946), Gersonides' commentary on Job, interprets the book as an analysis of the doctrine of providence. In this he follows in the footsteps of Saadia and Maimonides. His commentary parallels his discussion of providence in the fourth treatise of Wars of the Lord and he shows how his extremely untraditional view of providence can be read out of the book of Job. Lassen's clear translation includes a very brief introduction and some source notes.

MANEKIN presents a translation of Gersonides' Book of the Correct Syllogism with an extensive introduction, detailed commentary, and analytical glossary. Gersonides' book, which Manekin characterizes as arguably the greatest work on logic written in Hebrew, attempts to construct a theory of the syllogism free of the errors that Gersonides detected in Aristotle as interpreted by Averroës. Manekin's long introduction and wealth of annotations make Gersonides' otherwise forbidding work accessible.

SAMUELSON presents a very heavily annotated literal translation of Wars of the Lord, which deals with the question of God's knowledge of particulars. It is here that Gersonides' most daring theological claim—that God does not know individuals (including human beings, even the most saintly of them) as such—is worked out in careful argumentation with Aristotle and Maimonides. The treatise itself is short, if dense, and Samuelson's commentary, which carefully situates Gersonides' discussion in the history of western philosophy, makes up the bulk of this book.

STAUB takes up another of Gersonides' notorious claims: that God did not create the world ex nihilo, but, rather, from preexisting matter. Staub's long introduction, literal translation of the relevant chapters from the second part of the sixth treatise of Wars of the Lord, and extensive commentary follow Gersonides' complex arguments with Aristotle and Maimonides on the issue of creation.

MENACHEM KELLNER

Levi Isaac of Berdichev c.1740–1810

Galician hasidic saint and teacher

Blumenthal, David R., God at the Center: Meditations on Jewish Spirituality, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1988

Buber, Martin, Tales of the Hasidim, translated by Olga Marx, New York: Schocken/Farrar, Straus and Young, 1947; London: Thames and Hudson, 1956

Dresner, Samuel H., Levi Yitzhak of Berdichev: Portrait of a Hasidic Master, New York: Hartmore House, 1974; updated edition, New York: Shapolsky, 1986

Kaplan, Aryeh, The Light Beyond: Adventures in Hassidic Thought, New York: Maznaim, 1981

Wiesel, Elie, Célébration hassidique: portraits et légendes, 1972; translated by Marion Wiesel as Souls on Fire: Portraits and Legends of Hasidic Masters, New York: Random House, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1972

The most beloved of the hasidic masters—even mentioning his name, so it is said, opens the heavenly gates of love—Levi Isaac ben Meir of Berdichev is the subject of surprisingly few English works, and his own major book, Kedushat Levi (Holiness of Levi) has not appeared in translation. The works reviewed below, however, are good sources for stories and excerpts from his written teachings.

BUBER, writing originally in German, retold hasidic stories with close attention to the Hebrew and Yiddish sources, though he introduced subtle variations based on his modern literary and spiritual sensibilities. He was among the very first to introduce Levi Isaac and the other hasidic masters to Western European and North American readers. This classic book includes 65 stories and brief teachings about Levi Isaac; the emphasis is on his emotional candor and intensity. The poetic clarity of Buber's style is well communicated in Olga Marx's English translation.

DRESNER is the major source in English on Levi Isaac, highlighting his love for all Israel and his fervor in prayer and Jewish observance. Essentially this is a work of hagiography but one founded on historical research and attention to the sources. It includes many tales about Levi Isaac as well as brief selections of teachings from Kedushat Levi and from other hasidic sources in which he is cited. Dresner makes use of other historical evidence as well, including a contemporary nonhasidic description. A narrative of Levi Isaac's often difficult career is accompanied by chapters on themes such as prayer, observance of commandments, and love of Israel.

WIESEL retells stories of a number of hasidic masters and reflects on who they were and what they meant to him in his hasidic childhood and in his adult life as a survivor and memorializer of the Holocaust. Most of the stories in the short chapter on Levi Isaac are also found in Buber and Dresner, but Wiesel distinctively highlights an aspect of "despair and revolt" in Levi Isaac. Thus, he dwells on Levi Isaac's nervous breakdown, which incapacitated him for a year, and even more so on his famous arguments with God, which Wiesel speculatively locates in the last years of Levi Isaac's life, after his return to health. Wiesel has surely read much of himself into Levi Isaac, but his intuitive approach creates a memorable picture of the man.

"The general principle," Kedushat Levi begins, "is that the blessed Creator created all and is all." KAPLAN's introductory notes describe Kedushat Levi as lucidly written, working kabbalistic teachings into advice for day-to-day spiritual living, and as one of the most popular books in hasidic life. In his own lucid style, Kaplan provides English paraphrases (though not literal translations) of selections from a variety of classic hasidic books, accessibly arranged by themes such as "Meditation and Prayer" and "Life and Society." Kedushat Levi is well represented, with some 60 pages of excerpts, several of them substantial at three or four pages long. Kaplan provides footnotes on Hebrew sources and parallel texts, with some useful explanatory remarks.

BLUMENTHAL is the author of a significant work of original theology, Facing the Abusing God (1993), and also this earlier work of personal theology, presented in the quintessentially Jewish form of commentary. The texts commented on here are passages from Kedushat Levi, which Blumenthal presents in paraphrase and occasionally in translation together with his own reflections. Through his role as selector of the material and commentator, often speaking in personal tones, the dominant voice is Blumenthal's, but he presents Levi Isaac's ideas with humility and sympathy. Blumenthal calls attention to concepts he finds profound and to how Levi Isaac's teachings can be applied today, often in ways that challenge common complacencies and pat solutions.

JUSTIN JARON LEWIS

Levinas, Emmanuel 1906–1995

Lithuanian-born French thinker

- Aronowicz, Annette (translator), "Translator's Introduction," in Levinas's Nine Talmudic Readings, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Bernasconi, Robert and Simon Critchley (editors), Re-reading Levinas (Studies in Continental Thought), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, and London: Athlone, 1991
- Critchley, Simon, The Ethics of Deconstruction: Derrida and Levinas, Oxford and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1992
- Davis, Colin, Levinas: An Introduction, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, and Cambridge: Polity, 1996
- Derrida, Jacques, "Violence and Metaphysics: An Essay on the Thought of Emmanuel Levinas," in his Writing and Difference, translated by Alan Bass, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1978
- Eaglestone, Robert, Ethical Criticism: Reading after Levinas, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1997
- Peperzak, Adriaan Theodor, To the Other: An Introduction to the Philosophy of Emmanuel Levinas (Purdue Series in the History of Philosophy), West Lafayette, Indiana: Purdue University Press, 1993
- Stone, Ira, Reading Levinas/Reading Talmud: An Introduction, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1998

Born in Kaunas, Lithuania, in 1906, Emmanuel Levinas has become one of the most important contemporary philosophers. Originally known to Jean-Paul Sartre and others in the 1930s as an early French expositor of Edmund Husserl, Levinas was later regarded by an increasing number of readers as the 20th century's foremost philosopher of ethics. Despite not moving to France until 1923, he wrote his mature work primarily in French and much remains to be translated. His initial audience was in France, and, although books about him in English are increasingly available in the form of original texts and as translations of non-English texts, the best books on Levinas are still unavailable in English. There is no biography of Levinas in English, and even the most reliable biography in French (Marie-Anne Lescourret, Emmanuel Lévinas, Paris: Flammarion, 1994) is already out of date.

The most important advocate of Levinas's centrality to ethical thought in the post-structuralist period has been Jacques Derrida. CRITCHLEY's aim is to show that, contrary to accusations of its tendency to encourage personal and political quietism based on ontological indeterminacy, deconstruction has always inherently needed or implied "the ethical." In this book, deconstruction, as disseminated by Derrida, and the ethical philosophy of Levinas are explicitly linked. Although not free of the technical vocabulary that is necessary to represent the ideas of these two men, the book opens by asking, on the reader's behalf, why one should read Levinas or Derrida. It does a convincing job of answering its own question by arguing that Levinasian ethics may provide a way to reincorporate the deconstruction of Derrida, Lacoue-Labarthe, and Nancy into discourse and so provide a compelling account of justice and a just polity.

At the time of writing, DERRIDA's book-length eulogy to Levinas (Adieu, Paris: Galilee, 1997) is untranslated, but his essay from 1964 is available. The essay is the earliest major article about Levinas accessible in English. In it Derrida puts the Levinasian project into perspective by explaining how it questions the Greek tradition that formed the thought of Western Europe, including that of Levinas's two early mentors, Husserl and Martin Heidegger. Derrida demonstrates the way in which the traditions Levinas uses are at constructive odds and what effects that has had on contemporary French philosophy. The piece is typical of Derrida's dense writing style and presupposes a familiarity with, if not the texts, at least the contexts of his work.

After being introduced to Levinasian ideas through Derrida, scholars of literary criticism have shown a profound interest. EAGLESTONE gives an account of the history of ethics in critical theory and outlines the reasons why contemporary philosophy is deeply implicated in the current practices of the discipline. Trying to avoid tritely "applying" Levinas, Eaglestone explains how Levinas might permit a redefinition of approach that would allow for a reintroduction of ethics into criticism.

DAVIS provides the clearest general introduction to Levinas that currently exists in English. It is brief and acknowledges that it cannot adequately explain each of its topics, but it lives up to its billing as an introduction. It gives the reader a short biography and then expands, in a more accessible way, upon the themes that Derrida began meditating upon in "Violence and Metaphysics": the relation to Husserlian and Heideggerian phenomenology; the repression of the "Other" as a form of the "Same"; the development of an ethics beyond phenomenology; the place of the Jewish tradition in tension with the Christian and Greek traditions of thought; and finally the influence that Levinas has had on contemporary French philosophers and literary critics. Davis uses his historical perspective to examine the problems that French philosophy has had in reading Levinas, namely, it is unable to incorporate him into a tradition or understand his difference. Davis's book contains remarks on most topics in Levinas's thought but does not go into great detail about any of them, an attribute that is mirrored by the daunting bibliography that contains an impressive array of books but little way of choosing between them. For more detailed analyses than Davis provides, BERNASCONI's collection has short essays by many of the major commentators on different aspects of Levinas's philosophical work as well as four essays on Levinas's influence on Derrida and Blanchot.

PEPERZAK is a comprehensive and technical introduction to Levinas's philosophy. Peperzak comments at length on the 1957 essay "Philosophy and the Idea of the Infinite" as a way of beginning to deal with Levinas's first major work, Totality and Infinity, which he then proceeds to discuss. Peperzak assumes that the reader has little prior knowledge of the texts but still manages to lay out in some detail Levinas's main contributions to philosophy without excessively simplifying the difficulties of his work. Peperzak reaches only the second major work, Otherwise than Being; or, Beyond Essence, in his final chapter, and it is at this point that he overreaches and in the space he has allowed himself can no longer lucidly convey the complexities of the philosophy and the vast context of the traditions within which Levinas worked. The book contains a useful preliminary bibliography of Levinas's philosophical oeuvre and early work in English about him.

Levinas himself separated the two branches of his work—the philosophical and the confessional—from one another while acknowledging that they have a “common source of inspiration.” This bifurcation has affected the reception of his work: his confessional work (centered on talmudic interpretation) has provided the focus for Jewish scholars, and the philosophical work developing out of his work on Husserl and Heidegger has provided material for philosophers and literary critics. It is the latter that has produced the most material, but the framework and background of his confessional work is succinctly described by ARONOWICZ in the translator's introduction to a volume that includes some of the best examples of that work in English. STONE, however, takes more time to expand upon Levinas's approach to talmudic interpretation from a rabbinic point of view and to explain as well as demonstrate Levinas's methodology.

DAN FRIEDMAN

Leviticus

- Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Praeger, 1966; 2nd impression with corrections, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1969
- Hartley, John E., Leviticus (Word Biblical Commentary, vol. 4), Dallas, Texas: Word Books, 1992
- Knohl, Israel, Mikdash ha-demamah: 'iyun be-rovde ha-yetsirah ha-kohanit sheba-Torah, 1992; translated by Jackie Feldman and Peretz Rodman as The Sanctuary of Silence: The Priestly Torah and the Holiness School, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1995
- Levine, Baruch A., Leviticus/Va-yikra: The Traditional Hebrew Text with the New JPS Translation (JPS Torah Commentary Series), Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1989
- Milgrom, Jacob, Leviticus 1–16: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (Anchor Bible, vol. 3), New York: Doubleday, 1991
- Wright, David Pearson, The Disposal of Impurity: Elimination Rites in the Bible and in Hittite and Mesopotamian Literature (Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series, no. 101), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1987

Since late antiquity it has been increasingly standard for Jews to see in the Pentateuch and oral tradition a total of 613 commandments. Two-hundred-forty-seven of these, which is to say slightly more than 40 percent, are contained in the Book of Leviticus. The first ten chapters of Leviticus deal with the sacrificial service of the Temple. Chapter 11 establishes the basis for the dietary laws; chapters 12 through 16 lay down other rules of purity; and chapter 23 prescribes the sabbath and festivals.

For Christians—which is to say for the majority of persons who believe in the Bible, study the Bible, and teach the Bible—the Book of Leviticus is an enigma because at least 17 of its 27 chapters deal wholly with subjects that Christianity, from its inception, has declared obsolete. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Christian-dominated Anchor Bible series would find it appropriate to assign the Book of Leviticus to MILGROM, a Jewish scholar, to explain this strange (from a Christian perspective) book of the Jewish Torah. When called upon to say something meaningful about Leviticus, earlier generations either treated its rules and regulations as arbitrary, or they superimposed fanciful allegorization upon the unfamiliar rites and ceremonies of the biblical Tabernacle and Temple. As a Semitist of the first rank with a thorough grounding in comparative religion, anthropology, Second Temple literature, and rabbinics, however, Milgrom reveals for the first time in perhaps two and a half millennia the abiding message contained in the symbolic world set forth in Leviticus and its cognate literature. One of the crowning achievements of his distinguished scholastic career is his exciting 1163-page commentary on Leviticus 1–16. Seeing how much light Milgrom has shed on the unknown in this first volume, scholars, clergy, students, and lay Bible readers look forward to seeing how much further illumination will be forthcoming when he publishes his commentary on Leviticus 17 through 27, chapters that contain, inter alia, “Love your neighbor as yourself” (Leviticus 19:18).

Milgrom has produced a number of first-rate graduate students who have followed his lead in delving into and explaining in the light of comparative religion and comparative Semitics the intricacies of Leviticus's symbolic rites. One of the most important works produced by a Milgrom student is WRIGHT, the first serious attempt to analyze Leviticus's rules of disposal, such as the scapegoat (Leviticus 16) and the rites for purification of the recovered leper (Leviticus 14). Wright also offers original insights when treating phenomena of exclusion and restriction as a body and assessing which ideas are expressed symbolically by these rites. Employing the method of contrastive comparison, Wright unpacks Leviticus's rites for the disposal of impurity through an in-depth study of comparable rites described in cuneiform tablets from the ancient Near East and through a careful consideration of exegetical insights contained in rabbinic literature and medieval Jewish biblical commentary. Wright shows that in other ancient Near Eastern civilizations impurity stemmed from a variety of sources (including angry deities, demonic attacks, witchcraft, sorcery, and sickness), but Leviticus and its cognate biblical literature limit the sources of evil to ritual impurity and human transgression, a message of considerable importance.

It is difficult to imagine that Milgrom would have found an audience, lay or scholarly, for his analysis of the symbolism behind the rules and regulations of Leviticus before the anthropologist DOUGLAS broke thoroughly new ground in her study, which rejects both of the medieval apologies for Jewish dietary laws—arbitrary fiats of the divine legislator and considerations of hygiene—and seeks, with the aid of anthropological method and parallels from Hinduism, to find Scripture's own rationale. That rationale proves to be a matter of order vs. disorder, and Douglas allows the reader to see how it is played out in the warp and woof of Leviticus's laws of purity. She concludes that "the dietary laws would have been like signs which at every turn inspired meditation on the oneness, purity and completeness of God."

LEVINE has made excellent use of an important opportunity to popularize his own discoveries as well as those of his mentors H. L. Ginsberg and Cyrus H. Gordon and his distinguished contemporaries, including Milgrom, Haran, Knohl, Schwartz and the late Moshe Held. Especially significant is Levine's transmission in lucid English of many important insights from David Tsevi Hoffmann's monumental commentary, until now only available in its German original (1905–1906) and in a Hebrew translation. This volume represents the first time that a professional Jewish biblical scholar of the first rank has written a commentary on the Book of Leviticus geared to the needs of laity and clergy.

While Levine writes for a specific (i.e., Jewish) audience whose intellectual and spiritual thirst has long been neglected, HARTLEY addresses a much larger audience of students and scholars of every denomination and persuasion, who can now for the first time identify the important issues in Leviticus at a glance. Thus, for example, there is a clear presentation of the deliberate use of neutral, nonsexist language by the author(s) of Leviticus, one of many discoveries by linguists and theologians who have tended to publish such findings only in obscure professional journals and festschriften. Hartley's comprehensive commentary provides a masterful summary of the full range of ancient, medieval, and modern exegesis, both Jewish and Christian, covering historical, philological, and theological issues. He succeeds in the avowed goal of the series of which this volume is part: making technical and scholarly approaches to a theological understanding of Scripture comprehensible to educated laypersons, beginning students, clergy, and a broad range of professional scholars. He repeatedly demonstrates that frequently the most recondite current biblical scholarship contains insights that can enrich both the inner and the public life of contemporary men and women.

In 1878, Julius Wellhausen published his monumental Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel, which gave the widest possible currency to the theory that the Pentateuch had been redacted from four main documents, designated J, E, D, and P. That same year A. Klostermann published an article in which he separated from P (the supposed source of all of Leviticus) a further documentary source: the Holiness Code contained in Leviticus 17–26. A century later, KNOHL, one of the young superstars of contemporary Israeli biblical scholarship, clearly distinguishes and examines in detail the distinct languages, symbolic worlds, and ideologies that set apart the Priestly Code (P) contained, inter alia, in Leviticus 1–16 from the Holiness Code contained in Leviticus 17–26 and from additional passages produced by what he calls the Holiness School that are scattered throughout the books of Exodus and Numbers. In Knohl's reading, the detachment of the cult from public morality is one of many expressions of the Priestly Code's deanthropomorphism. Another such expression is the absence of prayer from cultic worship as prescribed in

P. Likewise, Knohl argues that the Holiness Code and the related Holiness School, which he dates to the period of Isaiah (second half of the eighth century B.C.E.), foster a much more intimate relationship between every human being and the deity. Such a relationship is reflected in the frequent declarations, "I am the LORD your God" (Exodus 6:6, 8; 7:4, 5; Leviticus 17:10; 23:5; etc.) as well as in frequent references to God's body parts. Feldman and Rodman's English translation of his remarkable opus provides the key to unlocking one of the Bible's best-kept secrets: that it contains a treasure trove of ancient Hebrew symbology, which adumbrates the famous theological debate as to whether God is the unmoved mover (Maimonides, anticipated by the Priestly School) or the most moved mover (Heschel, anticipated by the Holiness School).

MAYER IRWIN GRUBER

Lexicographers and Grammarians

- Amzalak, Moses Bensabat, Portuguese Hebrew Grammars and Grammarians, Lisbon: [s.n.], 1928
- Chomsky, William, Hebrew: The Eternal Language (Gitelson Library), Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1957
- Eldar, Ilan, "The Grammatical Literature of Medieval Ashkenazi Jewry," in Hebrew in Ashkenaz: A Language in Exile, edited by Lewis Glinert, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993
- Fellman, Jack, The Revival of a Classical Tongue: Eliezer Ben Yehuda and the Modern Hebrew Language (Contributions to the Sociology of Language, 6), The Hague: Mouton, 1973
- Galliner, Helmuth, "Agathius Guidacerius 1477?–1540: An Early Hebrew Grammarian in Rome and Paris," Historia Judaica, 2(2), October 1940
- Goshen-Gottstein, Moshe, "Foundations of Biblical Philology in the Seventeenth Century Christian and Jewish Dimensions," in Jewish Thought in the Seventeenth Century (Harvard Judaic Texts and Studies, 6), edited by Isadore Twersky and Bernard Septimus, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Center for Jewish Studies, 1987
- Hirschfeld, Hartwig, Literary History of Hebrew Grammarians and Lexicographers, Accompanied by Unpublished Texts (Jews' College Publications, no. 9), London: Oxford University Press, Milford, 1926
- Skoss, Solomon L., "A Chapter on Permutation in Hebrew from David ben Abraham Al-Fasi's Dictionary Jami 'Al-Alfaz," Jewish Quarterly Review, 23, 1932–1933
- Skoss, Solomon L., Saadia Gaon, the Earliest Hebrew Grammarian, Philadelphia: Dropsie College Press, 1955
- Wechter, Pinchas, Ibn Barun's Arabic Works on Hebrew Grammar and Lexicography, Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1964

The development of Hebrew grammar and lexicography took place over a period of more than 1,000 years, involving a great number of scholars who produced thousands of titles. The literature discussing original works is rather extensive, although most of the important research was published in Hebrew, German, French, or Spanish, and only a few works are available in English. The Cairo Genizah material is still explored only partially. Many important medieval and early modern linguistic works are still in manuscript.

HIRSCHFELD's short book offers a cursory outline of the history of Jewish linguistic literature from Saadia Gaon to Samuel ben Elhanan di Archivolti and Leone Modena. Hirschfeld supposes that the first Hebrew grammarians were the Karaite scholars of the Scriptures, since the biblical text, stripped of rabbinic tradition and strictly construed, was the only material they claimed to admit as a guide to religious life. He mentions only a few names of the Karaite grammarians who lived prior to Saadia Gaon, however, and his discussion of Saadia is little more than a brief overview of his work. SKOSS (1955) provides a much fuller and more detailed treatment of Saadia's linguistic works. Hirschfeld describes the tenth-century North African scholar Judah ibn Kureish as the father of comparative Semitic philology, although modern scholars may not agree with this attribution. Still, ibn Kureish was one of the first grammarians to treat the relation of Hebrew to Aramaic and the relation of Arabic to Hebrew.

SKOSS (1932–1933) devotes the introduction to his partial edition of David ben Abraham al-Fasi's dictionary to the analysis of his views on the phenomenon of permutation in Hebrew. This Karaite scholar was not the first to notice the phenomenon. A large portion of the article examines the exploitation of permutation in the Talmud and midrash. Skoss also describes the views of Aaron ben Asher, Saadia Gaon, Judah ibn Kureish, Dunash ben Labrat, Menahem ben Saruk, and others concerning permutation.

WECHTER devotes his principal research work to a study of ibn Barun's Book of Comparison between the Hebrew and the Arabic Languages (c.1085), surviving parts of which were edited by P.K. Kokovtsov (Kokowitzoff) of the Russian Academy of Sciences and appeared in 1893 and 1916. In chapter one Wechter cites Hebrew-Arabic comparisons in the Talmud and midrash as well as in medieval Hebrew works by grammarians, exegetes, and lexicographers; in chapter two he tries to establish some biographical facts and dates; and in chapter three he speaks about the sources and influence of Isaac ibn Barun. The rest of the book contains descriptions of ibn Barun's grammar and lexicon and annotated English translations of the fragments published by Kokovtsov.

CHOMSKY begins with an examination of the semantics and grammar presupposed in rabbinic midrash. He continues with a discussion of Saadia Gaon's role as the father of Hebrew grammar. Chomsky's next section is devoted to the Spanish school of Hebrew grammarians. Most of the great innovations in the analysis of Hebrew grammar belong to this school, and Chomsky summarizes the achievements of the best-known grammarians from Menahem ben Saruk and Dunash ben Labrat to Judah Hayyug, Jonah ibn Janah, Samuel ha-Nagid, Abraham ibn Ezra, and the Kimhi family. He describes in detail a controversy between ibn Janah and Samuel ha-Nagid and speaks of the popularizing activities of Abraham ibn Ezra. Chomsky, a specialist on David Kimhi (the collector and interpreter of much of the grammar and lexicography of the Spanish school), next evaluates Kimhi's linguistic activities, noting Kimhi's "fine sense of system and organization and deep insight into the language and its structure." Since Kimhi worked after the close of the "Golden Age," Chomsky summarizes by way of background the contributions of the early medieval grammarians and then describes the reaction to the Maimonidean Controversy and the subsequent regress of grammatical studies among the Jews, while also tracing the emergence of Hebrew grammatical studies in the Christian world. Finally, he discusses some Jewish grammarians of the Enlightenment.

AMZALAK surveys the Hebrew grammars written in Hebrew, Latin, and Portuguese by Portuguese authors, and authors of Portuguese extraction, from the 15th century to 1914. Among the grammarians whom he notes, the most important are: (1) David ben Solomon ibn Yahya, author of Leshon limmudim (published in Constantinople in 1506); (2) Moses ibn Habib, best known for his Aristotelian poetics, Darke no'am (1486), who also wrote Perah Shoshan (1484), a longer grammar influenced by Efodi, and a shorter grammar, Marpe lashon, based on sources such as ibn Hayuj, ibn Janah, Abraham ibn Ezra, and Efodi; (3) David ben Joseph ibn Yahya whose grammatical works, sometimes cited by Christian Hebraists who were his pupils, are still in manuscript; (4) Solomon de Oliveyra who published a number of books on questions of Hebrew philology including Yad lashon and Dal sefatayim, which were published in one volume as Livro da gramatica hebrayca e chaldayca (1689); (5) Menasseh ben Israel who wrote a compendium of Hebrew grammar, Safah berurah, which remains in manuscript; (6) José Vieira who wrote Compendio de gramatica hebraea; (7) Moses ben Gideon Abudiente, author of a long and erudite Hebrew grammar; (8) Moses Raphael Aguilar who wrote Epitome de grammatica hebraica (published in Leiden in 1660); and finally (9) Baruch Spinoza, whose Compendium grammatices linguae Hebraeae (1677), suggestively stresses the importance of the noun above all other parts of speech. The rest of the grammarians Amzalak lists are Christian Hebraists. All the grammars discussed in his handy but characteristically superficial study are not so much original contributions to theory as textbooks that served the educational needs of their time.

ELDAR deals with the beginnings of grammar study among Ashkenazim in parts of eastern France and Germany. He lists eight grammatical writings of the Ashkenazi school, which are still in manuscript, and identifies ten Ashkenazi grammarians whose works have been lost. Then he summarizes the content of each of the eight preserved writings. Grammatical study in Ashkenaz was concerned primarily with the correctness of the biblical text and with the proper pronunciation of it. Eldar acknowledges that the Ashkenazi school did not produce significant advances in Hebrew grammar but notes the sharp logical insights of certain individuals.

GALLINER traces the origins of Hebrew studies among Christians in the late Renaissance, arguing that the extent to which these studies were taken up at the behest of the ecclesia militans rather than under the influence of humanism has been understated. Galliner elucidates the activities of 16th-century Catholic scholar Agathio Guidacerio who held professorial positions in Rome and Paris. In his Grammatica Hebraicae linguae (1518), Agathio felt it necessary to justify the learning of Hebrew by quoting from Saint Augustine and Saint Jerome. He also praised Pope Leo X for his work in behalf of the study of Oriental languages. Agathio studied for seven years under the learned Rabbi Jacob Gabbai and used the grammar of Moses Kimhi. The content of Agathio's short book is based on the first chapter of David Kimhi's grammar Mikhlol. In 1529 he published a larger book on Hebrew grammar, Institutiones grammaticae Hebraicae linguae. However, the summation of his achievements as a Hebrew grammarian is presented in his Grammaticae in sanctam Christi linguam institutiones (Paris, 1539). Of course, Agathio's importance also rests upon the fact that he taught Hebrew to hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of Christians, some of whom became either important theologians, humanists, or leaders of the Counter-Reformation. His last works were an edition of Hebrew text of the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes with Latin translation (1539) and an edition of Kimhi's Mikhlol (1540).

GOSHEN-GOTTSTEIN discusses contact among Jewish teachers and Christian scholars, including Obadiah Sforno who taught Johannes Reuchlin and Elia Levita (Eliyahu Bahur) who taught Hebrew grammar to many leading Christian scholars. He observes that whereas the first two generations of Christian Hebraists studied under Jewish teachers, by the third generation study of Hebrew had become so well established among Christians that many were taught Hebrew by other Christian Hebraists. Following the period of Levita, Jewish learning was sufficiently accessible to Christian scholars that Jews were increasingly not aware of subsequent developments in Hebrew philology (and in a broader sense, biblical studies) in Christian scholarly circles. Also of great interest is Goshen-Gottstein's discussion of Menahem Lonzano's and Jedidiah Norzi's reaction to Daniel Bomberg's Biblia Rabbinica (1525) and the theological motives of the Christian Hebraists.

In his volume devoted to the great Jewish linguist Eliezer ben Yehuda, FELLMAN describes the lexicographical work of the man who almost single-handedly realized an exhaustive multivolume dictionary of the Hebrew language of all periods that includes a great number of neologisms of his devising to address the needs of his contemporaries. According to Abraham Berliner, "What the French Academy did for French, what the Grimm brothers did for German, Ben Yehuda did for our holy tongue."

HAYIM Y. SHEYNIN

Libels, Anti-Jewish: Medieval

Chazan, Robert, Medieval Stereotypes and Modern Antisemitism, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997

Hsia, R. Po-Chia, The Myth of Ritual Murder: Jews and Magic in Reformation Germany, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1988

Langmuir, Gavin, Toward a Definition of Antisemitism, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990

Rubin, Miri, Gentile Tales: The Narrative Assault on Late-Medieval Jews, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1999

Schreckenberg, Heinz, The Jews in Christian Art: An Illustrated History, New York: Continuum, and London: SCM, 1996

Trachtenberg, Joshua, The Devil and the Jews: The Medieval Conception of the Jew and Its Relation to Modern Antisemitism, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Milford, Oxford University Press, 1943; 2nd edition, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1983

Several folk motifs or myths that circulated between the middle of the 12th century and the beginning of the 18th are treated collectively as a set of antisemitic libels. Although this designation implies that the accusations were promulgated by people who knew them to be false, the scholarly consensus is that many medieval Christians honestly believed that Jews ritually murdered young boys, tormented consecrated hosts, and poisoned wells. Recent studies have focused on the ways in which such beliefs emerged from learned literature and popular culture, on methods of transmission, on the psychological context in which such convictions helped people make sense of their world, on the manipulation of these motifs by interested parties (both non-Jewish and Jewish), and on the circumstances under which such beliefs could lead to violence. Some of the most important recent work on this subject has appeared in Hebrew and German. In addition to the books cited above, readers should look for forthcoming translations of works by Wolfgang Treue, Friedrich Lotter, and Israel Yuval.

CHAZAN claims that modern antisemitism is part of the "ideational legacy" of the 12th and 13th centuries—a legacy that includes the whole range of medieval libels. The emergence of these new ways of understanding and characterizing Jews during the Middle Ages is the primary focus of his book, which begins with a brief sketch of the migration of Jews northward from the Mediterranean basin in the ninth and tenth centuries. The new Jewish immigrants were conspicuously wealthy, sophisticated aliens in the culturally and economically backward river valleys of northern France and Germany. They were thus uniquely prepared to prosper during the social, economic, and cultural efflorescence that has been called the 12th-century renaissance. Chazan surveys the major models adduced by historians for understanding the ensuing deterioration in Jewish-Christian relations and cites the most important primary sources. His analysis of Crusader violence and Jewish responses to such assaults is particularly helpful. This is a good, concise introduction to the subject.

HSIA argues that the belief that Jews ritually extracted the blood of Christian boys at Easter emerged from a prior belief that Jews practiced magic. The Jewish magician had been a feature of Christian legend since antiquity. In German-speaking lands, legends of Jewish magic, folk beliefs about the magical powers of blood, and the church's new emphasis on the salvific potency of the blood of Christ thought to be present in the host merged with the new myth of ritual murder to form the blood libel. Hsia charts the rapid spread of the blood libel for 200 years, beginning in the 13th century, and then traces its gradual decline, which he attributes to fading consensus about the veracity of the institutions that had created the blood libel as a new kind of social knowledge, and to the ebbing belief in magic. This book is almost exclusively concerned with events in Germany.

LANGMUIR's collected essays constitute the most elaborate and carefully theorized analysis of ritual murder and the blood libel to have appeared in English. He interprets these medieval libels psychoanalytically, as symptoms of an irrational Christian reaction to repressed doubts about the truth of Christian doctrine, and he argues that the very idea of ritual murder, as well as its subsequent elaboration in blood libels and claims of host desecration, emerged from pervasive doubt about the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation. Fantasies of Jews mocking Christ's passion and tormenting consecrated hosts helped buttress Christian beliefs by suggesting that, deep down, Jews acknowledged the centrality of Christ and the reality of transubstantiation, their perverted protestations to the contrary notwithstanding.

RUBIN traces the emergence and evolution of Christian claims that Jews tormented consecrated communion wafers. She locates the earliest of such stories in Paris in the year 1290 and maps the spread of the tale throughout Europe. Her approach is grounded in the work of recent French historians who have studied the ways in which discourse shapes and reflects the social world. She draws her evidence from a very wide range of sources, including Latin and vernacular chronicles, Hebrew responsa and liturgy, and Christian art and folk tales. Tracing the frequently lethal social consequences of the spreading stories about host desecration, Rubin paints a vivid picture of the mental world of late-medieval Europe that emphasizes the impact of narratives constructed from folk motifs and from learned theology. An interesting appendix translates the text of a medieval Jewish response to Christian claims of host desecration.

SCHRECKENBERG is a pictorial survey of the representation of Jews in Christian art. Included in its encyclopedic coverage are many of the medieval libels. Each of the more than 1,000 pictures is briefly discussed, but the volume is primarily a collection of images. It is the first place to look for depictions of medieval Jews.

TRACHTENBERG wrote his popular work in the early days of World War II, and it reflects the passion and anguish of U.S. Jews as they learned of events in Europe. The author's style of engaged scholarship is currently out of fashion, but this book continues to be cited by academics. It draws on both learned and popular sources to document its central claim that many medieval and early-modern Christians thought of Jews as demonic—either as allies of Satan or as demons themselves. The imagined Jewish pendants for sorcery, ritual murder, well poisoning, usury, and host desecration were understood as signs of this special relationship with the devil. The text, which is sometimes weakened by ahistorical generalizations (such as claims about the universality of Jewish suffering) is enhanced by more than 20 illustrations.

WILLIS JOHNSON

See also Anti-Judaism: Middle Ages

Libels, Anti-Jewish: Modern

- Carmichael, Joel, The Satanizing of the Jews: Origin and Development of Mystical Anti-Semitism, New York: Fromm International, 1992
- Cohn, Norman, Warrant for Genocide: The Myth of the Jewish World-Conspiracy and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, New York: Harper and Row, and London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1967; new edition, London: Serif, 1996
- Gross, John, Shylock: A Legend and Its Legacy, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992
- Lindemann, Albert, The Jew Accused: Three Anti-Semitic Affairs (Dreyfus, Beilis, Frank), 1894–1915, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991
- Seiden, Morton Irving, The Paradox of Hate: A Study in Ritual Murder, South Brunswick, New Jersey: Yoseloff, 1968

In late antiquity, Jews were accused of unsociability, fanaticism, and pride. In the Christian Middle Ages they were charged with deicide, ritual cannibalism, well-poisoning, and witchcraft. All these accusations carried over into the modern era. New libels, however, were added as well: In the modern era, Jews were accused of being evil capitalists or loathsome communists, not only practitioners of an evil religion but an accursed race of traitors and conspirators. These modern libels adapted, expanded, and radicalized the older characterizations of the Jews as an evil people to explain the problems of modern times.

CARMICHAEL provides an excellent overview of the "objectification" of the irrational hatred of the Jews at the core of antisemitism. He describes how the Jew became the theological symbol and later the racial incarnation of the Devil. This libel began with the charge of deicide and survived into modern times as a "mystical" concept. It differed from conventional libels or ethnic slurs directed against minority groups, taking on a "cosmic magnitude" in representing the Jew as all-powerful, diabolical evil. In modern times this libel became entirely secularized. The very survival of the Jews in the face of great odds was explained by antisemites as evidence of their mysterious power. The Jew became the secular Anti-Christ responsible for a host of modern ills. The images of the Wandering Jew, of Shylock, of the arch-capitalist and the arch-communist, and, finally, of the incurably evil race all represented modern elaborations on older religious themes. The new forms of antisemitic libel came together in Nazism as a response to the extreme cumulative traumas of modernity in 20th-century Germany. Stalinist Russia also exploited modern antisemitic libels. Carmichael ventures the hope that the impact of the Holocaust will discredit mystical antisemitism and that Christians will discard their traditional fondness for scapegoating.

COHN has written the best book on the sources, significance, and impact of the myth of a Jewish world conspiracy. He was led to his conclusion that the idea of a Jewish world conspiracy was such a supremely powerful and deadly modern anti-Jewish libel in 1945 while scouring the Nazi literature about Jews. From there he went on to trace the origin of these ideas in the early Christian era and the medieval period, finding the origins of the myth to lie in the charge that the Jews plotted to kill Jesus and then proceeded to plot ritual murders, desecrations, and plagues. In modern times, the Jews were accused of conspiring to bring about the French Revolution, and they were charged with running both modern banking and industry and the revolutionary movements of modern times. By the 1880s these ideas were taking shape in France, England, and Germany, but they achieved a "classic" and systematic expression in the Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion in the czarist Russia of 1905. This text was modeled on a collection of forgeries and especially a pamphlet directed against Napoleon III by his critic Maurice Joly written in 1870. The Protocols accused the Jews of being behind every conceivable problem of modern times. By 1920 new libels were added, blaming the Jews for World War I and the Bolshevik Revolution. During the 1920s the Protocols was translated into an array of languages and printed in a great number of editions. Henry Ford subsidized U.S. editions, while the tract had great influence in Nazi Germany. It was a "warrant for Genocide" because it claimed that the Jews, being eternal conspirators who used diabolical means to master the world, had to be destroyed by any measure, however drastic. After 1945 the Protocols continued to circulate in the Soviet Union, the Arab countries, and among sundry movements of the radical right, and it has exhibited remarkable longevity and staying power to this day.

GROSS traces the legend and legacy of the figure of Shylock through the many and fascinating forms it has taken in the literature of modern times. The author approaches the literary character of Shylock as an economic, psychological, and cultural symbol. Immortalized in Shakespeare's 1598 play, The Merchant of Venice, the ancestry of Shylock can be traced back to a 14th-century Italian characterization of a Jewish money lender. A number of English versions preceded Shakespeare's play, most notably Christopher Marlowe's The Jew of Malta of 1589. In Shakespeare's drama the craven and vengeful Jew Shylock is contrasted to the honest and generous Venetian merchant, Antonio. Shakespeare represented Shylock as the personification of Judaism as a "pseudo-religion"—materialistic, legalistic, and lacking in spirituality. Shylock's only redeeming feature is his love for his daughter Jessica. At the end of the play, Shylock is forcibly converted to Christianity, then banished unceremoniously. Gross guides the reader through later interpretations of the story, in which Shylock emerges as a persecuted and more sympathetic figure. By the 20th century, Freud was able to view Shylock as a tragic father figure, although antisemites of left and right continued to find the grasping Shylock a convenient and time-honored weapon. A still more sympathetic Shylock emerged after 1945, but Gross maintains that Shakespeare never intended Shylock to be a "Jewish villain." Whatever the case, the playwright's masterpiece is shown to have added a powerful stereotype to the arsenal of modern anti-Jewish libels.

LINDEMANN has written an important comparative history of three significant anti-Jewish "affairs," in France, Russia, and the United States at the turn of the 20th century: Alfred Dreyfus was accused of treason, Mendel Beilis of ritual murder, and Leo Frank of rape and murder. Dreyfus was convicted and later pardoned and rehabilitated and Beilis was acquitted by a jury of Russian peasants, while Frank was lynched by a mob that feared his acquittal. In each of these cases modern antisemites attempted to harness public outrage for their own purposes. The author seeks to separate myth from reality in all three episodes and explains how Jews fought back. He shows how the three historical incidents were not only expressions of established antisemitic libels, but were also rooted in modern crises and in "real" conflict between Jews and non-Jews. In France, for example, the Dreyfus affair was instigated by reactionary elites hostile to liberalism; in Russia a backward autocracy sought to stir up antisemitism in order to distract its people from domestic and international crises, and in the Southern United States populist antisemites used the Jews as a symbol of Yankee capitalism. Lindemann argues that these affairs drew on older libels but were modern in their appeal to mass passions and their relation to social and economic problems. He also stresses the role of personalities in history. Some traditional antisemitisms came to the defense of Dreyfus and Beilis, while Frank was prosecuted by a philosemite who happened to believe him guilty. Ironically, violent antisemitism continued in France and Russia but declined in the United States.

SEIDEN offers an interesting Freudian explanation for the rise and persistence of anti-Jewish libels, developing his thesis through a detailed analysis of ten antisemitic documents covering 2,000 years of Western history. The roots of anti-Jewish libels in the West, he maintains, lie in the accusation that the religion of the "father" (Judaism) murdered the founder of the new religion (the "son") that the father helped to create. Thus, the Jews are accused of committing a "ritual murder" of the son of God, who is also their own son. Herein lies the "irrational hatred and irrational guilt" that permeates antisemitism. Anti-Jewish libels can result from the conflict between a demonic primordial father and an innocent and pure primordial son. The Jews become the "primordial cosmic scapegoat." For Seiden, this horrendous drama was enacted in the mind of Hitler and his concentration camps. The selected antisemites whose writings are analyzed include Cicero, Tacitus, Augustine, Martin Luther, Henry Adams, H.L. Mencken, and Hitler himself. The legends of the Jew as financial wizard, eternal wanderer, and demonic father—along with more than 50 additional ugly stereotypes—are extracted from these readings. Seiden illustrates as well the bitter irony that while the antisemites suffered from feelings of inadequacy and self-hate, some Jews too came to accept and explain their own sufferings as deserved, natural, and inevitable.

LEON STEIN

See also Antisemitism

Libya

Applebaum, Shimon, Jews and Greeks in Ancient Cyrene (Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity, vol. 28), Leiden: Brill, 1979

De Felice, Renzo, Jews in an Arab Land: Libya, 1835–1970, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985

Goldberg, Harvey E., Cave Dwellers and Citrus Growers: A Jewish Community in Libya and Israel, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972

Goldberg, Harvey E., Jewish Life in Muslim Libya: Rivals and Relatives, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990

Hakohen, Mordechai, The Book of Mordechai: A Study of the Jews of Libya, edited and translated by Harvey E. Goldberg, Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues, 1980; London: Darf, 1993

Simon, Rachel, Change within Tradition among Jewish Women in Libya, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1992

Libyan Jews are unique among modern North African Jews in their Italian influence. Since the 1950s, most of the community immigrated to Israel and Italy. Relatively little research has been conducted on Libyan Jews, most of it published in Hebrew, English, and Italian.

APPLEBAUM examines the first phase of Jewish existence in Cyrenaica, eastern Libya. Following a description of the land and a survey of Greek colonization, including Ptolemaic and Roman rule in the region, as well as the economy and agriculture of ancient Cyrene, Applebaum focuses on the Jewish community. He examines the circumstances of their settlement and their spread across the region in towns and rural areas and describes the organization of their communities. Applebaum then proceeds to examine the background to the Jewish revolt in Cyrenaica under Trajan (115–117), which shook the Roman empire and had devastating results for the Jews. He provides a detailed, annotated description of the revolt in Cyrenaica and its spread to Egypt, Cyprus, Mesopotamia, and Palestine. As a result of the revolt, the Jewish communities of Cyrene, Egypt, and Cyprus were destroyed, to be renewed only much later by new waves of immigration. This is the main study on the topic and includes detailed information followed by analysis and bibliography.

DE FELICE examines Jewish life in Libya under several regimes: the second Ottoman administration (1835–1911), the Italians (1911–1943), the British (1943–1951), and Arab independent rule prior to Qadhafi's revolution (1952–1969). The book's main contribution relates to the Italian period, examining changes in Jewish communal organization, the impact of fascism on Jewish life, and especially their condition during World War II. De Felice provides much information on the deterioration of Jewish-Muslim relations in the 1940s and on the mass migration of the late 1940s to early 1950s, during which time most of Libya's Jews left for Israel. Conditions under Arab rule, the Jews' final departure, mainly to Italy, following the 1967 Arab-Israeli War, and Qadhafi's ascent to power in 1969 are also examined. Based on Italian, British, and Jewish archival materials as well as numerous publications, this is the most comprehensive study of Libyan Jewry in modern times, though it is occasionally difficult to use.

GOLDBERG (1972) examines the continuity and the change that the rural Tripolitanian Jewish community of Gharian experienced in the course of immigrating to Israel. Because most of the original community settled together in a rather homogenous village, Goldberg could compare their social, economic, cultural, and communal interrelations in both places. The first part of the book, based on published sources and the testimonies of immigrants, focuses on the community before emigration: its structure and relations with the authorities, with the Muslim neighborhood, and with other Jewish communities and the Jewish leadership, as well as economic, cultural, and social issues. Goldberg then examines the immigration process and settlement in a cooperative village in Israel and provides a detailed examination of life there, based on field research conducted between 1963 and 1965. Although most of the study deals with the period after immigration, this is an important book examining a Jewish rural community and the implications of immigration for its life.

GOLDBERG (1990) analyzes from historical and anthropological perspectives the changing relations between Jews and Muslims in Libya from the early 19th century to the mid-20th century. He examines the mutual influence of Jews and Muslims living in close proximity for generations while keeping their individual characters and specific social and economic roles in the society as a whole. Special chapters deal with Jewish life in Muslim Tripoli in the late Karamanli period (early 19th century); cultural sources of the Jewish wedding in Libya; the changing role of itinerant Jewish peddlers in Tripolitania at the end of the Ottoman period and under Italian rule; Jewish-Muslim religious rivalry in Tripolitania; a cultural analysis of the Tripolitanian anti-Jewish riots of 1945; and historical and cultural process with regard to change and stability in the perception of Jews in Libyan society. The book includes a bibliography on Libya as well as more generally on North Africa and the Middle East and on anthropology.

HAKOHEN includes selections from the Hebrew original Higid Mordekhai, which was written at the beginning of the 20th century by a Tripolitan Jew based on his own observations and on older manuscripts. Being a well-versed individual who was involved in Jewish communal and educational life in Tripoli and who traveled in the Tripolitanian hinterland, Hakohen includes invaluable information in various fields, including history, demography, linguistics, social and economic life, folklore, anthropology, religion, and interfaith relations. Though only parts of the original Hebrew manuscript were translated, it is still a very important source for the study of the Jews of Libya in the framework of the gentile environment prior to the Italian occupation. The importance of the book is further enhanced by the notes and introductions furnished by Goldberg, who puts the indigenous phenomena into a broader Jewish framework and adds an extensive bibliography.

The slow, evolutionary change in the status of Jewish women in Libya in the 19th and 20th centuries is examined by SIMON. Based on archival and published sources, the book shows how social, economic, and political changes in Libya affected the Jews, including women, and analyzes developments in women's social position, family life, education, and public life. Economic deterioration and foreign penetration opened new work opportunities for women, which gradually allowed them to become wage earners outside the home. Economic needs, on the one hand, and the wish of many Jews who had economic and social ties with Europe to imitate Europeans socially and culturally, on the other, resulted in the provision of formal education for women. Consequently, Jewish women were exposed exclusively to modern secular education whereas men studied in both traditional and modern schools. Despite all the changes, the Jewish community remained traditional and the principles upon which it operated did not change drastically. Thus, the male power structure did not alter in the private or the public domain and the position of women changed little within these spheres despite the expansion of opportunities for women in education and economic life. This book is the first comprehensive study of Jewish women in a modern Middle Eastern or North African land.

RACHEL SIMON

Lieberman, Saul 1898–1983

Belorussian-born American textual scholar of talmudic literature

Marx, Alexander, "Dr. Lieberman's Contribution to Jewish Scholarship," Proceedings of the Rabbinical Assembly of America, 12, 1949

Neusner, Jacob, Why There Never Was a "Talmud of Caesarea": Saul Lieberman's Mistakes, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1994

Sigal, Phillip, "The Scholarship of Saul Lieberman: Reflections on His First Yahrzeit," Judaism, 33(2), Spring 1984

Saul Lieberman ranks as one of the 20th century's most important scholars of rabbinic literature. His critical editions and books have become standard reference tools. He is particularly known for his innovative studies of the influence of Hellenistic culture on rabbinic Judaism. Many of Lieberman's works were written in Hebrew and remain untranslated. He was born in Motol, Belorussia, and was ordained at the yeshiva of Slobodka in 1916. He studied talmudic philology and Greek literature at the Hebrew University, and he graduated with a master of arts degree in 1931 and was hired as a lecturer. In 1940 Lieberman began teaching at the Jewish Theological Seminary, becoming its dean in 1949. He was president of the American Academy for Jewish Research, and in 1971 he became the first non-Israeli to win the Israel Prize for Jewish Studies. Lieberman died on 23 March 1983, aboard an El Al airliner bound for Israel.

MARX's essay is the transcript of an address given in 1948 at a convention in Chicago of the Rabbinical Assembly of America. This address is an informative survey of Lieberman's works. It is perhaps most useful for its review of many of Lieberman's studies that are written in Hebrew and not otherwise accessible to English readers. For example, it summarizes Lieberman's critical edition of the Tosefta, a collection of rabbinic literature with secondary canonical status. It examines his treatment of manuscript variants and his theories of how and when different Tosefta manuscripts were produced. Marx also reviews some of Lieberman's studies in Hebrew on the Jerusalem Talmud. Lieberman helped discredit the view that the Jerusalem Talmud was a uniform text. Rather, he argued that it was a compilation of material from different rabbinic schools that were produced in different times. Marx discusses Lieberman's 1944 essay, "The Martyrs of Caesarea," written in English, which compares accounts of the persecution of the Jews at the time of Hadrian to accounts of the persecution of Christians. Also discussed are studies on such subjects as Yemenite midrash, Maimonides, and the Karaites.

SIGAL's article is a helpful general introduction to Lieberman's scholarship. Sigal surveys briefly Lieberman's chief works and the principles that guided his studies. He describes Lieberman as the "outstanding practitioner" of the analysis of rabbinic literature with modern historical critical methods. His ideas on how texts developed over time into their present form are very influential. Sigal suggests that perhaps Lieberman's most important contribution to the study of rabbinic literature is his case for the extent to which the Tosefta and Palestinian Talmud, which are often neglected by students of the Mishnah and Babylonian Talmud, must be taken into consideration. Lieberman's critical editions make much of this "deuterocanonical" rabbinic literature accessible to scholars. Sigal also provides examples that show the breadth of Lieberman's erudition. He had a command not only of rabbinic literature but also of the Dead Sea Scrolls, classical and Hellenistic literature, and New Testament and early Christian writings as well.

NEUSNER critiques Lieberman's thesis that three tractates of Nezikin in the Palestinian Talmud (Yerushalmi), Baba Kamma, Baba Metsia', and Baba Batra (the Baba'ot), were the product of the rabbinic academy in the coastal city of Caesarea. The conventional view is that the entire Yerushalmi was edited in Tiberias. Lieberman's proposal is found in his monograph "The Talmud of Caesarea" (Supplements to Tarbiz, vol. 2, no. 4, Jerusalem, 1931). Lieberman developed this theory to explain long-noted differences of style, content, and terminology between the Baba'ot and the rest of the Yerushalmi. For example, this would account for the unusually large number of Greek words in the Baba'ot, since Caesarea was an extremely Hellenized city. Neusner argues that it is not necessary to explain the Baba'ot's peculiarities by positing their provenance in this city. Instead, he argues that the relationship between the Baba'ot in the Yerushalmi and the rest of its tractates is analogous to the relationship between the Baba'ot of the Babylonian Talmud and the rest of its tractates. Neusner proceeds to accuse Lieberman of not understanding the logic underpinning these talmudic tractates. While it is healthy to subject propositions made by preeminent scholars to scrutiny, in this case such an accusation is conspicuously unpersuasive.

MATTHEW GOFF

Lineage

Cohen, Shaye J.D., The Beginnings of Jewishness: Boundaries, Varieties, Uncertainties, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999

Goodblatt, David, The Monarchic Principle: Studies in Jewish Self-Government in Antiquity (Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum, 38), Tübingen: Mohr (Siebeck), 1994

- Ilan, Tal, Jewish Women in Greco-Roman Palestine (Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum, 44), Tübingen: Mohr (Siebeck) 1995; Peabody, Massachusetts: Hendrickson, 1996
- Kalmin, Richard, "Genealogy and Polemics in Rabbinic Literature of Late Antiquity," Hebrew Union College Annual, 67, 1996
- Kalmin, Richard, "Relationships between Rabbis and Non-Rabbis in Rabbinic Literature of Late Antiquity," Jewish Studies Quarterly, 5(2), 1998
- Lewis, I.M., "Descent," in Encyclopedia of Social and Cultural Anthropology, edited by Alan Barnard and Jonathan Spencer, London and New York: Routledge, 1996

The chain of father-child or mother-child relationships that establishes a person's descent from specific ancestors is an apt means of defining identity. A genealogy may refer to biological facts, but very often it is a more or less mythical construction handed down from generation to generation in order to provide a specific identity for a person or group. Genealogies appear worldwide in many different forms, which can be roughly divided into two categories: cognate genealogies, which put equal weight on each parent's families, and unilineal genealogies. The latter can be divided again into two patterns: patrilineal genealogies, highlighting the importance of descent from the father and his male ancestors, and matrilineal genealogies, emphasizing descent from the mother and her ancestresses as crucial for the child's identity. The unfolding of theories concerning lineage and descent groups is one of the traditional domains of social anthropology. The reference article by LEWIS gives a sound survey of the history and contemporary state of lineage theory.

In antiquity as well as in the present, the societies of the Middle East generally emphasize patrilineality. An individual is rooted in his or her group by endless chains of sons and fathers that recede into the group's mythical past. This pattern is also true for biblical genealogies, where membership of the people of Israel is defined through patrilineal descent from the patriarchs and one of the 12 tribes that the patriarchs begat. Patrilineality thus is the determining factor of family, tribal, and ethnic affiliations. Affiliation with a certain Israelite patrilineal tribe or tribal segment is especially important where priestly and levitical descent is concerned. In these cases, descent implies additional religious rights and responsibilities, as well as restrictions concerning marriage.

The Jewish people, however, broke with the Middle Eastern tradition of unequivocal patrilineality and introduced matrilineality as a consideration. Thus, matrilineality and patrilineality have different social functions in Jewish social practice. The matrilineal pattern matters only in cases of intermarriage with non-Jews; it helps determine ethnicity, thereby governing relations between Jews and gentiles. One halakhically Jewish grandparent is the criterion of automatic entitlement to Israeli citizenship, but an amendment stipulating matrilineal descent remains high on the Orthodox agenda. Patrilineality retained its effect only for social status inside the Jewish community: rabbinic rulings since late antiquity try to downplay biblical notions of patrilineality, interpreting them as relating to an intra-Jewish context. In any case, for the rabbis it was not descent from an esteemed or wealthy lineage that conferred honor but accomplishments in the study and practice of Torah. Rabbinic texts, therefore, rather neglect genealogical considerations. Because of this virtual absence of sources, little scholarly work has been produced on patrilineality in the Jewish context.

COHEN is the most important contemporary scholar analyzing rabbinic notions of matrilineal descent. His work, here and in scattered articles, is both comprehensive and vital to the discussion because it summarizes the few previous relevant works on the topic and combines them with the crucial primary sources to formulate a new and fruitful synthesis. How, when, and why, Cohen asks, did the rabbis depart from the biblical social patterns of unequivocal patrilineality in order to adopt the opposing principle of matrilineality? In the biblical and Second Temple periods, it was an individual's patrilineal genealogy that determined his or her identity as a Jew. The child of a Jewish male was a Jew. A mother of non-Jewish origin joined her husband's patrilineal clan by marriage, at the same time becoming a member of the Jewish people. Ritual conversion of women was neither known nor thought necessary. Rabbinic halakhah, however, stated that only the child of a Jewish female was a Jew, and in accordance with this new emphasis, the rabbis introduced rituals of conversion for gentile women who wished to be Jewish.

While Cohen comes close to a satisfactory answer to the questions of how and when the rabbis introduced the shift, he decides to leave the question of why open for the time being. He argues that this transformation did not happen before the time reflected in the Mishnah (second century C.E.) and that the earliest evidence of matrilineality as part of Jewish marital law is found in Mishnah Kiddushin 3:12. But why did the rabbis depart from the biblical law of patrilineality, which was, after all, social practice all over the Middle East? In Cohen's view, there are two reasonable explanations for this development. First, the rabbis may have extrapolated to human unions the mishnaic understanding of the biblical law of kilayim (forbidden mixtures), which stated for example that the offspring of the union of a horse with a donkey must be judged matrilineally. The second hypothesis, which Cohen finds more convincing, concerns the influence of the Roman law of intermarriage. Roman law held, in principle, that the status of offspring of any union in which one parent was not a full-fledged Roman citizen was determined by the mother's lineage. (Later, however, the Romans declared that such offspring should follow the parent of inferior status, who may not necessarily be the mother.) Cohen concludes that the crucial rabbinic source, Mishnah Kiddushin, may express a combination of these two factors, as the rabbinic concept of kilayim facilitated the influence of the Roman law.

The introduction of matrilineality split the group affiliations of a Jew: ethnicity was now governed by female descent, while family and (where relevant) tribal affiliation stayed within the domain of patrilineality. The relevance of patrilineality has been shown by ILAN in her study of Jewish women's lives in antiquity. On the one hand, descent defined an individual's eligibility for marriage; on the other hand, marriage was a means of conserving lineage purity. Rabbinic literature provides a number of texts pertaining to preferred and forbidden matches among Jews of different family or tribal descent. Patrilineages of high esteem favored marriage within the family in order to avoid the complications of marrying outsiders. Thus, the texts advocated such endogamous practices as marriage between first cousins and the union between a man and his sister's daughter. Ilan explains that in the Second Temple period, when priestly power was flourishing, it was predominantly families from the tribe of Levi who used endogamy to keep their lineage pure. Early rabbinic texts, such as passages in Mishnah Kiddushin, chapter four, still deal with such questions as who is allowed to marry a woman of priestly stock—an important issue in a patrilineal society in which a woman's children belong to her husband's lineage. After the destruction of the Temple, priorities concerning whose lineage purity was of the highest value changed. The newly powerful lay scholars paid little respect to the old tribal pedigrees, and scholarship became a determinant for marriageability in the rabbinic world. When the Babylonian Talmud (Pesahim 49b) catalogs desirable marriage partners, scholars rank the highest, while priests do not appear on this list. The sages and their offspring, however, soon formed patrilineal clans of their own, affiliation with which was an important factor in one's status and marriageability. Thus, kinship as a basic principle remained effective.

Kalmin's research on Jewish societies of the classical rabbinic period similarly emphasizes the history of patrilineality. In several articles, notably KALMIN (1996) and KALMIN (1998), he examines the importance of pedigree as a means of distinction between rabbinic and non-rabbinic families. Kalmin explores the regional divergence of Jewish social traditions, highlighting the differences between Palestinian and Babylonian Jewish societies as reflected in rabbinic texts: Babylonian rabbis pronounced the importance of lineage purity for rabbinic families and advocated a clear-cut, almost caste-like separation between themselves and "ordinary" Jewish families, while Palestinian rabbis of the same period were much more permissive. According to Palestinian sources, casual everyday contact and intermarriage between members of rabbinic and non-rabbinic lineages are permissible and sometimes even desirable. Kalmin links this striking difference to the different social environments in which the two Jewish communities lived. The non-Jewish Persian majority in Babylonia attached much importance to questions of lineage purity and the segregation of social classes, and Kalmin suggests that under this influence Babylonian rabbinic circles came to fear that casual relations with non-rabbinic families would open the way for intermarriage and compromise their lineage purity. In Palestine, however, the non-Jewish majority reflected the Greco-Roman cultural pattern in which stratification was much weaker. Rigid class and lineage boundaries were not considered desirable form, and again the attitude of the dominant culture influenced the Jewish minority.

GOODBLATT's study of Jewish views on monarchy provides another strong argument for recognizing the importance of patrilineality in postbiblical and rabbinic times. Unlike Ilan and Kalmin, Goodblatt studies dynasties of pre- and non-rabbinic "nobility." Nevertheless, he comes to similar conclusions, while questioning the common scholarly tendency to analyze the political and social ideologies expressed in rabbinic texts without discussing the historical context in which the rabbis lived. He argues that rabbinic texts do not reflect the extent to which Jewish societies of postbiblical times were still strongly committed to those ideologies of patrilineality that supported priestly status or that of Davidic royalty. Goodblatt makes his point through an analysis of three Jewish monarchies: the priestly monarchy of Second Temple times; the Palestinian patriarchate from the House of Gamaliel (second to fifth century C.E.); and the exilarch in Babylonia (second to 13th century C.E.). All three exemplify how a constructed patrilineal genealogy can serve political purposes. The priestly monarchs claimed descent from the High Priest Aaron of the tribe of Levi, while the patriarchal and the exilarchal ruling lineages founded their political claims on descent from the royal House of David as the noblest lineage of the tribe of Judah. Focusing on the case of the Palestinian patriarchate (which is the least studied of the three institutions), Goodblatt demonstrates how the Roman-backed family of Gamaliel had to construct a Davidic pedigree in retrospect in order to be respected by its Jewish subjects. Furthermore, Jews at that time acknowledged that the patriarchate and the exilarchate shared a genealogically based hierarchy, with the exilarchate deemed superior to the patriarchate. This arrangement was reflected in the ascription of the patriarch's descent from David through females, while the exilarch traced Davidic descent through males. This hierarchy illustrates the deeply rooted pattern of patrilineality in Jewish society: descent from a male line proves much more highly esteemed than affiliation through matrilineage.

Thus, like Kalmin, Goodblatt explains that the Jews of late antiquity used the concept of "pure" patrilineal lineage to stratify society. He concludes with the view that the strikingly few references in rabbinic literature to the importance of genealogy do not by their scarcity prove that lineage was unimportant for Jewish life. Instead, the omissions reveal that the talmudic masters had little interest in these matters on ideological grounds.

MONIKA HUMER

Literature, Jewish

- Burnshaw, Stanley, Carmi Charny, and Ezra Spicehandler (editors), The Modern Hebrew Poem Itself, New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1965
- Mintz, Alan, Hurban: Responses to Catastrophe in Hebrew Literature, New York: Columbia University Press, 1984
- Roskies, David G., Against the Apocalypse: Responses to Catastrophe in Modern Jewish Culture, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1984
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Wine, Women, and Death: Medieval Hebrew Poems on the Good Life, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1986
- Waxman, Meyer, A History of Jewish Literature, 5 vols., New York: Yoseloff, 1960

Zinberg, Israel, A History of Jewish Literature, 12 vols., translated by Bernard Martin, Cleveland, Ohio: Press of Case Western Reserve University, 1972

The study of Jewish literature, from the narratives of the Tanakh to the poetry of the generation of Palmah, can be a fascinating and compelling source of enjoyment. Contrary to conventional wisdom, Jewish literature, rather than simply representing details of Jewish life in a positivistic or ethnographic sense, has often been influenced greatly by the surrounding culture and represents a polemic against traditional piety and popular values. Jewish literature has been produced in Jewish languages such as Hebrew, Aramaic, and Yiddish as well as many other languages.

BURNSHAW serves the autodidact's pursuit of Hebrew poetry. Turning to the back of the book, the reader will find an introductory essay on the history of modern Hebrew poetry by Ezra Spicandler. He proceeds from the poetry of Spain to the creativity of Hayyim Nahman Bialik and Saul Tchernichowsky in Europe and early developments in 20th-century Palestine, and finally to post-State developments in Israel. Benjamin Hrushovski traces the development of Hebrew poetics from the Bible through the Middle Ages to the modern period, and he includes discussions of modern Hebrew meter, pronunciation, rhythm, and rhyme. The book contains discussions of 69 poems, most chosen for their aesthetic qualities. The book presents the poems in Hebrew, transliteration, and translation; the renderings of the poems are followed by biographical information on the poet and analyses by various scholars and poets. Burnshaw also provides useful information concerning biblical and historical allusions. The material moves from the classics of Bialik and Tchernichowsky to the major figures of modern Israel including poets involved in the Canaanite movement, an attempt to distance Israeli culture from Judaism. The work includes poetry by women and poetry written in reaction to the Holocaust.

MINTZ offers a historical monograph on a specific topic—catastrophe—in a specific type of literature—Hebrew—dealing with a set of authors ranging from biblical through rabbinic, medieval, and modern to contemporary Israeli writers. Beyond the impressionistic glimpses of authors found in general surveys and encyclopedias, Mintz compares the way in which writers approach a common theme. He presents not only a compelling introduction to each author and his texts but also supplies historical background relevant to both the events and the mentality of the authors and their original readers. Of particular importance is Mintz's development of what he calls the mikdash (sanctuary) paradigm in discussing Jewish depictions of suffering as sacrifice during the Middle Ages. One of Mintz's most astounding literary-historical discoveries appears in his discussion of Bialik's reaction to the Kishinev pogrom of 1903. In his "Be'ir haharegah" ("In the City of Slaughter"), Bialik condemns the Jews in vitriolic language for not defending themselves in the face of the attack. What Mintz discovered was that after the pogrom a committee was formed to investigate the violence. In reading their unpublished report, Mintz learned that the committee knew about Jewish self-defense efforts during the pogrom. He concludes, therefore, that Bialik's poem was founded upon a lie—

Bialik himself was not only a member of the committee, but it was he whom the committee sent to investigate on site in Kishinev and he who wrote the report.

ROSKIES treats the same subject as Mintz but from a different perspective (the Holocaust) and by making use of other (primarily Yiddish) materials. One of the central questions he deals with is the question of the continuity and uniqueness of the Holocaust and the usefulness of traditional archetypes. To answer this he suggests that the Holocaust was actually anticipated by the artistic process. Roskies does not deal with his material chronologically, purposely avoiding what he calls seamless progressions, and instead treats it thematically. The book is filled with fascinating asides about most major modern Hebrew and Yiddish writers. His central thesis revolves around the relationship of ancient archetypes, scriptural and midrashic, to Jewish collective memory. Roskies notes that traditional Jewish archetypes of sacrifice and martyrdom were collective rather than individual. Subsequent Jewish memory appropriated and often altered these archetypes, the most famous alteration being that Abraham actually sacrificed Isaac, an image that was actualized by Jewish parents during some of the eruptions of anti-Jewish violence in the Middle Ages. The remainder of the book focuses on the ways that individual authors, often survivors of the Holocaust, drew on these traditions. The final chapter elaborates a significant theme in modern Jewish literature and art: the appropriation of the crucifixion as a symbol of Jewish catastrophe, a trend that he traces back in Yiddish literature to 1909 and in Hebrew literature to 1923, when the nationalist poet Uri Zvi Greenberg wrote a poem in the shape of a cross. The book closes with a discussion of Marc Chagall's Crucifixions. Although Chagall painted them as early as 1912, it was not until the 1930s that he connected them with Jewish suffering. Mixing the study of history and literature effortlessly, Roskies uncovers an amazingly sobering fact: the Nazi officer in charge of the liquidation of the Vilna ghetto had spent three years pursuing Jewish studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Joining the roster of so many scholars of the Bible, Semitics, and even rabbinics who wrote denunciations of the Jews during the 19th century, this officer's immersion in Jewish studies and Jewish life in the land of Israel leaves readers with serious questions about whether such studies and relationships offer any real hope for better relations.

SCHEINDLIN has produced an accessible masterpiece on a splendid period in the development of Jewish literature. After an introduction about the context of Hebrew poetry in Muslim Spain and a few words on the major poets, each section of the book begins with an introduction to one of the selected genres of poetry: wine, love, and death. Scheindlin presents examples of each type of poem in both Hebrew and English translation and then analyzes each poem. He stresses that his approach highlights not what is unique about Judaism but what Judaism shares with general culture, and it illustrates how the poetry constitutes a unique cultural synthesis between Jewish traditions and those of Islamic Spain, including meter, rhyme, and literary conventions. His masterful translations convey these features felicitously in English. The three themes that Scheindlin selects constitute not mere examples but significant vantage points on the cultural world of the Jews of Spain, especially since these genres, particularly hedonistic drinking songs and love poems sometimes addressed to men by men, are not a regular feature of Jewish culture in other periods. His discussion of these is nuanced and sensitive to the literary and social forces involved. On one matter Scheindlin's presentation appears contradictory. When discussing the wine poetry, he regularly asserts that these poems document a social reality and are not simply literary conventions copied from the works of Arab contemporaries. When he discusses the love poetry, however, he argues that it is conventional and stylized, and thereby he undermines the positivistic possibility of finding hard autobiographical data. When arguing for a difference in social realities behind these two types of poems, however, Scheindlin does make the profound observation that if Jews imitated some conventions and not others, that reveals a telling cultural choice on their part. Such an approach may offer a more intriguing and consistent direction of study than the attempt to correlate one genre with social reality at the expense of another.

WAXMAN actually wrote most of his work between the late 1920s and the early 1940s, later adding a supplementary volume covering the period from 1935 to 1960. Thus, much of Waxman's work represents not an improvement over Israel Zinberg's work (discussed below) but rather an alternative approach. Waxman covers a much broader expanse of literature, beginning earlier and extending his coverage wider geographically and later chronologically, with considerably more attention to rabbinic and religious literature. He presents his material thematically, and thus discussion of major authors may be spread out over several sections. However, each section pulls together and shapes diverse material into a coherent unit. Waxman offers plot summaries of important works with very few quotations. The work is composed of nine books bound in the first four volumes, with each volume containing supplements and excursions on various topics. A brief outline of the book indeed serves as an outline of the contours of Jewish literature. The first book contains units on apocryphal, rabbinic, and Hellenistic literature. Books two and three include several units on medieval Jewish literature divided chronologically, and discussions of grammar, biblical exegesis, and Hebrew poetry beginning with the piyyut of the land of Israel. Further units include medieval rabbinic literature (arranged by category: talmudic commentaries, law codes, and responsa). These units are followed by chapters on philosophy and theology, ethics, mysticism, Karaite literature, materials on history, geography, travel, science, fables, proverbs, satire, Kabbalah, autobiography, polemics, and early Yiddish literature. In book four Waxman traces the development of modern Jewish literature, beginning with hasidic literature and then turning to Haskalah. Book five treats the 19th century including various Jewish movements, Jewish science, Jewish thought, and rabbinic literature. Book six offers an introduction to the renaissance of modern Hebrew literature at the end of the 19th century, with discussions of authors and genres. Book seven traces Yiddish and then European Jewish vernacular literature in a similar manner. Book eight returns to the modern manifestations of the medieval categories such as biblical exegesis, rabbinic literature, history, geography, autobiography, philosophy, theology, and ethics. Book nine treats American Jewish literature written in English, Yiddish, and Hebrew, and it then surveys American accomplishments in classical Jewish scholarship of the Bible, rabbinics, and Jewish law. The fifth volume of Waxman's collection offers updates, by genre and author, on Hebrew and Yiddish poetry, short stories, novels, and essays and also offers units on more traditional categories such as the Bible, rabbinics, history, biography, autobiography, philosophy, and theology. The work ends with an update on American scholarship in Hebrew literature, Jewish studies, and Jewish thought.

ZINBERG's work is a multivolume history of Jewish literature and culture, originally written in Yiddish. Trying to formulate a secular vision of Jewish culture, he concentrates primarily on poetry, ethics, mysticism, philosophy, and polemics and excludes most aspects of medieval rabbinic and religious literature. The volumes follow a chronological and geographical order. Each chapter usually focuses on a leading individual as well as other literary figures around him and only sometimes pulls together material by theme, rarely by genre. During the 1960s this work was translated into Hebrew, accompanied by additional notes. The English translation of the 1970s does not have all the material of the Hebrew translation. Zinberg, with his extensive quotations, is best viewed as an introduction and as providing a sometimes cumbersome approach for situating authors and locating sources, rather than as the final word on any subject. His work is perhaps most profitably consulted alongside Waxman, by way of a second opinion.

HOWARD TZVI ADELMAN

See also American Literature; Hebrew Literature; Hellenistic Literature; Judeo-Arabic Literature; Ladino Literature; Languages, Jewish; Poetry; Women's Literature; Yiddish Literature

Lithuania

Cohen, Israel, Vilna, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1943, facsimile edition, 1992

Goldstein, Sidney, Lithuanian Jewry, 1993: A Demographic and Sociocultural Profile (Jewish Population Studies, no. 28), Jerusalem: Avraham Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1997

Greenbaum, Masha, The Jews of Lithuania: A History of a Remarkable Community, 1316–1945, Jerusalem: Gefen, 1995

Hundert, Gershon David and Gershon C. Bacon, The Jews in Poland and Russia: Bibliographical Essays (The Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984

Schoenburg, Nancy and Stuart Schoenburg, Lithuanian Jewish Communities (Garland Reference Library of the Humanities, vol. 1321), New York: Garland, 1991

Jews first began migrating to Lithuania in the 1300s and became a major presence there after about 1365. To an extent, Jews in Lithuania enjoyed greater security and social and economic freedom than those in other medieval European nations because some leaders of Lithuania demonstrated greater religious and cultural tolerance. Nevertheless, the frequent subjugation of Lithuania in wars between larger states created severe crises for Lithuanian Jewry over the centuries, from restrictive legal measures to show trials and pogroms. In the 1500s, Jews were granted freedom of movement and employment, and they became a particularly important force in trade. Two major European centers of Jewish social and cultural activity from the 17th century to World War I were Vilnius (Vilna) and Kaunas (Kovno). From 1795 to 1918, after Russia had annexed a large portion of Polish territory, Lithuania formed a part of the Russian Empire. During this time, Lithuania was a major center of Jewish culture with numerous yeshivot, rabbinic authorities, and scholars, and Vilnius was viewed as "the Jerusalem of Lithuania." After World War I, newly independent Lithuania lost Vilnius to Poland. Jewish autonomy eroded in the Lithuanian republic of the 1920s and 1930s, and during World War II Nazis and Lithuanians destroyed most of the country's Jewish population. The government of the Soviet Union, which took over Lithuania after World War II, largely prohibited religious expression. After the dissolution of the Soviet Union and the emergence of the new Lithuanian republic after 1991, the Jewish community experienced some signs of a rebirth.

GREENBAUM gives a clear and well-written overview of Lithuanian Jewish political, social, and cultural history from the Middle Ages to 1945. She focuses on cultural institutions and social phenomena, such as the older yeshivot in Lithuanian territories, Jewish councils, and the Jewish Bund. Throughout the book, historical narrative is amplified by descriptions and explanations of the great Jewish cultural achievements of each period. Greenbaum points to the highlights of Jewish life in the medieval period under the different rulers of Lithuania, and she provides a particularly interesting survey of Jewish cultural life in the 18th-century Enlightenment period, noting especially the differences between hasidim and their opponents in Lithuania and Poland. In her examination of Lithuanian Jewry under Russian rule from the late 18th century to World War I, she alternates between describing the largely intolerant policies of the czars and the Jews' own increasing attempts to secure greater freedoms or to assimilate to Russian life. The book ends with a review of Jewish national autonomy in the free Lithuanian republic that lasted until World War II and a section on the near-liquidation of Lithuanian Jewry during the Holocaust. There are numerous sources in a variety of languages in the bibliography, and the notes for each chapter are particularly clear and detailed.

COHEN views Lithuanian Jewish history through the prism of the Jewish community of Vilnius. His book traces the political, social, demographic, and cultural history of Vilnius and Lithuanian Jewry from 1350 to the beginning of World War II. The book intertwines narration of historical developments under Lithuania's different rulers with descriptive sections on the Jewish community's customs and self-government. Cohen does a particularly good job of sorting out the financial and external relations of the Vilnius Jewish ruling body, or Kahal, with both the Lithuanian Jewish community as a whole and with the Polish and Russian rulers of Lithuania. He also devotes some attention to the Karaite group in Vilnius and Lithuania and to notable Lithuanian Jewish cultural and artistic figures. The book contains useful illustrations of Vilnius's Great Synagogue and the ghetto. Although this book has a bibliography, Cohen does not supply footnotes, so this book may not lead directly to other sources for those readers who are researching more specific topics.

HUNDERT and BACON present a set of bibliographical essays that will be useful for readers studying Jewish life in both Poland and Lithuania or in Lithuania as part of the Soviet Union. For those studying Lithuania alone, there are some relevant references but not many. Nevertheless, the book's division into two long essays with bibliographies at the end of each helps to establish the context of, and interconnections between, Lithuanian-Jewish, Polish-Jewish, and Soviet history. The book notes reference works, surveys, studies of cultural and political history, and journals devoted specifically to individual countries. The only real shortcoming of this book is the lack of a comprehensive index of minor or individual topics.

SCHOENBURG provides a unique perspective on Lithuanian Jewish history and culture through the prism of genealogy as well as history. Originally geared toward readers tracing their roots to specific Lithuanian Jewish families or villages, it offers useful insights into the life of the Lithuanian shtetl as well as life in the larger cities such as Vilnius and Kaunas. The book begins with a condensed but informative history of Jewish life in Lithuania from the 1300s to the end of World War II. A large portion of the book describes specific towns, villages, and Jewish communities in Lithuania, which it lists with their Yiddish and alternative names. Most entries in this section of the book offer a brief history of each town, a description of Jewish life and the most important buildings there, and a list of the leading Jewish families in the town, as established from archival sources. An appendix shows each town on exhaustive maps. Other appendixes include lists of Lithuanian Jewish names that emerged from specific towns, lists of Lithuanian Jewish Holocaust survivors, and a bibliography of other works relating to Lithuanian Jewish history and genealogical research. This book is particularly useful for readers who wish to form a general understanding of the workings of Lithuanian Jewish village and community life or to study population patterns and customs in different regions of Lithuania.

GOLDSTEIN updates the information available on Lithuanian Jewry to provide a demographic profile of this population in the post-Soviet era. Goldstein writes that his purpose was to determine whether international sources could help to revive Jewish life and culture in Lithuania today. He provides a thorough and valuable analysis of numerous facets of the experience of current Lithuanian Jews, whose numbers have declined from about 30,000 after the Holocaust to 6,500 as of 1993. Analyzing the data derived from surveys and interviews with more than 4,000 Lithuanian Jews, Goldstein explores everything from issues of marriage, housing, professions, and economic factors to issues of ethnic conflict and the observance of specific Jewish traditions and rituals. Numerous charts, tables, and graphs throughout the book illustrate Goldstein's statistical findings. One notable finding is that Lithuanian-born Jews residing in Lithuania are more likely to identify themselves as Jewish than are Russian-born Jews residing in Lithuania. Perhaps more predictably, he also finds that those who identified themselves as Jews in terms of religion are more likely to be observant of Jewish traditions and customs than those who identified themselves as Jews by ethnicity or birth. Goldstein concludes by encouraging increased international involvement with Lithuanian Jews, as the presence of a larger international Jewish community helped smaller Jewish populations in countries such as Denmark to retain their identity and cohesiveness. The main focus of this book, however, is on the demographic charts.

ALISA GAYLE MAYOR

Liturgy, History of

- Bradshaw, Paul F. and Lawrence A. Hoffman (editors), The Making of Jewish and Christian Worship, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1991
- Elbogen, Ismar, Der Jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 1913; translated by Raymond P. Scheindlin as Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1993
- Heinemann, Joseph, Ha-tefilah bi-tekfufat ha-Tana'im veba-Amora'im, 1962; translated by Richard S. Sarason as Prayer in the Talmud: Forms and Patterns (Studia Judaica, vol. 9), New York: de Gruyter, 1977
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., The Canonization of the Synagogue Service (Studies in Judaism and Christianity in Antiquity, no. 4), Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1979; London: University of Notre Dame Press, 1986
- Idelsohn, A.Z., Jewish Liturgy and Its Development, New York: Holt, 1932; London: Constable, 1995
- Kohler, Kaufmann, The Origins of the Synagogue and the Church, edited by H.G. Enelow, New York: Macmillan, 1929
- Langer, Ruth, To Worship God Properly: Tensions between Liturgical Custom and Halakhah in Judaism (Monographs of the Hebrew Union College, no. 22), Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1998
- Reif, Stefan C., Judaism and Hebrew Prayer: New Perspectives on Jewish Liturgical History, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Zahavy, Tzvee, Studies in Jewish Prayer (Studies in Judaism), Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1990

Modern study of the history of the liturgy began with the 19th-century Wissenschaft des Judentums school. Scholars from Leopold Zunz on, using primarily philological methods, proposed reconstructions and datings of the earliest versions of rabbinic prayers. The discovery of the Cairo Genizah and Qumran complicated and enriched these efforts and led eventually to a methodological shift, led by Joseph Heinemann, who posited that early liturgy was so fluid that no reconstruction or dating was possible. Most recently, Ezra Fleischer has published a series of articles in Hebrew questioning Heinemann's conclusions. This debate remains unresolved, impeded not just by the complete lack of any prayer books predating the ninth century but also by evolving methodologies in the study of rabbinic literature as a whole. Medieval and modern liturgical developments have generally received much less attention, as have non-Ashkenazi rites.

The oldest, most valuable comprehensive history of the liturgy is ELBOGEN, first published in German in 1913 and translated into English with the updates of the 1972 Hebrew edition. Part one surveys the components of the liturgy, including a description of each prayer, its putative origins and development, and the differences between various rites; part two presents a history of the liturgy as a whole; and part three discusses the synagogue context of the liturgy. While Elbogen's descriptions and references remain invaluable, his historical interpretations have been superseded. Aware of the early findings from the genizah, he still assumed a discrete date of promulgation for each prayer. His discussions of liturgical poetry, as indicated by the long 1972 additions, are fundamentally flawed. His understanding of the contribution of mysticism is also limited.

Most of KOHLER's posthumous work dedicates chapters to the development of the synagogue and its liturgy and to the various groups that shaped them in the Second Temple period. While, like Elbogen, he shies away from suggesting original texts of the prayers, he does give detailed datings of each segment with attention to possible borrowings and influences from surrounding cultures. While he criticizes Elbogen's interpretations, Kohler perpetuates many of the same methodological flaws, including, especially, insupportable assumptions about the realities of Second Temple religious life.

IDELSOHN embeds these same sorts of assumptions about the early liturgy in his sequential, historically oriented description of the traditional liturgy. Prefacing this description are chapters tracing the development of Jewish worship from the First Temple to the compilation of the ninth-century Seder Rav Amram Gaon as well as discussions of liturgical poetry, the influence of Kabbalah, and medieval regional developments. The final chapter of the book discusses Reform liturgy. His medieval historical observations, although incomplete, are more reliable than his early materials; his discussion of liturgical poetry, while more accurate than Elbogen's, is incomplete in light of more recent discoveries.

HEINEMANN's revolutionary study, published in Hebrew in 1962 and integrating the evidence of Qumran, applies the tools of form criticism to the existing data on the early history of the liturgy. Heinemann suggests persuasively not only that fixed authoritative texts for synagogue prayer were nonexistent in the Second Temple period but also that the prayers as they are known now may not have existed then. He suggests, rather, that vocabularies and syntaxes of prayer were gradually developing independently in different social contexts: the synagogue, the study hall, the temple, the law court, and the private realm. Only gradually in the rabbinic period and after do these crystallize into the known rites. Speculation about dates of and motives for the composition of specific prayers is thus inappropriate. Critics of Heinemann question whether rabbinic liturgy could have functioned without fixed texts; it is also unclear whether the pre-rabbinic synagogue was a place of prayer at all.

HOFFMAN, following Heinemann, analyzes the evidence for the formalization of the liturgy in the geonic period, the point at which there begins to be clear insistence on fixed prayer texts. Hoffman collects and interprets the geonic responsa and legal literature on the various parts of the liturgy and then concludes with an analysis of the factors motivating various geonim to move toward "canonization" of the liturgy. While canonization reflects more what certain geonim wanted than what they achieved, Hoffman's work provides crucial insights into a critical period.

ZAHAVY's seriously flawed volume employs a novel reading of early rabbinic history, suggesting that the various parts of the liturgy originated with rival political factions in post-destruction Judaism. While intriguing, his arguments are poorly supported and documented and hence unconvincing.

REIF's important survey of the entire history of Jewish liturgy constitutes a dialogue with his predecessors and a programmatic call for future research. Methodologically, he follows Heinemann. Not an introductory text, it is best read after Elbogen, Heinemann, and, ideally, Fleischer (Hebrew). Particularly significant are Reif's chapter on talmudic liturgical issues, his history of the prayer book as a literary text, and his chapters on medieval liturgical developments. His notes and bibliography provide important reference to the rich periodical literature not discussed here.

BRADSHAW and HOFFMAN include contributions on methodology and history that, while not groundbreaking, are accessible to the nonspecialist and up-to-date. Hoffman reads liturgy through the lens of anthropological ritual studies; Zahavy makes the same historical claims as above; Chiat discusses archaeological contributions. Reif and Friedland divide their historical survey at the geonic emergence of the prayer book. Like Kohler, this volume presents Jewish liturgical history in dialogue with its Christian counterpart.

LANGER looks not at prayer texts but at the development of the legal framework governing them. Beginning with an analysis of the development of talmudic liturgical law and a summary of its principles, she then studies the changing application of several of these principles in the medieval world. Addressed are issues of the fixity and authority of received prayers and proper venues for their recitation. She studies the acceptance of post-talmudic blessings, the integration of liturgical poetry, and the private recitation of angelic liturgies. Each case and its resolution reflect shifting balances between rabbinic legal decrees and actual communal practice, factors that have been largely ignored in previous liturgical histories.

RUTH LANGER

See also Liturgy, Reform

Liturgy, Reform

- Blau, Joseph L. (compiler), Reform Judaism: A Historical Perspective: Essays from the Yearbook of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, New York: Ktav, 1973
- Bradshaw, Paul F. and Lawrence A. Hoffman (editors), The Changing Face of Jewish and Christian Worship in North

- America* (Two Liturgical Traditions, vol. 2), Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1991
- Elbogen, Ismar, Der Jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 1913; translated by Raymond P. Scheindlin as Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1993
- Friedland, Eric L., "Were Our Mouths Filled with Song": Studies in Liberal Jewish Liturgy (Monographs of the Hebrew Union College, no. 20), Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1997
- Hoffman, Lawrence A. (editor), Gates of Understanding: A Companion Volume to Shaarei Tefillah, Gates of Prayer, New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1977
- Meyer, Michael A., Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism (Studies in Jewish History), New York: Oxford University Press, 1988
- Petuchowski, Jakob J., Prayerbook Reform in Europe: The Liturgy of European Liberal and Reform Judaism, New York: World Union for Progressive Judaism, 1968
- Plaut, W. Gunther, The Rise of Reform Judaism: A Sourcebook of Its European Origins, New York: World Union for Progressive Judaism, 1963
- Plaut, W. Gunther, The Growth of Reform Judaism: American and European Sources until 1948, New York: World Union for Progressive Judaism, 1965
- Reif, Stefan C., Judaism and Hebrew Prayer: New Perspectives on Jewish Liturgical History, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993

Despite the continuing centrality of liturgical change as a primary mode of theological self-definition in Reform Judaism, relatively little has been written on the subject. Not only do major prayer books lack significant scholarly analysis, but the vast treasures of liturgy written for particular communities have gone largely unexamined in the various efforts to understand the history of the movement.

The most significant exception to this generalization is PETUCHOWSKI. Based on an analysis of the weekday and Sabbath services in the surviving 171 European Reform and Liberal prayer books that he was able to identify, ranging from 1816 to 1967 (and listed in a bibliography in chapter one), Petuchowski describes and explains the development of European Reform liturgy. Although acknowledging the interdependence of these reforms with those occurring contemporaneously in North America, Petuchowski was required by his sponsors to maintain a strictly European focus. Five chapters treat aspects of the process of reform, examining the various social and intellectual forces shaping the changes. Eight chapters then focus on the approaches taken to the reforming of some of the individual topics of the liturgy that the Reform world found most troubling, such as particularism, ties to Zion, and restoration of the sacrificial cult. These more-focused studies include aspects of the High Holy Days liturgy, including a detailed look at the memorializing of the dead. Throughout, Petuchowski has included generous citations of the original sources, including the Hebrew of the prayer texts. The volume also contains a valuable bibliography of European non-Reform and North American prayer books and of secondary writings about Jewish prayer.

The other exception, FRIEDLAND's volume, comprises the author's collected articles. This melange, in general more descriptive than analytic, includes a brief survey of medieval developments; studies of specific early North American Reform prayer books; thematic studies on innovative Hebrew prayers in Reform worship, on Sephardi and mystical influences, and on theologies of death, messianism, and vengeance in certain holiday liturgies; and the author's reviews of various Reform and Reconstructionist prayer books that have appeared since the mid-1970s. While the bulk of Friedland's writings focus on the texts of the North American Reform movement, his volume does not fill the gaps left by Petuchowski's European emphasis. He provides neither a broad historical discussion of North American developments nor penetrating analysis of many important theological issues. For instance, there is no direct discussion of the prayer book that dominated the North American Reform movement for most of its history, the Union Prayer Book, and no formal discussion of the impact of Zionism or feminism. His discussions, however, are important collections of the relevant data needed for some more analytical treatments.

Less consistently academic but still important is HOFFMAN's collection of essays published to accompany the 1975 Gates of Prayer (the revision of the Union Prayer Book). The first three sections of this book gather previously published essays, or selections from essays, by major reform thinkers on the history, theology, and praxis of Reform worship. Notable here is the subtle editorial creation of a discussion of the major innovation of this new prayer book—its retreat from any attempt to propound a unified theological statement for the entire movement. The fourth section consists of Hoffman's own essay, "The Liturgical Message," which presents an important analysis of the history of Reform liturgy and proposes a mode of understanding the new prayer book that moves away from dependence strictly on the rational interpretation of the verbal texts to the admission of more symbolic and affective modes of interpretation. The final section provides an introduction and explanation of the new text.

A few of the general histories of Jewish liturgy have included sections on Reform. ELBOGEN's classic text devotes its entire discussion of "The Modern Period" to three brief chapters on Reform. The book, published originally in 1913, reflects historically and critically, yet clearly as a partisan apologist, on the 19th-century development of the movement, primarily in Germany and North America. The 1993 date of the English edition is somewhat misleading, for it simply translates the 1913 original, adding only the emendations, presumably here by Petuchowski, to the 1972 Hebrew edition. These additions largely summarize Petuchowski's own work. While important, this text is dated.

More recently, REIF's comprehensive liturgical history devotes its final two chapters to the modern world. Reif's discussion of Reform itself is somewhat superficial and presents no new material. However, because he does not focus exclusively on the Reform movement, he offers valuable insights into the contexts in which various reforms occurred. His interests in methodology lead him to pose many penetrating questions for future study.

Some collections of articles contain relevant materials. BLAU includes a section titled "On Ritual and Worship," which reproduces important articles by Kaufmann Kohler (1907), W. Gunther Plaut (1965), Samuel S. Cohon (1928), and Israel Bettan (1930) on, respectively, the necessity of reformed ceremonial observances, the Sabbath, and two critiques of the Union Prayer Book. While these articles may be read as scholarly reflections on contemporary problems, they may also fruitfully be employed as primary sources for the theology of Reform liturgy.

BRADSHAW and HOFFMAN include a brief article by A. Stanley Dreyfus that summarizes the history of liturgical reform and that concludes with an analysis of the recent "Gates" series of Reform prayer books. Michael Signer's essay on the "Poetics of Liturgy" may be read as a critique of the contemporary liturgical situation in the Reform world. The other articles in this collection, devoted to issues in various Christian settings, provide valuable counterpoint to the Jewish experience and point to glaring gaps in the literature about Reform liturgy, such as the absence of any serious study about the impact of feminism.

A significant portion of the reforms of the Reform movement have expressed themselves liturgically. Hence, any history of the movement necessarily discusses liturgical issues. MEYER's authoritative, well-indexed history contains no extended discussion of liturgy but rather incorporates rich quantities of material into its larger analysis. No serious study of Reform Judaism can ignore this volume. PLAUT's (1963, 1965) two-volume history includes sections devoted to matters of synagogue and liturgy. Each section includes introductory material followed by selections from documents.

RUTH LANGER

See also Liturgy, History of; Reform Judaism

London

- Alderman, Geoffrey, The Jewish Community in British Politics, Oxford: Clarendon, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1983
- Alderman, Geoffrey, London Jewry and London Politics, 1889–1986, London and New York: Routledge, 1989
- Alderman, Geoffrey, Modern British Jewry, Oxford: Clarendon, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Brook, Stephen, The Club: The Jews of Modern Britain, London: Constable, 1989
- Fishman, William J., East End Jewish Radicals, 1875–1914, London: Duckworth, in association with the Acton Society Trust, 1975
- Kosmin, Barry A., and Nigel Grizzard, Jews in an Inner London Borough: A Study of the Jewish Population of the London Borough of Hackney Based on the 1971 Census, London: Research Unit, Board of Deputies of British Jews, 1975
- Kosmin, Barry A., and Caren Levy, Jewish Identity in an Anglo-Jewish Community: The Findings of the 1978

Redbridge Jewish Survey, London: Research Unit, Board of Deputies of British Jews, 1983

Roth, Cecil, The Great Synagogue, London, 1690–1940, London: Goldston, 1950

Rubinstein, W. D., A History of the Jews in the English-speaking World: Great Britain, Basingstoke, Hampshire: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996

There is no evidence of Jews in Roman or Saxon London, but William of Malmesbury notes that William the Conqueror brought Jews from Rouen to London in the wake of the Norman Conquest of 1066. In the reign of Henry I (1100–1135), the establishment of a Jewish quarter (vicus Judaeorum) is first noted, followed a couple of years later by the first blood libel against the Jews, with a fine of £2000 levied against the community. Several scholars visited London in the 12th century, and Abraham ibn Ezra wrote his Iggeret ha-Shabbat and Yesod Mora there during the reign of Henry II (1154–1189). The persecutions in France in the 1170s led to an influx of scholars such as Yom Tov of Joigny. The coronation of Richard I in 1189 was marked by the first massacre of Jews in London and followed by the first charter granted to the community. A series of worsening incidents involving further blood libels, pogroms, and economic and religious discrimination led to the expulsion of England's Jews by Edward I in 1290. Jews from Spain and Portugal were the main visitors thereafter, and a small community of Marranos existed until the English republic under Oliver Cromwell tacitly re-admitted the Jews in 1656. The establishment of an Ashkenazi community in 1690 followed the original Sephardi settlers from the Netherlands. The history of Anglo-Jewry is somewhat the history of the Jews of London. Indeed the London Committee of Deputies became the representative body of British Jewry in 1760.

ROTH's classic history of the Great Synagogue documents the development of the Ashkenazi community, its rabbis and lay leaders. Completed just before the destruction of this historic building by German bombers in 1941, it projects an informative and colorfully descriptive account.

Alderman, a historian of the successor generation, is more analytical in his own work and highly critical of the public relations agenda of Roth and his time. In particular ALDERMAN (1992) emphasizes the diversity and lack of uniformity within Anglo-Jewry. For example, the class structure of London Jews in 1882 suggests 42.2 percent were middle class and 23.6 percent were paupers. The great immigration from Russia and Poland after 1881, however, threatened all that and produced an antipathy on the part of anglicized West End Jews and their United Synagogue toward the poverty-stricken immigrant Jews in London's East End and the alarmingly ethnic premises where they met for prayer and study. The latter, as described in detail by Alderman, developed into the Federation of Synagogues. Alderman is also incisive on the transformation of the office of Chief Rabbi into a Jewish counterpart to the Archbishop of Canterbury for British society at large. He charts the genesis in London of different Jewish denominations: Reform (1840), Liberal (1902), and most recently the Masorti followers of Rabbi Louis Jacobs, a leading talmudic scholar effectively expelled from the United Synagogue in the 1960s for expounding a qualified interpretation of traditional doctrines of revelation.

RUBINSTEIN is particularly interesting for taking issue with the view (of Geoffrey Alderman and Richard Bolchover, among others) that London Jewry was docile and ineffective during the Holocaust period and could have done more. Rubinstein contends that "hindsight is not historical evidence."

London Jewry has a radical political tradition of liberalism, socialism, anarchism, communism, and Trotskyism, which has emanated essentially from London's East End. In 1876 Aron Lieberman established Agudat ha-Sotsyalistim ha-'Ivriim be-London (London Hebrew Socialist Union), and Morris Winchevsky's publication Der Polisher Yidl followed shortly afterward. FISHMAN details these early years of Jewish radicalism and especially the life and work of Rudolf Rocker, a German Catholic who developed and led the Jewish anarchist movement and devoted many years to the Jewish working class of London's East End.

Since World War II, London's changing Jewish population has been swollen by migration to the capital from other British cities as well as from Israel and South Africa and from former British colonies. At the same time, the population has been diminished by emigration to Israel, Australia, Canada, and other English-speaking countries as well as by a much-increased rate of assimilation and exogamy. Today London Jews account for a probable two-thirds of British Jews. During the last quarter of the 20th century, demographic analysis carried out by KOSMIN and GRIZZARD and by KOSMIN and LEVY established a factual picture of London Jewry firmly based in social scientific research. The Board of Deputies of British Jews and the Institute for Jewish Policy Research regularly produce demographic and general research on the changing patterns of London Jewry.

BROOK has written a journalistic account of Anglo-Jewry and its institutions that is critical, iconoclastic, and sharply observant. Unusually for a book on this subject, it has been reviewed widely in the national press in Britain and gone into a second edition. ALDERMAN (1983 and 1989) examines contemporary Jewish policy and national issues. His analysis of Jewish voting patterns is particularly interesting and suggests that the central issue for London Jews, as for non-Jews, is their socioeconomic situation rather than any specific Jewish agenda. He does, however, note that in Margaret Thatcher's heavily Jewish constituency of Finchley, the Jewish vote for the Conservatives ought to have been higher, and he sees here a possible reflection of disagreement with her social and foreign policies. Even so, Alderman concludes that any connections with the radicalism of the days of Jewish anarchism and domination of the London region of the Communist Party are long gone.

COLIN SHINDLER

Lubavitch see Habad

Luria, Isaac 1534–1572

Charismatic Palestinian pioneer of messianic Kabbalah

Fine, Lawrence, "Maggidic Revelation in the Teachings of Isaac Luria," in Mystics, Philosophers, and Politicians: Essays in Jewish Intellectual History in Honor of Alexander Altmann (Duke Monographs in Medieval and Renaissance Studies, no. 5), edited by Jehuda Reinharz, Daniel Swetschinski, and Kalman Bland, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1982

Fine, Lawrence, Safed Spirituality: Rules of Mystical Piety, the Beginning of Wisdom (The Classics of Western Spirituality), Ramsey, New Jersey: Paulist Press, 1984

Fine, Lawrence, "The Contemplative Practice of Yihudim," in Jewish Spirituality: From the Sixteenth-Century Revival to the Present (World Spirituality, vol. 14), edited by Arthur Green, New York: Crossroad, 1987; London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1988

Jacobs, Louis (editor and translator), The Palm Tree of Deborah [Tomer Devorah by Moses ben Jacob Cordovero], London: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1960; New York: Sepher-Hermon, 1981

Schechter, Solomon, "Safed in the Sixteenth Century," in his Studies in Judaism, vol. 2, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1908

Scholem, Gershom, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (Hilda Strouk Lectures), New York: Schocken, 1941; 3rd edition, New York; Schocken, 1954; London: Thames and Hudson, 1955; with new foreword by Robert Alter, New York; Schocken, 1995

Isaac Luria, the Ari (acronym for Adonenu ["Our Master"] Rabbi Isaac), was the most influential Jewish mystic of the Renaissance and modern times. His system of Kabbalah took on the stature of a revealed religion for his followers, as they believed it to have originated with a direct communication from the prophet Elijah. Despite its quiet beginnings, within 30 years Luria's teaching had become central among the mystics of the land of Israel, and within 50 years it was to become the single most powerful force in Kabbalah. Luria's life story, particularly as presented in such enthusiastic works as Shivhei ha-Ari and Toledot ha-Ari, provided a legendary context for his theoretical teachings. (Limited selections from Shivhei ha-Ari have been published in English as Tales in Praise of the Ari, translated by Aaron and Jenny Klein, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1970.) A cult of personality, modeled on the Zohar's veneration of Simeon bar Yohai, was carried over into Luria's circle and from there to the movements that accompanied the messianism of Shabbetai Tsevi and the sages of Polish Hasidism. Evident in Luria's writings is a growing sense of psychological dread. SCHOLEM interprets this sense of catastrophe and dread as a response to the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492. According to him, Luria's worldview was meant as nothing less than "a mystical interpretation of Exile and redemption, or even as a great myth of Exile. Its substance reflects the deepest religious feelings of the Jews of that age." Lurianic speculative literature took shape over several generations in the writings of a number of authors and editors led by Hayim Vital. Vital's presentations of the Lurianic system were variously combined and successively revised to make up what is commonly referred to as Kitvei ha-Ari, the Lurianic canon. During the first 200 years after Luria's death, only two compositions from the canon were formally published, while hundreds of manuscripts circulated, transmitting teachings identified as his in dozens of formats. Many of the Lurianic texts were not available in print until the 19th century. This resulted in the circulation of many secondary and tertiary recensions and summaries of the Lurianic doctrine.

For Western readers, the first sympathetic exposition of Luria's teaching and of the Safed renaissance in general was SCHECHTER's essay. This work, like much of Schechter's literary production, is semi-apologetic but portrays the energy and pathos of the Safed experience in ways that would be influential for later scholars.

Modern studies of Luria have been dominated by the research of Yosef Avivi, Ronit Meroz, and Lawrence Fine. Avivi and Meroz have both produced taxonomic analyses of the Lurianic canon, building on the foundation of Scholem's pioneering research, and especially his bibliographical work in which he attempts to differentiate true and false attributions to Luria. Unfortunately, the work of these two Israeli scholars has not yet been translated into English. Lawrence Fine takes a phenomenological approach, concerning himself with Luria's mystical practices. Through the practice of these mystical kavvanot, or "intentions," the mystic took an active role in bringing together the shattered metaphysical superstructure, mending the "broken vessels." In FINE (1987) and FINE (1982), the author discusses another way that Lurianic doctrine influenced the methodologies for the shamanistic, visionary practices that some of the kabbalists who gravitated to Safed brought with them from the diaspora.

It remains a matter of debate whether the most distinguished figure of the Safed renaissance was Isaac Luria or the great teacher whose reputation he eclipsed, Moses Cordovero. Cordovero synthesized a unified approach to the various traditions that comprised the legacy of the medieval Kabbalah, drawing upon the Zohar, the teachings of Abraham Abulafia and other strands, and combining them into a vast baroque system. Cordovero has been largely inaccessible in English writings, and a translation of the groundbreaking Hebrew studies of his thought by Bracha Sack is particularly to be desired. Still, a good sense of Cordovero and the milieu he fostered in the Galilee, out of which the dynamic personality of the Ari emerged, can be garnered from JACOBS and from FINE (1984). Jacobs presents a lucid translation of Cordovero's manual of "kabbalistic ethics," prefaced by an extended and thorough introduction that sets out the kabbalistic preconceptions implicit in this statement of moral theology. Fine's accessible and illuminating introduction to the ethos of Safed contextualizes and annotates selected supererogatory rituals fostered by Abraham Galante, Abraham Berukhim, and Joseph Karo, as well as Cordovero and Luria. The book also features a popular period abridgement of Elijah de Vidas's enormously influential Beginning of Wisdom, a visceral summons to the good life pietistically construed.

Luzzatto, Moses Hayyim 1707–1746

Italian-born kabbalist, moralist, poet, and playwright, died in Acre

Bindman, Yirmeyahu, Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto: His Life and Works, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1995

Carlebach, Elisheva, "Redemption and Persecution in the Eyes of Moses Hayyim Luzzatto and His Circle," Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, 54, 1987

Gallant, Batya, "The Alleged Sabbateanism of Rabbi Moshe Hayyim Luzzatto," Tradition, 22, 1986

Ginzburg, Simon, The Life and Works of Moses Hayyim Luzzatto, Founder of Modern Hebrew Literature, Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1931

Roth, Cecil, The History of the Jews of Italy, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1946; Westmead: Gregg, 1969

Moses Hayyim Luzzatto was the preeminent kabbalist and Hebrew poet of the 18th century. English-language scholarship on him includes three general works (Roth, Ginzburg, and Bindman) that offer a biographical and bibliographical description and two others (Carlebach and Gallant) that deal with specific aspects of his life and work.

ROTH presents, in very condensed form, a survey of Italian Jewish history, but he does succeed in giving the reader a fair amount of basic information about Luzzatto and his times. Roth claims that "Luzzatto is one of the most important names in Jewish literature and links the poetical tradition of the Middle Ages with that of today." The book presents briskly the figure of Luzzatto, his writings, and his studies in Kabbalah, as well as his esoteric self-image as Messiah, which caused a major dispute within the Jewish community and compelled him to flee Padua.

GINZBURG's book is substantially a biography of Luzzatto and a survey of his writings. The book is divided into two parts. The first section deals with the life of Luzzatto, and the second concerns his works and is divided into three areas: the kabbalistic and rabbinic field, the dramas and the poems in terms of their content, and questions of literary style and meter. In particular, Ginzburg describes the polemical stories that arose in Padua about Luzzatto, his messianism, his mystical revelations, and his ensuing persecution. In his literary analysis, Ginzburg compares Luzzatto's theatrical works with those of the non-Jewish writers of the Italian Baroque. Naturally, Ginzburg's work does not reflect subsequent trends in literary criticism, and it is also somewhat dated by his unfamiliarity with the many dramas by Jewish authors published from manuscript only in recent years, which nevertheless exercised considerable influence on the work of Luzzatto.

BINDMAN's book is not intended to be a scientific study. It does not include a bibliography or footnotes and is essentially just a popular biography of Luzzatto. It consists of very brief chapters dealing with the various aspects of Luzzatto's life and work. The book's approach is a little superficial, although it does offer a general survey of the subject for non-specialist readers. Naturally, one should not look for a deep analysis of Luzzatto's writings in this work, but in spite of that, the book does present the distinctive religious experience of Luzzatto. At the end there is a selection of brief quotations from Luzzatto's writings to illustrate, according to Bindman, "the range of key points in the subject matter."

GALLANT's brief article studies substantially the accusation of Sabbatianism that the rabbis of Venice leveled against Luzzatto. Gallant summarizes Luzzatto's attitude to Sabbatianism and Tishbi's opinion that Luzzatto's teacher, Rabbi Isaiah Bassan himself, brought these charges of Sabbatianism against him. In conclusion, Gallant analyzes and critiques Tishbi's thesis. This study enlightens a central aspect of Luzzatto's thought and reviews the most important secondary literature on the subject.

CARLEBACH analyzes some of the philosophical conceptions that emerge from Luzzatto's literary endeavors. According to Carlebach, Luzzatto inhabited a richly imaginative inner spiritual world, and he believed himself chosen for a special destiny. For this mission he took steps to prepare himself, registering his experiences in a diary. In Carlebach's opinion, these mystical experiences influenced Luzzatto's other writings. In this important article, Carlebach also surveys other texts that affected Luzzatto's imagination, and she gives a sharply defined picture of Luzzatto's mystical thought.

YAAKOV A. LATTES

Luzzatto, Samuele Davide 1800–1865

Italian biblical commentator, pioneer of Wissenschaft, and theologian

Baron, Salo W., "The Revolution of 1848 and Jewish Scholarship," Proceedings of The American Academy for Jewish Research, 18, 1949

Gopin, Marc, "The Religious Ethics of Samuel David Luzzatto," Ph.D. diss., Brandeis University, 1993

Harris, Monford, "The Theologico-Historical Thinking of Samuel Luzzatto," Jewish Quarterly Review, 52, 1962

Margolies, Morris B., Samuel David Luzzatto, Traditionalist Scholar, New York: Ktav, 1979

Morais, Sabato, Italian Hebrew Literature, Julius H. Greenstone, editor, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1926

Rosenbloom, Noah, Luzzatto's Ethico-Psychological Interpretation of Judaism: A Study in the Religious Philosophy of Samuel David Luzzatto (Studies in Torah Judaism, 7), New York: Yeshiva University Department of Special Publications, 1965

Roth, Cecil, The History of the Jews of Italy, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1946; Westmead: Gregg, 1969

Slymovics, Peter, "Romantic and Jewish Orthodox Influences in the Political Philosophy of S.D. Luzzatto," Italia, 4, 1985

Theologian, biblical scholar, grammarian, liturgiologist, poet, and charismatic pedagogue, Samuele Davide Luzzatto is the defining thinker of modern (i.e., post-Emancipation) Italian

Judaism. The various studies on Luzzatto have treated his literary production (Slymovics), his thought (Gopin and Harris), and his historical context (Baron), while other writers have taken a more biographical approach.

ROTH's book is a general survey of Italian Jewish history, and therefore it supplies only very basic information about Luzzatto. Roth does, however, describe the intellectual activity of Luzzatto and his milieu in Italy as well as abroad. For this reason, his book is a fundamental work for the comprehension of this corner of history, even if it has been superseded in its historiographic approach by newer studies. It is of very limited value for scientific research because it does not note its sources, but it is a good and stimulating read nonetheless.

MORAIS describes the Jewish cultural context of the period as well as Luzzatto's family background. The work covers the mentality of the time and the intellectual activity of Luzzatto in defending the Jewish religion from criticism and in perpetuating and spreading the knowledge of sacred literature. Morais includes an account of Luzzatto's efforts to cultivate scholars at the Rabbinical College in Padua and a description of his various works.

MARGOLIES's study is perhaps the most detailed and comprehensive biography of Luzzatto. It discusses the different aspects of Luzzatto's life: his background and his influences, his religious inner world, his relationship with his contemporaries, and his poetry. Furthermore, it analyzes Luzzatto's exegesis, thought, and linguistic studies. In particular, this work provides an interesting description of Luzzatto's intellectual and personal commitments, such as his approach to the Bible based on linguistics and philology, and also the scholarly activity reflected in his enormous correspondence with the most eminent minds of the period. One chapter is dedicated to the Italian Hebrew literature that inspired Luzzatto's own poetry and to the estimation of his poetry by his contemporaries.

ROSENBLOOM's book analyzes a specific aspect of Luzzatto's thought: his efforts to reconcile traditional Judaism with the rationalist philosophy of the 19th century and thus to interpret it in light of his post-Enlightenment age. Rosenbloom argues that Luzzatto's purpose was to demonstrate that the Torah can be reconciled with the categories of reason and principles of logic. In fact, Luzzatto interpreted Jewish tradition as an ethical and ethnic culture, and he published a number of books that expounded a view of Judaism that emphasized particularly its ethical rather than speculative aspect.

GOPIN discusses the religious philosophy of Judaism as developed by Luzzatto. In his opinion, the Jewish thought of Luzzatto was unique in the context of the period because he based his analysis on moral sense theory, similar to the approach to ethics of Hume, Rousseau, and other European thinkers. This work studies the different editions of Luzzatto's autobiography, the collections of his Italian and Hebrew letters, and other writings. Its aim is to demonstrate the interaction of Luzzatto's personal history and the development of his ethical thought, as well as the relationship between Luzzatto and rabbinic Judaism. Gopin concludes that Luzzatto incorporated rabbinic Judaism into his ethics, although he evaluated the rabbis critically in the light of personal sentiment, in particular toward non-Jews.

BARON's article is an important contribution to understanding Luzzatto's historical and social background. It analyzes the influence on Jewish scholars of revolutionary ideas and movements at the beginning of the 19th century and also their participation in the revolutions of 1848. He considers the Jewish scholars who participated in the struggle for Jewish emancipation, notably Luzzatto, and who contributed immense activity and vast correspondence to furthering the cause. This article therefore takes a wide perspective on the political context in which Jewish intellectuals worked.

SLYMOVICS's article is a philosophical analysis of Luzzatto's thought. Its purpose is to examine the conception of Judaism as it emerged in his writings and the different cultural trends that influenced him. Through comparison of the thought of Luzzatto with that of Rousseau, Slymovics demonstrates the similarities of their religious and social conceptions. In Slymovics's opinion, both Luzzatto and Rousseau were Enlightenment figures who severely criticized the rationalistic tendency of their day. He also analyzes their shared concept of law and politics as rooted in morality, as well as their view of history. This article is learned and technical, and as such will be mainly of interest to scholars of Jewish philosophy.

HARRIS's work analyzes Luzzatto's thought and his intellectual achievements to reveal a "coherent approach to historical scholarship and to Jewish tradition." Harris notes the emphasis Luzzatto placed on the distinction between Greek and Jewish mentalities. He also illuminates Luzzatto's inner world as a theologian and the grounds for his strenuous opposition to Kabbalah in general and his debunking of the Zohar in particular. In spite of this antimystical tendency, in Harris's opinion Luzzatto had great respect for Christianity and saw a need for Jewish-Christian dialogue.

This page intentionally left blank

M

Magic and Superstition

- Ben-Ami, Issachar, Saint Veneration among the Jews in Morocco, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1998
- Grözinger, Karl Erich and Joseph Dan (editors), Mysticism, Magic, and Kabbalah in Ashkenazi Judaism: International Symposium Held in Frankfurt a.M. 1991, New York: de Gruyter, 1995
- Idel, Moshe, Hasidism: Between Ecstasy and Magic, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995
- Nigal, Gedalyah, Magic, Mysticism, and Hasidism: The Supernatural in Jewish Thought, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1994
- Patai, Raphael, The Jewish Alchemists: A History and Source Book, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994
- Ruderman, David B., Kabbalah, Magic, and Science: The Cultural Universe of a Sixteenth-Century Jewish Physician, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1988
- Seidel, Jonathan Lee, "Studies in Ancient Jewish Magic," Ph.D. diss., University of California at Berkeley, 1996
- Sharot, Stephen, Messianism, Mysticism, and Magic: A Sociological Analysis of Jewish Religious Movements, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1982
- Sperber, Daniel, Magic and Folklore in Rabbinic Literature, Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1994
- Swartz, Michael D., Scholastic Magic: Ritual and Revelation in Early Jewish Mysticism, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1996
- Trachtenberg, Joshua, Jewish Magic and Superstition: A Study in Folk Religion, New York: Behrman's Jewish Book House, 1939

Evidence of the use of magic is abundant in the Jewish literature of late antiquity and the Middle Ages, even though there is much confusion as to what the word magic means, and scholars debate how to apply the term within the realm of religion. Many issues regarding the significance of magic and superstition for Judaism remain unsettled, for numerous ancient sources containing relevant texts written in Hebrew, Aramaic, and other languages remain in manuscript and have not been studied or translated.

Much of what is known about antique Jewish magic stems from the Hekhalot ("Chambers of Heaven") literature. The focus of Hekhalot is ritual—it is a literature of Jewish magic and phenomenology. Many theories abound regarding the historical origin of the Hekhalot literature, and the great authority Gershom Scholem considered it to be vital to the evolution of Jewish mysticism. One text in this literature, the Sar-Torah, depicts an angel who transformed ancient conjurers into learned rabbis. Rabbis of the time were responsible for memorizing incantations for use in many areas, such as health, love, prosperity, childbearing, and improvement of memory. Superstitious features of this literature include belief in the rabbis' ability to bring the dead back to life and in their power to battle evil. Conjuring the name of God, uttering magic spells, and calling angels for divine intervention were all conceived as part of the rabbi's job description.

It is not impossible that the themes of the Hekhalot literature and the attendant rituals may help explain why Jews were accused of magic and dark deeds for many centuries. The growing segregation of Jews only reinforced public opinion against them, and accusations of sorcery, ritual murder, magic, and consorting with demons were commonplace—biblical and talmudic injunctions notwithstanding.

BEN-AMI's exhaustive work on modern Jewish saint worship in Morocco is the culmination of 10 years of research and includes a list of 656 saints, 25 of whom are women. Ben-Ami does not present a historical study of saint veneration; instead he compiles and interprets the relevant folklore. He has divided his work into five categories: folktales, descriptions of miracles, dreams, descriptions of experiences while paying homage to saints, and related traditions. Magic in ceremonies and rituals and notably in the exorcism of evil spirits is well represented in this book, and the author describes the perception that magic and superstition offered the Jews essential protection against an evil environment comprising a fundamentally hostile Islamic majority. Visits to saints' tombs offered Moroccan Jews "a heightened sense of Jewish unity and identity," and Ben-Ami argues that "The powerless minority seeking security found a highly effective protective mechanism in the countless miracle tales of punishments inflicted on Muslims who harmed Jews or Jewish saints." The author describes Moroccan Jews' beliefs regarding saintly powers, such as the abilities of saints to cure sickness, converse with plants and animals, and tame wild beasts. He also includes numerous photographs of saints' tombs and a glossary that will be helpful to those uninitiated in Jewish culture. The reader will find both French and English sources in the bibliography.

GRÖZINGER has compiled a collection of essays from a conference on mysticism, magic, and Kabbalah in Ashkenazi Judaism that took place in Frankfurt in 1991. Many of the essays in this volume deal with medieval Jewish mysticism in Germany and surrounding areas of central Europe. This work is especially valuable because most scholarship has concentrated on mysticism in southern Europe. The history of Kabbalah in Germany is addressed as are more sectarian manifestations of mysticism such as Sabbatianism. Grözinger's own essay, "Between Magic and Religion: Ashkenazic Hasidic Piety," evaluates the relationship between magic and religion, using the talmudic and Hekhalot literature, along with later medieval sources, to illustrate intimate links between the two realms. Most essays are in English, with a few articles written in German interspersed throughout the volume. Grözinger also offers studies of individuals as prominent as Judah Loew ben Bezalel and as obscure as Meyer Heinrich Hirsch Landauer.

IDEL seeks to define the roles of magic and mystical practice in Hasidism. He attempts to answer several questions concerning Hasidism by looking at clues in earlier forms of Jewish literature. He argues that the zaddikim or rebbes did not seek ecstasy as their ultimate goal, but they did endeavor to bring divine power into their midst to benefit the community, and religious ecstasy was widely perceived as the precondition for wonder-working. Idel introduces the reader to several models of Hasidism and devotes one chapter to the mystico-magical model. In chapter four, titled "Mystical and Magical Prayer in Hasidism," Idel presents a thorough explanation of the Lurianic method of prayer, or kavannot. Appendixes offer the reader further assistance in understanding aspects of Kabbalah, Lurianic theosophy, and magical power. A rich bibliography will prove invaluable for the scholar seeking further insight into the role of magic and superstition in Hasidism.

NIGAL begins his work with the first of the hasidic storytellers, the Ba'al Shem Tov, considered a worker of wonders who conjured up miracles to heal the sick and to bless couples with fertility. The background of the Ba'al Shem's ministry is discussed, as well as the use of amulets used by the Ba'al Shem himself. The second chapter discusses the concept of kefitsat ha-derekh, a kind of magical time travel that enabled adepts to shorten the duration of a journey. Other areas explored within the work are reincarnation, exorcism, demons, and magic formulae. Nigal recounts numerous traditional stories to exemplify the use of magic and superstition, interpreting them from a historical and sociological perspective with notable clarity.

Jews were widely perceived as a community of alchemists in the Middle Ages and early modernity, largely as a function of their great repute in the sciences of the time, specifically medicine and astrology. PATAI introduces the reader to the various definitions of alchemy, from its consideration as a legitimate, albeit misdirected, attempt to turn base metals into gold to the belief that it could transform the imperfect human soul into a "more perfect spiritual entity." Two basic versions of alchemy are identified: alchemy as science and alchemy as magic. Patai explains the work of the Jewish alchemists, and he notes ironically that while Kabbalah and Hasidism enjoyed a rehabilitation in the last half of the 20th century, alchemy was not so fortunate, perhaps because it demands too much specialized training. Earlier scholars had been unable to find proofs of Jewish alchemical activity prior to the Renaissance in Jewish or European literature, but Patai claims to have found such evidence. This material is arranged in chronological order, from biblical, Hellenistic, and talmudic evidence through the 19th century. Patai, the pioneering polymath of Jewish studies in the late 20th century, has rendered a signal service by locating and assembling references to alchemy and its Jewish connection in European as well as in Jewish literature. A very useful alchemical vocabulary follows the text, and illustrations are provided throughout the work.

RUDERMAN considers relationships among science, magic, and Judaism in 16th-century Europe. The study centers on the world of Abraham ben Hananiah Yagel (1553–c.1623), a Jewish magician, kabbalist, and physician, and the author investigates how magic figured in the medicine of the time and considers how Yagel's own religious beliefs affected his scientific research. Ruderman states,

As a religious thinker, he [Yagel] sought to reshape Jewish culture by underscoring the religious value of comprehending the natural world, by reformulating kabbalistic tradition in the language of scientific discourse so as to promote it as the highest form of human knowledge, and by pushing Jewish religious sensibilities to their limits in advocating the legitimate role of the magical arts as the ultimate expression of human creativity in Judaism.

Ruderman analyzes Yagel's work Ya'ar ha-Levanon, in which Yagel encourages his readers to use magic for human benefit and to unlock the secrets of the divine body. Ruderman's elucidation of the role of magic in past medical practice provides an interesting insight into the background and development of modern medicine.

SEIDEL's ambitious dissertation examines "the historical development of the conceptualization of Jewish magic," focusing on the word magic and on magic as a field. He argues that scholars have traditionally scoffed at the possibility that magic was widely used in early Judaism because "early evidence was indeed against" this supposition. Many Jewish Wissenschaft scholars downplayed magic's role in Judaism because they believed that the presence of magic was indicative of degeneracy. Seidel rejects such claims, as well as the theory that magic is merely a vestige of more primitive times. He contextualizes his research by investigating the history of the discourse about magic, studies the term magic in ancient Near Eastern contexts, and emphasizes the social role of magic in biblical, Greco-Roman, and rabbinic contexts.

SHAROT offers the reader some interesting historical background on magical religion in the established Jewish community and various millenarian movements in the diaspora, Sabbatianism, and Hasidism. The theurgic orientation of the millenarian movements is noted, manifested, for example, in their elaborate after-meal liturgies. Sharot's concluding chapter, a summary of the major arguments of the work, is a tour de force.

TRACHTENBERG's work remains the definitive effort to clarify aspects of magic and superstition and their relationship to Judaism. Practitioners of Judaism have often been accused of practicing sorcery in virtue of the ritualistic character of the religion. Even the task of house-cleaning for Passover was sometimes perceived by non-Jews as strange and therefore magical. By way of distinction, Trachtenberg defines the bona fide Jewish magician as "a scholar by vocation, a practitioner of the mystical-magical arts by avocation." The power of the "the word" and the role of evil and demons, numerology, dreams, nature, and medicine are clearly discussed. The book provides a marvelous overview of the interconnected roles that magic, superstition, and religion play. The reader is well-advised to consult this general survey of research into magic and its role in Judaism before embarking on more specialized studies.

SPERBER's study investigates the place of magic in the midrashic and talmudic literature. Sperber divides his work into five areas: folklore, magic, historical allusions, midrashic texts, and specifically Palestinian rabbinical texts. Areas of discussion include Greek magical terms, amulets, incantations, and fantastic creatures. A useful index of rabbinic sources is appended.

SWARTZ provides an estimable guide to the concepts and rituals embedded in the Hekhalot literature. He analyzes the Sar-Torah and other texts and argues for its continuity with the mysticism of the early talmudic sages. This extensive study explores the forgotten rituals of ancient Jewish mysticism and themes that relate to memory and the role of magic. Swartz seeks to define the patterns of the Sar-Torah narratives, and he provides copious translations in which rituals and prescriptions for purification are well represented. Also very helpful to the reader are Swartz's detailed annotations and thorough bibliography.

CYNTHIA A. KLÍMA

Mahzor see Liturgy, History of; Liturgy, Reform

Maimonidean Controversy

Chavel, Charles B., Ramban: His Life and Teachings, New York: Feldheim, 1960

Dienstag, Jacob I., Eschatology in Maimonidean Thought: Messianism, Resurrection, and the World to Come: Selected Studies, with an Introduction and a Bibliography, New York: Ktav, 1983

Sarachek, Joseph, Faith and Reason: The Conflict over the Rationalism of Maimonides, Williamsport, Pennsylvania: Bayard, 1935

Septimus, Bernard, Hispano-Jewish Culture in Transition: The Career and Controversies of Ramah (Harvard Judaica Monographs, 4), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982

Shrock, Abe Tobie, Rabbi Jonah ben Abraham of Gerona: His Life and Ethical Works, London: Goldston, 1948

Silver, Daniel Jeremy, Maimonidean Criticism and the Maimonidean Controversy, 1180–1240, Leiden: Brill, 1965

Talmage, Frank, David Kimhi: The Man and the Commentaries (Harvard Judaica Monographs, 1), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1975

Twersky, Isadore, Rabad of Posquières: A Twelfth-Century Talmudist, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1962; revised edition, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1980

The Maimonidean Controversy refers to several related episodes through most of the 13th century, beginning during the lifetime of Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides) and extending for about a century after his death—some of them having little or nothing to do directly with Maimonides. It includes arguments over halakhic authority, the comprehensive claims of the Mishneh Torah, the doctrine of resurrection, and the appropriate place of philosophy in Jewish discourse. The dramatic peak of the controversy was the burning of Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed in 1232. Daniel Jeremy Silver observes that Maimonides' opponents praised him as much as his supporters did, and the controversy ultimately inscribed Maimonides' prestige "indelibly in the ledgers of Jewish literature."

Sarachek and Silver have produced the only book-length studies of the controversy. Other volumes reviewed here are primarily studies of some of the key players (apart from Maimonides himself). Although not reviewed here, consideration should also be given to works of general Jewish history by Yitzhak Baer, Heinrich Graetz, and Julius Guttmann.

SARACHEK's pioneering effort to summarize events on the basis of available sources sets the conflict against the background of an "age of intellectual expansion" for Islam, Christianity, and Judaism. It was triggered in part by the fall of Constantinople to the crusaders in 1204 (the year of Maimonides' death) and a resultant availability of the works of Aristotle. While far less polemical than earlier historians (such as Graetz), Sarachek still has a tendency to view the Maimonidean camp as enlightened and progressive and its critics as reactionary and retrograde. Rabbi Abraham ben David of Posquières (known as Rabad), for example, is rendered as a one-dimensional opponent, a characterization later contested by Isadore Twersky. Sarachek accepts the traditional sequence of events leading to the burning of Maimonides' works, arguing that the Moreh and the Sefer ha-Madda were denounced to Catholic Church authorities by "the strict traditionalists," but he dissents from earlier accounts that name Rabbi Solomon ben Abraham of Montpellier as the direct instigator.

SILVER goes further: clearly Solomon ben Abraham, David ben Saul, and Jonah Gerondi were active and public in their opposition to philosophical trends represented by Maimonides. "There is, however, every reason to doubt their being the actual agents of denunciation," writes Silver. He focuses on a narrower period of the controversy. Whereas Sarachek sets the dispute against the historical background of “intellectual expansion,” Silver hypothesizes that the looming danger of the newly militant church was the primary cause of the dispute’s intensity. The church directly involved itself in Jewish affairs, with disputations, missionizing, and critiques of the Talmud by converts to Christianity. In more normal times, new questions would have been assimilated and answered. In these conditions of fear, however, philosophy and its attendant questioning became suspect: “Today’s youthful questioner might be tomorrow’s convert and . . . informer.”

Silver therefore posits a group of “restless and rootless anonymous men” as the source of the Maimonidean Controversy. Few of them had actually read the Moreh, but they were happy to believe that it justified their abandonment of Jewish observance. These anonymous intellectuals had wealth and connections but were alienated from Jewish tradition. According to Silver, “It is always dangerous for a people when an alienated intelligentsia develops alongside an equally intelligent authoritative leadership with whom it can hardly communicate.” Further, given that the church was newly militant and missionary, this group of rootless cosmopolitans seemed to expose the community to the risk of widespread apostasy. This is why “men of faith” set themselves to prevent “defection and defamation.”

DIENSTAG assembles material that sheds light on one of the major issues that engaged some of the disputants: eschatology. Especially useful are the brief biographical sketches of some of the principals, along with bibliographical notes, contained in the introduction.

Nahmanides was an important participant in one phase of the controversy, and CHAVEL, who has devoted much work to Nahmanides, provides a helpful, if eulogistic, survey of the basic biographical facts. The second half of the book synthesizes Nahmanides’ views on various aspects of Jewish teaching. Similar in structure is the work of SHROCK on R. Jonah Gerondi, another major combatant.

The works of Twersky, Septimus, and Talmage do not differ significantly on the general outline of events, but they offer striking detail about several of the principals and render the cultural context with much richer complexity. TWERSKY’s brilliant study of Rabad offers a remarkable view not only of its central subject, but also of the broader background of 12th-century talmudic culture. Clarifying what most talmudists of that period were trying to accomplish, Twersky brings into vivid relief the revolutionary achievement of Maimonides in the Mishneh Torah.

While sharply critical of Maimonides for failing to cite sources, even accusing him of having “an overbearing spirit,” Rabad nevertheless holds Maimonides’ achievement in high regard. Rabad initiated the hassagot literature, glosses now scattered throughout printed editions of the Mishneh Torah, which are “both criticism and commentary, dissent and elaboration, stricture and supplement.” Twersky’s careful analysis emphasizes that, contrary to a widespread perception of Rabad as solely a critic of Maimonides, he was often eager to support Maimonides’ view when he found it convincing.

Rabad’s critique of the Mishneh Torah certainly lent support to opponents of Maimonides by raising questions about Maimonides’ halakhic mastery. Yet it seems more likely that Rabad’s own motivations had more to do with his sense of the appropriate direction of halakhic research, his “critico-conceptual approach” to Talmud. Above all, Rabad wished to prevent the stagnation that might overtake talmudic study if the Mishneh Torah became established as authoritative. This is in agreement with Silver’s view that Rabad’s primary concern was “the integrity of his halachic world,” and that while Rabad is an important critic of Maimonides, he certainly did not start the controversy.

Rabbi David Kimhi (Radak) and Rabbi Meir ben Todros ha-Levi Abulafia (Ramah) were partisans on opposite sides of the conflict. TALMAGE bases much of his study on extensive readings of Radak’s biblical commentaries, combing this material for useful biographical insights. According to SEPTIMUS, the vehemence of the controversy in the 1230s reflects a shift in the cultural arena. Earlier arguments over philosophical rationalism had been confined to Judeo-Arabic culture. Now Spain was looking toward Europe and so was setting up the first direct engagement between Franco-German talmudic Jewry and Spanish philosophical rationalism. Septimus also detects elements of “sociocommunal struggle” and takes issue with Gershom Scholem’s contention that the antirationalists were closely connected with the Kabbalah.

LAURENCE L. EDWARDS

See also Moses ben Maimon

Maimonides see Moses ben Maimon

Maimonides Family

Fenton, Paul (editor and translator), The Treatise of the Pool/Al-Maqāla al-Ḥawḍiyya, London: Octagon, 1981

Fenton, Paul, “The Literary Legacy of David ben Joshua, Last of the Maimonidean Negidim,” Jewish Quarterly Review, 75, 1984

Goitein, S.D., A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1967–1988

Mann, Jacob, Texts and Studies in Jewish History and Literature, 2 vols., Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1931–1935

Rosenblatt, Samuel (editor and translator), The High Ways to Perfection of Abraham Maimonides (Columbia University Oriental Studies, vol. 27), New York: Columbia University Press, 1927

Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides, 1135 or 1138–1204?) never accepted the formal title of “Nagid” as head of the Jewish community of Egypt, but he and his descendants served in this capacity until the late 14th century. The preservation of personal letters, literary works, and historical traditions by and about members of the Maimonides family allows a unique glimpse of the intellectual life, social and family relations, and communal roles of Maimonides himself, his father, his brother, his in-laws, and his descendants. His father, Maimon “the Judge,” was himself the author of an important work, the Letter of Consolation. Moses’ son Abraham (1186–1237) served as Nagid most of his adult life; Abraham’s son David (1222–1300) succeeded his father as Nagid. Although Moses ben Maimon was perhaps the most prominent exponent of the rationalist-philosophical trend within Judaism, his son and some of his descendants were more closely associated with mystical tendencies, especially with Jewish Sufi-style mysticism. Abraham is remembered not only for championing and defending his father’s works but also for his attempts to reform the prayer service and for his magnum opus, the Kifāyat al-‘Abidin (discussed below), a manual for following the mystic path. His son Obadiah (1228–1265), David’s younger brother, is also known for his mystical work. The last of Maimonides’ descendants to serve as Nagid were Joshua (1309–1355) and his son David (1335–1415), who apparently served until the 1370s and also wrote on mystical topics. Although much is known about the Maimonidean dynasty, relatively little has been written in English, and little of that in book form. Several items selected here are English-language introductions to editions of works by Maimonides’ descendants.

GOITEIN had a lifelong fascination with Abraham Maimonides. He translated Abraham’s responsa from Arabic into Hebrew, published major articles on his work, and saw Abraham—more than his father—as the archetypal man of medieval Jewish civilization represented in the Genizah materials. There is material on Maimonides’ family relationships in volume two of Goitein’s Mediterranean Society and elsewhere in this important work. But, most importantly, the final sections of Goitein’s fifth volume, delivered to the printer just before he died, summarize his lifework on Abraham and refer to every important document and study of Abraham that he published. Here and elsewhere, Goitein discusses Abraham’s pietism (although he was not interested in a philosophical analysis), his activism and leadership within the pietist movement, and his constant involvement in community affairs, including attention to minute administrative details, which presumably made it difficult for him to complete his works. Goitein saw the focus of his Mediterranean Society as continuing only to the rise of the Mamluk regime; in consequence, there is much about Moses ben Maimon and his son Abraham but little on subsequent members of the family.

MANN’s work on Genizah material revolutionized understanding of geonic times, Karaism, and medieval Egyptian Jewry. His classic Texts and Studies includes references to Maimonides family members and descendants throughout the two-volume collection. Among its pearls is a short narrative on “The Egyptian Negidim of Maimonides’ Family,” which is, despite its brevity, still among the most substantive histories of the family in English. Readers should be aware, however, that research after Mann’s time has filled in some of the missing data and has identified some works that were unknown to Mann.

ROSENBLATT edited and translated into English the ninth and final surviving section of Abraham Maimuni’s Kifāyat al-‘Abidin, naming it The Highways to Perfection. Maimuni also wrote works defending his father and a commentary on the Bible that he completed only as far as the middle of Exodus. Other portions of the Kifāyat al-‘Abidin have come to light since Rosenblatt’s edition. Maimuni describes traits necessary to achieve perfect moral character, such as faith in God, asceticism, and prayer. Maimuni lauds the Sufi way of life and, as Rosenblatt points out, makes scriptural arguments to justify his views that the Sufis merely continued the ancient ways of the prophets, which had been lost within the Jewish community. The goal is described as wuṣūl, which Rosenblatt usually translates as “union” with God; this was the subject of the tenth and concluding section of Maimuni’s work, which did not survive.

FENTON’s (1981) introduction gives a detailed history of the Egyptian pietist movement, providing information on some of the individuals who moved through Egypt, family relations within the Egyptian hasidim, and a resumé of the views and practices of the group. Fenton describes how Obadyah quotes liberally from his father’s and grandfather’s works, such as the Mishneh Torah, the Commentary on Mishnah Avot, and the Kifāyat al-‘Abidin. Like his grandfather, he seeks a goal of perfecting the intellect’s perception of Reason and claims that his treatise is written in such a way as to conceal some of its most important insights—except from those initiates who study the work carefully. Yet, as Fenton notes, the work is much more practically oriented than Moses ben Maimon’s Guide of the Perplexed. Obadyah stresses the need to shun corporeal necessities, practice solitude, marry late, and be firmly grounded in the exoteric law before seeking to “enter Paradise” by pursuing the mystic path to gain the “favor of Reason.”

FENTON’s (1984) article on David ben Joshua includes some biographical narrative but is largely bibliographical; it nevertheless provides English readers with a fair idea of the scope of David’s oeuvre and the nature of his thought. In this article, Fenton sets forth his reason for identifying David ben Joshua as the author of the Murshid ilā al-tafarrud (Guide to Detachment), a Jewish Sufi-style work first described by Franz Rosenthal. (Fenton includes a more substantial biographical narrative and description of the contents of the Murshid, an ethical manual on the stations needed to reach the exalted plane of hasidut, in the Hebrew introduction to his Hebrew translation of this work.) In this article, Fenton also describes at some length David’s most outstanding composition, Tajrid al-haqā ‘iq al-nazariyya (Abstract of Speculative Truth), and, in briefer fashion, his other works, some 17 in all. Fenton’s list of the sources known to David gives an idea of the tremendous breadth of his personal library and his interests in science, philosophy, and even the Zohar and other kabbalistic literature.

SETH WARD

See also Moses ben Maimon

Manuscripts, Hebrew

Beit-Arié, Malachi, Hebrew Codicology: Tentative Typology of Technical Practices Employed in Hebrew Dated Medieval Manuscripts (Institut de recherche et d’histoire

- des textes: Etudes de paléographie hébraïque), Paris: Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1976
- Goldstein, David (editor), The Ashkenazi Haggadah: A Hebrew Manuscript of the Mid-15th Century from the Collections of the British Library, New York: Abrams, and London: Thames and Hudson, 1985; new edition, London: Thames and Hudson, 1997
- Gutmann, Joseph, Hebrew Manuscript Painting, New York: Braziller, 1978; London: Chatto and Windus, 1979
- Metzger, Thérèse, and Mendel Metzger, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages: Illuminated Hebrew Manuscripts, New York: Alpine Fine Arts Collection, 1982
- Narkiss, Bezalel, Hebrew Illuminated Manuscripts, New York: Amiel, 1969
- Sabar, Shalom, Ketubbah: Jewish Marriage Contracts of the Hebrew Union College Skirball Museum and Klau Library, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1990

Hebrew illuminated manuscripts from the Middle Ages are a rich but under-investigated resource, ripe to be mined for insights into the inner landscape of medieval Jewish society, and for revelations about the world views of the documents' creators, patrons, and intended audience. Several anthologies of medieval manuscript art have been created, offering samples that may be studied in order to gauge the broad parameters of the field, differences among schools, and geographical and chronological distinctions.

NARKISS's survey provides an introductory historical chapter, followed by one-page analyses of a considerable number of monumental examples of Hebrew manuscript illumination. Each page of description includes a discussion of iconography and faces a full-page, full-color example from the manuscript in question. Manuscripts are identified by title (for example, "The Golden Haggadah"), as well as by call-numbers of the respective libraries. The titles applied by Narkiss have become commonplace, although they are not necessarily historically authentic. The work represents a considerable effort to gather and characterize a large number of manuscripts and to delineate a field of research around them. The problems with the volume are obvious—due to both the paucity of surviving manuscripts and the fact that Narkiss shows only a single page from each of the selected manuscripts (which are replete with many other fascinating iconographies); the selection is rather arbitrary in its scope, partially obscuring the importance of items that it does not, or cannot, show.

The format of GUTMANN's smaller, less elegant work resembles the organization of Narkiss's compilation, although the layout makes the information it contains less accessible than in Narkiss. This volume is part of a more general series, and the effect is to place Hebrew manuscript illumination in the context of a broader universe of discourse and to impose some uniformity on the volume.

In general, the works by Narkiss and Gutmann complement each other. The authors mostly discuss different manuscripts, and when the two texts do analyze the same document, they provide illustrations of different folios from the manuscripts in question. The scholarly differences between the backgrounds of Gutmann, a U.S. scholar, and Narkiss, an Israeli, are revealed in the distinctive themes that the authors identify in their introductions. Gutmann focuses on the biblical prohibition against the production of graven images and considers the general problem of Jewish art that surrounds that edict (a preoccupation also found in many of his other works), while Narkiss concentrates on the historical antecedents for Hebrew manuscript illumination. Both works emphasize, to differing degrees, the possibility that a lost tradition of early Jewish manuscript painting informed the creation of medieval Christian art. Both books also stress the stylistic similarities between Hebrew manuscripts and their contemporary Christian and Muslim counterparts, and as a result, the authors do not effectively explain which characteristics, aside from the Hebrew script and the occasional manifestation of midrashic allusion, may distinguish the Hebrew manuscripts from those of the majority cultures. This problem has been addressed by more recent work in the field of iconography.

The METZGERS' work occupies a unique position among surveys of Hebrew manuscript illumination. Organized by topic, the work considers many more manuscripts than the volumes by Gutmann and Narkiss, including secular manuscripts written in Hebrew besides religious texts. Following the direction established by the earliest forays into the topic, they regard medieval Hebrew art as a rich historical resource for scholars of medieval Jewish life, and the authors provide a charming glimpse into some of the ways in which medieval Jews, or the artists they commissioned, wished to represent their culture. The Metzgers are rather naïve, however, to assume that these images present an accurate or factual image of contemporary Jewish life. Still, their work contributes much toward a more complete, if not entirely objective, idea of medieval Jewish clothing, home furnishings, rituals, and holiday celebrations. The index of manuscripts (including documents that were not cited in the volume as well as cited sources) is a major accomplishment, which provides concise and precise information about most extant illuminated Hebrew manuscripts, organized by library and call-number.

The best way to appreciate Hebrew illuminated manuscripts is, of course, to examine an entire manuscript, rather than a single folio or a cropped image. GOLDSTEIN's complete edition of a 15th-century Haggadah is a model presentation of such a complete document. While quite a few rare and very expensive collector's facsimiles exist, Goldstein's beautiful edition is an example of a number of recent publications that are widely available, affordable, scholarly, and comprehensive. The full text of this Haggadah and its commentaries is provided, and the iconography of each folio is fully described. Complete bibliographical, provenance, and codicological details are included. Working with this kind of a facsimile is the next best thing to seeing the original in the British Library.

BEIT-ARIÉ is a masterpiece of codicological information, essential for anyone who wants to date or classify Hebrew manuscripts. The work is unsurpassed in detail, clarity, and precision, providing up-to-date information on all physical aspects of the Hebrew manuscript book. The text is accompanied by clear illustrations that exemplify the topics under discussion.

SABAR's catalog of marriage contracts is an example of trends in art history scholarship at the end of the 20th century. A comprehensive catalog of a single collection, the work evaluates one of the more easily researched and presented genres within the field of illuminated manuscripts: marriage contracts are by nature dated, and each contract is a single folio. Therefore, the original provenance of these objects is known, and the manuscript can be fully reproduced as well as described. Sabar applies sociological insights as well as aesthetic criteria to the evaluation of these documents, with great success.

MARC MICHAEL EPSTEIN

See also Books and Libraries; Printing, Early Hebrew; Scribes; Script and Scribal Practices

Marranism

- Baer, Yitzhak, A History of the Jews in Christian Spain, 2 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1961–1966
- Cohen, Martin, The Martyr: The Story of a Secret Jew and the Mexican Inquisition in the Sixteenth Century, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973
- Henningsen, Gustav and John A. Tedeschi, The Inquisition in Early Modern Europe: Studies on Sources and Methods, De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1986
- Netanyahu, Benzion, The Marranos of Spain, from the Late XIVth to the Early XVIIth Century, According to Contemporary Hebrew Sources, New York: American Academy for Jewish Research, 1966
- Rivkin, Ellis, "The Utilization of Non-Jewish Sources for the Reconstruction of Jewish History," Jewish Quarterly Review, 47, 1956–1957
- Rivkin, Ellis, The Shaping of Jewish History: A Radical New Interpretation, New York: Scribner, 1971
- Roth, Cecil, A History of the Marranos, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1932; 3rd edition, New York: Harper and Row, 1966
- Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim, From Spanish Court to Italian Ghetto: Isaac Cardoso: A Study in Seventeenth-Century Marranism and Jewish Apologetics, New York: Columbia University Press, 1971

Beginning in 1391, Jews in Spain were drawn to the baptismal font in large numbers, both voluntarily and involuntarily. In the course of the next century, especially as these conversos and their descendants, the New Christians, prospered, their loyalty to Catholicism was questioned by Spanish Old Christians. By the end of the century the Inquisition was put into place by the Spanish authorities. The ostensible purpose of the Inquisition in Spain, and later in Portugal, was to uproot the Judaizing practices of the New Christians, regarded as crypto-Jews and commonly called Marranos. Scholars have, however, questioned whether the Inquisition was really driven by religious motivations or by social and racial designs against the New Christians as a class or race. Chief among the concerns of scholars studying the Inquisition, therefore, is the question of the reliability of the dossiers produced by its tribunals. On the one hand, it is easy to ascertain that many of those who were most skeptical of the reliability of inquisitional sources had used them the least. On the other hand, it must be stressed that until the relatively recent opening of Spanish society to outside scholars and a new historiographic interest in such documents, very few historians actually used the inquisitional sources extensively, and it does not appear that those who did use them did so with much caution. In addition, 20th-century manifestations of supposedly crypto-Jewish practices in Portugal, and more recently the Southwestern United States, have served to complicate the issue by offering, to some observers, evidence of the viability of the Marrano movement and the reliability of charges against them.

BAER betrays a major inconsistency between his enthusiastic acceptance of inquisitional documents when they demonstrate the loyalty of New Christians to Judaism and his rejection of them as biased when they do not. Baer recognizes that the Inquisition produced information that was not always true, because it relied upon torture to force confessions or because it encouraged people to slander their neighbors. Nevertheless, even when he raises the possibility that the records of the Inquisition were unreliable, Baer always concludes with a dogmatic affirmation of the Jewishness of the New Christians. Although Baer tries to show religious motivation for the behavior of both New Christians and Inquisitors, he repeatedly undermines this position by raising the possibility that the Inquisition was economically rather than religiously motivated.

RIVKIN (1956–1957) issues a startling challenge to several central tenets of the conventional wisdom of Jewish historiography concerning the New Christians or conversos of Spain and Portugal, asserting that they were loyal Christians and were not persecuted because of their secret Judaism. He also asserts that the Inquisition was not established to destroy a danger to the Catholic faith and that the dossiers of the Inquisition cannot be used as evidence for the religious life of the conversos. In addition to denying that the majority of the New Christians practiced Judaism in secret, Rivkin challenges the basic methods employed by Jewish historians by claiming that the primary sources available to the historian cannot be relied upon literally. In this historiographic work, Rivkin does not build from archival inquisitional documents but rather tears down the rickety edifices constructed by previous scholars of the Inquisition who, he contends, accepted the inquisitional documents as valid sources for reconstructing the life of the New Christians. RIVKIN (1971) elaborates the view that the decision by New Christians to adopt Judaism in the Ottoman Empire was based on the business opportunities available to them as Jews and not on any feelings for Judaism they had nurtured in Spain or Portugal. He argues that it was the Inquisition that created the Jewish consciousness in some New Christians by identifying them with Jews and Judaism, although such charges may have been unfounded. He also asserts that the Ottoman sultan realized that it was in his best interest for the New Christians who settled in the empire to embrace Judaism openly. Rivkin's views align him with the Portuguese historian Antonio José Saraiva, whose evisceration of the spiritual pretensions of the uniquely far-reaching Portuguese Inquisition are presented in a comprehensively expanded and updated English version by Herman Prins Salomon and Isaac Sassoon, forthcoming from E.J. Brill.

In the introduction to his 1964 translation of Samuel Usque's Consolation for the Tribulations of Israel, Martin Cohen confirmed Rivkin's views by asserting that the wealth and influence of the Spanish New Christians was the reason they were accused of practicing Judaism in secret. He argues that false charges were made in order to fan popular hatred against the New Christians and to justify their liquidation. Cohen, nevertheless, appears to part company with Rivkin by asserting that the majority of Portuguese New Christians remained true to Judaism. COHEN's book on the activities of the Inquisition in the New World presents Rivkin's views at length, but Cohen diverges from Rivkin on the reliability of Inquisitional sources, describing his own account as "entirely factual," with every "detail, description, and transcribed conversation . . . found in the trial records of the Inquisition or other unimpeachable primary or secondary sources."

HENNINGSEN and TEDESCHI bring together many studies of the Inquisition done during the 1970s and 1980s by scholars who used inquisitional documents, and they show that critics of previous historiography on New Christians were correct: most of the victims were probably loyal to Christianity. Even those who managed to leave the Iberian peninsula by no means always returned to Judaism, and those who did were not always steadfast in their Jewishness. Many chose to return home to Spain and Portugal. Others became very critical of rabbinic authority. Nevertheless, there were some New Christians who returned to Judaism—often women—whose Inquisition dossiers show that members of their families had been watched for several generations by the Inquisition because of Judaizing practices. The recent scholars represented in this collection have demonstrated that the authors of the monumental older works on the Inquisition possessed only impressionistic knowledge of the available materials, that on most major questions concerning these materials historians today are still ignorant, that inquisitional materials must be used in conjunction with other contemporary evidence, and that it is necessary not only to record information from the inquisitional archives but to reconstruct it critically. These later scholars note that the information in inquisitional dossiers may have passed through several filters: language differences between the interrogated and the Inquisition, gaps in education between the tribunal and the interrogated, and scribal conventions that standardized testimony. In one recent study of the Spanish Inquisition it was discovered that of the approximately 44,000 trials around the world between 1540 and 1700, only 40 percent were devoted to major heresies, among which Judaizing represented only a small part. Thus 60 percent of the inquisitors' efforts went to prosecuting heretical propositions (about priests, the pope, or the Virgin Mary), blasphemy, bigamy, crimes against the Holy Office, premarital intercourse, homosexuality, sodomy, bestiality, sexual solicitations by clergy during confession, magic, witchcraft, astrology, necromancy, sorcery, and superstition; these charges were usually leveled against "Old Christians," who were often uneducated and rural. These charges reflected more the post-tributary fear of medieval Catholicism than any fear of Judaism. Furthermore, only 1.8 percent of the accused were put to death, an average of about five per year. For some earlier tribunals, however—for example, the one held in Valencia from 1478 to 1530—there was a much higher percentage of Judaizers tried (up to 90 percent), and about 30 percent were killed. Recent scholars of the dossiers notice that the Inquisition always was on the lookout for Judaizers and readily found them during various waves of interest in Judaizers, which continued up to the 18th century. Often during the late 16th century, entire communities were discovered, sometimes even in monasteries. Despite their difficulty in identifying what they were looking for, the Inquisition did not have to fabricate their findings. Their files, however, are not easy to interpret because they represent the complexities of both crypto-Judaism and a secretive bureaucracy. Most researchers now feel that by understanding the filters through which inquisitional materials passed—the structures of New Christian life and inquisitional procedure—they have access to rich, reliable, and detailed sources.

The views contained in NETANYAHU's magnum opus go back to his 1947 dissertation on Don Isaac Abravanel, which was published in 1953. Netanyahu claims that most New Christians had no loyalties to Judaism except for a few vestigial habits. Following Baer's characterization of the Jews of Spain as religiously lax because of the philosophical influence of Averroës, Netanyahu argues that as New Christians they certainly had even less interest in practicing Judaism in secret. By falsely accusing the New Christians of Judaizing, the Inquisition was motivated by racial, political, and economic considerations and not by religious zeal. Netanyahu also sees that Baer's characterizations of Spanish Jewry's religious laxity were not consistent with his enthusiastic description of their crypto-Judaism. Netanyahu's attempt to show that rabbinic literature of the period for the most part dismissed the Jewishness of the conversos produced a spate of attention to this question that also drew further study of Rivkin's views, although Netanyahu does not address Rivkin's work explicitly. One of the major criticisms of Netanyahu's thesis is that the rabbinic writings from the Sephardi diaspora on which he relied included negative characterizations of Iberian New Christians that were written for local audiences. Often the purpose was to make matters easy in cases of marriage and inheritance for Jews who had fled Spain. For these reasons rabbinic responsa were often as contradictory, tendentious, polemical, and unreliable as Netanyahu claims the inquisitional sources are.

ROTH sees his subject as a romantic episode and testimony to the tenacious desire of the crypto-Jews to transmit their religion in secret. Thus, concerning the attachment of New Christians to Christianity, some were sincere converts, but the vast majority remained completely loyal to Judaism, keeping all of the traditional observances. While doing so they managed to prosper because of the new economic opportunities open to them and the high level of intermarriage with Old Christian families. With the establishment of the Inquisition, according to Roth, many Judaizers were caught and burned; he rarely mentions trumped-up charges or confessions made solely due to torture. Roth's work is filled with subtle contradictions. It is only when he describes crypto-Judaism in Portugal that he indicates that Spanish crypto-Judaism was much weaker and that Marranism would have died out during the 16th century had it not been for the Portuguese Inquisition. Similarly, he admits that the majority of those who died at the stake denied Judaism while they lived and that denunciations were based on trivial lapses into old habitual actions, thus diminishing his assertions of widespread sincerity. Roth concedes that dossiers of the Inquisition cannot be relied upon implicitly. He describes the religion of the Marranos as narrow and atrophied but claims that it preserved all the basics of traditional Judaism. From Roth it appears that the major goal of the Inquisition remained always to ferret out Judaizers, despite its interest in others such as Muslims, Protestants, bigamists, sorcerers, and witches. He concludes that the number of Judaizers killed in Spain and Portugal exceeded 30,000. However, in 1958 Roth conceded in the foreword to a new edition of his book that “. . . very important research has been done recently on the early days of crypto-Judaism in Spain, on the origins of the Inquisition, and on various aspects of the history of the Marrano Diaspora. Years have diminished, though it is to be hoped not entirely obliterated, the author's high romanticism of a quarter-century ago. . . .”

YERUSHALMI offers a major study of the New Christians based on dossiers of the Inquisition, and he begins with an incisive summary of Rivkin's arguments and then a refutation of them. Yerushalmi's attention to Rivkin's thesis is striking because of his profound disagreement with it and the significant research he has produced based on the very inquisitional documents discounted by Rivkin. The bulk of the book is devoted to following sample migrations of New Christians from Spain to Italy. In the course of presenting a compelling narrative, Yerushalmi pulls together all the forces in early modern Jewish history, including the rise of the Sabbatian movement.

HOWARD TZVI ADELMAN

See also Crypto-Jews, Contemporary

Marriage

- Baskin, Judith (editor), Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1991, 2nd edition, 1999
- Diamant, Anita, The New Jewish Wedding, New York: Summit, 1985
- Epstein, Louis M., Marriage Laws in the Bible and the Talmud (Harvard Semitic Series, vol. 12), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1942
- Friedman, Mordechai Akiva, Jewish Marriage in Palestine: A Cairo Genizah Study, 2 vols., New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1980
- Goitein, S.D., A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza, vol. 3: The Family, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978
- Lamm, Maurice, The Jewish Way in Love and Marriage, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1980; London: Harper and Row, 1982
- Sabar, Shalom (editor), Ketubbah: Jewish Marriage Contracts of the Hebrew Union College Skirball Museum

and Klau Library, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1990

In 1997–1998, the Israel Museum in Jerusalem staged an exhibition on marriage among Afghan Jews during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The exhibition was striking for two reasons. First, by presenting the Jewish wedding customs and rituals alongside the wedding customs of their non-Jewish neighbors, the exhibition highlighted the extensive similarities of the weddings and marital understandings of the Jewish and non-Jewish communities. Second, simply by graphic demonstration of Jewish weddings that seem bizarre to most moderns, the exhibition emphasized the discontinuities of Jewish marriage. Afghan Jews, like modern Jews, shared the cultural ideals of their host community and also attempted to make it “Jewish” by incorporating some unique legal institutions or rituals (e.g., gift-giving between the betrothed couple's families on Jewish rather than Moslem holidays).

Unfortunately, there is no English version of the catalog for this exhibition. The issues that it raises, however, can be traced in other ways. One of the most common elements of a Jewish marriage, from late antiquity to the present, is the marriage contract, or ketubbah. Because it combines traditional legal language with artistic adornment, the ketubbah is an important source for the study of Jewish assimilation and self-identity. SABAR documents the collection of 271 ketubbot from the Skirball Museum, dating from the 14th to the 20th century from all over the world. The descriptions and photographs are accompanied by a short commentary, mostly dealing with the artistic aspects of the ketubbot. The ketubbot themselves are, for the most part, highly ornate, but the chronological presentation, by location, of these ketubbot highlights the lack of a uniform artistic ketubbah tradition. When artists looked for methods or models for illustrating ketubbot, they turned to the artistic world around them rather than to earlier Jewish ketubbot. For example, an image of hands about to deliver the priestly blessing appears in a ketubbah from Italy dated 1775 and in another from Brazil dated 1911. Neither the artistic rendition of the hands nor their symbolic meanings are similar: in the former ketubbah they indicate the marriage of a member of a family claiming priestly descent, while in the latter they are simply a sign of good wishes, an invocation of blessing. Likewise, priestly hands and indeed all human and animal representations are absent from ketubbot from countries under Islamic rule, while some Italian ketubbot contain lavish baroque images of men and women in various states of undress.

Despite its mainly symbolic function today, the ketubbah originated as an enforceable legal document, and its language contains or alludes to the legal rights and obligations of marriage as understood by the rabbis. FRIEDMAN examines both the legal and linguistic aspects of the ketubbah. This two-volume study has become the standard academic reference work on the ketubbah and, therefore, also on the traditional legal structure of Jewish marriage. The first volume is devoted to analysis of and commentary on the different clauses of the ketubbah, tracing their development from rabbinic sources (or sometimes earlier) to their presence in the Palestinian ketubbot from the Middle Ages found in the Cairo Genizah. In the second volume, Friedman publishes these medieval ketubbot from the Genizah. Friedman demonstrates that even the language of these ketubbot was not always uniform, having frequently been adapted for the particular situations of their authors.

Whereas Friedman focuses on the legal aspects of the ketubbot, GOITEIN provides a social-historical synthesis of the marriages of the "Genizah people." This highly readable scholarly masterpiece combines legal material with data gleaned from sermons and letters to present a rich picture of how these Jews understood and practiced marriage. Here too, little distinguished the marriages of Jews from those of the non-Jewish majority. Goitein's study is the most complete account of marriage in any premodern Jewish community.

EPSTEIN straddles the line between offering a legal history of Jewish marriage and a historical explanation for the development of Jewish laws of marriage. He deals with a wide range of legal issues relating to marriage, tracing each of them from the Bible to the 19th century. His results are dated and his historical conclusions suspect, but in the absence of a more recent comprehensive study of Jewish marriage law, this remains a useful reference.

BASKIN is a collection of essays dealing with the historical experience of Jewish women, not with marriage per se. Nevertheless, many of the essays here at least touch upon Jewish marriage in different historical periods. Of particular note is the essay by Deborah Hertz, "Emancipation through Inter-marriage in Old Berlin," in which she explores the odd fact that an extraordinary proportion of Jewish women from the aristocratic Jewish families of Berlin at the turn of the 19th century married non-Jews, at least for their second marriages.

Today, Jews continue to adopt the marriage customs, rituals, and understandings of those around them, modifying them in order to assert Jewish identity. DIAMANT and LAMM offer two examples of this phenomenon. Both are "how-to" books primarily for American Jews, step-by-step guides to creating a Jewish marriage. Diamant writes from a more liberal perspective, showing greater concern with integrating egalitarianism and modern conceptions of marriage (e.g., an important goal of marriage is the fulfillment of personal happiness) than with legal aspects. Lamm details the legal aspects of marriage as they are commonly accepted in Orthodox communities today and attempts to show the relevance of traditional practices (some of which are not particularly old) for modern Jewish marriages. Ultimately, however, they both struggle with the same issue, that of what it means for highly assimilated American Jews to have "Jewish" marriages. The visions of marriage that they offer are as close to each other, and to those of many non-Jewish Americans, as they are different from those, for example, of the Jews of Afghanistan.

MICHAEL L. SATLOW

See also Divorce; Ketubbah

Martyrdom

- Agus, Ronald E., The Binding of Isaac and Messiah: Law, Martyrdom, and Deliverance in Early Rabbinic Religiosity (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1988
- Chazan, Robert, European Jewry and the First Crusade, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987
- Droge, Arthur J. and James D. Tabor, A Noble Death: Suicide and Martyrdom among Christians and Jews in Antiquity, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992
- Levenson, Jon Douglas, The Death and Resurrection of the Beloved Son: The Transformation of Child Sacrifice in Judaism and Christianity, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1993
- Marcus, Ivan G., "From Politics to Martyrdom: Shifting Paradigms in the Hebrew Narratives of the 1096 Crusade Riots," in Prooftexts, vol. 2, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982
- Soloveitchik, Haym, "Religious Law and Change: The Medieval Ashkenazic Example," AJS Review, 2, 1987
- Spiegel, Shalom, Me-agadot ha'-akedah, 1950; translated by Judah Goldin as The Last Trial, New York, Pantheon, 1967

The Talmud requires Jews to give up their life in cases of idolatry, forbidden sexual relations, and bloodshed. Along with this basic halakhic instruction, rabbinic texts narrate the martyrdoms of rabbis executed by Romans. In midrashic literature, these rabbis are known as the Ten Martyrs (asarah haruge malkut). The term kiddush ha-Shem, or the Sanctification of the (divine) Name, has come to designate this phenomenon of voluntary death in the name of God. Large-scale Jewish martyrdom arose during the crusades together with complex religious and moral dilemmas. Despite the controversy, kiddush ha-Shem remained an integral part of the Jewish experience in Europe.

AGUS opens with the story of the anonymous mother and her seven martyred sons found in the Second Book of Maccabees. Agus understands this "typological story" to be a form of rationalization of martyrdom. He proceeds with "a comparative study of the story's configuration in several versions with an eye to understanding its early rabbinic manifestation," which also incorporates the biblical story of the binding of Isaac (the Akedah). Through careful examination of early rabbinic texts, Agus unravels the rabbinic understanding of the dialectical relationships between martyrdom and the Law, and the tension existing between the course of history and personal biography. What leads Israel to actual martyrdom, according to Agus, is "Israel's shrugging off the yoke of the Law," while readiness to suffer for the Law eliminates the need for martyrdom. Piety—a combination of personal suffering and constant repentance—neutralizes the need for actual martyrdom and thus provides Jews with the spiritual alternative of "vicarious martyrdom." As the story of the Akedah demonstrates, suffering for the Law leads to personal salvation and self-realization in the present. Abraham and Isaac should thus inspire every Jew as they also inspire the Messiah. "The messiah is an Abraham sacrificing his son Isaac, the promise of the future, in the conviction that a heroic embracing of the present is an embracing of God and His deliverance." The Messiah therefore delivers every Jew not by dying for his nation, but by cleaving to a life of suffering in exile.

CHAZAN meticulously and thoughtfully analyzes the complex relationship between Franco-German Jews and Christians during the First Crusade. Relying on both Hebrew and Latin sources, the author identifies the major players in the assaults and explores the different Jewish patterns of response to the crusaders' slogan, "death or conversion," paying a great deal of attention to the controversial and disturbing reaction of (passive and active) Jewish martyrdom. Chazan contends that these patterns of attack and response represent new styles of persecution and martyrdom, and in his search for a historical explanation of the changes, he describes in impressive detail the innovative martyrological behavior of medieval Ashkenaz as well as the imagery and radical ideology that characterized the milieu. Despite the high number of casualties, Chazan does not treat the First Crusade as a major turning point in Jewish-Christian relationships; instead he delineates the return of Ashkenazi Jewry to normal and prosperous life after the conflict, although he also contends that these martyrdoms were not forgotten, remarking that "A significant new dimension had been added in 1096 to the legacy of kiddush Ha-Shem." Readers who do not know Hebrew will appreciate the appended English translations of two medieval texts pertaining to the events. Students of medieval history and Jewish martyrdom will find Chazan's book both fundamental and illuminating.

DROGE and TABOR provide a comparative study of voluntary death in antiquity, arguing that it was a popular concept among pagans, Jews, and early Christians. In the authors' opinion, the Book of Daniel demonstrated the belief that voluntary death in the name of God may bring redemption and salvation, which was later developed in other, noncanonical Jewish documents, such as the Assumption of Moses and the Books of the Maccabees. The authors also rely heavily on Josephus' accounts to support their arguments. For Droge and Tabor, Josephus represents "the beginning of the philosophical discussion of voluntary death in the Jewish sources," although a generation earlier Philo of Alexandria provides another philosophical treatment of voluntary death, which echoes the legacy of Socrates. The authors conclude their analysis of Jewish sources with a short survey of voluntary death in rabbinic literature, positing that the practice is considered common and acceptable behavior in early rabbinic texts.

LEVENSON's book is not a work on Jewish martyrdom per se, but his treatment of the all-important story of the Akedah explains why the biblical story retained a central role in Jewish and Christian martyrology. In contrast to the prevailing view, he suggests that the pagan ritual of child sacrifice had also been practiced among the ancient Israelites on some occasions. Attempts were made to curb this ritual, but the primordial belief in its benefits was not completely forgotten. This hypothesis leads Levenson to regard the archetypal story of the near-sacrifice as the "seed" that inspired the theology of Jewish martyrdom as it evolved in the aftermath of Antiochus's attempt to suppress Judaism. This seed, Levenson continues, "would be watered by the blood of Jewish martyrs," from the Second Temple to the First Crusade and beyond. Although the story of the Akedah is not the only source of Jewish martyrdom, students interested in the Jewish martyrological phenomenon will find Levenson's contribution of value.

MARCUS's important article brings attention to the fictional aspects of the Hebrew narratives of the First Crusade. He sees in these narratives a creative literary response to the tragic events. In his opinion, the narratives combine two "acts": political and martyrological. The purpose of the latter is to explain, through "Jewish religious imagination," the Jewish failure to secure protection from political authorities. While the political sections of the narratives are "predictable," the martyrological scenes are "spontaneous." These spontaneous scenes provided a theodicy designed to overcome the Jewish political defeat. The literary shift from politics to martyrology, Marcus argues, defines the narratives of 1096 as a body of religious polemics.

SOLOVEITCHIK focuses on the legal works of the tosafists that attempt to bridge the gap between halakhah and medieval reality. The many instances of Jewish active martyrdom, which the author labels "suicides," during the crusades serve as Soloveitchik's case studies. He tries to understand how the tosafists legitimized self-killing and the killing of fellow Jews, acts that one may define as suicide and murder. His answer: the tosafists could find justification for suicide by employing canonical and semi-canonical literature, as well as aggadah, but even these radical thinkers found it difficult to defend the killing of others. Soloveitchik associates the inclination of Ashkenazi Jews toward extreme behavior with their self-image as an ideal religious society.

SPIEGEL explores rabbinic approaches to the biblical story of the Akedah in antiquity and the Middle Ages. In his view, the Bible introduced the Akedah story mainly to abolish the pagan ritual of human sacrifices. Genesis 22:19 ("So Abraham returned [alone] to the young men"), however, opened the door to legends of actual sacrifice on Mount Moriah. Such exegesis leads Spiegel to conclude that "some leftover of belief" from the pagan world can be traced in Amoraic texts, "if not earlier." He argues that it is possible that the "Haggadah recovered for Judaism something of that legacy the Torah wished to renounce, or at least to subdue." Although other midrashim endeavored to uproot this foreign influence, stories of Isaac's actual sacrifice evolved throughout the early rabbinic period. The aggadic version of the biblical story "became the favorite one in the medieval time." It is Abraham and Isaac of the midrash who became the Ashkenazi archetype and inspiration during the crusades. From the early midrashim, medieval narratives recovered the hope that the merit of their numerous Akedot would sustain the nation. Spiegel concludes his classic work with his translation of the Akedah, a poem by Rabbi Ephraim ben Jacob of Bonn.

SHMUEL SHEPKARU

Masorah

- Breuer, Mordechai (editor), The Masorah Magna to the Pentateuch, 2 vols., New York: Lehmann Foundation, 1992
- Ginsburg, Christian D., Jacob ben Chajim's Introduction to the Rabbinic Bible, Hebrew and English, London: Longman, Green, Longman, Roberts, and Green, 1865; as Jacob ben Chajim Ibn Adonijah's Introduction to the Rabbinic Bible, Hebrew and English (Library of Biblical Studies), New York: Ktav, 1968
- Ginsburg, Christian D., Introduction to the Massoretico-Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible, London: Trinitarian Bible Society, 1897; New York: Ktav, 1966
- Gordis, Robert, The Biblical Text in the Making: A Study of the Kethib-Qere, Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1937, augmented edition, New York: Ktav, 1972
- Kahle, Paul, The Cairo Geniza (Schweich Lectures of the British Academy), London: Oxford University Press for the British Academy, 1947; 2nd edition, Oxford: Blackwell, 1959; New York: Praeger, 1960
- Kelley, Page H., Daniel S. Mynatt, and Timothy G. Crawford, The Masorah of Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia: Introduction and Annotated Glossary, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1998
- Wickes, William, Two Treatises on the Accentuation of the Old Testament (Library of Biblical Studies), edited by Harry M. Orlinsky, prolegomenon by Aron Dotan, New York: Ktav, 1970
- Yeivin, Israel, Mavo la-Masorah ha-Tavranit, 1971; translated by E.J. Revell as Introduction to the Tiberian Masorah (Masoretic Studies, no. 5), edited by Harry M. Orlinsky, Missoula, Montana: Scholars Press for the Society of Biblical Literature and the International Organization for Masoretic Studies, 1980

The Hebrew term masorah is an alternative form of the Hebrew term masoret, which referred initially to a canonical version of the consonantal Hebrew text of Holy Scriptures. In rabbinic literature, the purely consonantal—and thus ambiguous—written text was distinguished from the vocalized and more unequivocal orally transmitted pronunciation of the consonantal text. The oral pronunciation was called in Hebrew mikra, literally, “what is read (chanted) aloud.”

There are three main theories as to the etymology of masorah/masoret in relation to editions of the Hebrew Scriptures and their apparatuses. The most plausible view is that the term derives from Biblical Hebrew masoret (bond) (Ezekiel 20:37) and that it refers to the binding character (i.e., the inerrant authority) of the canonical consonantal text of the Bible. Another plausible theory holds that the term derives from a rare meaning of the verb masar (to count) and that it refers to the activity of fixing the number of letters of each biblical book in order to guarantee preservation of the integrity of the text. It is widely assumed, however, that masoret is derived from the more common definition of the verb masar (that is, “to hand over”) and that the noun means “tradition.”

This folk etymology obscures rabbinic Judaism's distinction between the written word of God (Scripture) and tradition, a distinction that is reflected in the antithetical pair masoret-mikra, in which it is mikra that represents oral tradition.

At some point between the 6th and 9th centuries C.E., masorah or masoret came to refer not only to the consonantal text of Hebrew Scripture but also to a series of apparatuses apparently created by expert masoretes. These apparatuses include: the vowel points; the so-called masoretic accents, which are a highly sophisticated system of punctuation interpreted also as musical phrasing for the chanting of Scripture in public worship; and three separate collections of text-critical notes. The first of these collections is called the small masorah (Hebrew Masorah Ketanah or Masoret Ketanah; Latin Masorah Parva). It is a series of marginal notes to the biblical text. These notes point to peculiar words; peculiar spellings of common words; such phenomena as blank spaces in the middle of a verse; words that appear in the text but are not read aloud; and words that are read aloud although they do not appear in the text. The second set of notes, called the large masorah (Hebrew Masorah Gedolah; Latin Masorah Magna), is a detailed explanation of the laconic notes found in the small masorah with many additional notes as well. A third collection of notes, extant in several distinct versions, is also referred to as the large masorah. This last form of masoretic apparatus notes peculiarities in the biblical text either topically or according to the order of books in Hebrew Scripture and their respective subdivisions.

C.D. Ginsburg's magnum opus was a brilliant critical edition of the Hebrew Bible based upon the biblical text published in Venice by Daniel Bomberg in his so-called Second Rabbinic Bible (1524–1525). In a companion volume, GINSBURG (1897) explains the Western (Palestinian) and Eastern (Babylonian) recensions of the Hebrew Bible; examines the differences between the Western recensions of Aaron Ben-Asher (c.900–940 C.E.) and Moses Ben-Naphtali; and identifies the Second Temple-era roots of masoretic activity. The author surveys the important medieval biblical manuscripts known to Western European scholars in his time, and he traces the history of the printing of the Hebrew Bible through Bomberg's third quarto produced in Venice between 1525 and 1528. This Bible was used by Luther and other reformers, who translated the Bible into the major modern languages of the Western world.

While recent works listed here discuss some of the fine points concerning masorah in all its ramifications that were discovered in the 20th century, the two 16th-century works published in GINSBURG (1865) preserve what was known and believed about masorah at the dawn of the modern era, when Hebrew Scripture was first printed with movable type.

In chapter two of his study, KAHLE discusses the history of the Hebrew text of the Bible and identifies the masoretes. He recounts his 1926 discovery of the early-11th-century Leningrad Codex B19A, the oldest complete text of the Hebrew Scriptures, and he tells how he persuaded Rudolph Kittel to use this version of the Hebrew text as the basis of the third edition of Biblia Hebraica (Stuttgart: Württemberg Bibelanstalt, 1937).

Drawing from older and better manuscripts that were unknown to Ginsburg, YEIVIN explains the history of masorah and evaluates its significance. He considers in detail the masoretic terminology of the Tiberian masoretes that is reflected in the Ben-Asher codices, and he traces the roots of masoretic activity in the wider contexts of both Hellenistic-Roman-Byzantine culture and rabbinic halakhah.

KELLEY, MYNATT, and CRAWFORD present a lucid and comprehensive dictionary in straightforward English of the abbreviations employed in the marginal masorah printed in the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1967). This handy volume, complete with introduction and extensive bibliography, enables students, scholars, and the curious layperson to learn from this ancient critical apparatus.

There are 1,350 places in the Hebrew Bible where the marginal masorah indicates that one is to read a word other than that found in the body of the text. The word to be read is called keri, the Aramaic imperative "read," while the unread word is called ketib, the Aramaic for "it was written." Examining the many theories proposed to account for this phenomenon, GORDIS concludes that the ketib in all instances reflects an archetypal text of the Hebrew Bible selected during the reign of Queen Salome Alexandra of Judah (76–67 B.C.E.) while the keri is drawn from an ancient collection of variants from other manuscripts.

BREUER, recognized by religious and academic authorities alike as a foremost expert on the text of the Hebrew Bible, presents a complete edition of the masorah magna of Ms. L^M of the Pentateuch and the Former Prophets. This manuscript was produced by the same Samuel ben Jacob who produced Ms. L B19A, which is the basis of the third edition of Biblia Hebraica and Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia. Breuer's English introduction identifies different mistakes that the scribe makes in each of the two manuscripts, thus demonstrating evidence of human frailty as well as prodigious skill in these texts.

Children preparing for Bar/Bat Mitzvah learn that the printed Bible in Hebrew contains signs that are interpreted as musical phrases. These masoretic accents serve also as a highly sophisticated system of punctuation and as indicators of which syllables are to be stressed. WICKES explains the intricacies of two distinct systems of these accents—one for Psalms, Proverbs, and Job 3:2–42:6 and another for all the rest of Hebrew Scripture. Wickes summarizes the most important information in two brief tables, one for each of the two systems.

MAYER IRWIN GRUBER

Medicine

Avalos, Hector, Illness and Health Care in the Ancient Near East: The Role of the Temple in Greece, Mesopotamia, and Israel (Harvard Semitic Monographs, no. 54), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1995

Brim, Charles J., Medicine in the Bible, New York: Froben, 1936

Kottke, Samuel S. (editor), Medicine in Bible, and Talmud (Proceedings, 2nd International Symposium on Medicine in Bible and Talmud), Koroth special issue 9(1–2), Fall 1985

Preuss, Julius, Biblich-talmudische Medizin, 1911; translated by Fred Rosner as Julius Preuss' Biblical and Talmudic Medicine, New York: Sanhedrin, 1978

Rosner, Fred, Medicine in the Bible and the Talmud: Selections from Classical Jewish Sources, New York: Ktav, 1977; augmented edition, New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1995

Even if "the Jewish element in medicine has been present since antiquity and has made itself felt in various ways in medical history" (G. Rosen), there is, nevertheless, no specifically Jewish medicine. Much might be said of Jewish physicians through the ages, Jewish medical ethics, medicine and Jewish law, and Jewish medical institutions; this essay, however, is limited to the topic of medicine in ancient Jewish sources. Even thus restricted, this is a field of inquiry that has been extensively plowed, though mainly by antiquarian hobbyists and/or from an apologetic point of view. Nevertheless, collaborative ventures among trained historians of medicine and of ancient cultures, philologists, classicists, Assyriologists, and cultural anthropologists are developing and should lead to a renewed evaluation of the data.

PREUSS's epoch-making work remains unsurpassed as regards its scope and cautious, critical, scholarly approach. Still, this does not mean that the work could not bear some revision, whether in light of modern medicine or of advanced biblical and talmudic scholarship. Preuss attests judiciously that "there is no Jewish medicine in the sense that we speak of an Egyptian or a Greek medical science." No less important is his premise that although Bible and Talmud are religious writings, "for historical research, however, religious feelings should play no role at all." His book is divided into 18 chapters: on the physician, anatomy and physiology, pathology and therapy, special pathology, injuries, and malformations; thence to the specialties: ophthalmology, dentistry, oto-rhinology, nervous and psychiatric disorders, skin diseases, gynecology, and obstetrics; and finally materia medica, forensic medicine, dietetics, and regimens of health. The bibliography has unfortunately not been updated, but in Fred Rosner's English version the index of passages cited has been revised and the general index considerably enlarged. One may regret that the glossary of Hebrew and Aramaic terms compiled by Loewinger, although incomplete and even questionable at times, has not been included. This glossary was appended to the German-language version reprinted in New York in 1971. Once corrected, it would be a very valuable resource for Hebrew- and Aramaic-reading scholars, including talmudists. One problem of Preuss's work is that biblical and talmudic data are closely interwoven, too closely if one considers the span of time between the biblical and talmudic eras. Still, Preuss was quite right when he subtitled his book "Contributions to the History of the Science of Healing and of Culture in General." (This subtitle has unfortunately disappeared in the English translation.) Paraphrasing a statement of a talmudic sage, Preuss acknowledges at the end of his introduction that he is only a collector and an organizer. Manifestly, he did much more than that, and no publication in this field can omit a reference to his magnum opus.

BRIM's study was restricted to the Pentateuch, scanned through the eyes of medieval commentators, Rabbi Solomon Yitshaki (Rashi) in particular. If the author's aim was "the exposition of the science of medicine in the Torah," his approach was definitely apologetic and uncritical. The strange transliteration of the Hebrew terms is also problematic. Although completely outdated since the translation of Preuss's work into English, the fact that this book deals only with the Pentateuch allows one to find the relevant biblical data with greater ease. The work was obviously addressed to (physician) readers of the Bible, not to scholars of ancient medicine.

ROSNER's own book on biblical and talmudic medicine was published one year before his translation of Preuss's work came off the press. A number of chapters are directly inspired by Preuss, such as data on diseases (rabies, hemophilia, scurvy, gout, heatstroke, etc.) and on organs (heart, spleen, gallbladder). A chapter on the talmudic scholar-physician-astronomer Mar Samuel is added to a more general section on physicians in the Talmud. There is also a chapter on ethics and prayers for the physician, and more miscellaneous items, such as sex determination, forensic medicine, suicide, and anesthesia. Ethical and halakhic dimensions are also addressed in Rosner's compilation. He has collected and organized wide-ranging data, drawing heavily on medieval commentators and on rabbinic literature. This is perhaps not very sound historically, but it is the accepted way of traditional Jewish cultural studies and is thus adapted to the broader public.

The essays in KOTTEK's collection were read at the Second International Symposium on Medicine in Bible and Talmud (Jerusalem, 1984). Twenty-seven brief papers deal mainly with talmudic medicine and include renewed considerations of pregnancy and fertility, pestilence, water supply, ecology, and alcohol consumption. Other essays discuss biblical topics, such as tsara'at (the so-called biblical leprosy), ritual impurity, toxicology, and baldness. The four keynote essays deal with rabbinic law as related to medical data; talmudic medicine and Greek sources; the concept of "disease" in the Talmud; and a reappraisal of Preuss's work. K. Codell Carter argues in his paper that in the Talmud "health and long life were construed preeminently as consequences of conformity to social and religious norms." S. Newmyer shows that "while talmudic medicine certainly does not eschew magic, it shows to a significant degree the rationalism of Greek medicine." S. Kottek gives evidence of various influences on the phenomenology of disease, including theoretical, empirical, and popular sources. Two other special issues of Koroth (now Korot) cover the Proceedings of the First and Third Symposia (1981 and 1987, published 1982 and 1988). These international meetings attest to the wide range of scholars involved in an area of research that is obviously multidisciplinary.

AVALOS's approach to illness and health care is original and stimulating. The author does not restrict his research to ancient Israel but extends it to the ancient Near East—to Greece and Mesopotamia in particular. His thesis is that the temple has a central role to play in this comparative approach. Avalos's methods are those of cultural anthropology. He relies heavily on biblical criticism. His scholarship in Assyriology and ancient lore more generally and his comprehensive analysis of biblical topics such as tsara'at allow him to come to tentative conclusions that go beyond Preuss's cautious claims. Avalos argues that in case of disease there was "a dichotomous system of options in Israel." Disease was either a punishment by the Lord or was "arbitrary" (he does not mention the concept of "trial"). The Priestly Code represents an "official religion," while it seems that Israelites used "illegitimate options" quite frequently. Thus Avalos uses the categories of medical anthropology in order to discuss the socio-religious framework of Israelite (biblical) health care. When he speaks of "medical theology," however, one may feel somewhat uneasy. This may be a misleading way of unifying two different themes: the theological meaning of disease and the theological context of healing. It seems, moreover, excessive and unfounded to argue—as some cultural anthropologists have—that God was the only accepted healer, whereas human healers were frowned upon. The moral (and judicial) duty to heal (admittedly in a context of assault and injury in Exodus 21:19), and the famous encomium of the physician by Ben Sira (chapter 38), can hardly be considered marginal.

SAMUEL S. KOTTEK

See also Bioethics; Reproductive Technologies

Menahem Mendel of Kotsk

1787 or 1789–1859

Polish hasidic leader and moralist

Feinberg, Chaim, Leaping Souls: Rabbi Menachem Mendel and the Spirit of Kotsk, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1993

Fox, Joseph, Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Kotsk: A Biographical Study of the Chasidic Master, Brooklyn, New York: Bash, 1988

Heschel, Abraham Joshua, A Passion for Truth, New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1973

Oratz, Ephraim (translator), And Nothing but the Truth: Insights, Stories, and Anecdotes of Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Kotsk, New York: Judaica, 1990

Raz, Simcha (editor), The Sayings of Menahem Mendel of Kotsk, translated by Edward Levin, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1995

Menahem Mendel Morgenstern, the Kotsker rebbe, was the fiery leader of a hasidic movement that originated in the Polish town of Kotsk in the mid-19th century. He was an often harsh and dynamic individual committed unwaveringly to personal integrity. "Who is the 'man of truth'?" he asked. "One who takes pains and labors to say only true things." His brand of Hasidism, which emphasized brutal honesty and total self-nullification, revolutionized the hasidic movement of Eastern Europe, particularly in Poland, where his numerous disciples (including the rebbes of Gur and Alexander) synthesized rigorous talmudic study with spiritual fervor.

The Kotsker rebbe left only a very limited body of written works (having destroyed most of his own writings); it is chiefly his sayings that have survived. Trenchant and often abrasive, these sayings indicate the sharp mind that shaped them, and they are the basis for the materials that have become available in English about the Kotsker rebbe.

HESCHEL provides a study comparing the Kotsker to his contemporary Søren Kierkegaard, a Christian mystic and the father of existentialism. There are indeed similarities in their sober views of humanity and their low tolerance for moral imperfection. They also shared certain personality traits (sarcasm, alienation), behaviors, and ascetic practices. Kierkegaard remained a bachelor; the Kotsker went into virtual seclusion during the last two decades of his life. The fact that the two men moved in completely different orbits, however, raises questions regarding Heschel's contention that the similarities he identifies are meaningful. Also questionable is the author's recourse to modern psychological theories to analyze the Kotsker. Conflicts between the rebbe's exacting principles and his human frailty might have plagued the Kotsker and contributed to his withdrawal from society, but Heschel's labeling these thoughts and actions as manic-depressive tendencies imposes a materialistic reading on the mind of a spiritual giant. Nevertheless, this book is passionate and moving.

FOX attributes the Kotsker's breakdown and withdrawal to his frustration over his inability to reconcile the inherent contradictions of his philosophy. The author vividly recreates the Kotsker's dramatic moment of collapse, which shocked and disillusioned many followers, including Rabbi Mordecai Joseph, who broke away and founded the Izbica system. Fox is also unsparing in his depiction of the Kotsker's difficult personality. As a result, this book may upset some readers. Nevertheless, it is highly valuable for its extensive coverage of the Kotsker's life and historical background. Fox depicts the events leading up to the founding of the hasidic movement by the Ba'al Shem Tov, discussing the Chmielnicki massacres of 1648, the cold elitism of the Jewish intelligentsia, the messianism of Shabbetai Tsevi, and the disillusionment and demoralization of the Jewish masses in Poland. Also explored in depth are the teachers and other figures who influenced the Kotsker rebbe (for example, the "Holy Jew," the Seer of Lublin) and the Kotsker's warm relations with his foremost disciple Rabbi Isaac Meir, who became the first rebbe of Gur. This book fits the Kotsker rebbe squarely within the context of Jewish and East European society, showing him as very much a person of his times.

ORATZ does not mention the Kotsker's more controversial actions, but he does examine why the Kotsker's demanding credo produced such ambivalence and hostility among his contemporaries. In his introduction, Oratz vigorously defends the Kotsker, while arguing that the rebbe's unrelenting rebukes left many feeling angry and defensive. "Kotks stripped the false and fraudulent gentility from those who paraded as venerable and esteemed persons," he writes. "Is there any wonder that this generated opposition?" The introduction also contains a biography of the Kotsker and an overview of his basic principles, such as self-analysis and criticism. The rest of the book presents Kotks quotes and anecdotes, centered on three facets of truth—man and God, man and himself, man and the world—and supplemented with scholarly insights.

FEINBERG touches briefly on the Kotsker's personal life and focuses mainly on the teachings, as he traces the Kotks's spiritual path. Each chapter discusses a specific aspect of the Kotks's philosophy (e.g., faith, humility), showing how these principles lead progressively to self-renewal and transformation. The Kotsker's sayings are smoothly integrated within a florid narrative. This book, written during an illness that claimed the author's life, is not only a tribute to a powerful leader, but clearly a labor of love. It is also a linear, instructional blueprint of the Kotsker worldview.

The sayings of the Kotsker rebbe reveal so much about the man himself that they can occupy a book of their own. In an excellent translation, RAZ arranges the Kotsker's incisive words according to theme and lets them speak for themselves. The introduction provides a good overview of the Kotsker's life and philosophy and uses quotations from the Kotsker himself to illuminate his role not as a benign mascot but as a stern spiritual guide:

One who seeks to be a Rebbe must ascend mountains and descend valleys, seek hidden treasures, and knock on the gates, many gates, until the heart breaks, until the body crumbles, until the heaven and earth collapse, while he maintains his way.

More than any other statement, these thunderous words reveal the Kotsker's turbulent soul. If self-improvement was the Kotsker rebbe's goal, it is the fear of heaven that was his motivation and his obsession. This fear hovered over the lives of those around him, consuming them, stimulating them, and revitalizing Jewry with intellectual energy.

HALLIE LYNN CANTOR

Menasseh ben Israel 1604–1657

Portugese-born Dutch preacher, writer, and leader

Berg, Johannes van den and Ernestine G.E. van der Wall (editors), Jewish-Christian Relations in the Seventeenth Century: Studies and Documents (International Archives of the History of Ideas, 119), Boston: Kluwer Academic, 1988

Kaplan, Yosef, Henry Méchoulan, and Richard Popkin (editors), Menasseh ben Israel and His World (Brill's Studies in Intellectual History, vol. 15), New York: Brill, 1989

Katz, David S., Philo-Semitism and the Readmission of the Jews to England, 1603–1655 (Oxford Historical Monographs), Oxford: Clarendon, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1982

Manasseh Ben Israel, The Hope of Israel, translated by Moses Wall, 1650; edited by Henry Méchoulan and Gérard Nahon, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1987

Roth, Cecil, A Life of Menasseh ben Israel: Rabbi, Printer, and Diplomat, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1934

Wolf, Lucien (editor), Menasseh Ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell: Being a Reprint of the Pamphlets

Published by Menasseh ben Israel to Promote the Re-Admission of the Jews to England, 1649–1656, London: Macmillan, 1901

Menasseh ben Israel's life brings together elements of the Portuguese Marrano experience, the beginnings of Amsterdam Jewish life, and the spadework for the readmission of Jews to England. The child of a family that had returned to Judaism after fleeing Portugal, Menasseh received a traditional Jewish education, entered the rabbinate, and became a scholar, printer, and prolific and diverse author. Notably, he reached out to Christian scholars, entering into correspondence with a number of philosemites both on the European continent and in England. Although his mission to England ended in qualified failure and he died disappointed and destitute, Menasseh left behind a rich heritage of writings and ideas that influenced the intellectual ferment of the Baroque among Jews and Christians alike.

ROTH's classic work remains the only complete biography of Menasseh, and undergraduates and lay readers will find it well worth consulting, although it lacks the insights of later researchers who have uncovered much material unseen by Roth. This highly readable book traces Menasseh's life from his Marrano background in Portugal and his youth in the emerging Jewish community of Amsterdam; discusses his experiences, positive and negative, as a rabbinic leader; reviews his career as a printer and author; and describes his Jewish and non-Jewish friends. A chapter is dedicated to Menasseh's influential little book, The Hope of Israel, and the biography concludes with an account of his failed mission to England. Roth presents Menasseh's many vicissitudes with great sympathy, creating a rounded portrait supported by appropriate bibliography and endnotes.

KATZ has written a number of important works bearing on the life of Menasseh. In his introduction to the most directly pertinent of these studies, Katz stresses that his aim is to sum up the key intellectual movements of the period, and he proceeds to describe the ferment of ideas that led Menasseh to undertake his mission to England as well as the events surrounding the mission's failure. Katz concentrates on the more speculative theological issues: Judaizers and the Mosaic law; the supernatural qualities of Hebrew; matters millenarian; and the ten lost tribes. He demonstrates the growth of philosemitic movements in England from the time of James I through the Civil War to the Commonwealth period and then analyzes events following Menasseh's arrival in England in 1655 and the presentation of his seven-point petition. While the final chapters focus on the events of the Whitehall Conference more than on Menasseh himself, Katz's exemplary use of contemporary sources illuminates brilliantly the framework in which Menasseh operated. A detailed bibliography and footnotes add to the value of this publication.

KAPLAN, MÉCHOULAN, and POPKIN, representatives of the scholarship of Israel, Europe, and the United States, respectively, present an important collection of papers from a conference on "Menasseh ben Israel and His World" held in Israel. These offerings explore "Menasseh ben Israel in terms of Portuguese expectations, Scottish millenarianism, various Dutch movements, various English thinkers and politicians, in terms of both the Jewish and Christian contexts." Kaplan's historio-graphical introduction is very helpful, and the collection of work by both Jewish and general historians sheds much light on Kabbalah, Jewish messianism, Christian Neoplatonism, and millenarianism. While this collection of papers presents a great deal of new research, it remains a matter of debate whether the parallel growth of Jewish messianism and Christian millenarianism in the 16th and 17th centuries was essentially coincidental or much more interdependent, as Michael Heyd points out in his concluding comments. The publication fails to arrange the papers in the most logical order, and as a result the volume is somewhat disjointed and is less accessible to nonspecialist readers than it might have been.

Complementing the above, BERG and VAN DER WALL's compilation on Jewish-Christian relations in the 17th century is divided into two sections: studies and documents. In the studies section, R. Popkin's chapter titled "Jewish-Christian Theological Interchanges in Holland and England" offers the most explicit discussion of Menasseh. P. van Rooden's chapter on the Dutch theologian and rabbinic scholar Constantijn L'Empereur, and van der Wall's essay on the millenarian Petrus Serrarius, also illustrate the claim that Menasseh was "the father of Judeo-Christian friendship." The second half of the book presents many valuable sources, including Menasseh's preface to the vocalized Mishnah (1646), the Latin contents of his Nishmat Hayyim, and his Compendium Kabbalae. The careful scholarship enhances significantly the reader's appreciation of Menasseh's many contributions to the developing Christian-Jewish dialogue of the 17th century.

Méchoulan and Nahon's edition of MANASSEH's Hope of Israel includes informative introductory sections on the Jews of Amsterdam and Menasseh's life and scholarship. It also provides notes and a detailed introduction. In addition, Popkin contributes an interesting note on Menasseh's English translator, Moses Wall. This edition makes a key primary resource for early modern Jewish history readily accessible to a general audience, and it is essential reading for anyone who wishes to understand Menasseh's life and writings.

Similarly, WOLF's classic edition of Menasseh's writings and pamphlets requesting the readmission of the Jews to England is of the greatest value. Published in 1901, it remains a basic work.

SUZANNE D. RUTLAND

Mendele Moykher Sforim 1835–1917

Russian pioneer of modern Hebrew and Yiddish literature

Aberbach, David, Realism, Caricature, and Bias: The Fiction of Mendele Mocher Sefarim, London and Washington, D.C.: The Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 1993

Frieden, Ken, Classic Yiddish Fiction: Abramovitsh, Sholem Aleichem, and Peretz (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish Literature and Culture), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995

Madison, Charles A., Yiddish Literature: Its Scope and Major Writers, New York: Ungar, 1968

Miron, Dan, A Traveler Disguised: A Study in the Rise of Modern Yiddish Fiction in the Nineteenth Century, New York: Schocken, 1973

Miron, Dan and Ken Frieden (editors), Tales of Mendele the Book Peddler: Fishke the Lame and Benjamin the Third (Library of Yiddish Classics), introduction by Dan Miron, translations by Ted Gorelick and Hillel Halkin, New York: Schocken, 1996

Zuckerman, Marvin, Gerald Stillman, and Marion Herbst (editors), Selected Works of Mendele Moykher-Sforim (The Three Great Classic Writers of Modern Yiddish Literature, vol. 1), [Malibu, California]: Joseph Simon/Pangloss Press, 1991

Novelist, essayist, social critic, and reformer, Sholem Yankev Abramovitsh took his pen name from the fictional narrator of his novels, Mendele Moykher Sforim (Mendele the Book Peddler). The author, known as the father of both modern Yiddish and modern Hebrew literature, had a genius for language, creating a Yiddish fiction whose realism was influenced by Dickens and Gogol. Abramovitsh began his career as a Hebrew writer but switched to Yiddish early on in order to reach a wider audience. Toward the end of his life, Abramovitsh returned to writing in Hebrew. Translating his own novels from Yiddish into Hebrew, he crafted a modern Hebrew literary prose where previously there had been none, this at a time when Hebrew was not once more a spoken language. The focus of Abramovitsh's writing was on the teeming, desperately poor Jewish communities of the Russian Pale of Settlement. Although he viewed Jewish life in Eastern Europe with a critical eye, he tempered his satiric censure by sympathetic identification with the poignant human plight of the shtetl world.

ABERBACH's book begins with a comparative study of the five novels that Abramovitsh wrote in Yiddish and translated into Hebrew in the latter part of his career and goes on to explore the interwoven strands of realism, social criticism, Jewish self-hate, satire, and autobiography in Abramovitsh's writing. The book includes a bibliography of Abramovitsh's works and a bibliography of secondary sources.

FRIEDEN devotes the first section of his study of the three greatest Yiddish writers to Abramovitsh. Beginning with a chronology and short biography of Abramovitsh's life, he continues with a literary analysis of the author's fictional work by focusing on the evolution of Abramovitsh's literary alter ego, Mendele the Book Peddler. The persona of Mendele appears in all of Abramovitsh's novels, and although some critics claim that Mendele is a static figure, Frieden maintains that he evolves over the course of Abramovitsh's career. As Frieden sees it, the author altered the Mendele persona in his Hebrew stories, "retaining his irony but rendering the overall effect less subversive." He concludes with a short survey of critical views of Abramovitsh. The book provides both an overview and a close reading of Abramovitsh's fiction. Drawing upon historical, political, social, and religious events, Frieden provides the background that situates Abramovitsh in a time and place. The book includes a bibliography of primary and secondary sources and a list of English translations.

MADISON discusses Abramovitsh's work in the context of the development of Yiddish literature. In chapter two, which he devotes to the author, he gives an overview of Abramovitsh's work while placing him in the overall tradition of Yiddish writing. Although Madison discusses Abramovitsh's literary output, his approach is more historical than literary. He focuses on the social conditions of the Jews in the Russian Pale of Settlement and demonstrates how Abramovitsh responded in his works to the misery he saw around him. Madison's chapter is useful as a brief introduction to the study of Abramovitsh. A bibliography of Yiddish writings in English translation and a bibliography of source materials are included.

MIRON and FRIEDEN's book is part of the Library of Yiddish Classics series, edited by Harvard Yiddish scholar Ruth R. Wisse. The tales included in the book are English translations of Fishke the Lame and The Brief Tales of Benjamin the Third. Miron's informative introduction examines Abramovitsh as a cultural and literary figure whose linguistic and literary innovations pointed the way for the Yiddish and Hebrew writers who followed. Miron argues that Abramovitsh projected for the first time in modern literature "the historical presence and unique lifestyle of the traditional premodern Eastern European Jewish community as a total, complex, and aesthetically balanced and self-contained 'world.'" Miron discusses Abramovitsh's evocation of the shtetl world through his literary creation of the three prototypical small towns of Glupsk (Ksalon in Hebrew), Tuneyadevka (Betalon), and Kabtsansk (Kabtsiel). These towns represent the entire Russian Jewish Pale of Settlement where living conditions were abysmal and the spiritual and intellectual life of its inhabitants, in Abramovitsh's view, were backward and stifling. The depiction of this imaginary geographical space whose very names are comical—Foolsville, Idleville, and Paupersville—provides the canvas for Abramovitsh's biting satire, according to Miron. Against this Jewish mass stands the author's other brilliant creation, the figure of Mendele the Book Peddler, who is of the shtetl world but also has distance from it as a result of his trade—he is on the road all the time. He thus serves as the perfect mouthpiece for Abramovitsh. The two ably translated novels included in this volume serve as models of Abramovitsh's art.

MIRON'S book examines the rise of modern Yiddish literature in the 19th century through an analysis of the fictional figure of Mendele the Book Peddler. "The rhetorical position of the figure of Mendele and its function as an ironic persona are analyzed as indication of a historical-cultural-literary situation, not as mere specimens of the art of storytelling," writes Miron. The book presents a far-reaching discussion of the strategies employed by Abramovitsh—the harsh critic of Jewish life in the Pale—in order to make it possible for his social, reformist agenda to coexist with his equally compelling artistic, literary impulse. It is indispensable reading for anyone interested in Abramovitsh's literary enterprise in particular and in the development of 19th-century Yiddish literature in general. The book includes several pages of illustrations and an extensive bibliography.

The anthology edited by ZUCKERMAN, STILLMANN, AND HERBST is the first extensive collection in English translation of the most important parts of Abramovitsh's literary output. It includes two complete novels, excerpts from several others, a short story, a memoir, a brief biography, a chronology, a selective bibliography, and a glossary of the Yiddish and Hebrew terms retained in the translations. Each work in the anthology is preceded by an introduction by one of the editors. The extensive background material combined with the large number of Abramovitsh's translated works makes the book an invaluable resource. It is highly recommended as a starting point in any study of Abramovitsh.

NANETTE STAHL

Mendelssohn, Moses 1729–1786

German Enlightenment philosopher, theologian, and advocate of civil rights

- Altmann, Alexander, Moses Mendelssohn: A Biographical Study, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973
- Arkush, Allan, Moses Mendelssohn and the Enlightenment (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994
- Breuer, Edward, The Limits of Enlightenment: Jews, Germans, and the Eighteenth-Century Study of Scripture, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1996
- Katz, Jacob, Tradition and Crisis: Jewish Society at the End of the Middle Ages, New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1961
- Lowenstein, Steven M., The Berlin Jewish Community: Enlightenment, Family, and Crisis, 1770–1830 (Studies in Jewish History), London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993
- Meyer, Michael, The Origins of the Modern Jew: Jewish Identity and European Culture in Germany, 1749–1824, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1967
- Sorkin, David, Moses Mendelssohn and the Religious Enlightenment, Berkeley: University of California Press, and London: Halban, 1996

There has been a palpable surge of interest in Moses Mendelssohn in recent years. This development no doubt has been occasioned, at least in part, by the burgeoning of the field of Holocaust studies and the attention this relatively new field has focused on the German-Jewish relationship generally. Whether one views this relationship as hostile by definition or as something more benign, Mendelssohn emerges as a key figure. Discussions of Mendelssohn tend to conform to an agreed formula: thinker torn between two worlds. Where scholars differ is in the way they choose to people and color these worlds.

KATZ's subtitle is misleading, for when he speaks of the Middle Ages he is not using the standard European periodization. The focus of this classic study is on the disintegration of the traditional Jewish world, a process Katz locates between the 16th and 18th centuries. The book operates at a significant level of abstraction, focusing more on institutions than on individuals. Indeed, Katz's treatment of Mendelssohn in the book's closing sections is really more an analysis of the Haskalah than it is a discussion of the thinker. This metonymy allows Mendelssohn to emerge as larger than life. He becomes a symbol perched somewhere between the old world and the new.

MEYER's book, although now more than 30 years old, remains a serviceable introduction to the dynamic period in German-Jewish history between 1750 and 1825. The first two chapters provide a concise yet learned introduction to Mendelssohn's life and thought. The book's focus is on the question of what happens to Jewish life once it comes to occupy just one segment of a person's existence. The split here is between Mendelssohn the philosopher and Mendelssohn the Jew. The author's treatment of the thinker is ultimately colored by the book's progression toward the 19th century's more romantically inspired conceptions of Judaism. Mendelssohn's rational synthesis of Judaism and Enlightenment is thus deemed "an ephemeral solution."

ALTMANN's is the most comprehensive book on Mendelssohn ever published in any language. Now more than a quarter-century old, it remains the standard work. Altmann's is the only English-language book that claims to present a life of Mendelssohn. Altmann deems Mendelssohn German Jewry's patron saint, at once emphasizing his contributions to German language and culture and crystallizing his reputation as devoted Jew, philosopher of Judaism, and advocate of Jewish civil rights. Although today's scholars have begun to move away from Altmann's bifurcated approach, his book nevertheless continues to set the tone of much Mendelssohn research. Scholars will use Altmann's work as the foundation for more focused studies. Important as it is, however, this is a long (900 pages) and unwieldy book without an easily discernible argument.

LOWENSTEIN stresses that "this study does not seek to answer the ideological questions underlying much of the debate over the Berlin Haskala. Its purpose, rather, is to give a clear picture of the nature of the events that took place among Berlin Jewry in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries." Lowenstein's focus on the day-to-day helps highlight those aspects of Mendelssohn's career that are often overlooked by more philosophically oriented studies. Lowenstein sheds light, for instance, on Mendelssohn's involvement in the silk trade, a connection he maintained through much of his life. The author's approach is also valuable in showing how Mendelssohn, who was at some points a catalyst for change and at others a conservative force, was often out of step with his community.

ARKUSH rejects the notion that Mendelssohn was torn between Judaism and Enlightenment philosophy. "Mendelssohn was able, with little difficulty, to harmonize the doctrines of natural religion with the tenets of Judaism," writes Arkush. He identifies two alternative sources of tension in Mendelssohn's defense of the Jewish Bible: Mendelssohn's espousal of liberal politics, on the one hand, and the still more difficult problems posed by Spinozan historical criticism, on the other. Arkush claims that Mendelssohn was aware of the flaws of his defense, but he cynically papered them over so as to preserve his credentials as a loyal Jew. The book is a Straussian attempt to view the surface of Mendelssohn's work as in conflict with its subtext. As such, it is not entirely convincing.

SORKIN's book is, in part, a response to "the need for a succinct and accessible interpretation of Mendelssohn's Jewish thought." Sorkin maintains that this body of work, much of which was written in Hebrew, has been largely ignored by scholars, and what has emerged as a result is a distorted understanding of Mendelssohn's oeuvre. The author's focus on the Hebrew works helps bring to light Mendelssohn's debt to the Andalusian tradition, an approach developed in medieval times in which sacred texts are seen not as vessels of esoteric truth but as sources of practical knowledge, best understood literally. The book unfolds in three roughly chronological sections devoted to Mendelssohn's philosophy, exegesis, and politics, respectively. Throughout, the author shows how Mendelssohn privileged practical concerns over speculative ones in both his Hebrew and German works. In so doing, and through depicting Mendelssohn as a religious Enlightener, Sorkin narrows the gap between Mendelssohn's "two faces."

BREUER lays bare what is perhaps the Haskalah's central irony: that the Jewish Enlightenment was at once an attempt to emulate contemporary European thinking and at the same time a harking back to medieval exegetical traditions. The book's early chapters juxtapose the long history of Jewish Bible commentary with the younger tradition of text-critical methods of interpretation. In this context, Breuer introduces his analysis of Mendelssohn's Bible translation, "the most important and enduring scholarly work of the German Haskala." Breuer succeeds in locating Mendelssohn's project between no fewer than four coordinates: new European trends, revived medieval methods, the tradition-bound rabbinic of Mendelssohn's day, and those acculturated Jews who had already turned their backs on Judaism completely. Breuer's narrowly focused approach allows a very complex and nuanced Mendelssohn to emerge.

GABRIEL SANDERS

Messer Leon Family

- Carpi, Daniel, "Notes on the Life of Rabbi Judah Messer Leon," in Studi sull'ebraismo italiano: in memoria di Cecil Roth, edited by Elio Toaff, Rome: Barulli, 1974
- Messer Leon, Judah, Nofet tsufim, c.1474–1477; translated and edited by Isaac Rabinowitz as The Book of the Honeycomb's Flow/Sepher Nopheth Suphim, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1983
- Tirosh-Rothschild, Hava, Between Worlds: The Life and Thought of Rabbi David ben Judah Messer Leon (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991

Two members of the Messer Leon family have been studied in depth. Judah ben Jehiel Rofeh, known as Messer Leon (c.1420–1497/1499), was a rabbi and head of yeshivot in Ancona, Padua, Bologna, Mantua, and Naples as well as a physician and a productive philosophical writer. His son, David ben Judah Messer Leon (c.1460–after 1530), was a rabbi and philosophical writer about Jewish religious belief. Most scholarship on the two is in German and Hebrew, but two important recent books about them are in English.

Judah (Leon), born in northern Italy around 1420, was a physician. In 1452, probably because of his medical activity, the emperor and pope conferred on him the title of "Master," which became added to his name as "Messer Leon." Messer Leon was the head of the yeshivah in Ancona by 1454. He was active in Padua in 1470, in Venice and Bologna in 1471–1472, and in Naples from about 1480 to 1495.

Messer Leon wrote commentaries on Yedaiah Bedersi's Behinat Olam; on Aristotle's logical treatises, Isagoge, Categories, and De interpretatione; on four books of Aristotle's Physics and his Posterior Analytics; and on Maimonides' Guide for the Perplexed. He also wrote supercommentaries on Averroës's commentaries on Aristotle's Prior Analytics and Ethics. He wrote a Hebrew grammar book, Liwnat ha-Sapir, a logic textbook, Mikhlol Yofi, and a book on rhetoric for Hebrew, Nofet Tsufim, translated here as The Book of the Honeycomb's Flow. This, the first Hebrew book by a living author to appear in print, was published in Mantua, probably between 1474 and 1477, without Judah's supervision.

CARPI publishes some Latin and Hebrew documents about Judah's activities.

The scholarship on Judah is collected in Rabinowitz's introduction to MESSER LEON, a systematic account of the art of rhetoric. Rabinowitz's text and translation of The Book of the Honeycomb's Flow occupy most of the book. Messer Leon wrote the Hebrew rhetoric manual as a service to his yeshivah students, many of whom also studied medicine at the Italian universities. Rhetoric, like grammar and logic, was a liberal art that all medical students were required to study. Messer Leon equally intended to demonstrate his belief that the Hebrew Bible was the source of all learning, including the art of rhetoric, as well as being the highest example of rhetorical expression. The book is organized on the pattern of two main precedents: the Middle Commentary of Averroës on Aristotle's Rhetoric and a classical Latin book, the Rhetorica ad Herennium, that medieval scholars thought was written by Cicero. Messer Leon illustrated all these authors' arguments with examples from the Hebrew of the Bible, so that the book presents rhetorical analysis of many biblical passages. The first part of Messer Leon's book defines rhetoric and the good orator. The second part discusses the ways to organize the three different kinds of rhetorical argument: courtroom pleading, political deliberation, and praising or blaming. The third part discusses the different kinds of human character and the different emotions. The fourth part presents the possible figures of speech, each one exemplified by biblical illustrations.

David, Messer Leon's son, was born in Venice, ordained a rabbi in Naples at the age of 18, was active in Istanbul (1496–1497), Salonica (Thessaloniki, c.1504), and Valona (in what is now Albania, 1510), and probably died in Salonica during the 1530s. TIROSH-ROTHSCHILD provides the only intellectual biography of David, and she and Carpi dispute several of Rabinowitz's conclusions, notably the dates of David's birth, of Judah's travels, and of important letters. Four of the seven chapters of the book integrate the events of his life into their social and cultural background, and the last three chapters analyze the doctrines in his writings. Tirosch-Rothschild emphasizes the importance of the background to David's activity. He became a leader in a Jewish community at a time when major upheavals destroyed some Jewish communities, led to the creation of others, and compelled Jewish scholars to reformulate their beliefs under new circumstances. David was among the teachers whose work enabled Kabbalah, previously known only to small numbers of devotees, to be integrated into general Jewish belief, along with philosophy.

Tirosch-Rothschild's first chapter sketches the economic, social, and political settings of Jewish life in Italy at the time of David's birth as well as the activity of his influential father, Judah. The second chapter reconstructs David's education, which combined Jewish law, Latin and Greek literature, philosophy, and Kabbalah. He studied in Padua and Naples, but, after the French invasion of 1495, he went to the Ottoman Empire. There he had to defend his Italian version of Jewish learning against the opposition of the majority of the Jewish population, new émigrés from Spain.

Chapter three traces his encounter with Ottoman Jewish life in Constantinople. There, his Italian manner of preaching led him to lose his rabbinic post. His request for financial support from a Jewish patroness in Florence was the occasion for his writing a book, Shevah ha-Nashim (In Praise of Women), which is in manuscript.

Chapter four surveys other controversies in which David was involved. He supported the Romaniot (Greek) Jewish authority, Rabbi Moses Capsali, in 1496–1497. In Valona, in about 1510, he disputed with Sephardi Jews. David wrote accounts of these disputes in two books of responsa, one of which was published in the 19th century as Kevod Hakhamim (The Honor of Scholars), and another that remains in manuscript. His commentary on Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, called Ein ha-Kore (The Eye of the Reader), in manuscript, records his defense of Maimonides in 1506 while in Salonica.

Chapter five presents the configuration of David's learning that made him a hakham kolel, a "complete" or "comprehensive scholar," who was competent in all branches of knowledge, including philosophy and theology. David harmonizes reason and revelation in his book Magen David (Shield of David).

Chapters six and seven explain the systematic theology presented in David's book Tehillah le-David (David's Praise). Chapter six summarizes his theology, notably his definition of the dogmas of Judaism. In contrast with such formulations of Jewish dogma as Maimonides' 13 principles, David argues that the three essential dogmas of Judaism are creation ex nihilo, prophecy, and miracles.

Chapter seven explains divinity: the existence and attributes of God, the essence of God, and divine knowledge and providence. The arguments and conclusions combine Kabbalah with Aristotelianism, as refracted through Thomas Aquinas.

ARTHUR M. LESLEY

Messiah and Messianism

Charlesworth, James H. (editor), The Messiah:

Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity (The First Princeton Symposium on Judaism and Christian Origins), Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1992

Ravitzky, Aviezer, Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism), translated by M. Zwirsky and J. Chipman, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996

Saperstein, Marc (editor), Essential Papers on Messianic Movements and Personalities in Jewish History (Essential Papers on Jewish Studies Series), New York: New York University Press, 1992

Scholem, Gershom G., Sabbatai Sevi: The Mystical Messiah, 1626–1676, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973

Solomon, Norman, Judaism and World Religion (Library of Philosophy and Religion), New York: St. Martin's, and London: Macmillan, 1991

Urbach, Efraim E., Hazal, pirke emunot ve-de'ot, 1969; translated by Israel Abrahams as The Sages: Their Concepts and Beliefs, 2 vols., Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1975; Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987

The biblical Hebrew word mashiah ("Messiah") means "anointed"; both high priests (Exodus 29:7) and kings (1 Samuel 10:1) were inducted into their sacred callings by ceremonies of anointment. Deutero-Isaiah refers to Cyrus, king of Persia, as "anointed," meaning that he was fulfilling, albeit unwittingly, God's mission to restore Israel (Isaiah 45:1).

By the first century B.C.E., the concept had arisen that an anointed descendant of David would arise to defeat the Lord's enemies, restore Israel to its land, free the world from war and want, and rule over a redeemed humanity. This idea, destined to play a significant role in the development of Judaism as well as Christianity, is a conflation of various biblical prophecies such as those in 2 Samuel 7:9, Ezekiel 37:21, Joel 3:14, Amos 5:18, Isaiah 11 and 27:13, and Zechariah 9:9–10, 14:9.

CHARLESWORTH's collection of papers presented at a Princeton Symposium on Judaism and Christian Origins contains a wealth of up-to-date scholarship on the development of the Messiah concept from its genesis in the Hebrew scriptures to its flowering in the first and second centuries C.E., both in early Christianity and in rabbinic culture. Full consideration is given to the evidence from the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Controversial issues, including the significance of the varied titles applied to Jesus, such as "Son of Man," are handled sensitively and with authority, and there is a wealth of penetrating studies on topics such as the Messianic Banquet, the relationship between conversion and messianism, and messianic figures and movements in first-century Palestine. Charlesworth himself contends that the common portrayal of the Jewish world in the time of Jesus as feverishly obsessed with messianic expectation is wide of the mark; such fervor, he maintains, was largely confined to small apocalyptic groups. The Jewish philosopher and contemporary of Jesus, Philo of Alexandria, seems, on the surface, unconcerned with messianic issues; yet Peter Borgen, in a penetrating study of Philo's political theory, demonstrates how deep-seated are the messianic elements in Philo's expectation of an ideal emperor with a universal mission.

RAVITZKY, a leading Israeli academic and philosopher, brings to his book the unique insights of one who has worked in the political arena to combat the excesses of radical messianism that he perceives as an aberration in contemporary Jewish Orthodoxy. His description of how the 19th-century religious "harbingers of Zion" such as Judah Alkalai and Tsevi Hirsch Kalischer, under the influence of burgeoning European nationalisms, moved from a passive "yearning for Zion" to an active, even radical, political program, is vivid yet unflinchingly careful in its scholarship. It prepares the way for him to assess the dilemma of Orthodoxy, which now has to relate itself to a Jewish state that, contrary to messianic prediction, remains secular and has not brought the expected era of peace, ingathering of the exiles, and rebuilding of the Temple. Many readers will be particularly fascinated by Ravitzky's assessment of the Lubavitch movement and the tensions and radicalism generated first by the response of its fifth rebbe, Joseph Isaac Schneersohn, to secular Zionism, and more recently by the messianic claims made openly since 1992 for its last rebbe, Menahem Mendel Schneersohn, who died in 1994.

SAPERSTEIN's collection of seminal essays written over the past 75 years commences with studies of the "Second Commonwealth," including the time of Jesus, but deals mostly with later developments in Judaism up to the present day. In his introduction he notes the intermittent appearance of messianism in the Jewish world; the archetypal career of the pseudo-Messiah Shabbetai Tsevi in 1666; and the rise of Reform Judaism, socialism, and Zionism as "redemptive" movements. A penetrating essay by Eliezer Schweid further examines the metamorphosis of the messianic idea into contemporary political forms, while Menachem Kellner focuses on "Messianic Postures in Israel Today." Other sections of the book contain important essays on early Islamic (Shiite) influences on Jewish sectarianism, on Jewish pseudo-Messiahs in the period of the Crusades, on the origins of "Acute Apocalyptic Messianism" (Isaiah Tishby) after the 1492 Expulsion from Spain, and on Sabbatianism, Hasidism, and Zionism. Bat-Zion Eraqi contributes a fascinating chapter on the little-known 19th-century Yemenite pseudo-Messiah Shukr Kuhayl II.

SCHOLEM's monumental work on Shabbetai Tsevi remains the most detailed and cogent account available of any Jewish pseudo-Messiah. With profound scholarship and acute insight, he places the Sabbatian movement within the social and intellectual context of 17th-century Jewry. Shabbetai's subversion of Lurianic Kabbalah is clear; however, Scholem's contention that the antinomian tendency within Sabbatianism contributed to the rise of Reform Judaism has been doubted by some more recent scholars.

SOLOMON argues that though there is no consistent rabbinic concept of Messiah, traditional views may be conveniently expressed along seven parameters. To what extent is Messiah within or beyond the normal historical process? Is there a fixed time for his coming or does it depend on human action? Is Messiah a person or rather a "golden age"? Is his mission political or spiritual? Is it particular (directed to Israel or universal (to humankind as a whole)? Will his advent be a catastrophic or an evolutionary process? How much detail can be put into the picture? The maximal view is that the messianic advent is "not of this world"; it will come about at a pre-determined time; Messiah is a preexistent son of David on whom God's glory will descend, because God, not the Messiah, is the actual Redeemer; Israel will be delivered from its enemies, and the exiles, including the Ten Tribes, will be gathered to the land of Israel, and exercise spiritual dominion over humankind; and the coming will be a "catastrophic" event, brought about by divine intervention in history. On the minimal view, no personal Messiah will arise, no catastrophic event will take place; if and when Israel repents, its political independence will be restored, and Jerusalem will become a spiritual center for mankind. Solomon asks how much of this, beyond the general confidence in a better future, still makes sense within a modern world view; for instance, does any "ultimate solution" make sense when we think in terms of billions rather than thousands of years? He notes also the paucity of conception of what things will actually be like when the Messiah comes; how will the administration work, for instance?

URBACH's masterly study of the thought of the rabbis was first published in Hebrew in 1969, and much of the detail of its scholarship has been superseded. However, it remains one of the best and most readable introductions to classical Jewish thought, and the chapter relating to Messiah, together with other references easily traced through the index, helps to place rabbinic thinking on this subject in its broad context.

NORMAN SOLOMON

Middle East

- Ben-Zvi, Itzhak, The Exiled and the Redeemed, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1957; 2nd edition, Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute, 1976
- Cohen, Hayim J., The Jews of the Middle East, 1860-1972, New York: Wiley, 1973
- Cohen, Hayim J. and Zvi Yehuda, Asian and African Jews in the Middle East, 1860-1971: Annotated Bibliography, Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute, 1976
- Deshen, Shlomo and Walter P. Zenner (editors), Jewish Societies in the Middle East: Community, Culture, and Authority, Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1982
- Deshen, Shlomo and Walter P. Zenner (editors), Jews among Muslims: Communities in the Precolonial Middle East, New York: New York University Press, and Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire: Macmillan, 1996
- Fischel, Walter J., Jews in the Economic and Political Life of Mediaeval Islam, London: Royal Asiatic Society, 1937; New York: Ktav, 1969
- Landshut, S., Jewish Communities in the Muslim Countries of the Middle East, London: Jewish Chronicle, 1950; Westport, Connecticut: Hyperion, 1976
- Patai, Raphael, The Seed of Abraham: Jews and Arabs in Contact and Conflict, Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1986

Schechtman, Joseph B., On Wings of Eagles: The Plight, Exodus, and Homecoming of Oriental Jewry, New York: Yoseloff, 1961

Stillman, Norman A., The Jews of Arab Lands: A History and Source Book, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1979

Stillman, Norman A., The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1991

The first Jewish diaspora was in the Middle East, which hosted major Jewish communities until the mid-20th century, when most Jews emigrated these communities, mainly to Israel as well as to Western Europe and the Americas. Much research has been conducted on Jews in the region as a whole and on individual countries, much of it in Hebrew as well as in English, French, and local languages. Important bibliographies have also been compiled.

BEN-ZVI examines several Oriental Jewish communities, mostly in the Middle East. In the first part he studies ancient communities (Yemen, North Africa, Iraq, Caucasia, Georgia, Bukhara, Crimea, and Iran) and proceeds to describe a number of Jewish sects (Samaritans, the Sabbatian Dönmeḥ of Salonica, and Karaites), Jewish traditions among Muslim tribes, Oriental travel journals, and Jewish sovereign states in the diaspora. The study is augmented by interviews with members of Middle Eastern Jewish communities before and after their immigration to Israel, with whom Ben-Zvi, the second president of Israel, had close and warm relations.

COHEN's study covers the modern Middle East from the late 19th century to the 1970s. Following a historical survey up to 1870, Cohen devotes separate chapters to political, demographic, economic, and educational-cultural developments, each chapter subdivided by country. The last chapter deals with social change and examines morals and criminality, religion, and the status of women. The book includes much data and analysis, is easy to use, and deals with several major issues governing Jewish life in the region.

COHEN and YEHUDA's useful bibliography of monographs and articles has two parts: the first deals with Asian and African Jews in Israel, and the second covers the Jews of the Muslim Middle East (Egypt, Syria and Lebanon, Iraq, Kurdistan, the Arabian Peninsula, Turkey, and Iran). Each country chapter in the second part is further subdivided as follows: general works on the country; general works on its Jews; travels; demography, health, and economics; education; status of women; culture and literature; religion and customs; Jewish organizations; political situation; Zionism; aliyah; Jewish diaspora of the country in question; and bibliography. Author and place indexes are included. Most of the entries are in Hebrew but many are in English, French, and German.

DESHEN and ZENNER (1982, 1996) have edited two collections of articles on Jews in the Middle East. Both include an introductory section covering the region as a whole, followed by articles on Morocco, Tunisia, Tripolitania, Syria, Iraq, Yemen, and Iran. Among the topics dealt with are the move from tradition to modernity, communal life, social structure, relations with Muslim neighbors and colonial authorities, and religious life with special reference to women, folk songs, and education. Recommended readings for the region and by country are included. These are valuable collections, even though they do not cover the whole region, focusing instead on specific topics.

FISCHEL's book examines the economic and political role of Jews in the region from Egypt to Iran from the eighth to the 14th century and is based on Arabic and Jewish sources. The study is divided chronologically based on the Islamic regimes that governed the region and is subdivided by leading Jewish personalities whose economic activities are examined along with their political power, their dependence relations with the rulers, and their relations with the Jewish community. The study is of importance for Jewish, as well as general economic, political, and cultural history.

LANDSHUT's survey was prepared in 1950 for the American Jewish Committee and the Anglo-Jewish Association. It opens with a historical introduction on population, relations with Muslim authorities, communal organization, and the effects of colonialism and nationalism on the Jews. This is followed by country-by-country surveys covering the Middle East and North Africa, with the exception of Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco. A general Jewish population table, map, and bibliography are included. The book provides a succinct and comprehensive survey of the Jews in the early 1950s.

PATAI provides a historical and anthropological description of Jews in Arab lands and their relations with the Muslim majority from the rise of Islam to the 1980s. He examines the representation of Jews in Arab tradition, compares the life of Jews in Yemen and Morocco, and pays special attention to Jewish and Arab folklore, Middle Eastern perceptions of the feminine in the divine, and the status of women. Written by an anthropologist, this work provides much comparative data on everyday life and culture.

SCHECHEMAN focuses on the Jewish mass migration from the Middle East and North Africa to Israel in the late 1940s and early 1950s, providing a country-by-country examination of the phenomenon. Each chapter describes the history and conditions of the community prior to emigration, examines the emigration itself and its organization, and provides data on those who stayed. The concluding segment examines the integration of the immigrants in Israel. Schechtman's book is an important and comprehensive early study on the last phases of Jewish life in the Middle East and North Africa.

STILLMAN (1979) includes a survey and sources on Jews in Arab lands from the rise of Islam in the seventh century until the beginning of modernization in the 19th century. The survey starts with the encounter of Muhammad and the Jews, continues through the first three centuries under Islam to the Islamic high middle ages, and ends with the Mamluk empire and the Ottoman empire at the dawn of modern times. The sources follow the same order as the historical portions and are all annotated and published in English. An extensive bibliography and an index are included. Stillman provides an indispensable comprehensive examination and documentation of Jewish life in Arab lands.

STILLMAN (1991) is structured like his 1979 book and covers the period from the early 19th century to the almost complete exodus of Jews from Arab lands in the mid-20th century. The survey starts with the impact of the West on the region, examines social transformations, colonialism and nationalism, the influence of Zionism on Middle Eastern Jews, and the deteriorating condition of Jews in the 1930s. The survey ends with the condition of Jews during World War II and the mass migration thereafter. The sources are very rich and cover all aspects of the survey. Like Stillman's earlier volume, this is essential reading for people interested in the Middle East and North Africa, the status of minorities, and the implications of colonization and decolonization for the region.

RACHEL SIMON

See also Algeria; Egypt and Sudan; Iran, Afghanistan, and Central Asia; Iraq; Libya; Morocco; North Africa; Syria; Tunisia; Yemen and the Arabian Peninsula

Midrash Aggadah

- Boyarin, Daniel, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Braude, William (translator), Pesikta Rabboti: Discourses for Feasts, Fasts, and Special Sabbaths (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 18), 2 vols., New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1968
- Braude, William and Israel Kapstein (translators), Pesikta de-Rab Kahana: R. Kahana's Compilation of Discourses for Sabbaths and Festal Days, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1975
- Freedman, H. and Maurice Simon (editors), Midrash Rabbah, London: Soncino, 1939; 3rd edition, London and New York: Soncino, 1983
- Friedlander, Gerald (editor), Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer, London: Paul, Trench, Trubner, and New York: Bloch, 1916; 4th edition, New York: Sepher-Hermon, 1981
- Ginzberg, Louis, The Legends of the Jews, 7 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1909
- Goldin, Judah (translator), The Fathers according to Rabbi Nathan (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 10), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1955
- Hartman, Geoffrey H. and Sanford Budick (editors), Midrash and Literature, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1986
- Kalmin, Richard, "Patterns and Developments in Rabbinic Midrash of Late Antiquity," in Hebrew Bible, Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation, vol. 1, edited by Magne Sæbø, Göttingen: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1996
- Kugel, James, In Potiphar's House: The Interpretive Life of Biblical Texts, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990; 2nd edition, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1994
- Kugel, James, The Bible as It Was, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1997; revised as Traditions of the Bible: A Guide to the Bible as It Was at the Start of the Common Era, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1998
- Mack, Hananel, The Aggadic Midrash Literature (Broadcast University Series), Tel-Aviv: MOD, 1989
- Spiegel, Shalom, Me-agadot ha-'akedah, 1951; translated as The Last Trial: On the Legends and Lore of the Command to Abraham to Offer Isaac as a Sacrifice: The Akedah, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1967
- Stern, David, Parables in Midrash: Narrative and Exegesis in Rabbinic Literature, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1991
- Strack, Hermann Leberecht and Günter Stemberger, Einleitung in Talmud und Midrasch, 1982; translated by Markus Bockmuehl as Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, Edinburgh: Clark, 1991, 2nd edition, 1996

The study of midrash aggadah (the classical rabbinic interpretation of Scripture for any purpose other than elucidation of the law—be it moral exhortation or popular storytelling) may be approached from various perspectives, and the meaning of aggadah itself has given rise to a plethora of scholarly works. In addition to synchronic compilations of aggadot, recent publications include diachronic analyses of the development of particular stories and folklore. Furthermore, there is a keen interest among postmodern literary theorists in the study of midrash as literary discourse. In a similar vein, midrashic scholars have used literary theory to understand not only the use of certain exegetical techniques but also the meaning of midrash as a literary and cultural artifact.

BOYARIN's work, dealing primarily and explicitly with midrash through a postmodern critical lens, is an invaluable contribution to the field of midrashic studies. Scholars consider his introduction a groundbreaking, masterful exposition of midrash as an interpretative discourse that is historically and ideologically situated. Boyarin exploits the concept of intertextuality to describe both the Bible itself and the rabbinic code used to interpret the text. Through a study of the Mekhilta and its use of quotations, he illustrates how rabbinic interpretation is both the continuation and disruption of tradition. Although the work deals with an essentially halakhic corpus, on a more general level, it attempts to determine "what sort of theory would allow [the rabbis] to make the interpretive moves they make."

HARTMAN and BUDICK's collection of essays discussing the nature of midrash is a felicitous entry into the study of midrash as literature. The anthology is particularly useful to those readers interested in examining the relationship between midrash and contemporary literary inquiry. The work in general draws attention to the ways in which midrash reads Scripture. It is important to note, however, that some of the studies in this compilation are more relevant than others. One of the most significant essays is Heinemann's "Nature of the Aggadah," where he discusses aggadah as a method of "creative genesis," a means by which the rabbis used Scripture to wrestle with contemporary issues. Goldin's essay, "Freedom and Restraint of Haggadah," conceives of aggadah as the essential counterpart to halakhah and focuses on the necessity of their interplay, for "they are an articulation of the fundamental, universal, interminable combat of obedience and individual conceit." In addition to these articles, Fishbane's "Inner Biblical Exegesis: Types and Strategies of Interpretation in Ancient Israel," James Kugel's "Two Introductions to Midrash," and Frank Kermode's "Plain Sense of Things" help illuminate various aspects of the nature of midrash aggadah.

STERN's in-depth analysis provides the reader with a clear understanding of the function of the mashal (parable) in rabbinic literature. Stern explores the compositional and exegetical techniques of the mashal, its rhetoric, and its role in midrashic discourse. He claims that parables about kings constitute the preeminent form of narrative in rabbinic literature, and he argues that this form provides a point of entry into nearly every aspect of this literature and its interpretation. Stern only analyzes meshalim found in Midrash Lamentations Rabbah, but his treatment provides readers not only with a great appreciation for the structure of these texts, but also with a model of how to approach midrash as a whole. That is, he examines meshalim as both narrative and exegesis; at the same time he takes into account the historical context in which they were created. Although he emphasizes the mashal, Stern also examines other literary forms such as the petihta (the proem of a homiletic midrash), and the ma'aseh (reportage). This work is an important resource not only for those examining the mashal in particular, but also for those desiring a better sense of the literary character of midrash aggadah.

MACK's work is an excellent introduction to the various corpora and exegetical methods of midrash aggadah. In addition to an important exposition of the meaning and nature of aggadah, the work includes a lucid discussion of related topics such as the historical context that gave rise to this form of literature. One welcome feature of Mack's work is its successful attempt to cover several, if not all, aspects of midrash aggadah in a comprehensive yet concise manner.

In his review essay on midrash, which includes an exhaustive bibliography on midrashic studies, KALMIN discusses the most salient features of midrash and pays special attention to the differences between the midrash of Palestine and Babylonia, the two centers of rabbinic Judaism. This article also surveys works that deal with such issues as the relationship between the diverse exegetical schools and the Sitz im Leben of rabbinic exegesis. Kalmin concludes with an instructive examination of a midrashic text found in "chronologically and geographically diverse rabbinic compilations." His balanced perspective, which takes into account both the literary and historical aspects of midrash, is a significant contribution to the field.

SPIEGEL's work is a perspicacious examination of various ancient texts that interpret the akedah (the binding of Isaac in Genesis 22). The author not only examines postbiblical writings such as the works of Philo, midrashim, talmudic sources, the gospels, and patristic literature, he also gives serious consideration to traditional biblical commentary and higher criticism. First written in Hebrew, this study was originally designed to serve as an introduction to "The Akedah," a 12th-century poem by Rabbi Ephraim of Bonn, which Spiegel, primarily a scholar of medieval Hebrew poetry, edited and analyzed for publication. The volume is a rich resource for anyone interested in literature on the akedah trope. The sophistication and magnitude of the author's work is universally recognized by scholars of midrash.

KUGEL (1990) examines a series of stories pertaining to the Joseph narrative and seeks "to present a methodological model for reading early biblical interpretation." The author devotes part one of the study to various exegetical motifs underlying narrative expansions of the Joseph story in Jewish sources; Kugel also makes some references to relevant Christian and Muslim texts. In part two, he deals with a variety of stories and motifs. He discusses, for example, biblical texts of a non-legal character such as the tale of Lamech and Psalm 137, and he examines the injunction of Leviticus 19:17, "You shall not hate your brother in your heart; you shall surely reproach your neighbor, and you shall bear no sin because of him." To illustrate how early exegetes dealt with this verse, Kugel draws on such works as the Wisdom of Ben Sira, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Damascus Document (one of the many writings of the Qumran community), and the Sifra, a compilation of tannaitic midrashim on Leviticus. At the end of part two, after having examined the ways in which exegetical motifs develop, Kugel formulates nine theses, "general conclusions about the workings of biblical exegesis as a whole," that are essential to understanding the creation and development of postbiblical exegesis. The glossary familiarizes the reader with important terms and sources related to the study of midrash aggadah.

The unprecedented work of GINZBERG, the aggadic scholar par excellence, is the most comprehensive collection of aggadic material extant. His compilation of folklore, tales, and legends is not limited to rabbinic literature but draws also from targumim and medieval biblical commentaries. The first four volumes provide the general reader with hundreds of legends. Volumes five and six contain notes to the previous volumes and are replete with rabbinic and pseudepigraphic parallels as well as references to the writings of the church fathers, and volume seven provides an index to this mine of aggadic material.

Although not of the same magnitude as Ginzberg's work, KUGEL's (1997; revised, 1998) work is also a synchronic collection of biblical interpretation. Kugel limits the scope of his work to the centuries just before and after the beginning of the common era, from approximately 200 B.C.E. to 150 C.E., and he deals with motifs and interpretations based on two dozen stories found in the Torah. The work attempts to reconstruct the Bible as it was understood in this period, a daunting task. Kugel successfully elucidates how these ancient biblical interpretations "came to cling to the biblical text." The author examines texts culled from such sources as Philo, Josephus, the Dead Sea Scrolls, and the rabbis, and he offers an erudite commentary on the selected material. He explains the interpreter's modus operandi and demonstrates how particular exegetical techniques gave rise to crucial transformations in the meaning of a biblical story. This work, an expanded version of his The Bible as It Was, is useful to the general reader and the biblical expert alike.

First published in 1887, STRACK's bibliographic guide remains invaluable as a result of STEMBERGER's complete revision. The book briefly introduces each work and refers the reader to extant manuscripts, printed editions, translations, and secondary literature. Each rabbinic work is also discussed in terms of its history, character, and date of origin. Scholars in the field readily acknowledge the scope of Strack and Stem-berger's contribution to rabbinic studies. Their introduction is a superb point of entry into the vast material of rabbinic literature.

FREEDMAN and SIMON have edited the standard English translation of the Midrash Rabbah. Replete with extensive notes and indexes, this ten-volume work, the first of its kind, attempts to be both faithful to the original text and intelligible to the common reader. Each component work is preceded by an introduction that discusses the putative dating and possible place of origin as well as the fundamental features and distinguishing characteristics of the individual compilation.

GOLDIN's translation of Avot de Rabbi Natan, the earliest extant commentary on the mishnaic tractate Avot, is a significant addition to the rich library of rabbinic texts in English translation. His work, the first English translation of this text, is based on Solomon Schechter's edited text, which was first published in 1887. The synopsis of each chapter is a helpful guide for those unfamiliar with Avot. Goldin draws upon the works of traditional commentators of both Avot and Avot de Rabbi Natan to provide the reader with copious notes that not only facilitate the reading of the work but also contribute to an understanding of the transmission and inner workings of rabbinic literature.

FRIEDLANDER's translation of Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer, a composite aggadic work redacted in the ninth century, is meticulous and draws upon a wide range of primary and secondary sources. Friedlander bases his translation on an unedited manuscript belonging to Abraham Epstein of Vienna, but he also consults Genizah fragments and other manuscripts including those edited by Horowitz. The extensive footnotes refer readers to parallel sources, explain ambiguous allusions in the text, indicate manuscript variants, and give historical, theological, and literary references that place the work within the broader contexts of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

BRAUDE's two-volume English rendering of Pesikta Rabbati is exemplary in its scope. The translator has an acute awareness of textual nuance. He points out variants among the manuscripts, and his notes render obscure comments comprehensible. Moreover, his discussion of the distinguishing characteristics of Pesikta Rabbati is substantive and especially useful to those unfamiliar with its content and method.

Braude's talent for translating ancient sources is also apparent in BRAUDE and KAPSTEIN, a compilation of homiletic midrashim from Pesikta de-Rab Kahana. The introduction offers a thorough analysis of the Pesikta's contents and its structure, style, and textual history. More important, the translators exhibit a precision and sensitivity to language subtleties, evidenced in the translation itself and in the detailed footnotes, that are quite exceptional.

CAROL BAKHOS

Midrash Halakhah: Translations

Basser, Herbert W. (editor and translator), Midrashic Interpretations of the Song of Moses, New York: Lang, 1984

Hammer, Reuven (editor and translator), Sifre: A Tannaitic Commentary on the Book of Deuteronomy (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 24), New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1986.

Lauterbach, Jacob (editor and translator), Mekilta de-Rabbi Ishmael (Schiff Library of Jewish Classics), 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1933-35.

Levertoff, Paul (editor and translator), Midrash Sifre on Numbers: Selections from Early Rabbinic Scriptural Interpretations, New York: Macmillan, and London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1926.

Neusner, Jacob (editor and translator), Sifre to Numbers: An American Translation and Explanation (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 118-119), 2 vols., Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1986

Neusner, Jacob (editor and translator), Sifre to Deuteronomy: An Analytical Translation (Brown Judaic Studies), 2 vols., Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1987

Neusner, Jacob (editor and translator), Mekhilta according to Rabbi Ishmael: An Analytical Translation (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 148), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988

Neusner, Jacob (editor and translator), Sifra: An Analytical Translation (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 138-140), 3 vols., Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988

Neusner, Jacob (editor and translator), The Components of the Rabbinic Documents: From the Whole to the Parts, vol. 12, pts. 1-3: Sifre to Numbers (South Florida Academic Commentary Series, nos. 104-106), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1998

Translation of halakhic midrash is a paradoxical enterprise insofar as the results are most usable by those who need them least. The idiom of this literature, even in translation, demands an intimacy with the rabbinic mind, its legal categories and methods of scriptural interpretation. To anyone else the works will appear as so much foolishness and have sometimes been categorized as such by those who have an insufficient grasp of antique exegesis in general and the rabbis, their methods, and objectives in particular. This is also true of the narrative sections of midrashic literature, but an ability to spot the mechanics of rabbinic interpretation at work is even more indispensable when it comes to the extrapolation of detailed law from Scripture. No translation will suffice to convey this aptitude, which requires extended study and experience. With the premise that all these translations will be of value only in proportion to the familiarity that the reader brings to the literature, some general appraisals of what is available are presented below.

HAMMER's translation of Sifre, the halakhic midrash on Deuteronomy, shows much industry in finding the proper English idiom to render technical Hebrew vocabulary. The problem is that his work is very uneven and has a number of gross misunderstandings of complex legal terminology. His rendition of the narrative portions also fails to hit the mark in a number of instances. The upshot is that the translation is unreliable in its details but acceptable in the main as a plausible representation of the gist of Sifre Deuteronomy.

NEUSNER (1987) has followed his predecessor (giving acknowledgement) and corrected a number of Hammer's mistranslations in the legal portions, but Neusner has introduced a number of debatable renderings himself. In his introduction to the large section of narrative in Sifre Deuteronomy he acknowledges that Herbert W. Basser's Midrashic Interpretations of the Song of Moses (see below) provides a much better understanding in difficult places than Hammer's work. Having realized this, he nevertheless follows Hammer almost exclusively to the detriment of his rendition.

NEUSNER (1988a) fares better with his translation of the halakhic midrash on Exodus, but then again LAUTERBACH has produced a first-rate translation for him to consult. Neusner's work lacks notes and commentary, a necessity that all other translators provide, and as a result Neusner leaves the reader inevitably bemused at times. Midrash halakhah is often predictable and similarly often a very complex and obscure genre that absolutely demands some kind of commentary. Lauterbach includes some notes and references in his edition, as well as his own critical edition of the Hebrew text as a basis for the translation.

NEUSNER (1986) has the rather poor model of LEVERTOFF for some of the work he presents on Sifre on the Book of Numbers. He does not have even Levertoff as a model for the balance of the text of Sifre Numbers. NEUSNER (1998) presents the completion of his Sifre Numbers. This contribution is not nearly as readable as his translations of midrash for which he had the benefit of consulting earlier works in English. Nonetheless, it is an attempt at literal rendition.

NEUSNER (1988b) translates the halakhic midrash on Leviticus, a project in which Neusner has invested much effort. Like much of his Sifre Numbers, he has had to do the work without benefit of an English model to consult. The result is that a number of passages require revision and the work is too uncertain to consult with confidence. In general, the major problem with Neusner's work is that he has not studied the rabbinic commentaries, which often clarify quite convincingly the sense of the laconic wordings of halakhic midrash. A further major drawback of his work is that it is not at all indexed; other translators have provided not one but often several useful indexes, enhancing the utility of their work by providing access points by way of sources, parallels, and topics. Neusner's trademark penchant for breaking up sentences into what he considers logical units is interesting, but here one meets problems of consistency. Why does one item in a list deserve a full sentence while several other items in the same list are lumped together in another sentence, even though everything suggests that the midrash treats all equally? Still, since Neusner ensures that each unit is numbered, it does make for easy reference for any discussion that might ensue around his translations.

Only full translations into English have been considered thus far, but one should note that there are translations of sections of these midrashim in English and full translations in European languages. BASSER's study referred to above is limited to the "halakhic midrash" on a non-halakhic passage, chapter 32 of the Book of Deuteronomy, but it is remarkable for the erudition and understanding that the editor brings to the methodology and context of this form of rabbinic literature.

It is not envisioned that these translations will be of much benefit to those who are not able to read the Hebrew originals, but as a guide to accompany scholars and students as they navigate their way through difficulties, each translation is of potential use. In the final analysis, the greatest problem in producing a competent translation lies in the ability of the translator to comprehend the original text. Most of the translations considered here have relied upon extant critical—but not necessarily final—editions and the notes—valuable but far from exhaustive—found within these editions. There is much important work to be done.

REENA ZEIDMAN

See also Midrash Halakhah: Introductions

Midrash Halakhah: Introductions

- Boyarin, Daniel, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Fraade, Steven, From Tradition to Commentary: Torah and Its Interpretation in the Midrash Sifre to Deuteronomy (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991
- Goldin, Judah, The Song at the Sea: Being a Commentary on a Commentary in Two Parts, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1971
- Goldin, Judah and Reuven Hammer, The Classic Midrash: Tannaitic Commentaries on the Bible (Classics of Western Spirituality), New York: Paulist, 1995
- Hammer, Reuven, Sifre: A Tannaitic Commentary on the Book of Deuteronomy (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 24), New Haven and London: Yale University 1986.
- Herr, Moshe David, "Midreshei Halakhah," in Encyclopaedia Judaica, Jerusalem: Keter, 1971
- Horowitz, Saul, "Midrash-Halakah," in The Jewish Encyclopedia: A Descriptive Record of the History, Religion, Literature, and Customs of the Jewish People from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, New York and London: Funk and Wagnalls, 1901
- Lauterbach, Jacob, Mekilta de-Rabbi Ishmael (Schiff Library of Jewish Classics), 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1933-35.
- Neusner, Jacob, Sifre to Deuteronomy: An Analytical Translation (Brown Judaic Studies, nos. 98 and 101), 2 vols., Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1987
- Neusner, Jacob, Sifre to Deuteronomy: An Introduction to the Rhetorical, Logical, and Topical Program (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 124), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1987
- Neusner, Jacob, Mekhilta According to Rabbi Ishmael: An Analytical Translation (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 148), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988
- Neusner, Jacob, Sifra in Perspective: The Documentary Comparison of the Midrashim of Ancient Judaism (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 146), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988
- Neusner, Jacob, The Canonical History of Ideas: The Place of the So-Called Tannaite Midrashim: Mekhilta

Attributed to R. Ishmael, Sifra, Sifre to Numbers, and Sifre to Deuteronomy (South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism, no. 4), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1990

Neusner, Jacob, The Components of the Rabbinic Documents: From the Whole to the Parts, (South Florida Academic Commentary Series, nos. 75–84, 89, 94–98, 100–106), 12 vols. in 23 pts., Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1997–1998

Strack, Hermann Leberecht and Günter Stemberger, Einleitung in Talmud und Midrasch, 1982; translated by Markus Bockmuehl as Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, Edinburgh: Clark, 1991, 2nd edition, 1996

Midrash halakhah denotes the corpus of interpretation by the rabbis of the first two centuries of the Common Era, aimed for the most part at extrapolating law from the biblical books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Since Genesis and Exodus 1–11 do not teach many laws, there is no legal midrash to them. The date of the compilation of these exegetical compendia remains guesswork for the most part, but it may be safely assumed that the traditions themselves are no later than the third century C.E. These midrashim are sometimes denoted by the name “tannaitic midrashim” since the authorities to whom these interpretations are attributed are exclusively the tannaim of first through early-third-century Palestine. There are very few works in English that introduce the contents and composition of tannaitic midrash.

These works are referred to as “Mekhilta according to Rabbi Ishmael,” “Mekhilta according to Rabbi Simeon bar Yohai” (both on Exodus), “Sifra” or “Torat Kohanim” (on Leviticus), “Sifrei Debei Rav” (on Numbers and Deuteronomy); there is also a work that survives in fragments known as “Mekhilta on Deuteronomy.” To this list one might add “Sifrei Zuta” on the Book of Numbers, although the bulk of the text is evidently lacking and the date of this work is still largely a matter of conjecture. In STRACK and STEMBERGER, the classic old introduction to the full range of rabbinic literature by Strack, who provided succinct characterizations of the halakhic midrashim along with a thorough bibliography, has been invaluable updated by Stemberger, whose judicious summaries and assiduous bibliographic intelligence brings the scholarship up to date as far as 1995.

The most comprehensive studies in English come from the pen of Jacob Neusner, who provides a mass of translations and analysis of the materials in his many works. NEUSNER (1997–1998) provides methodological studies in the rhetoric and topics of each of the halakhic midrashim. Besides translating the major midrashim, he has written extensive introductions to these works in separate monographs: NEUSNER (1987a, 1987b, 1988a, 1988b, 1990). In all these cases, he isolates particular forms used in the various midrashim and correlates these forms to specific messages that he sees embedded in these works, one predominant form and message per work. For example, Sifrei Deuteronomy has a separate authorship from the other works. Likewise Sifrei Numbers and Sifra are separate works addressing unique problems each in their own way. Neusner compiles impressive arrays of statistics correlating form and message. He concludes that apart from the Mekhilta according to Rabbi Ishmael, each midrash aims to present a coherent and cohesive approach to a specific issue.

Neusner’s approach, although industrious and probing, has not been well received by scholars of halakhic midrashim. Neusner delineates separate literary forms and decides that the form most used in a compilation is the form uniquely suited to that authorship for his message. Virtually every midrash scholar in the 20th century, as discussed by HOROVITZ and by HERR, has accounted for the same observations in a much simpler way. Legal materials in the halakhic midrashim are considered as mainly the product of the hermeneutic rules of one school, while narrative midrashim are usually the product of those of another school. These scholars do not doubt that the style and structure of the biblical verses being commented upon determine the form and preoccupation of the commentary in the midrashim as a whole. They do not study individual authorships of any midrashic compendium but attempt to account for the features of the literature as a whole. For them, midrash responds to the biblical texts in light of some particular wording in the Bible and in light of its genre (legal or narrative). The midrashim themselves have no message beyond elucidating the subjects of the biblical text in accordance with specific school traditions. Neusner’s method forces him to articulate imprecise categories and then to fit every compilation into a straitjacket such as “God loves Israel” or “Scripture defeats logic.” These are much too vague to work as fine classifications. In the end his proliferation of messages is not as useful as the more elegant division into two schools. Neusner had hoped to establish a paradigm shift but so far there has not been much affirmation from the scholarly world.

Other works incorporate introductions to halakhic midrashim incidental to their aim of explaining midrash aggadah (the ethical rather than legal exposition of Scripture). Among the better treatments are the translations and commentaries of select sections of midrash with incisive, subtle, and informed introductions offered by GOLDIN and by GOLDIN and HAMMER. Among the weaker offerings one might note the overpraised studies by FRAADE and by BOYARIN. These works, while popular in academic circles, fail to provide a lucid approach to the materials. Instead they offer an array of flashy interpretations that resonate in a convoluted way with current literary fads while making no attempt to address the real concerns of the rabbis and ignoring the transmitters of the texts throughout the ages. These traditional approaches to the meaning of the text are, however, entertained in the introductions to the translations by HAMMER and by LAUTERBACH as well as by Neusner.

REENA ZEIDMAN

See also Midrash Halakhah: Translations

Mikveh

Kaplan, Aryeh, Waters of Eden: An Exploration of the Concept of Mikvah: Renewal and Rebirth, New York: National Conference of Synagogue Youth of the Union of

Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, 1976, 2nd edition, 1982

Neusner, Jacob, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Purities (Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity), vols. 13–14, Leiden: Brill, 1976; as The Judaic Law of Baptism: Tractate Miqvaot in the Mishnah and the Tosefta: A Form-Analytical Translation and Commentary and a Legal and Religious History (South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism, no. 112), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1995

Slonim, Rivkah and Liz Rosenberg (editors), Total Immersion: A Mikvah Anthology, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1996

A mikveh (Hebrew: gathering) is a pool of water used for ritual immersion. NEUSNER's two volumes on the development of the rabbinic laws of the mikveh contain translations of the relevant passages in their historical context and his perceptive commentaries. At first glance, the mishnaic laws primarily supplement the biblical laws of purification by providing additional details, but Neusner underscores the extent to which the mishnaic laws express the innovations of the rabbis. This study is the foremost scholarly treatment of the subject of mikveh; Neusner translates and analyzes complex passages from the Mishnah, Tosefta, Maimonides, and other rabbinic texts concerning the construction of a mikveh, the water supply, and the immersion of people and utensils in the purifying waters.

KAPLAN's study of the mikveh includes an exploration of its biblical roots. The author observes that the first step in the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests involved immersion in a mikveh. This immersion was not, however, for purification purposes; rather, the purpose was to effect a change in status (Ex. 29:4). Kaplan also explains that in the Mishnah's account of the Temple, the mikveh played an important role on the Day of Atonement, for on that day, the high priest immersed himself in a mikveh each time he changed his vestments. The high priest was not considered impure nor unclean; he used the mikveh to change his status. In a similar manner, the mikveh may change the spiritual status of other individuals; most dramatically, when a non-Jew converts to Judaism, the mikveh marks his or her transformation. Kaplan summarizes the rules of the mikveh and gives some mystical explanations underlying its function. For example, a mikveh is comparable to a womb and enables one to have a "spiritual rebirth," although the ultimate source of purification is God, not the ritual.

The volume by SLONIM and ROSENBERG on ritual immersion in a mikveh consists of 47 essays by different authors. The book is divided into three parts: "In Theory and Practice," "Voices," and "Memories and Tales." Slonim's introduction explains in simple language the purpose of a mikveh from a contemporary Orthodox perspective, emphasizing that, although observant Jews typically use an artificial construction as their mikveh, natural bodies of water are also mikvehs and have the power to purify. Slonim also discusses the regulations for constructing, maintaining, and using a mikveh.

The book includes a discussion of "family purity," personal accounts of mikveh experiences, practical guidelines, and a list of addresses of mikvehs.

RIVKA B. KERN ULMER

Miracles

Borodowski, Alfredo F., "Isaac Abravanel on Miracles: The Tension between Biblical Exegesis and Philosophy," Ph.D. diss., Jewish Theological Seminary, 1997

Eisen, Robert, Gersonides on Providence, Covenant, and the Chosen People: A Study in Medieval Jewish Philosophy and Biblical Commentary (SUNY Series in Jewish Philosophy), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995

Heller, Joseph, "Maimonides' Theory of Miracle," in Between East and West: Essays Dedicated to the Memory of Bela Horovitz, edited by Alexander Altmann, London: East and West Library, 1958

Kellner, Menachem, "Gersonides and His Cultured Despisers: Arama and Abravanel," Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies, 6, 1976

Kellner, Menachem, "Gersonides on Miracles, the Messiah and Resurrection," Da'at, Winter 1980

Kellner, Menachem, "Gersonides on the Problem of Volitional Creation," HUCA, 1980

Ravitzky, Aviezer, "The Anthropological Theory of Miracles in Medieval Jewish Philosophy," in Studies in Medieval Jewish History and Literature, vol. 2, edited by Isadore Twersky, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1984

Reines, Alvin J., Maimonides' Concept of Miracles, Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press–Jewish Institute of Religion, 1975

Schweid, Eliezer, "The Belief in Miracles as an Article of Faith," in his Feeling and Speculation, Ramat Gan: Masadah, 1970

Urbach, Efraim E., Hazal, pirke emunot ve-de'ot, 1969; translated by Israel Abrahams as The Sages: Their Concepts and Beliefs, 2 vols., Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1975; Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987

The rabbinic dictum, "Do not rely on a miracle" (Pesahim 64b) seems to have resonated with subsequent Jewish scholars, none of whom has produced a comprehensive study of miracles in Judaism. Even Maimonides and Gersonides, who dealt with topics such as prophecy and providence, omitted a systematic treatment of miracles. The few articles on this subject limit themselves to general surveys or particular ideas of individual thinkers, mostly from the medieval period. Consequently, those in search of a full and systematic treatment of the supernatural will have to piece together scattered fragments on this subject.

URBACH's classic work on the thought of the rabbis includes a chapter titled "Magic and Miracles." There he delves into a wide range of topics and their relationships to miracles. These include miracles as proof of prophecy, as promoters of faith, as ethical vehicles, as a confirmation of the truth of Israel's election and of the Torah, as deliverers of individuals and communities, and as manifestations of the doctrine of reward and punishment. Urbach also addresses the correlation of miracles and magic and of miracles and Jewish Law. He concludes that the problem of the relationship between the laws of nature and miracles did not preoccupy the sages. The change in the order of the universe was not usually considered to be a miracle; on the contrary, this order itself was viewed as the greatest of miracles and as a testimony to God's power. The fulfillment of commandments and acts of kindness were understood as being central in a way that reliance upon the supernatural was not. Urbach attests that this approach toward miracles was one of the divisive points between Jews and early Christians, who preferred to emphasize the supernatural. In his usual style, Urbach includes a vast number of rabbinic sources that may assist future research.

SCHWEID analyzes the positions of particular medieval thinkers, most of whom maintained that belief in miracles is a principle of the Jewish faith and who inherited the biblical view of a Creator who intervenes directly in the world's affairs. These thinkers were confronted both by the philosophical doctrine of the eternity of the universe and by its corollary: the contention that natural laws are inviolable. Schweid begins with Saadia Gaon and his rejection by Neoplatonists such as Bahya ibn Pakudah, Solomon ibn Gabirol, and Abraham ibn Ezra. He proceeds to an analysis of Judah Halevi, Maimonides, Shem Tov ibn Falaquera, Isaac Albalag, and Hasdai Crescas, among others. The main contribution of this study is that it frames each thinker within broad philosophical trends. Thus, for instance, Crescas's theory is not studied in isolation or as a reaction to his Jewish predecessors but primarily as a rejection of Aristotelian philosophy. In other words, although Schweid explores the development of perspectives of the supernatural among Jewish thinkers, he emphasizes their connection to general philosophy. This approach imbues the reader with an understanding of the main philosophical problems confronted by these thinkers and places each doctrine within the context of philosophical discussion of the supernatural.

RAVITZKY's article is dedicated to the study of what he calls the "anthropological school of miracles." This school, which maintains that miracles are a phenomenon of nature produced by a special human being, was ignored by Maimonides and Halevi and rejected by Gersonides and Crescas. However, it was adopted by many other significant thinkers such as Abraham ibn Daud, Abraham ibn Ezra, Joseph Kaspi, Abraham Abulafia, Isaac ibn Latif, and Jacob Anatoli. Ravitzky succeeds not only in illustrating its development and systematizing the different positions, but also in tracing their roots to Islamic philosophy, mainly to Avicenna, with whom it originated. Moreover, he analyzes the critique of this position, which began in the 14th century with Kalonymus ben Kalonymus, Simeon ben Tsemah Duran, and Abraham Bibago among Jewish thinkers, and Aquinas and Nicole Oresme among Christian scholastics. The final section of the study concentrates on this viewpoint's resurrection under different premises in the 15th century by Zerachiah Halevi, Matathias Hayishari, and Joseph Albo. More than being just an excellent overview of the anthropological school, this study serves as a good general introduction to the problem of the supernatural. Its rich footnotes will be invaluable to those who want to research the subject further.

HELLER's article serves as a basic and succinct introduction to Maimonides' view of miracles. In just over 15 pages, the piece analyzes the incongruities between Maimonides' views in his Commentary to the Mishnah and in the Guide of the Perplexed, discusses miracles and creation, Shekhinah (divine immanence), prophecy, providence, and the nature and meaning of divine attributes, and culminates with the influence of Maimonides' theory. Although those who expect an in-depth analysis may find it superficial, those who possess some philosophical background and wish to avoid an intricate discussion about the notoriously elusive Maimonides will be rewarded with a concise view of what are regarded as his key positions.

REINES's article offers a thorough analysis of Maimonides' view of miracles. Subscribing to the school that distinguishes between an exoteric and esoteric understanding of Maimonides, Reines provides two opposite interpretations of Maimonides' position: the "apparent" and the "modified" conception of miracles. According to the first, intended for the masses who understand Scripture literally, miracles are events produced by a special will of God, who suspends the laws of causation. The "modified" or philosophical position, on the other hand, affirms that, although a rare occurrence, miracles were programmed into the essence of things to occur in the future as any other natural phenomena. Reines, who endorses the "modified" theory, offers a fair analysis of both.

Three articles by Menachem Kellner provide an overview of Gersonides' conception of the supernatural. For instance, KELLNER (1980a) underlines one of the basic principles of Gersonides' theory of the supernatural: the greatness of a prophet is proportional to the greatness of his miracles. Similarly, KELLNER (1980b) explores Gersonides' ideas concerning whether and how a timeless and immutable being can intervene in ever-changing history. KELLNER (1976) offers the author's most complete and systematic treatment of the supernatural. This article, which revolves around the interpretation of Joshua 10:13—a verse that became one of the foci in the medieval discussion of miracles—serves as a case study that explores and contrasts most of Gersonides', Arama's, and Abravanel's views of the supernatural.

EISEN's book represents the first in-depth study of the correlation between Gersonides' exegetical and philosophical corpora. While exploring the topic of particular providence, the main expression of which is found in miracles, Eisen offers a detailed account of how numerous biblical miracles, especially those that occurred during the exodus from Egypt, are interpreted in Gersonides' biblical commentary and in his Wars of the Lord. He concludes that, contrary to common belief, which based upon his philosophical writings ascribes to this philosopher a rejection of individual providence, his exegesis recognizes a variation called “inherited providence” bestowed upon the Israelites in Egypt in virtue of Abraham’s merits. Eisen concludes that the exegetical and philosophical writings complement each other and must be correlated in order to obtain a full understanding of Gersonides’ views. This study will not only provide a systematic interpretation of Gersonides’ view of the supernatural but will serve as a matrix for those who want to investigate the connection between exegesis and philosophy.

BORODOWSKI’s dissertation entails a comprehensive study of the nature of the relationship between Abravanel’s philosophical corpora and his vast exegetical writings. Focusing on the topic of miracles, this work explores how Abravanel’s philosophical treatise, Mifa’lot Elohim (a book that concentrates on the greatest of miracles, Creation, and includes a chapter on the theory of the supernatural), correlates with his interpretation of the biblical counterparts. Abravanel’s methodology is characterized by prefacing each discussion with an extensive list of questions on the biblical text as well as a summary and critique of his predecessors. This approach is echoed in Borodowski’s work, which, prior to analyzing Abravanel’s theory, offers a general discussion of the main issues relating to the topic of miracles as well as an assessment of Maimonides’ and Gersonides’ and other philosophers’ views through the prism of Abravanel’s critique. Thus, more than a study of Abravanel, this work serves as an introduction to the study of the supernatural as well as a systematic overview of miracles in medieval Jewish philosophy. Special emphasis is placed on how the different philosophical positions influenced the interpretation of rabbinic sources on miracles. Arranged thematically, the dissertation contains, among others, the following chapters: “The Concept of Miracle: The Possible and the Impossible,” “Miracles and the Possibility of Ex-Nihilo Creation,” “Miracles and Free Will,” “Agency and Purpose of Miracles,” and “Prophecy and Miracles.”

ALFREDO FABIO BORODOWSKI

Mitnaggedim see Haredim

Modena, Leone 1571–1648

Italian rabbinical scholar, controversialist, writer, and promoter of Jewish music

Adelman, Howard Ernest, “New Light on the Life and Writings of Leon Modena,” in Approaches to Judaism in Medieval Times, vol. 2 (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 57), edited by David R. Blumenthal, Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1985

Cohen, Mark R., “Leone da Modena’s Riti: A Seventeenth Century Plea for Toleration of Jews,” Jewish Social Studies, 34(4), 1972

Cohen, Mark R. (editor and translator), The Autobiography of a Seventeenth-Century Venetian Rabbi: Leon Modena’s Life of Judah, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988

Fishman, Talya, Shaking the Pillars of Exile: “Voice of a Fool,” an Early Modern Jewish Critique of Rabbinic Culture (Stanford Studies in Jewish History and Culture), Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1997

Ravid, Benjamin, “The Prohibition against Jewish Printing and Publishing in Venice and the Difficulties of Leone Modena,” in Studies in Medieval Jewish History and Literature (Harvard Judaic Monographs, no. 2), edited by Isadore Twersky, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and London: Harvard University Press, 1979

Rivkin, Ellis, Leon da Modena and the Kol Sakhal, Philadelphia: Dropsie College, 1948

Leone Modena (also known as Leon[e] da Modena and Leon[e] Modena da Venezia), the best-known Venetian rabbi of the 17th century, was a preacher, teacher, writer, poet, legal functionary, printer, and much else. His legacy, however, remains mysterious. His writings define not only his personal views but the entire Italian Jewish culture of his time. The literature published in English on Modena examines some of these writings and their publication history and presents a debate over his authorship of the controversial text Kol Sakhal, a harsh critique of the rabbinic Judaism of which Modena himself was a leading exponent.

RIVKIN’s brief text argues that Modena, a protagonist of rabbinic Judaism, could not have authored Kol Sakhal. He discusses the rise of heresy in the 17th century as well as the strong position of the Jewish community of Venice, arguing that Venetian Jews were in a unique position to crush the heresy arising in other European cities. Rivkin’s complimentary portrait of Modena sees him as a champion of enlightened Rabbinism and of the superiority of the Jewish religion and Hebrew language. Rivkin uses stylistic and thematic evidence to argue that Modena could not have been the author of such a “vitriolic attack against Rabbinical Judaism.” Rivkin takes issue with the greatest of 19th-century authorities who link Kol Sakhal with Modena’s name, blasting Isaaco Reggio’s study as “worthless” and “invalid,” criticizing the “baselessness” and “irresponsible method” of Abraham Geiger’s work, and citing the inconclusive arguments of scholars subsequent to Reggio and Geiger on both sides of the debate.

FISHMAN’s recent and more lengthy study argues that Modena was indeed the author of Kol Sakhal. She refutes proposals by previous scholars and concludes that Modena composed the text under a pseudonym, a common practice in the age in which he wrote. She examines the text in light of the political, religious, and cultural contexts of the time, discusses the treatise’s revisionist view of Jewish law, and reflects on the text’s significance within the history of Jewish thought. Fishman also analyzes the work within the context of Venice’s struggle with Rome and the Papacy. Although she cannot find concrete reasons as to why Modena would have written the text, Fishman argues, using philological evidence, that Modena is unequivocally the text’s author. Certainly she detects stylistic patterns and wording not found before Modena’s time to tie its creation to his lifetime and to Venice. Her bibliography is lengthy and very helpful.

ADELMAN's brief study separates the legend of Modena from the historical counterpart, focusing its argument on the authorship of Kol Sakhal. Adelman interestingly discusses the reasons for the creation of this legend and how it has prevented scholars from truly understanding Modena. As examples, he discusses the theories of four scholars—Reggio, Samuele Davide Luzzatto, Geiger, and Heinrich Graetz—who, in contradictory ways, all tried to prove Modena was the author of Kol Sakhal. He then profiles the reality of Modena's situation, claiming Modena devoted his life to serving the Jews of his generation by enriching Jewish literature and defending the principles of rabbinic Judaism from threats from all sides. Adelman separates legend from history regarding Modena to demonstrate his true "unhappy but productive life," stressing the importance of Modena's autobiography for understanding his actual, historic self and his link to Kol Sakhal.

That autobiography is presented by COHEN (1988) in an accessible manner for the first time in English. This Life of Judah, found in manuscript in the Biblioteca Ambrosiana in Milan, first came to the attention of scholars in the 19th century. It is invaluable for understanding the unhappiness Modena endured, the gambling he used as an escape from his life, and the hard work and despair he suffered during the 31 years over which he wrote this memoir. Cohen and his colleagues, Theodore Rabb, Adelman, and Natalie Davis, present a sympathetic view of this character through their introductory essays. Cohen and Rabb use the autobiography as a means of viewing "northern Italian Jewish life in general from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries"; Adelman argues that the autobiography gives a fascinating yet partial glimpse of the life of this exceedingly active and complex man; and Davis proposes viewing the autobiography in the context of other early modern European autobiographies to see how those of Jews differ from those of Christians. The text brings to life much of the scholarly debate over Modena.

In a brief study, COHEN (1972) discusses Modena's Historia de' riti hebraici in a new light, as an apologetic text to highlight Jews' virtues and refute Johannes Buxtorf's 1603 negative portrayal of Jews in his Synagoga Judaica. Cohen convincingly sees Modena's text as a reaction to 16th-century Europe's negative portrayal of Jews as mystics. Cohen concludes that the rhetoric of the text is not unlike that of the 18th- and 19th-century Jewish emancipation literature and claims the Riti was an attempt at advancing social integration in repressive, Counter-Reformation Venice. He calls for investigation of the scholars who read Modena, such as Selden, Basnage, Calmet, and Grégoire, to examine the Riti's effect on Christian attitudes toward Jews.

RAVID's article revisits the Venetian prohibition of Jewish involvement in printing. His intriguing study uses documents from the Venetian State Archives to establish the date of the original prohibition as 1548, not 1571 as long assumed. He also shows that the prohibition may not have been aimed at Jews directly, but rather was designed to prevent importation and printing of Protestant books within Venice's Counter-Reformation culture. However, Ravid also cites three Jews active in printing whose success may have aroused the resentment of Christian competitors. He discusses the creation of a printers' guild to ensure Catholic dominance of the field, a guild from which Jews were banned. Ravid cites a passage from Modena's autobiography regarding his grandson's imprisonment in 1634 for printing as the impetus for Jews having sought a modification of the prohibition against them. He establishes that, while legislation technically prevented their involvement in printing, Jews actually continued their printing activity until the end of the Venetian Republic.

HILARY LIEBERMAN

Modern Orthodox Judaism

- Bernstein, Louis, Challenge and Mission: The Emergence of the English Speaking Orthodox Rabbinate, New York: Shengold, 1982
- Bulka, Reuven P. (editor), Dimensions of Orthodox Judaism, New York: Ktav, 1983
- Heilman, Samuel C., Synagogue Life: A Study in Symbolic Interaction, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976
- Heilman, Samuel C. and Steven M. Cohen, Cosmopolitans and Parochials: Modern Orthodox Jews in America, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989
- Joselit, Jenna Weissman, New York's Jewish Jews: The Orthodox Community in the Interwar Years (Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Sacks, Jonathan (editor), Orthodoxy Confronts Modernity, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav in association with Jews' College, London, 1991
- "The Sea Change in American Orthodox Judaism: A Symposium," Tradition, 32(4), Summer 1998
- Soloveitchik, Haym, "Rupture and Reconstruction: The Transformation of Contemporary Orthodoxy," Tradition, 28(4), Summer 1994
- Wurzburger, Walter S. (editor), "Symposium: The State of Orthodoxy," Tradition, 20(1), Spring 1982

Modern Orthodox Judaism designates the faith of those individuals and institutions that affirm traditional Jewish beliefs, such as the divine revelation of the Torah; observe Jewish ritual laws; have a positive attitude toward secular education and engage in various professions such as law and medicine; and emphasize the matters that they have in common with all other Jews rather than those that separate them from all other Jews. While Modern Orthodoxy is a 20th-century religious movement, its antecedents go back to Samson Raphael Hirsch's 19th-century attempt to synthesize Jewish tradition and modern culture, as articulated in his slogan, "Torah with the way of the land."

BULKA collects a series of essays on Orthodox Judaism. Of particular interest is Charles Liebman's contribution, "Orthodoxy in American Jewish Life," which first appeared in the American Jewish Year Book of 1965. Liebman's considered judgment is that the only remaining bastion of Jewish passion resides in the Orthodox community. This landmark piece brought the demographic, communal, and institutional aspects of Orthodox Judaism to the fore. The essay contains a large section on Modern Orthodoxy that discusses the organization and ideology of this movement. Although its statistics are hopelessly out of date, this seminal essay still bears careful study. In "The Ambiguous Modern Orthodox Jew," Lawrence Kaplan focuses on the issue of how the Modern Orthodox Jew relates, or does not relate, the component elements of his identity, modernity and Orthodoxy, to one another. He asks whether the word modern in the appellation Modern Orthodox Jew modifies the adjective Orthodox or the noun Jew. His essay examines the profound ideological and religious implications of fusing together various dimensions. The dean of the right-wing Telshe Yeshiva in Chicago offers a detailed point-by-point analysis of the divergent viewpoints of Modern Orthodoxy and the Torah True Judaism he represents. At the beginning of his essay, he quotes the remark of his sainted rebbe: "We no longer have to fear Conservatism—that is no longer the danger. Everyone knows that it is avodah zarah [idolatry]. What we have to fear is Modern Orthodoxy." The author of this essay, Chaim Dov Keller, is a graduate of Yeshiva University, an institution prominently identified with Modern Orthodoxy. In general, critics on the right censure the typical Jew who populates many Modern Orthodox synagogues as a poker-playing, disco-dancing, synagogue-schmoozing, marginal Orthodox Jew who rarely, if ever, opens up a gemara. He is lax in observance: he will eat hot dairy food in a nonkosher restaurant when with a business client, and his wife is not likely to use a mikveh.

BERNSTEIN describes the struggles of the nascent Modern Orthodox rabbinate to establish itself. With the passage of time, its rabbinic organization, the Rabbinical Council of America, became the largest rabbinic body in the world. When it was first organized in 1935, however, a spokesman for the more traditional Union of Orthodox Rabbis (Agudat Harabonim) declared that only members of that organization were true rabbis, while all others were deceiving the public. The traditional rabbis particularly resented the council's involvement in kashrut, an area that it considered its own preserve. The prestige of the Rabbinical Council was greatly enhanced in the mid-1950s when Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik became chairman of its Halakha Commission. The Rabbinical Council is a strong supporter of the Jewish state and, unlike rabbinic organizations to the left or right, is a staunch ally of the Chief Rabbinate of Israel. In the matter of cooperation with the non-Orthodox, the position of the council (on the advice of Rabbi Soloveitchik) is as follows: when representation of Jews and Jewish interests vis-à-vis the non-Jewish world are involved it fully cooperates with other groups and presents a united front, but in matters concerning Jewish law, synagogues, and education, it does not join groups that deny the foundations of its viewpoint.

HEILMAN and HEILMAN and COHEN usefully supplement each other. Heilman's 1976 ethnographic study describes from the perspective of a participant-observer the inner life of a Modern Orthodox synagogue in metropolitan "Sprawl City," a large Northeastern municipality. Heilman calls this synagogue Kehillat Kodesh, "holy community," and enhances his book with lively anecdotes gathered from several years of involvement in the activities of the congregation. An interesting feature of Heilman's work is his analysis of gossip. Conversation, gossip, and joking, which are often overlooked as a characteristic of informal social life, are viewed here not as idle talk but as an activity with many social functions. Gossip acts as an upholder of traditional standards, since it is a reflection of public opinion, community sentiments, beliefs, and values. Heilman and Cohen's work analyzes the behavior and attitudes of Modern Orthodox Jews in a survey based largely on members of New York City's Lincoln Square Synagogue. The Modern Orthodox are engaged in a delicate balancing act between segregation and integration, caught between the conflicting demands of Jewish parochialism and secular cosmopolitanism. The authors conclude that while triumphalism is hardly inherited, there is a future for Modern Orthodoxy in the United States. First, intensive Jewish education has become de rigeur in Orthodox circles. Second, the fact that most Orthodox young people will attend such schools will further network relations among them. Finally, it is likely that women will play an increased and influential role in Modern Orthodox Jewish life.

JOSELIT's fascinating book deals with modern "Americanizing Orthodox Jews" and concentrates on two rabbis and their affluent congregations in two upscale Manhattan neighborhoods: Joseph Lookstein of Kehillat Jeshurun and Leo Jung of the Jewish Center. She contends that the level of observance was far from high. For example, the Jewish family purity laws were widely disregarded and in effect fell into disuse.

SOLOVEITCHIK explores the recent changes in Modern Orthodoxy and its movement to the right. He traces this to a shift from a mimetic tradition of transmitting the ways of religious life—children absorbing patterns of conduct by observing adult and peer behavior at home and in the street, synagogue, and school—to a text-based culture, where a plethora of legal codes and guides to religious practice and observance dictate correct religious performance. The shift of authority to texts and their enshrinement as the sole source of authenticity has caused power to shift from the congregational or communal rabbi to acknowledged masters of talmudic law who are relatively insulated from the larger community and the day-to-day experience of most Orthodox Jews. Lacking the religious experience of God and the numinous in this secular age, Orthodox Jews seek to ground their spirituality in ritual observance of the minutiae of the halakhah. Soloveitchik poignantly concludes that Modern Orthodox Jews "having lost the touch of His presence . . . seek now solace in the pressure of His yoke."

Tradition magazine is a publication of the Rabbinical Council of America. In the early 1980s and again in the late 1990s, it devoted an entire issue to the condition of Modern Orthodoxy, inviting a number of its leading exponents to respond to some fundamental questions. In recent years Orthodoxy in general has become self-confident and buoyant as a result of its newfound strength and vitality. Yet the Modern Orthodox respondents to these symposia (WURZBERGER and "THE SEA CHANGE IN AMERICAN ORTHODOX JUDAISM") manifest many signs of a failure of nerve: a sense of inferiority vis-à-vis the right-wing Orthodox and a loss of self-confidence in their way of life, which is viewed as second-class Orthodoxy. The very legitimacy of Modern Orthodoxy is categorically denied in right-wing circles. One symposiast (David Singer) confesses that he is stranded with a handful of Orthodox intellectuals while the Orthodox community as a whole goes marching off in a traditionalist direction. As an undergraduate at Yeshiva University in the 1960s, Singer writes that the mood was euphoric. Modern Orthodoxy was about to sweep all before it. Twenty years later he looks back with bitterness and admits defeat: "We are pathetically few in number, lack a sound institutional base, and are largely without leadership." His final judgment is that "History has almost certainly passed us by." The Modern Orthodox rabbinate has been marginalized with the death of its mentor, Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, in 1993. As Heilman notes in the second symposium, the Modern Orthodox rabbi of the Rabbinical Council is viewed by the yeshivah world as a kind of red heifer, at best, purifying the "impure" moderns but contaminating the "purer" yeshivah people and, at worst, as part of the "other side," the devil's domain of which the kabbalists speak.

SACKS, the chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Commonwealth, has gathered together ten essays, which had their genesis in the conference "Traditional Alternatives: Orthodoxy and the Jewish Future," convened by Jews' College, London, in May 1989. All the contributors, including the chief rabbi, are adherents of modern or centrist Orthodoxy. They include such leading exponents of Modern Orthodoxy as Norman Lamm, Charles Liebman, Shlomo Riskin, Reuven Bulka, and David Hartman. The essays deal with such themes as the future of Modern Orthodoxy, women's equality and Judaism, religion and politics in Israel, and the encounter of Orthodoxy with secular culture. Collectively, these essays show how avowed spokesmen of Modern Orthodoxy face and confront formidable spiritual challenges.

JACOB HABERMAN

Momigliano, Arnaldo 1908–1987

Italian-born British ancient historian

Berti, Silvia, "Introduction," in Arnaldo D. Momigliano's Essays on Ancient and Modern Judaism, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994
Rivista Storica Italiana, 100(2), 1988
 Steinberg, Michael P. (editor), The Presence of the Historian: Essays in Memory of Arnaldo Momigliano (History and Theory Beiheft, 30), Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University, 1991

Arnaldo Momigliano was one of the most important ancient historians of the 20th century. Of Italian Jewish descent, Momigliano served as a professor at the universities of Rome and Turin, moving to England upon the promulgation of the racial laws in 1938. He took a post at University College, London, and remained there until his retirement. Momigliano was a visiting professor at various universities in the United States and Italy. A recipient of 16 honorary degrees, Momigliano was a prolific writer who published works on many aspects of Greek and Roman history. He also developed a profound interest in the history of Judaism and early Christianity, even though he is best known for his insightful studies on ancient and modern historiography.

BERTI provides a short and easy-to-read biography that describes Momigliano's career as a scholar, his research interests, and his reaction to the writings of Jewish contemporaries such as Leo Strauss and Gershom Scholem. The other essays collected in Berti's volume illustrate Momigliano's characteristically straightforward way of dealing with the topics selected; these essays provide a good overview of and introduction to his contribution to Jewish studies, with special emphasis on his historiographic perspective.

The RIVISTA STORICA ITALIANA's special issue on Momigliano contains contributions (written in Italian) by Momigliano's friends and colleagues. The essays highlight different aspects of Momigliano's life and work including discussions of Momigliano's studies on ancient Rome, his interest in historiography, and his analysis of the writings of German historians. Additional essays explore Momigliano's relationship with British culture as well as his work on the history of Judaism. Written primarily for scholars, this collection provides a good introduction to Momigliano's thinking. The essays are especially useful for gaining a better understanding of Momigliano's interest in historiography.

STEINBERG's collection of scholarly essays, which includes translations of some of the Rivista Storica Italiana pieces, evaluates different aspects of Momigliano's contribution to the field of ancient history. The pieces address Momigliano's views on the history of historiography; his contribution to the study of the interaction between pagan, Jewish, and early Christian culture; his interest in biography; his relationship with the writings and thinking of Ernesto de Martino; and an appreciation of Momigliano's years in England.

LEONARD VICTOR RUTGERS

Montagu, Lily 1873–1963

British social worker and pioneer of Liberal Judaism

Conrad, Eric, Lily H. Montagu: Prophet of a Living Judaism, New York: National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, 1953
 Kuzmack, Linda Gordon, Woman's Cause: The Jewish Woman's Movement in England and the United States, 1881–1933, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1990
 Meyer, Michael A., Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism (Studies in Jewish History), New York: Oxford University Press, 1988
 Montagu, Lilian H., "Spiritual Possibilities of Judaism Today," Jewish Quarterly Review, 11, January 1899
 Montagu, Lilian H., Thoughts on Judaism, London: Johnson, 1904

- Montagu, Lilian H., The Faith of a Jewish Woman, London: Allen and Unwin, 1943
- Umansky, Ellen M., Lily Montagu and the Advancement of Liberal Judaism: From Vision to Vocation (Studies in Women and Religion, vol. 12), New York: Mellen, 1983
- Umansky, Ellen M., "Liberal Judaism in England: The Contribution of Lily H. Montagu," Hebrew Union College Annual, vol. 55, Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, 1985
- Umansky, Ellen M. (editor), Lily Montagu: Sermons, Addresses, Letters, and Prayers (Studies in Women and Religion, vol. 15), New York: Mellen, 1985

Lillian Helen Montagu was a British social worker, writer, suffragist, religious organizer, and spiritual leader who founded and long remained the driving force behind the Liberal Jewish movement in England, established in 1902. She later conceived of and, in 1926, helped create the World Union for Progressive Judaism, an organization intended to unite Liberal Jews and to promote the growth of Liberal Judaism as an international movement. From 1928 until her death in 1963, she also served as lay minister for London's West Central Liberal Jewish Congregation. To date, relatively little has been published on Montagu, perhaps because no book-length study has yet focused on either Liberal Judaism in England or the World Union. However, there are a number of works, including several by Montagu herself, that shed considerable light on her understanding of Judaism as personal religion, her communal activities and concerns, and her historical significance.

Montagu was not the first within the late 19th-century Anglo-Jewish community to identify herself as a Liberal Jew. She was, however, the first to issue a concrete "call to action." MONTAGU (1899) describes the depth of the spiritual degeneration of Anglo-Jewry and calls upon religiously committed Orthodox, Reform, and Liberal Jews to join an association aimed at reviving the community's religious life. Montagu advocates the establishment of weekly Liberal Jewish worship services and the publication of pamphlets through which the teachings of Liberal Judaism might be spread, and she proposes that membership in the association be open to all Jews sympathetic to the association's goals and to Montagu's belief in Liberal Judaism's ability to attract and reawaken the religiously disaffected. The interest generated by this essay later led Montagu to view its publication as the Liberal Jewish movement's true beginning.

MONTAGU's (1943) autobiography is a revealing account of her spiritual journey from the religious Orthodoxy of her father to a more personally meaningful sense of Jewish self-identity. Her chapters on the founding of the Jewish Religious Union (JRU), the organization out of which the Liberal Jewish movement in England emerged, and the World Union for Progressive Judaism are particularly valuable in detailing the specific roles that Montagu played in their creation, ideological goals, and organizational development.

MONTAGU (1904) is the author's first full discussion of her understanding of Judaism and the significance of religious faith. Montagu explicitly acknowledges her indebtedness to the writings and personal influence of Claude Montefiore, an early proponent of Liberal Judaism and president of the JRU, and she emphasizes the necessity of grounding theological ideas in one's own lived experiences. Montagu's personal struggle to assimilate religious concepts into her life illustrates the book's underlying theme that experience alone convinces people of God's existence.

CONRAD's short biography of Montagu was published in honor of her 80th birthday. It is a loving, intimate, and at times, reverential portrait of Montagu as social worker and religious leader, written by her nephew and designated literary executor. Although the book contains a few minor historical inaccuracies, Conrad's many personal details and small vignettes provide a rare view of Montagu's private life. Noteworthy too are the book's photographs and its foreword, written by Leo Baeck.

UMANSKY (1983) is, to date, the only book-length critical study of Montagu as religious organizer, leader, and thinker. Following an introduction that clarifies the book's historiographical assumptions and relationship to other studies of Anglo-Jewry, part one traces the historical, religious, and intellectual settings in which Montagu rose to prominence. Part two traces her family background, early achievements as an author and pioneer in the British club movement, and the spiritual awakening that led Montagu to devote her life to the Liberal Jewish cause. Including lengthy discussion of her role in the organization and development of Liberal Judaism, the book ends with an assessment of Montagu's historical significance. Umansky also shows ways in which a study of Montagu's life provides general insights into the religious possibilities and dilemmas faced by many modern Jewish women, as women and as Jews.

UMANSKY (1985a) delineates Montagu's contribution to Liberal Judaism in England. Without minimizing the important contributions of either Montefiore or Israel Mattuck, the movement's two other early leaders, the author carefully traces the origins of the Liberal Jewish movement, revealing Montagu's significance as its founder and the individual most responsible for its organizational growth. It also reveals the extent to which Montagu, along with Montefiore and Mattuck, helped provide the movement with its early spiritual vision.

UMANSKY (1985b) contains almost 50 of Montagu's previously unpublished writings, including those of greatest historical significance, such as the letter that directly led to the founding of the JRU, the first sermon that Montagu delivered at the Liberal Jewish Synagogue, and the sermon she delivered in 1928 at the first World Union conference in Berlin. The anthology also includes Montagu's personal letters to family members and colleagues, outlines of special religious services that she created, and prayers that she wrote and incorporated into communal worship.

KUZMACK's history of the Jewish women's movement in the United Kingdom and the United States during the late 19th and early 20th centuries offers substantial information on the Jewish League for Woman's Suffrage, founded in 1912, which sought to secure religious, communal, and secular voting rights for Jewish women in Britain. Included is a lengthy description of Montagu's activities as the League's vice president and spiritual advisor. Noteworthy too is Kuzmack's fine section on Jewish women's philanthropic and social groups, which provides insight into the importance of Montagu's work as leader of the West Central Girls' Club, England's "first multi-purpose Jewish girls' educational and social club and settlement house."

MEYER critically examines the Reform movement from its early-19th-century origins through the late 1980s. Impressive for both its breadth of material and its depth of analysis, the book details Montagu's central role in the creation and development of Liberal Judaism in England. It also mentions her work on behalf of the World Union for Progressive Judaism to establish Liberal congregations in Australia, New Zealand, Brazil, and South Africa. Meyer's discussion of Montagu is relatively brief, but it clearly establishes her significance within the history of Reform Judaism.

ELLEN M. UMANSKY

Morocco

- Ben-Ami, Issachar, Saint Veneration among the Jews in Morocco (Raphael Patai Series in Jewish Folklore and Anthropology), Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1998
- Brown, K.L., "Mellah and Madina: A Moroccan City and Its Jewish Quarter (Salé ca. 1880–1930)," in Studies in Judaism and Islam, edited by Shelomo Morag, Issachar Ben-Ami, and Norman A. Stillman, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1981
- Corcos, David, Studies in the History of the Jews of Morocco, Jerusalem: Mass, 1976
- Deshen, Shlomo, The Mellah Society: Jewish Community Life in Sherifian Morocco (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism), Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989
- Gerber, Jane S., Jewish Society in Fez 1450–1700: Studies in Communal and Economic Life (Studies in Judaism in Modern Times, vol. 6), Leiden: Brill, 1980
- Laskier, Michael M., The Alliance Israélite Universelle and the Jewish Communities of Morocco, 1862–1962 (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish History), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983
- Romanelli, Samuel, Masa ba-'Arav, 1853; translated and edited by Yedida K. Stillman and Norman A. Stillman as Travail in an Arab Land (Judaic Studies Series), Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1989
- Schroeter, Daniel J., Merchants of Essaouira: Urban Society and Imperialism in Southwestern Morocco, 1844–1886 (Cambridge Middle East Library), Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988
- Serels, M. Mitchell, A History of the Jews of Tangier in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, New York: Sepher-Hermon, 1991
- Stillman, Norman A., The Language and Culture of the Jews of Sefrou, Morocco: An Ethnolinguistic Study (Journal of Semitic Studies Monograph, no. 11), Manchester: University of Manchester Press, 1988

As home to a major indigenous Jewish population that absorbed a large number of exiles from medieval Spain, the once very substantial Jewish community of Morocco is still active despite large-scale emigration since 1948, mainly to Israel, France, and North America. Much research has been conducted on the community, mainly in Hebrew and French, as well as in English.

Saint veneration, a major characteristic of Moroccan society, is examined by BEN-AMI, who focuses on its Jewish aspects. The first part of the book is an analytical survey, starting with an examination of the genesis of a saint, families of saints, and saints from the land of Israel. He then examines the relations between saints and their disciples, saints as miracle workers, and the relations between saints and the world of nature. Ben-Ami describes visits of the faithful to the saints and the organizing work involved in this. Relations between Jews and Muslims with regard to saint veneration are examined, as is the development of saint veneration among Moroccan Jews in Israel. Here Ben-Ami considers old and new saints and sites. The second part of the book examines the tales and legends related to specific saints, including women saints. Combining analysis, description, and data, this is the major work on the subject.

BROWN examines how French colonialism influenced cultural, social, economic, and political developments among the Jews and Muslims of Salé. Following a description of the Jewish quarter (mellah) in Salé and the character of this port town, Brown considers how Westernization influenced Jewish life and relations with the Muslims. The impact of the West is seen to have spurred Zionism among the Jews and Moroccan nationalism among the Muslims, gradually pulling both groups in different directions.

CORCOS is a posthumous collection of the gentleman-scholar's engaging and informative journal articles on Moroccan Jewry that include three historical surveys of successive periods of the Middle Ages and studies of local given and family names. Note, however, that whereas three of the articles are in Hebrew and three in French, only his valuable study of the Marinide era (13th to 15th centuries) appears in English.

DESHEN surveys life within the urban Moroccan Jewish quarter (mellah) during the 18th and 19th centuries, based on writings of indigenous Jews, including correspondence, rabbinic responsa, and communal archives. Deshen deals with Jewish-Muslim relations, economic life, relations between individuals in the community and its leaders, internal taxation and charity, scholars, synagogues, and family life. Deshen's study contributes much to the understanding of Jewish life in Morocco in precolonial times and is of importance for students of both Jewish and Moroccan history and society.

GERBER's study on the Jews of Fez focuses on the organization and economic life of the community from 1450 to 1700. Following a discussion of the political context and the history of the community, Gerber examines the organization of the community, its structure, functionaries, economic life, and taxation. Special attention is paid to the impact on the community of Fez of the arrival of the Sephardim. The study is based primarily on Jewish sources as well as Arabic and European documents. Focusing on just one community over a period of two and a half centuries enables Gerber to paint a very vivid picture.

LASKIER examines the implications of the activities of the Alliance Israélite Universelle (AIU) in Morocco during the 100 years since it started operating there. He begins by describing the Jewish community of Morocco before the AIU became involved and the background to the establishment of the AIU in 1860 by French Jews. Laskier then discusses the educational operations of the AIU in Morocco, its relations with the French protectorate authorities between 1912 and 1956, and how its attitude changed as a result of World War II and the establishment of the State of Israel. The examination covers educational, cultural, social, economic, and political issues, including Jewish-Muslim relations, and uses much archival material, especially from the archives of the AIU itself.

Mantua-born ROMANELLI was a man of the Enlightenment and the age of revolution who was in Morocco from 1786 to 1790. His book, originally written in Hebrew, focuses on the Jews of Morocco and was intended for Jewish readers. It combines his personal tribulations with a vivid and detailed description of Moroccan Jewry, highlighting numerous details of daily life and customs. He taught himself the Jewish vernacular and was able to provide information unknown to outsiders. His skill as a storyteller coupled with the information he provided made his book a very popular and important source on the community at the end of the 18th century. The translators' notes and bibliography enhance the value of the book still further.

While examining the society of Essaouira as a whole, SCHROETER's book is especially important for the study of Moroccan Jews because of their great numbers in Essaouira and their major role in its economic life, a result of their special status based on British protection. Using extensive and diverse sources, Schroeter provides a rich analysis of mercantile life in Essaouira and its place in international trade and the role of Jews in these fields.

The Jews of the international city of Tangier are the subject of SERELS's book. Following a short survey of the town's history and growth until the late 19th century, European attempts at its internationalization are examined against the background of political and economic developments. Most of the study deals with the 20th century and the implications of internationalization for the Jews. The organization of the community is examined, as are its economic, social, and cultural conditions. Serels based his book on archival sources, oral histories, and published accounts and includes biographical sketches of prominent members of the community. The book adds to the short list of monographs on specific urban Maghrebi Jewish centers.

STILLMAN's book is an ethnolinguistic study of the Judeo-Arabic vernacular of the Jews of Sefrou and is accompanied by transcribed texts and their annotated English translations. Following a historical, social, economic, and cultural survey of the community, Stillman proceeds to his examination of Sefriwi Judeo-Arabic. This is followed by stories about saints and scholars, folk beliefs, folk medicine, reminiscences of the past, and studies of local vernacular Scripture translations and poetic texts. This book is of great importance to linguists, folklorists, and historians.

Moses ben Maimon 1135 or 1138–1204?

Cordoba-born physician, philosopher, theologian, and rabbinic authority, died in Egypt

- Altmann, Alexander, "Free Will and Predestination in Saadia, Bahya, and Maimonides," in his Essays in Jewish Intellectual History, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1981
- Fox, Marvin, Interpreting Maimonides: Studies in Methodology, Metaphysics, and Moral Philosophy, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1989; London: University of Chicago Press, 1994
- Goitein, Shelomo D., "Moses Maimonides, Man of Action: A Revision of the Master's Biography in Light of Geniza Documents," in Hommage à Georges Vajda: Études d'histoire et de pensée juives, edited by Gérard Nahon and Charles Touati, Louvain: Peeters, 1980
- Guttman, Julius, Philosophies of Judaism: The History of Jewish Philosophy from Biblical Times to Franz Rosenzweig, translated by David W. Silverman, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, and London: Routledge, 1964
- Haberman, Jacob, Maimonides and Aquinas: A Contemporary Appraisal, New York: Ktav, 1979
- Hartman, David, Maimonides: Torah and Philosophic Quest, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1976
- Heschel, Abraham Joshua, Maimonides, 1935; translated by Joachim Neugroschel as Maimonides: A Biography, New York: Farrar, Straus, Giroux, 1981
- Heschel, Abraham Joshua, "Hahe'emin ha-Rambam shezakhah linevu'ah?" in Louis Ginzberg: Jubilee Volume on the Occasion of His Seventieth Birthday, 2 vols., New York: American Academy for Jewish Research, 1945; translated by David Wolf Silverman as "Did Maimonides Believe That He Had Attained the Rank of Prophet?" in Heschel's Prophetic Inspiration after the Prophets: Maimonides and Other Medieval Authorities, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1996
- Husik, Isaac, A History of Medieval Jewish Philosophy, New York: Macmillan, 1916, new edition, 1930
- Husik, Isaac, "A Question of Logic in Maimonides," in his Philosophical Essays, Ancient, Mediaeval and Modern, edited by Milton C. Nahm and Leo Strauss, Oxford: Blackwell, 1952
- Kravitz, Leonard S., "The Revealed and the Concealed: Prophecy, Miracles and Creation in the Guide," Central Conference of American Rabbis Journal, 16, October 1969
- Kravitz, Leonard S., The Hidden Doctrine of Maimonides' "Guide for the Perplexed": Philosophical and Religious God-Language in Tension, Lewiston, New York: Mellen, 1988
- Leaman, Oliver, Moses Maimonides, London and New York: Routledge, 1990; revised edition, Richmond, North Yorkshire: Curzon, 1997
- Pines, Shlomo, "Introduction," in Maimonides' The Guide of the Perplexed, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, "Samuel Ibn Tibbon and the Esoteric Character of The Guide of the Perplexed," AJS Review, 6, 1980

- Ravitzky, Aviezer, "The Secrets of The Guide of the Perplexed: Between the Thirteenth and Twentieth Centuries," in Studies in Maimonides, edited by Isadore Twersky, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University, Center for Jewish Studies, 1990
- Roth, Leon, The Guide for the Perplexed, London and New York: Hutchinson's University Library, 1948
- Strauss, Leo, Philosophie und Gesetz, 1935; translated by Eve Adler as Philosophy and Law: Contributions to the Understanding of Maimonides and His Predecessors, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995
- Strauss, Leo, "On Abravanel's Philosophical Tendency and Political Teaching," in Isaac Abravanel: Six Lectures by Paul Goodman, L. Rabinowitz (and others) with an Introductory Essay by H. Loewe; edited by J.B. Trend and H. Loewe, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1937
- Strauss, Leo, Persecution and the Art of Writing, Glencoe, Illinois: Free Press, 1952
- Strauss, Leo, "How to Begin to Study The Guide of the Perplexed," in Maimonides' The Guide of the Perplexed, edited by Shlomo Pines, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963
- Tchernowitz, Chaim, Maimonides as Codifier (Maimonides Octocentennial Series, pamphlet 3), New York: Maimonides Octocentennial Committee, 1935
- Twersky, Isadore, Introduction to the Code of Maimonides (Mishneh Torah) (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 22), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1980
- Yellin, David and Israel Abrahams, Maimonides, London: Macmillan, and Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1903; revised as Maimonides: His Life and Works, New York: Hermon, 1972

Moses ben Maimon, also known as Maimonides and by the Hebrew acronym Rambam (Rabbi Moses ben Maimon) was an outstanding rabbinic authority, codifier, religious philosopher, and communal leader. Both in medieval and modern times there has been wide disagreement surrounding his philosophic system. Some critics perceive a unity between his philosophic and legal works, while others insist that there is a duality between the two, with the philosophic works containing heterodox views on creation, prophecy, the efficacy of prayer, and the resurrection of the dead, among other subjects.

HESCHEL (1935) has provided an introduction to Maimonides that tries to interweave his biography and his thought. For this integrated portrait, Heschel quotes extensively both from Maimonides' correspondence and from relevant portions of his philosophical and legal writings. Some of Heschel's insights first mentioned in this study were later expanded by him into full-length monographs. For example, his theory that Maimonides aspired to prophetic inspiration is more fully discussed in HESCHEL (1945). In his 1935 biography, Heschel makes some shrewd psychological observations throughout, for instance on how Maimonides was affected by the death of his younger brother, David, in a shipwreck. (He asserts that Maimonides had feelings of guilt over his self-centeredness in allowing David to support the family and endangering himself in the process.) As in all his books, Heschel writes in a unique, lively, and passionate style. Heschel has possibly done a disservice, however, to both Maimonides and serious scholarship by giving credence to a number of pious legends. Thus Heschel relates that on the night after Maimonides finished his code, the Mishneh Torah, he dreamed that his father Rabbi Maimon came to visit him with a stranger whom he introduced as "Our Teacher Moses, the son of Amram." Maimonides was apprehensive, but Moses told him that he had come to look at his code. After examining the work, Moses said: "Congratulations, may your strength increase!" It need only be said that legend likewise recounts that when Aquinas finished the Summa, the figure on the crucifix in his cell spoke to him, saying, "Master Thomas, you have written well about me; your teachings are true Catholic doctrine." Both Maimonides and Aquinas can shine by their own lights and do not need such hagiographic embellishments to add brilliance to their reputations.

YELLIN and ABRAHAMS's biography of Maimonides was written by Abrahams and based on a Hebrew biography by Yellin published in 1898. Both authors were important scholars, and Abrahams writes in an easy-flowing, graceful style. Separate chapters are devoted to different stages in Maimonides' life, as well as to his major works, the Commentary on the Mishnah, Mishneh Torah, and The Guide of the Perplexed. The revised edition features a valuable introduction and bibliography and important supplementary notes by Jacob Dienstag, a leading authority on Maimonides. Some of the more significant notes deal with Maimonides' attitude toward Islam; literature discussing the myth of the apostasy of Maimonides; and reference to an article refuting statements in Abrahams's text (as well as in Heschel's biography) that Maimonides was the court physician of Saladin and that he was invited by Richard I, the Lionheart, to treat him.

GOITEIN begins his article by referring to the complaint of Georges Vajda of the Sorbonne that there is no satisfactory biography of Maimonides—even the date of his birth and death are uncertain. Goitein partially attempts to remedy this defect on the basis of his study of the vast Genizah material, most of which was recovered at the end of the 19th century from the store-chamber of the medieval synagogue in Old Cairo (also known as Fustat). Many of the documents show that Maimonides was not a cloistered scholar but a consummate "man of action." In November 1168, the town of Bilbeis, which harbored an important Jewish community and served as the Egyptian terminal of the caravan route between Palestine and Egypt, was stormed and captured by the crusaders and many Jewish inhabitants were taken prisoner. Goitein shows that extraordinary efforts and enormous sums were needed to ransom the captives. The ransom for a prisoner, 33 and one-third gold dinars, was more than many craftsmen or shopkeepers could save in a lifetime. Maimonides sent circulars to numerous communities to help raise the money and at times was personally involved in its collection. Maimonides' swift rise to the office of Head of the Jews so soon after his arrival in Egypt (which is documented in Genizah sources) was due, at least in part, to his tireless efforts on behalf of the captives of Bilbeis.

ROTH presents, in broad outline and simple language, the life, work, and influence of Maimonides. The author has produced a brief, reliable interpretation of Maimonides akin to what is found in such series of semipopular monographs as "Past Masters," "90 Minutes," or "The Spirit of Philosophy," with a concise, lucid, and authoritative introduction to the philosopher's ideas and extensive quotations from his writings.

TCHERNOWITZ's pamphlet is also semipopular in nature but specifically presents a brief analysis of the method and scope of Maimonides' work as codifier of Jewish law. Although Tchernowitz was a leading authority on the development of halakhah and later wrote a multivolume Hebrew work on the subject, he wore his learning lightly, and this essay is truly a sketch by the hand of a master. Among the topics covered are the influence of Maimonides' predecessors; the purpose of the Mishneh Torah (according to Tchernowitz it was mainly educational—Maimonides wanted to compile a Jewish pandect); Maimonides' methodology or how he arranged the material of his code; its sources; Maimonides' system of interpretation; critics and commentators on the code; and the influence of Maimonides on later codifiers.

TWERSKY, famously tough and exacting on his students at Harvard, emerges through his 640-page analysis of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah as at least as demanding on himself. Some of his learned footnotes could easily be expanded, if not into doctoral dissertations, then certainly into masters' essays. He has observed the two commandments addressed to scholars: "Thou shalt work at the sources" and "Thou shalt acquaint thyself with work done before thee and beside thee." It would be difficult to find a significant article on Maimonides' code that Twersky has not seen or reckoned with. Twersky covers not only the same ground as Tchernowitz in much greater detail but also topics not considered by Tchernowitz, such as the language and style of the code, to which he devotes a chapter. Some of his conclusions may be questioned by other scholars, as for example his contention that Maimonides was not significantly influenced by Islamic thought and law, but all future scholars will have to reckon with this monumental study. Additional consequence is added to the book by Twersky's acknowledgement in his preface of the help he received from his father-in-law, the great Maimonidean authority Rabbi Joseph Baer Soloveitchik, with whom he discussed many of the issues raised.

Twersky considers the question of why Maimonides wrote his code, and he is rightly critical of scholars who would like to substitute their own conjectures in place of the reasons given by Maimonides himself, conjectures such as that he attempted to refute the Karaites or that he wanted to write the Constitution for the imminent Messianic Kingdom of Israel. On the other hand, even Twersky is not entirely above reproach in the matter of Maimonidean scholarship attempting to "improve" on Maimonides. Thus, he uses the word diwan repeatedly to characterize this Hebrew work in terms of its Arabic literary milieu, whereas Maimonides is invariably content to refer to his work as al-hibur or al-talif.

GUTTMANN presents a summary of Maimonides' philosophical system and finds his significance in establishing the biblical Creator-God within the framework of philosophical cosmology, and thus achieving a true philosophical synthesis between biblical religion and Aristotelianism with its conception of God as the necessary cause of the world.

HUSIK (1916), although reflecting an earlier phase of research, discusses (as does Guttmann) Maimonides' views on the existence and attributes of God, the origin of the universe, prophecy, providence, and ethics, but he is more skeptical than Guttmann of the resulting synthesis.

HUSIK (1952) in his charming four-page essay (originally written in 1923) spells out his misgivings about Maimonides' synthesis very clearly. In the Guide, Maimonides criticizes the Kalamists (Islamic dialectical theologians) for proving the existence of God by arguing that the world is not eternal and therefore must have been created, and since nothing can create itself, it must have been created by God. Maimonides argues that the major premise, namely that the world is not eternal, has not been scientifically proven and is doubtful. He therefore adopts the Aristotelian proof based upon motion, on the assumption (tentatively held and rejected afterward) that motion and, hence, the world are eternal. "Be prepared for either case," could well be Maimonides' motto. If the world is created, the Kalamists are proven correct, and if the world is eternal, Aristotle is proven correct; in either case the existence of God is firmly established. Husik, however, wonders if it is quite that simple. Is not an elementary blunder in logic committed if one reaches the same conclusion whether the major premise is affirmative or negative? To take the most famous of all syllogisms: all men are mortal; Socrates is a man; therefore Socrates is mortal. This is a valid argument; the conclusion follows necessarily from the premises. But if the major premise is changed to the counter-proposition, all men are immortal, then the conclusion obviously would be Socrates is immortal. How, then, can Maimonides reach the same conclusion proceeding from contradictory major premises? Husik answers simply that Maimonides does not. An unmoved mover is not the Maker of heaven and earth, and the God of Aristotle and the philosophers is not the God of the Hebrew Bible; an unbridgeable gulf extends between them.

In his various studies, STRAUSS (1935, 1937, 1952, 1963) gave a new turn to the study and interpretation of Maimonides' philosophy. The views of PINES, professor of Jewish and general philosophy at the Hebrew University and translator of the Guide into English, closely parallel those of Strauss. According to Strauss, the Guide is an esoteric work whose real message is presented between the lines, and that message is that reason and revelation are not fully reconcilable. According to Maimonides, this realization must be concealed from the "vulgar masses," who must observe the precepts of the Torah to prevent social anarchy. The basic critical canon of interpretation used by Strauss is that a seemingly casual contradiction of a conventional belief (or of a necessary presumption or consequence of such a belief) is what Maimonides really wishes to maintain, while repeated affirmations and reaffirmations of orthodox dogmas, if they are surreptitiously contradicted, are merely sops thrown to the "vulgar." Since secrecy can to some extent be identified with rarity, of two contradictory statements in the Guide, that which occurs least frequently (or only once) represents the true view of Maimonides.

RAVITZKY (1980) shows that Strauss's way of interpreting the Guide is very similar to that of Samuel ibn Tibbon, offered during Maimonides' lifetime. Abraham Maimuni, Maimonides' son, acknowledged that his father considered ibn Tibbon, who translated the Guide into Hebrew, to have penetrated and fathomed his teachings. The fundamental methodological principles of this esoteric interpretation are: highlighting the role of intentional contradictions in the text; identification of the concealed truth with a rare or unique statement appearing in the text; a search for the esoteric context of comments that seem out of place; and special attention to chapters whose subject matter breaks the continuity of a series of chapters.

RAVITZKY (1990) widens the scope of his inquiry beyond ibn Tibbon to include other commentators and interpreters of the Guide and lends further support to Strauss's reading of Maimonides.

ALTMANN argues that in the Guide, Maimonides contradicts doctrines affirmed in his more popular works. It can be shown that in the Guide, Maimonides tacitly replaces the absolute freedom of the will expressed in his dogmatic works by a deterministic theory that must be considered to represent his esoteric doctrine.

HARTMAN's book is a persuasive defense of the unity of Maimonides' thought, seeking to prove that he "chose the way of integration" and achieved a genuine synthesis between philosophy and Jewish law. But is Hartman successful? Perhaps the most competent critical evaluation of his study is the one given by Shlomo Pines in his foreword. He says that Hartman's interpretation "seems to engender more difficulties than it solves, and some of these may prove to be insurmountable." Pines, gentleman that he was, does not insist on spelling out these difficulties, but they are in any case all too evident from the introduction to his translation of the Guide, referred to above: "Maimonides had very strong convictions concerning the utility and even necessity of an official system of religious beliefs for the preservation of communal obedience to the law. What is more, he lived up to his convictions by formulating in his commentary on the Mishnah the thirteen principal dogmas of Judaism. Many of these dogmas run counter to philosophic truth" (emphasis added).

FOX has written with a twofold aim: (1) to mount a sustained attack on the Maimonidean scholarship of Leo Strauss and his school, and (2) to offer alternative interpretations of Maimonides' views on key issues. Fox is correct in maintaining against Strauss that precisely because the Guide is a Jewish book, it cannot at the same time also be a thoroughly philosophic book. (Thus, Leibniz's respect for the work of Maimonides was that of one philosopher for another, despite the fact that the Guide was a Jewish book.) Fox has also made the correct methodological observation that one cannot simply classify all statements in the Guide that are in any way inconsistent with each other as "contradictions." Rather, one must distinguish carefully between contraries, subcontraries, and other inconsistencies.

Finally, Fox is correct in observing that some of Strauss's interpretations are somewhat nebulous and problematic and carry with them certain inherent dangers. In his essay of 1963, for example, Strauss analyzes the first 49 chapters of the Guide, which are devoted to the theme of God's incorporeality and problems connected with it. Most of these chapters are devoted to expounding the true, deeper meaning behind such biblical metaphors as God's face, eyes, or feet, or locutions used to describe his actions. Strauss notes that the term "hand," which occurs repeatedly in the Bible, is not analyzed by Maimonides at all, but that in chapter 14 Maimonides interrupts his discussion of verbs and other parts of speech that refer to place and turns to an explanation of "man." According to Strauss this is not an accident. He observes that the Hebrew word for hand, yad, has a numerical equivalent of 14, and that the hand is the characteristically human organ by which man is distinguished from the rest of creation. By metonymy "hand" stands for "man," while the number 14 is closely associated in Maimonides' works with Torah. His code is divided into 14 books (in fact, rabbinic writers generally refer to the code by the name Yad). In the Book of Commandments, Maimonides sets out "14 roots of the commandments," and in the Guide, he divides the commandments into 14 classes. Maimonides, in the characteristic Straussian view disparaged by Fox, was sending a hidden message to initiates, a message that he felt was not suitable for the general public—namely, that the commandments of the Torah are man-made, and the Torah has a human, rather than divine, origin.

It seems true that Strauss's earlier studies are more solid than his later speculations. The earlier studies are based on a clear methodology and logical analysis, and the later, while certainly not irresponsible kabbalistic interpretations or undisciplined, extravagant imaginings, are creative reconstructions that by their very nature are not provable. Still, Fox's critique of Strauss does not affect the main thrust of Strauss's Maimonidean scholarship. Worse, Fox disregards the more recent investigations by the late Abraham Nuriel of Bar-Ilan University (unfortunately available only in Hebrew), which lend strong support to Strauss. After a careful study of the methodological approach of Maimonides, Nuriel comes to the conclusion that of two contradictory statements, the one that is formulated with a misplaced keyword is the one that Maimonides considers false. In light of his theory, Nuriel examines the use of the expression "the Creator" (ha-Bore') in the Guide. He notes that this term never appears in those passages where Maimonides expresses his positive opinion on the creation of the world. Conversely, in each and every instance that this word appears, Nuriel finds that it serves to appease the censorious opinions of the vulgar. He therefore concludes that Maimonides explained the first verse of the Bible as referring to creation from preexistent matter.

Fox's positive contributions seem more perplexing than guiding. Consider creation versus eternity. In the Guide (2:32), Maimonides mentions a link between the "three opinions concerning the eternity of the world or its creation in time" and "three opinions concerning prophecy." Commentators have been baffled with the problem as to which of the three opinions concerning creation represents the "real" Maimonides and what his corresponding opinion is with regard to the problem of prophecy. There are at least nine hypothetical solutions to this riddle, and in actuality there are many more because different interpretations are put on the various views. (This writer is familiar with 16 proposed "solutions"; besides those discussed here, the reader may refer to the articles of Davidson [1979], Harvey, and Kaplan listed in the bibliography of Leaman's book.) To the three views mentioned by Maimonides on that occasion, namely, the Platonic, Aristotelian, and Jewish, Fox adds that of the Kalam, discussed by Maimonides elsewhere, making the minimum number of solutions 12 rather than nine. According to Fox, Maimonides effects a “syncretistic unification” of elements drawn from all four positions. He contends that “Maimonides sees a useful counterweight to the Aristotelian theory in the Kalam affirmation” and that Maimonides picks and chooses “desirable” and “positive” features of the Kalam and Aristotle, while rejecting “undesirable” and “negative” features. However, the “Great Eagle” who soared to the heavens on the wings of understanding was capable of more than this seam-bursting eclecticism of the jackdaw that is of little philosophical consequence. If this were truly Maimonides’ opinion, he would himself deserve the scorn he heaped on the Kalamists, whose premises and arguments were driven by a desired outcome rather than by a regard for the truth (1:71). Questions are not answered and problems are not solved by claiming that Maimonides deliberately maintained “a dialectical tension between diverse positions.”

Even recourse to a “severe dialectical tension” does not solve the problem of petitionary prayer in Maimonides’ system. Did Maimonides believe that prayer falls into the category of “necessary beliefs” or did he believe that God answers prayers? Maimonides’ doctrine of the divine immutability and absolute transcendence suggest the former. Maimonides goes as far away as possible from the anthropomorphic pitfall, resting uneasily on the very edge of the agnostic pitfall on the other side. Maimonides’ conception of God as the Unknowable Negation of Privation does not satisfy the religious instinct. Mankind seeks the assurance of a loving, caring God—a refuge, the everlasting arms, or a Friend behind phenomena (to use Edwyn Bevan’s apt phrase), not an undifferentiated ooze. Fox attempts to settle the matter by claiming that Maimonides’ attitude to verbal petitionary prayer may be illuminated by his private practice. To commemorate his delivery from a life-threatening storm at sea, Maimonides vowed to keep its anniversary as a fast, in his words “seeing nobody, and praying and reading in solitude the entire day.” “This,” declares Fox, “is hardly the thinking or the practice of man who holds that prayer is intended only for the protection of the masses from heresy, while the truly educated should serve God exclusively through the activity of the intellect.” Such anecdotal evidence is at best of limited biographical interest and does not resolve any philosophical issue. Even an advanced thinker on the positive side of agnosticism may spend a day in silent adoration and contemplative reverence of a power not human that makes for righteousness. What is more, in the very source cited by Fox, this story serves to illustrate not Maimonides’ attitude to petitionary prayer but his love and attachment to the Holy Land: the day of the tempest was observed as a fast-day, while the day of his arrival in Palestine was celebrated as a day of feasting and rejoicing.

KRAVITZ (1969) is one of the most persuasive interpreters of Maimonides in the Straussian tradition. Kravitz develops the pregnant thesis that Maimonides himself has provided the key to understanding the Guide in his method of reading the Book of Job, particularly in his interpretation of the speeches of Elihu, which superficially seem merely to repeat what the other three comforters have said but which in reality disclose quite untraditional views. For many, this essay will mark a Copernican revolution in their understanding of Maimonides. Students often feel that modern critics read their own heterodox views into the Guide, and that they have darkened counsel by words without understanding. Kravitz will convince them that the critics are on to something significant that cannot be evaded or ignored: “According to Maimonides’ philosophy, Israel’s history did not occur as reported in the Bible.”

KRAVITZ (1988) is the author’s definitive study of the Guide. According to Kravitz the Guide reflects the central problem of medieval theology, that of correlating a conceptual system drawn from one world with a textual system drawn from another. That problem finds its specific focus in theos, on what is meant by God. For the conceptual system drawn from Greek philosophy, God is an idea, the Ultimate Form; for the textual system drawn from the world of the Bible, God is a person, the Ultimate Will. For the philosophers, forms are as they are and do not change; hence, God is and cannot change; for the religionists, God acts and responds and hence, in some manner, changes. The textual system was the basis of the religious life; it did not present a problem to those whose mindset was formed by it, and it did present a problem to those who were entranced by the conceptual system. They were perplexed by the relation of one system to the other.

Maimonides wrote the Guide to provide guidance by interpreting the words of the Torah using the notions of the philosophers. In a most careful manner, Maimonides gradually moved the reader for whom the book was intended from the denial of the Deity being corporeal, to the denial of the Deity acting in a corporeal manner, to a denial of the Deity acting; or to put it in another manner, Maimonides sought to move the astute reader to the notion that the Deity eternally acted, and hence, paradoxically, never changed. Since the Deity did not change, the reader had to change; by activating his intellect, by following the philosophers’ curriculum of the study of mathematics, physics, and metaphysics, the reader was to achieve the true wisdom that is the correct understanding of the Deity. That true wisdom was, however, not attainable by most people; hence, the Guide was carefully written to hide its meaning from those who could not use it and who, like a baby trying to eat steak, would be harmed by it. Even so, those who do not “get it” can still gain something from the book, for as Maimonides indicated by quoting the phrase “A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in fittings of silver,” those who cannot apprehend the gold of the book can learn something from the silver.

HABERMAN is interested in the question of how rationalist thinkers, such as Maimonides and Aquinas, could make room for supernatural revelation within their philosophical systems. Aquinas accepts Aristotle’s psychology and his reliance on sense data and combines it with the Neoplatonic goal of a mystical union with God. In taking his theory of man’s goal from the Neoplatonists and his account of man’s nature from the Aristotelians, Aquinas was left with a huge gap, which he neatly filled with the Christian revelation and its promises. According to Maimonides, the prophet is a philosopher-king in the Platonic sense, and the supreme prophet, Moses, “the man of God,” was that charismatic prophet-lawgiver/philosopher-king all in one, who achieved intellectual completeness and was able to promulgate the perfect and eternal law designed for the physical and spiritual perfection of the individual and society.

Maimonides agrees with Plato that there are certain beliefs that ought to be propagated by rulers whether they are in fact true or known to be false, on the grounds that they are valuable instruments for the promotion of good conduct on the part of the mass of the population. The question suggests itself as to whether intellectuals would support such a scheme to preserve the social order from the corrosive acids of rationalist philosophy. The simple answer is that they had no choice. There were no secular alternatives in Maimonides' age; the only alternatives were religious, and the other monotheistic religions affirmed the same dogmas as Judaism, plus others that could not readily be reconciled with Aristotle's philosophy. Moreover, religious skepticism will often ally itself with political conservatism. Since there can be no rational ground for preferring one set of dogmas over another, one may as well become a conformist and adhere to the rules and customs of one's own group in order to safely pursue philosophic inquiry. This, of course, has no bearing on the question of whether the philosopher in his study ought to believe in, say, the 13 principal dogmas of Judaism. He ought only to believe what is either self-evident, capable of certain or probable proof, or verifiable by sensible or introspective perception.

Haberman examines on their merits Maimonides' views on all major questions such as the existence and attributes of God, creation, the nature of prophecy, and divine providence, assuming that they were advocated because Maimonides was convinced that they were true. Only when such a reading is precluded by the ordinary canons of criticism and when they differ markedly from those Maimonides expressed elsewhere, as in the Treatise on Resurrection, is interpretation geared to these views' social utility and political usefulness. Critics generally have found Haberman's study useful and solidly documented, but some reviewers have objected to his participation in the argument. Zwi Werblowsky, in The Jewish Journal of Sociology (volume 23, June 1981), wrote, "[T]he reader sometimes gets the impression that there really are three great philosopher-theologians: Maimonides, Aquinas, and Haberman. Lest this sound unkind, let me hasten to add that the book is well-written, extremely readable, and exhibits considerable erudition which, together with a certain charming frankness, goes a long way towards reconciling the reader with the author's occasionally implicit arrogance."

LEAMAN interprets Maimonides as falling squarely within the tradition of philosophy as it developed in the Islamic world. There is much merit to this approach, but Leaman overdoes it. After all, any Muslim philosopher who would assert, as Maimonides repeatedly does, that Moses was the greatest of all prophets, both of those who preceded and those who followed him (i.e., including Muhammad) would have been summarily executed and his books burned. Still, Leaman avoids technical scholarly jargon and has interesting things to say on a number of topics. In regard to creation versus the eternity of the world, for instance, he discusses what he terms the "Maimonides Principle," namely that the laws of nature that govern the universe need not have been in force when the present order of events came into existence. This principle does, after all, find some support from the Big Bang cosmological theory according to which matter, energy, space, and time were indeed created during a primeval explosion lasting less than a trillionth of a second some 15 billion years ago.

JACOB HABERMAN

See also Maimonidean Controversy

Moses ben Nahman 1194–1270

Catalan-born talmudist, theologian, mystic, and controversialist, died in Palestine

Chavel, Charles, Ramban, His Life and Teachings, New York: Feldheim, 1960

Chazan, Robert, Barcelona and Beyond: The Disputation of 1263 and Its Aftermath, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992

Funkenstein, Amos, Perceptions of Jewish History, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993

Kanarfogel, Ephraim, "On the Assessment of R. Moses b. Nahman and His Literary Oeuvre," Jewish Book Annual, 54, 1997

Twersky, Isadore (editor), Rabbi Moses Nahmanides (Ramban): Explorations in His Religious and Literary Virtuosity, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983

Wolfson, Elliot, "By Way of Truth: Aspects of Nahmanides' Kabbalistic Hermeneutic," AJS Review, 14, 1989

A leading Spanish talmudist, Moses ben Nahman, also known as Nahmanides and by the acronym Ramban (Rabbi Moses ben Nahman), was the intellectual and communal leader of Catalan Jewry during a crucial period. His writings reflect a synthesis of the dialectical tradition of the tosafists in northern France with the geonic-Andalusian traditions of analytical scholarship and literary culture. The broad scope of Nahmanides' learning enabled him to provide a measure of stability in the face of conflicts that arose from within Jewish society and from the Christian world as well.

CHAZAN's study focuses on Moses ben Nahman's disputation with Pablo Christiani at Barcelona in 1263. Chazan begins by reconstructing the debate and its strategies on the basis of the brief Latin report produced by a Christian observer as well as the Hebrew narrative that Nahmanides himself composed. In doing so, Chazan evaluates the goals and methods of both of these accounts and compares and contrasts their findings, exploiting very effectively the significant differences in style and substance to clarify Nahmanides' aims and tactics. Chazan then moves on to consider the aftermath of the disputation from several perspectives. The "victory" secured by Ramban was followed by new Christian missionizing pressures against which Ramban sought, in turn, to reassure his fellow Jews. His efforts were centered on the interpretation of certain aggadic passages and biblical texts utilized by Christians for polemical purposes. In addition, Ramban wished to demonstrate the certainty and predictability of the messianic redemption. Chazan notes that while Nahmanides is considered to be somewhat conservative with regard to his kabbalistic teachings, his messianic calculations and interpretations possess an innovative flair.

FUNKENSTEIN discusses Nahmanides' penchant for typological symbolism in his biblical commentary against the backdrop of contemporary Christian typological exegesis. A number of the prefigurations of subsequent biblical developments found in Ramban's Torah commentary reflect a recognizable measure of Christian influence. To be sure, Ramban does not divulge the Christian origins of these interpretations, and many of Nahmanides' typologies are structured to counter Christian constructions. Moreover, Nahmanides' limitation of his use of typology to the patriarchal narratives was due perhaps to his awareness of the importance of this method for Christian interpretation. As a kabbalist, Nahmanides preferred to find biblical symbolism linked to letters and names rather than to events and persons. In his discussion, Funkenstein raises the issue of the relationship between the straightforward approach to biblical exegesis (peshat) and the kabbalistic approach (sod). He suggests that these categories almost never overlap in Ramban's commentaries.

TWERSKY introduces a rich collection of essays by pointing to the diversity of Nahmanides' achievements and by stressing, against the tendency in earlier historiography, that the corpus of Ramban's writings must be considered as a comprehensive oeuvre and should not be fragmented. Bernard Septimus's opening essay demonstrates the degree to which Nahmanides remained faithful to the Andalusian tradition even as he was exposed to the very different methodologies and ideals of Ashkenazi scholarship and culture. This loyalty is evident in the style of his writing; in the nature of his citations in his biblical and talmudic commentaries; and in the nuanced positions that he took with regard to philosophy and science during the Maimonidean controversy and with regard to the use of aggadah at the Barcelona disputation. As an inheritor of the Geonic-Andalusian tradition, Nahmanides never accepted the absolute authority of all aggadah, nor did he see kabbalistic interpretation as the universal key to the understanding of aggadah. In a brief essay, Ezra Fleischer sketches the parameters of Nahmanides' small but impressive poetic output, which reflects the salient characteristics of the Gerona school of Hebrew poetry. Moshe Idel links the relatively meager output of Ramban in terms of kabbalistic literature to the fact that Ramban was a conservative kabbalist. He was prepared to formulate or record only those kabbalistic interpretations that he had received from his teachers. Even those interpretations suggested by fellow members of the Gerona school of Kabbalah were not accepted by Ramban unless he was certain that they had emerged from a reliable kabbalistic tradition. He took a stand in marked contrast to the approach of other members of the Gerona school who favored direct and open dissemination of kabbalistic teachings. Bezalel Safran compares and contrasts Ramban's views on the sin of Adam and the fall of man to those of another member of the Gerona school, Azriel. Safran notes in passing that Ramban's endorsement of a limited asceticism was linked in his writings to achieving communion with the divine (devekut). David Berger argues that Ramban was much more familiar with aspects of Aristotelian thought and other philosophical systems and literature than has been imagined. This assessment leads Berger to a reconsideration of Nahmanides' view of natural law. In addition, Berger and Septimus both point to numerous instances in Ramban's Torah commentary in which peshat and sod do coincide.

WOLFSON maintains that Nahmanides was, in his biblical commentary, a kabbalist first and foremost, and a not-so-conservative kabbalist at that. His warning against speculation about kabbalistic secrets and ideas is overshadowed by the fact that he alludes to these secrets in his commentaries, thereby bringing this material to the attention of a general audience. Ramban employed a dynamic kabbalistic hermeneutical method. In the realm of esoteric interpretation, Ramban followed both a theosophical system as well as a mystical tradition that read the text of Scripture as a matrix of divine names. This tradition is but one example of a mystical doctrine found in Ramban's writings that originated with the German Pietists. In Wolfson's view, Nahmanides did not differentiate between rabbinic and kabbalistic modes of biblical and talmudic interpretation. Moreover, he considered aggadic interpretation to be a key to the understanding of Kabbalah. At the same time, Ramban's rejection of certain aggadic passages at Barcelona (and even in his Torah commentary) is readily understood. Even as aggadah was critical to Ramban's understanding of Kabbalah, he did not have to accept all aggadic statements as binding.

CHAVEL has written a basic biography of Rabbi Moses ben Nahman that describes his familial background and identifies his major teachers and students. Chavel also reviews Ramban's many compositions, grouping them under the headings of halakhic treatises and collections, works written in defense of earlier authorities, and talmudic novellae and responsa. The book concludes with a survey of Ramban's views on various matters of religious thought and faith, but it lacks the sophisticated level of analysis that characterizes some of the more recent studies of Ramban.

KANARFOGEL reviews the surge of writings about Ramban produced in the last 20 years, noting the vast difference between these studies and the efforts of historians writing at the dawn of modern Jewish historiography. In addition to focusing on many of the issues discussed above, Kanarfogel deals with Nahmanides' approaches to halakhic formulation and talmudic interpretation and with the diverse figures and movements throughout medieval Europe that may have influenced Nahmanides' thinking in a number of disciplines.

EPHRAIM KANARFOGEL

Mourning see Death, Burial, and Mourning

Muhammad and Judaism

Ahmad, Barakat, Muhammad and the Jews: A Re-Examination, New Delhi: Vikas, 1979

Firestone, Reuven, Journeys in Holy Lands: The Evolution of the Abraham-Ishmael Legends in Islamic Exegesis, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990

- Geiger, Abraham, Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthume aufgenommen, 1833; as Judaism and Islam, Edinburgh: Williams and Norgate, 1896; New York: Ktav, 1970
- Katsh, Abraham, Judaism in Islam: Biblical and Talmudic Backgrounds of the Koran and Its Commentaries, New York: Block, 1954; 3rd edition, New York: Sepher-Hermon, 1980
- Lewis, Bernard, The Jews of Islam, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1984
- Newby, Gordon, A History of the Jews of Arabia: From Ancient Times to Their Eclipse under Islam (Studies in Comparative Religion), Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988
- Rosenthal, E.I.J., Judaism and Islam (Popular Jewish Library), New York and London: Yoseloff, 1961
- Torrey, Charles Cutler, The Jewish Foundation of Islam (The Hilda Stich Stroock Lectures), New York: Jewish Institute of Religion Press, 1933
- Wasserstrom, Steven M., Between Muslim and Jew: The Problem of Symbiosis under Early Islam, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995
- Watt, W. Montgomery, Muhammad at Medina, Oxford: Clarendon, 1956; New York: Oxford University Press, 1981

The abundant literature on Muhammad and Judaism reflects the continuing scholarly controversy regarding the formative role played by Judaism in the shaping of Islam. More than a century after Western scholars first suggested Muhammad's indebtedness to Judaism, the subject of Judaism's influence on Islam is still largely a matter of heated disagreement. For those who adhere to the tenets of Islam, the entire issue is incomprehensible: Islam represents the original and perfect faith, and Judaism is but an imperfect reflection and distortion of that true faith. For scholars outside of the Islamic tradition, the degree of Islam's indebtedness to Judaism and the relative influences of Christianity and Judaism are at the heart of the debate.

The pioneering work on the subject of Islam's debt to Judaism is GEIGER's study, in which he highlights Kuranic stories, motifs, and concepts that probably derived from Judaism. Since the appearance of Geiger's book, many studies have been written to support or elaborate upon his conclusions, while other authors have sought to prove that Christianity, and not Judaism, was the main source of inspiration for the founder of Islam. In the 1970 reprint of Geiger's classic, Moshe Perlmann provides a good introduction to the literature on the various theories about the influences on Muhammad.

A sophisticated and nuanced analysis of the many issues involved in the relationship between Islam and Judaism can be found in the study by WASSERSTROM, who argues that the model of "borrowing" should be abandoned in favor of a paradigm that analyzes the process of "accommodation of the other" that occurred among both Jews and Muslims in response to one another. Wasserstrom is interested in the creative interplay that resulted from this accommodation, a process that yielded what he terms "products of mutuality." Each of the six chapters in this book investigates the process of self-definition by which both Judaism and Islam sought to legitimate themselves through their interpretations of the other religion.

Most discussions of Judaism and Muhammad accord centrality to Muhammad's relations with the Jews while he served as lawgiver and arbitrator in Medina. WATT examines the relations between the prophet and the powerful Jews of that city after Muhammad's departure in 622. Watt notes in the early part of Muhammad's career in Medina a "tendency to make his religion similar to that of the Jews and to encourage his Medinan followers to continue Jewish practices which they had adopted." The author attributes to this policy such practices as the original orientation of Muslim prayer toward Jerusalem, the license to eat the food of the "People of the Book," and the Kuranic permission allowing male followers of Muhammad to marry Jewish women. Despite Muhammad's efforts, the Jews of Medina rejected his overtures to create a religious and political union. According to Watt, once Muhammad was rebuffed, he understandably began to assert his independence from the Jews, adopting a new policy that culminated in both intellectual and physical attacks on his former prospective allies.

Less is known about Muhammad's contact with Judaism in Mecca, the commercial hub and pagan cultic center of Arabia in which Muhammad began his ministry, than is known about his time in Medina. TORREY proposes that Muhammad derived many of his earliest monotheistic views from an unidentified Jewish community in Mecca. The author contends that this community can be traced back to the sixth century B.C.E., and he argues that it was thoroughly familiar with the Bible, Jewish oral law, and the aggadah. Torrey claims that Muhammad not only learned the rudiments of Judaism from these Jews, he also learned a censored version of Christianity. By emphasizing the rabbinic Jewish origins of Islam, Torrey rejects the views of scholars subsequent to Geiger, such as Wellhausen and Andrae, who argue that Christianity had a more dominant role than Judaism in the formation of Islam. Torrey's thesis is highly speculative and has accordingly been dismissed by most modern scholars. Nevertheless, his work raises the important question of Jewish settlement in the Arabian peninsula, and it seeks a historical basis for the philological claims first put forward by Geiger.

NEWBY considers the relationship of Muhammad to Arabian Jewry in a comprehensive overview of Jewish history in the Arabian peninsula. Disputing the reliability of the Arabic historiographical tradition on the origins of Arabia's Jews, Newby stresses the importance of linguistic evidence, from which he concludes that there must have been a well-integrated Jewish presence in the Arabian peninsula in the early seventh century. An existing Arabian Jewish community was considerably augmented by Jews fleeing Palestine after the failure of the Bar Kokhba revolt in the second century C.E., and, according to Newby, "it is after this that Arabian Judaism begins to flourish." Newby relates the story of Arabia's Jews beyond the death of Muhammad, tracing continual Jewish settlement in Arabia well into the Middle Ages.

Perhaps the most telling examples of cultural borrowing between Islam and Judaism can be found through textual analysis of the Kuran and the Islamic legal system. Illustrative of the approach of comparative textual criticism is the work by KATSH. His close study of verses from chapters two and three of the Kuran stresses evidence that Muhammad borrowed extensively from Jewish material. Moreover, on the basis of the rabbinic sources that he finds embedded in the Kuran, Katsh rejects earlier views that characterized the Jews of Arabia as ignorant and removed from the flourishing centers of rabbinic Judaism in Palestine and Babylonia.

FIRESTONE draws conclusions similar to those of Katsh based upon a close reading of medieval Islamic exegesis of the Abraham/Ishmael tradition. Firestone argues that biblical legends were originally brought by Jews and Christians to the Arabian peninsula where they were then transformed. In this regard, Firestone sees the development of the Abraham/Ishmael legends in Islam as an example of the "clear continuity between Islam and pre-Islamic religious ideas and institutions." At the same time, however, Firestone insists that the Islamic traditions are more than simple borrowings, for "[j]ust as they display continuity from earlier and contemporaneous literature, they also exhibit originality as new literary works."

Muslim scholarship does not acknowledge this debate regarding the sources of Islamic traditions. For Muslims, Muhammad is the Prophet of God, and the Kuran is eternal and uncreated. If there are common elements in the two traditions, this similarity is explained as the result of a common divine source. Where the sources differ, Muslims explain the discrepancies as a result of the distortions and corruptions that the Jews introduced into the original Islamic revelations. Questions of chronology and the knowledge that Judaism antedates Islam by 2,000 years do not enter into Islamic discussion. AHMAD provides a rare English-language treatment by a Muslim of the interaction of Muhammad and Judaism.

Although modern Muslim scholars usually do not approach their traditional sources in order to examine critically parallels and mutual relationships between Islam and other faiths, medieval Islamic jurists were frequently interested in the question of so-called Judaizing practices or Jewish influences. The initial acceptance, followed by repudiation, of Jewish practices and narrative traditions marked the early legal traditions of Islam. Initially, sayings of the Banu Isra'il (Children of Israel), known as the Isra'iliyyat, circulated freely. Permission to embrace such traditions was eventually revoked by Islamic authorities, who also prohibited the study of Jewish Scriptures by Muslims. ROSENTHAL offers an introductory discussion of parallel legal developments in Judaism and Islam, without making hasty judgements about the direction of influence.

LEWIS's elegant, succinct, and persuasive book offers the best one-volume overview of the entirety of the Jewish-Muslim historical encounter. Lewis seeks to examine the complex relationship between Judaism and Islam in terms of the more general question of Islam's relationship to minority religious groups. He begins by identifying two common stereotypes that have dominated the discourse on Islam's relationship with other religions: on one hand, Islam is viewed as fanatically uncompromising in its opposition to other faiths, and, on the other hand, Islamic society is imagined as an "interfaith utopia." Lewis rejects both of these assumptions in this well-balanced study of what he terms the "Judaic-Islamic" tradition.

JANE GERBER AND ARNOLD FRANKLIN

Musar

Eckman, Lester, The History of the Musar Movement: 1840–1945, New York: Shengold, 1975

Eckman, Lester, The Teachings of the Fathers of the Musar Movement, New York: Shengold, 1990

Etkes, Immanuel, Rabbi Israel Salanter and the Mussar Movement: Seeking the Torah of Truth, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1993

Goldberg, Hillel, Israel Salanter, Text, Structure, Idea: The Ethics and Theology of an Early Psychologist of the Unconscious, New York: Ktav, 1982

Levinas, Emmanuel, "In the Image of God, according to Rabbi Hayyim Volozhiner," in Beyond the Verse, translated by Gary D. Mole, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, and London: Athlone, 1994

Levinas, Emmanuel, "Useless Suffering," in Entre Nous: On Thinking-of-the-Other, translated by Michael Smith and Barbara Harshav, New York: Columbia University Press, 1998

Musar can be rendered as "ethics" or as "ethical self-improvement." The Musar movement, a religious trend among Jews in 19th- and 20th-century Eastern Europe, specifically Lithuania, that emphasized ethical exercises and contemplation and that arose in response to the challenges to rabbinic Judaism posed by the twin threats of hasidic pietism and the secularizing intellectualism of the Haskalah, had a significant impact on the development of Judaism. Many of the teachings of the movement are based on the medieval and early modern literature devoted to the cultivation of middot (personality traits), and M.H. Luzzatto's Mesillat Yesharim, or The Path of the Just, is especially valorized. The Musar movement also created its own texts that sought to map the essential nature of the human being, on the one hand, and the good life, on the other, and the founder of the Musar movement, Israel Salanter (1810–1883), can be credited with one of the most original and influential reconceptualizations of Jewish thought in the modern period.

ECKMAN (1990) outlines the origins of the Musar movement and emphasizes its successes. Based on the letters and published works of the leaders of the Musar movement, this work is a clear, although not entirely academic, analysis of the various schools of Musar. The author initially focuses on one of Salanter's students, Isaac Blaser (1837–1907), and then devotes individual chapters to other teachers and schools, including Simcha Zissel (1829–1898), another prominent student of Salanter. Eckman addresses the recurrent preoccupations of the movement: prayer, morality, psychology, knowledge, and education. He also explains that the curricula of the various Musar yeshivot differed in their emphasis of study and practice. For example, the Kelm curriculum was weighted toward religious, as opposed to secular, studies, although, as the author is careful to note, the Kelm school did not see the study of secular subjects as a necessary evil. "On the contrary," Eckman asserts, the school believed that "understanding science and the general environment was necessary, not only for better living, but better to comprehend religious teachings." Each chapter is replete with many details and refferences to primary sources, but the author often fails to convey the intensity of the conflicts among the leaders of the Musar schools, and the study lacks critical analysis of the sources it cites. ECKMAN (1975) similarly tends to emphasize positive accomplishments and discount disputes within the movement.

GOLDBERG is a thorough treatment of the central ideas and methodologies of the movement as expounded in the writings of Salanter. Highlighting the central questions that the Musar pedagogues sought to answer, the author leads the reader through the initial political, intellectual, and spiritual development and expansion of the Musar movement as a Jewish response to modernity.

ETKES is the most significant scholarly analysis of the roots and development of the Musar movement. The book guides English-language readers through some of the most obscure and difficult texts and terminology of the movement. The volume also makes the material accessible to those unfamiliar with this period of Jewish history, for the author presents a history of the intellectual, spiritual, and historical development of Musar that begins by tracing the individuals who most significantly influenced Salanter's thinking. Etkes argues that Salanter's most unique and important contribution to Judaism was his transformation of the issues of ethics from the domain of theology to the realm of psychology, and the author explains the essential connections between modern psychology and the traditional understanding of personal ethical development. Chapters eight through ten provide the basis for a thorough grasp of the radical nature of Musar as well as the impact that the movement has had on all ensuing discussions of ethics and human nature in Judaism. Etkes does not refrain from evaluating the successes and failures of the various Musar schools, and he comments on the extent to which they reflected the teachings of Salanter. He insists that the religious-cultural tendency "embodied in the writings of the Gaon, given systematic formulation by Rabbi Hayyim, and again embodied in the person of Rabbi Zundel Salant" provides a clear precedent for Salanter's conception of the human being.

The influential French Jewish philosopher LEVINAS (1994, 1998) makes an explicit attempt to situate many of the themes of the Musar movement in a completely modern and not necessarily religious or Jewish context. Focusing on the interpersonal experiences of the individual, the author stresses the interdependence of humans, and he examines the ethical necessity of experiencing the suffering or pain of the other. He writes, "It is in the interhuman perspective of my responsibility for the other, without concern for reciprocity, in my call for his or her disinterested help, in the asymmetry of the relation of one to the other, that I have tried to analyze the phenomenon of useless suffering."

RACHEL SABATH

Music: Cantillation

Binder, Abraham Wolf, Biblical Chant, New York: Philosophical Library, 1959; London: Owen, 1960

Idelsohn, Abraham Zebi, Thesaurus of Oriental Hebrew Melodies, Berlin: Harz, 1923–1933; as Thesaurus of Hebrew Oriental Melodies, New York: Ktav, 1973

Jacobson, Joshua R., "Ta'amey Hamikra: A Closer Look," Journal of Synagogue Music, 22(1–2), July/December 1992

Rosenbaum, Samuel, A Guide to Haftarah Chanting, New York: Ktav, 1973

Rosenbaum, Samuel, A Guide to Torah Reading: A Manual for the Torah Reader, New York: Ktav, 1982

Rosowsky, Solomon, The Cantillation of the Bible: The Five Books of Moses, New York: Reconstructionist Press, 1957

Spiro, Pinchas, Haftarah Chanting, New York: Board of Jewish Education of Greater New York, 1964, revised edition, 1994

Weil, Daniel Meir, The Masoretic Chant of the Bible, Jerusalem: Mass, 1995

Wickes, William, A Treatise on the Accentuation of the Twenty-One So-Called Prose Books of the Old Testament, with a Facsimile of a Page of the Codex Assigned to Ben-Asher in Aleppo, Oxford: Clarendon, 1887; with prolegomenon by Aron Dotan, New York: Ktav, 1970

Cantillation involves the reading of biblical texts according to a system of diacritical markings known as ta'amei hamikra. These ta'amim appear as dots, lines, and other symbols above and below the verse, and they serve three purposes. Their primary functions are to indicate syntax and the correct accentuation of individual words. In addition, they have a musical function, as these accents guide the reader in the appropriate chanting of the text. Books and articles about cantillation focus variously on one, two, or all three of these functions.

WICKES adopts a primarily grammatical approach in his scholarly work, which offers a thorough discussion of the relationship of the ta'amim to Hebrew syntax and includes rules for parsing, based upon the markings in the text. Wickes's study remains the only book of its kind available in English, although recent works in Hebrew may offer more accessible reference to the grammatical underpinnings of cantillation.

IDELSOHN devotes space in each of the ten volumes of his monumental work to a discussion of the musical aspects of cantillation found in each of the Jewish subcultures that he studied. Idelsohn notes structural similarities among the disparate traditions, concluding that all Jewish music is based upon common roots in biblical chant.

ROSOWSKY presents the first major work in English devoted exclusively to cantillation. In this exhaustive yet accessible study, Rosowsky clearly sets out the grammatical structures that guide the employment of each accent in a clause, dividing them into "servants" and "lords," which function interdependently and appear in predictable sequences. He also dedicates extensive space to a patient and thorough exposition of the manner of chanting each accent according to the Lithuanian tradition imported to the United States. Rosowsky offers examples of the adaptation of each neume (musical symbol) to words of one to seven syllables, providing real illustrations of each possibility drawn from actual biblical verses. The volume is available in many school and synagogue libraries, and it should be consulted by any serious student of the subject.

While Rosowsky went to elaborate lengths to expound the Eastern European tradition, BINDER took just 125 pages to explore the Central European tradition preferred by his students at the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College. Binder's more compact treatment is a thorough and extremely practical survey of the basics. In addition, Binder offers instructions for dealing with the musical "detours" or irregularities in the Pentateuch, as well as information about all the Ashkenazi variations employed in chanting the Prophets and Five Scrolls. Binder concludes his slim volume with a comparative chart of all six cantillation systems.

Several volumes intended primarily for lay readers offer some introduction to the history of biblical chant and the organization of the accents into clauses. SPIRO's text is clearly meant for use in instructional settings, and it is especially well suited for use by adolescents preparing for Bar and Bat Mitzvah ceremonies. A supplemental "Guide for the Junior Torah Reader" provides a brief introduction to the Torah service, including charts for each kind of scriptural chant.

Rosenbaum was for many years the executive vice president of the Conservative movement's Cantors Assembly, and both ROSENBAUM (1973) and ROSENBAUM (1982) are as reader-friendly as Spiro's work, offering practical information for prospective chanters.

WEIL has authored an exhaustive study of cantillation whose syntactical/grammatical system presents the accents of the 21 prose books of the Bible in groups of "leaders" and "suspense" (an organization not unlike the division of accents maintained by Rosowsky into the classical "lords" and "servants"). Weil also investigates the original musical content of the now-universal Tiberian system of accentuation. Unfortunately, all of his research is predicated not only on the reader's prior knowledge of basic principles of cantillation, but also on familiarity with the work of a variety of other authors on the subject (notably M. Breuer) that is not readily available, at least in English. Weil's scholarship may be pioneering, but it is also highly abstruse, and therefore it is of little use to most students of the tradition of biblical chant.

JACOBSON's journal article is noteworthy, for it offers a comprehensive overview of several issues relating to cantillation. Jacobson starts by exploring the interrelationship between biblical texts and the uses of the ta'amim, in order to facilitate the proper setting of those same texts in liturgical compositions. He then turns his attention to the grammatical and syntactical uses of the accents, illustrating how various sentences could be misread if the punctuation provided by the ta'amim were ignored. Jacobson also provides an introduction to the syntactical division of Scripture that the experienced reader can use to predict the appearance of the correct accent. His article concludes with a brief bibliographic survey of books on cantillation and a call for greater diligence on the part of music professionals in the performance and practice of this sacred art. While the presentation of this article is marred by various printer's errors, this flaw should not detract from Jacobson's scholarship.

MARSHA BRYAN EDELMAN

See also Music: American Jewish Music; Music: Art Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Cantorial Music; Music: Middle Eastern Music; Music: Sephardi Music, Music: Views on Music

Music: Cantorial Music

- Cohon, Baruch Joseph, "The Structure of the Synagogue Prayer-Chant," Journal of the American Musicological Society, 3(1), 1950
- Gradenwitz, Peter, The Music of Israel: From the Biblical Era to Modern Times, Portland, Oregon: Amadeus, 1996
- Idelsohn, Abraham Zebi, Jewish Music in Its Historical Development, New York: Holt, 1929; as Jewish Music: Its Historical Development, London: Constable, 1992
- Levine, Joseph A., Synagogue Song in America (Performance in World Music), Crown Point, Indiana: White Cliffs Media, 1989
- Rothmüller, Aron Marko, The Music of the Jews: An Historical Appreciation, London: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1953; New York: Beechhurst, 1954; revised edition, Cranbury, New Jersey: Barnes, 1967
- Sendrey, Alfred, The Music of the Jews in the Diaspora (up to 1800): A Contribution to the Social and Cultural History of the Jews, New York: Yoseloff, 1971
- Slobin, Mark, Chosen Voices: The Story of the American Cantorate (Music in American Life), Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989
- Werner, Eric, The Sacred Bridge: The Interdependence of Liturgy and Music in Synagogue and Church during the First Millennium, vol. 1, New York: Columbia University Press, and London: Dobson, 1959; vol. 2, New York: Ktav, and London: Dobson, 1984
- Werner, Eric, A Voice Still Heard: The Sacred Songs of the Ashkenazic Jews (Leo Baeck Institute Series), University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1976

Treatment of the literature on cantorial music as a topic might encourage the reader to surmise that there is just one such genre. In fact, while the term refers to the ritual melodies performed by a Jewish precentor, there is immense variety in the global spectrum of cantorial music. Allowing for any number of subtler regional variations, we can divide the Jewish musical traditions of the world into three cultural subsets: Oriental or Middle Eastern music, which denotes by and large the repertoire of Jews living in Islamic lands; Sephardi music, which encompasses the traditions of Jews who lived in medieval Spain or Portugal and the lands of the Sephardi diaspora since the end of the Middle Ages; and Ashkenazi music, which denotes the musical output of the Jews with origins in Central and Eastern Europe.

Since the great majority of Jews in English-speaking countries are Ashkenazim, it is primarily their cantorial music that has received treatment in English-language studies, although there are innumerable books of actual cantorial music, notating the traditions of Jews from a variety of regions, Oriental and Sephardi included.

IDELSOHN, the first Jewish ethnomusicologist, devotes much of his landmark synthesis to discussion of cantorial music from the biblical period through the dawn of the 20th century. Chapters 4 through 16 of part 1 (more than 250 pages) provide a thorough overview of the history of synagogue music and its evolution from unrhythmical chant to art music. Idelsohn's prose is dry, and many of his musical illustrations, and the observations accompanying them, will be lost on the uninitiated. This remains, however, a first stop for any serious student of cantorial music.

Idelsohn was followed by a fairly long list of Jewish music historians eager to contribute their understandings to the literature. Of necessity, cantorial music is featured in their work, since (with only local exceptions) it and the folk music which it influenced were the sole extant Jewish musical forms until the 19th century. While none of these focuses exclusively or even disproportionately on cantorial music, the surveys by SENDREY, ROTHMÜLLER, and GRADENWITZ are among the most comprehensive, and each is well worth examination.

Eric Werner, by contrast, devoted much of his career to championing a thorough understanding particularly of Jewish liturgical music and the factors that influenced its development. Since the Ashkenazim lived in constant contact with their Christian neighbors, it is not surprising that Jewish and non-Jewish music should have cross-pollinated extensively. WERNER (1959) describes the results of this intermingling of traditions, exploring the maze of similarities and borrowings back and forth between the two forms. A more detailed examination specifically of the Jewish music that resulted is presented in WERNER (1976). The author places his study in a context of the many influences—internal and external—that affected the practice of cantorial music. He tends to assume considerable knowledge of both Judaism and music on the part of his readers, and sometimes it will be difficult for the non-specialist to follow. On the other hand, his understanding of the scope of Jewish history and literature is impressive, and the thoughtful reader will gain much from these volumes.

The important article by COHON contributes a clear and concise yet comprehensive understanding of "The Structure of the Synagogue Prayer-Chant." Following a brief explication of the distinction between a traditional "scale" and the "modes" employed in synagogue song, Cohon then discusses the four modes on which traditional Ashkenazi synagogue music is based: Adonoy Molokh, Ahavoh Rabbah, Mogen Ovos, and Psalm Mode. Each of these is utilized in unique ways for different times of day and/or different liturgical seasons, resulting in distinctive musical flavors. Cohon carefully charts the classical motives employed in each manifestation of the mode. While his article is, of necessity, somewhat technical and best understood by readers with some musical literacy, it is nevertheless easy enough to follow and provides a wonderful introduction to the world of cantorial music.

The only recent book to deal with the relationship between traditional and contemporary cantorial music is LEVINE. He provides a comprehensive survey of the subject, from Temple days to the modern American synagogue, and includes useful discussion of the primary modes utilized in Ashkenazi cantorial music, as well as extensive illustrative material. Unfortunately, Levine's tone varies from accessible and even mildly humorous to professorial and esoteric. In addition, especially in discussing more contemporary music (for which he barely attempts to disguise his disdain), Levine reaches some of his predetermined conclusions only by taking several examples out of any practical context. Despite its uneven presentation, this is a one-of-a-kind treatment of the subject, and it remains an essential element in the effort to understand the evolution of cantorial music.

One last volume must be added to the list of indispensable references for an appreciation of cantorial music: SLOBIN. While surveying the role of the cantor in American Jewish life, he coincidentally traces the evolution of synagogue musical practice. No study of cantors could be complete without some consideration of their music, and Slobin does not disappoint, discussing traditional nusach as well as art music written especially for the modern synagogue. This book contributes the context for appreciating cantors and their music, and it is a valuable addition to the literature.

MARSHA BRYAN EDELMAN

See also Music: American Jewish Music; Music: Art Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Cantillation; Music: Middle Eastern Music; Music: Sephardi Music; Music: Views on Music

Music: Art Music

- Bohman, Philip V., The World Centre for Jewish Music in Palestine, 1936–1940: Jewish Musical Life on the Eve of World War II, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1992
- Brod, Max, Israel's Music, Tel Aviv: Sefer, 1951; expanded by Yehuda Walter Cohen as Die Musik Israels, London: Bärenreiter, 1976
- Fleisher, Robert, Twenty Israeli Composers: Voices of a Culture, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1997
- Hirshberg, Jehosh, Music in the Jewish Community of Palestine, 1880–1948: A Social History, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1995
- Karas, Joza, Music in Terezín, 1941–1945, New York: Beaufort, 1985
- Keren, Zvi, Contemporary Israeli Music: Its Sources and Stylistic Development, Ramat Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1980
- Ringer, Alexander L., Arnold Schoenberg: The Composer as Jew, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1990
- Tischler, Alice, A Descriptive Bibliography of Art Music by Israeli Composers (Detroit Studies in Music Bibliography, no. 62), Warren, Michigan: Harmonie Park, 1988
- Weisser, Albert, The Modern Renaissance of Jewish Music: Events and Figures, Eastern Europe and America, New York: Bloch, 1954; reprint with new introduction, New York: Da Capo, 1983

Art music assumes three different but related forms in Jewish history and culture. First, composers create a music with distinctively Jewish themes, with resonances both inside and outside Jewish society. Second, composers with Jewish identities create works that express that identity, either through historical circumstances or because of conscious decisions to ascribe Jewish meaning to a composition. Third, particular works of music develop symbolically Jewish identities because of their reception history, and the Jewish identity of the composers in such instances may or may not be relevant to that history. Art music becomes Jewish, therefore, for both textual and contextual reasons.

WEISSER was the first music scholar to outline the conditions for Jewish art music. The Jewish composers generating the “modern Renaissance”—from the late 19th century into the 1920s—came of age at a high point of Russian nationalism, and they correspondingly developed their “Jewishness” by collecting and setting Jewish folk songs through the St. Petersburg Society for Jewish Folk Music. Jewish art music emerged at the interstices between tradition and modernity. A Jewish music theory took shape through investigations of intrinsically Jewish musical traits, such as those in the ritual of the synagogue, and their reformulation into modern compositional techniques. Weisser devotes separate chapters to Joel Engel, Joseph Achron, Moses Milner, Lazare Saminsky, Alexander Krein, and Michael Gniessen, and he closes the book with a chapter on the movement’s influence in America.

RINGER makes a bold and controversial case for establishing the attributes that mark a composer as Jewish. As the leading figure of European musical modernism, Arnold Schoenberg is usually interpreted as a composer more concerned with the independence of music from internal and external identities. This book brings an alternative perspective to the composer, first, by arguing that Schoenberg intensified his treatment of Jewish themes throughout his life, and second, by establishing parallels between Schoenberg’s aesthetic approaches and Jewish mystical traditions. Schoenberg’s obsession with number theory, for example, is likened to Kabbalah. Ringer’s major contribution is the musical portrait of Schoenberg as a complex figure, whose musical activities ranged from the most esoteric domains to popular musics such as cabaret.

HIRSHBERG writes the first comprehensive music history of the yishuv, the period of resettlement in Palestine prior to Israeli statehood in 1948. He employs a sociological methodology, examining cultural institutions and musical change more extensively than the music itself. The period unfolds as one marked by struggle and experimentation yet fundamental to the emergence of a national music culture. Each chapter encompasses a historical moment in or a significant influence on the music of Israel. The social history of music in the book portrays music as a means of accommodating differences among the ethnic communities and establishing a distinctive 20th-century voice.

BOHLMAN translates and edits the documents of the first art music society in the land of Israel, the World Centre for Jewish Music in Palestine (WCJMP), which flourished briefly on the eve of World War II. Organized by three European immigrants—Salli Levi, Joachim Stutschewsky, and Hermann Swet—the WCJMP established contacts with Jewish musicians throughout the world, attempting to centralize Jewish musical activity in the yishuv by founding the journal Musica Hebraica, organizing concerts and festivals, and publishing new compositions. The documents in the book give voice to many Jewish musicians as the specter of the Holocaust continued to grow, and the interpretive chapters examine the difficulties, personal and musical, of creating a national music culture in Israel.

KARAS has written the first major English-language study of music in the Nazi concentration camp of Theresienstadt (Terezín) in the northwestern part of Czechoslovakia. Terezín was somewhat unusual insofar as the prisoners were allowed to continue artistic activities, even in the midst of brutal deprivation. Concerts continued, and several of Central Europe’s most distinguished Jewish composers—Pavel Haas, Gideon Klein, Hans Krása, and Viktor Ullmann among others—were active in the camp’s musical life before deportation to the Auschwitz extermination camp. Karas portrays Terezín’s musical culture very lucidly, and several works, such as Krása’s children’s opera, Brundibár, receive in-depth treatment. Though the book does not dwell on Jewishness in Terezín’s music culture, it becomes clear that many composers intensified the Jewish qualities in their works while in the camp.

BROD has written an in-depth historical study of art music in Israel at the end of the yishuv and the beginning of statehood. An immigrant from Prague, Brod provides a sensitive portrait of the accomplishments of the immigrant generation, framing it as an in-gathering of diverse cultures. Jewish music and art music in Israel, therefore, reflect this diversity and are aesthetically the products of historical circumstances in the diaspora and in Israel. When the first edition appeared, art music in Israel was also benefiting from integration into a wide range of other cultural activities, from radio to dance and theater, with which Brod himself was associated. The first edition, which appeared only in English translation, quickly became a classic music history. The expanded edition retained the German in which Brod wrote and included an extensive update by Yehuda Walter Cohen, who gives an account of the subsequent quarter century of Israel’s music history.

KEREN approaches the music culture of Israel in the 1960s and 1970s by laying out a broadly historical background. Though his subject is art music in Israel, the influences he considers make it clear that his subject is also Jewish music in a narrower sense because of the ways religious traditions, Jewish folk music, and the Hebrew language naturally influence the composer. The presentation and analysis of contemporary Israeli music rely almost entirely on musical style, with biography and historical context kept to a minimum. Each discussion of musical style is illustrated with several musical examples, a total of 187 of which fill the book’s 181-page appendix.

TISCHLER provides a bibliography of works by composers active in Israel from the yishuv period until 1986, when she completed her research. For each work she includes not only the bibliographical citations but also information about first performances, manuscripts, and availability of taped or other recordings. The entries are organized by composer, and each composer is introduced with a biographical sketch, which is followed by a complete listing of compositions. The research for the book took place in libraries and archives primarily in the United States, Europe, and Israel, and researchers who want to pursue these sources will find the way well paved. Though the book stems primarily from institutional materials, it opens up many other possibilities for further research.

FLEISHER has gathered interviews from 20 of Israel's most distinguished composers, organizing them into three generations: immigrants who developed their compositional vocabularies prior to settling in Israel, a second generation that came of age during early statehood, and a third group whose musical voices developed after Israel became a nation. Fleisher has meticulously researched each composer and his or her works, making the reference aspects of the book as up-to-date as possible. The interviews are not presented in journalistic format but rather as narratives that allow each composer to speak as eloquently as possible. An American composer, Fleisher has taken great pains to ensure that his book is not simply a history but rather an ethnographic entry into the art-music scene of Israel in the late 20th century.

PHILIP V. BOHLMAN

See also Music: American Jewish Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Cantillation; Music: Cantorial Music; Music: Middle Eastern Music; Music: Sephardi Music; Music: Views on Music

Music: American Jewish Music

- Baumgarten, Murray (general editor), "Klezmer: History and Culture, A Conference," Judaism: A Quarterly Journal of Jewish Life and Thought, 47(1), Winter 1998
- Fromm, Herbert, On Jewish Music: A Composer's View, New York: Bloch, 1978
- Heskes, Irene, Passport to Jewish Music: Its History, Traditions, and Culture (Contributions to the Study of Music and Dance, no. 33), Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1994
- Kanter, Kenneth A., The Jews on Tin Pan Alley: The Jewish Contribution to American Popular Music, 1830-1940, New York: Ktav, 1982
- Levine, Joseph A., Synagogue Song in America (Performance in World Music Series), Crown Point, Indiana: White Cliffs Media, 1989
- Shelemay, Kay K., Let Jasmine Rain Down: Song and Remembrance among Syrian Jews (Chicago Studies in Ethnomusicology), Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998
- Slobin, Mark, Tenement Songs: The Popular Music of the Jewish Immigrants (Music in American Life), Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1982
- Slobin, Mark, Chosen Voices: The Story of the American Cantorate (Music in American Life), Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989

A comprehensive study of American Jewish music in all its facets has yet to be written. General Jewish music histories devote little attention to understanding the profound effect of the American experience on Jewish music. When transplanted to the United States, classic sacred and folk traditions from the Ashkenazi and Sephardi communities evolved in a wide range of directions. Genres from synagogue song to klezmer music were markedly influenced by American culture. Jewish music also became woven into the cultural and economic fabric of the American concert hall, theater, films, and the recording industry, as Jewish musicians reached outward from immigrant beginnings, creating a musical synthesis that inextricably linked American culture and the Jewish world. The readings listed above represent areas of recent study related to American Jewish music in its diverse forms—sacred and secular, deeply traditional and radically innovative.

HESKES provides an excellent overview of American Jewish music in a section titled "Three Hundred Years of Jewish Music in America" that examines the "complex legacy" of influences and traditions that Jews brought to the North American continent, and she provides summary highlights of major events and turning points in that history. The author focuses on significant artistic practices and mentions regional as well as national figures, including composers, cantors, organists, choir directors, and musical organizers. She covers musical theater, popular song, cantorial and choral synagogue song, klezmer, labor songs, and Yiddish popular music. Heskes also outlines the careers of major Jewish composers such as Ernest Bloch, Darius Milhaud, Arnold Schoenberg, and Leonard Bernstein, and she considers Jewish dimensions of their lives and music. A brief chapter on popular songwriters such as Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, and George and Ira Gershwin provides perspective on the increasing allure of secular American culture for Jewish artists.

SHELEMAY offers a case study of pizmonim (songs) of a Syrian Jewish community, based on ethnographic research involving field recordings and interviews, primarily with subjects in Brooklyn, New York, although she also documents musical connections between this community and other Syrian Jewish communities. Shelemay explains in detail how this music reflects an array of cultural processes involved in the transmission of Middle Eastern folk and sacred musical traditions. She explores the intricate workings and daily practices of cultural memory through music.

FROMM captures the American Jewish music world through the eyes of a musician practicing in a Reform synagogue. The essays, many of which had been previously published over the span of Fromm's career, outline the composer's views as he tackles the hard questions regarding the definition of Jewish music and the practical aspects of routine temple musicianship. Fromm elucidates not only the attitudes of his time but also the goals and ideas behind his own synagogue compositions. He discusses the works of many other composers and contemporaries. Especially useful are his reviews of books and particular synagogue works and other Jewish compositions.

LEVINE has produced the best work outlining how Americans practice the art of synagogue song. He primarily focuses on technical musical analysis of traditional synagogue chants, including extensive examples of cantorial styles that cover the arts of improvisation and prescribed motifs. He reveals his views of the influences of folk, pop, rock, and jazz on Jewish liturgical music, and in the conclusion, he evaluates the Americanization of Ashkenazi musical tradition.

SLOBIN (1989) provides a highly readable book of applied ethnomusicology that serves also as a historical and sociological study of Jewish music in the United States. The author presents Jewish community and musical life through anecdotes and extensive quotations from primary sources. Through these sources, Slobin traces the evolution of the role of the American cantor, emphasizing the extent to which cantors played a crucial part in the survival of Jewish sacred music across denominational lines. He discusses the first major waves of Jewish immigration from Europe, during which the cantor served as a primary religious leader; the early days of phonograph recordings, when select cantors became Jewish celebrities; and the modern era, when the cantorate became professionalized. Slobin discusses the current nature of the cantor's job, and he examines new trends in the profession including the recent inclusion of women. Specific musical examples reveal how the basic repertoire can provide clues to the significance and responsibilities of the cantor in various historical periods.

SLOBIN (1982) explores the popular secular works of music created by Jews during the great period of immigration at the turn of the 20th century. Millions of Jews from Europe brought their folk cultural legacy and Yiddish language to North American shores. Popular Jewish songs, sentimental ballads, and melodrama expressed ethnic identity and reflected the concerns and passions of that immigrant population. Slobin expounds the beliefs, the social and economic milieu, and the organizational life that encompassed these new immigrants. He explains the roles of various types of musicians including cantor, meshoyrer, and klezmer musicians. The accomplishments of Yiddish theater musicians such as Goldfaden, Mogulesco, Perlmutter, Rumshinsky, and Secunda are detailed. These and other prolific Yiddish theater composers set the stage for later American musical theater. Slobin also discusses the stylistics of Yiddish sheet music.

KANTER contends that the participation of Jewish composers, performers, agents, producers, and publishers played a prominent role in shaping the development and course of popular song in the United States. In the first section of the book, Kanter traces Jewish participation in American popular music through the songs of musicians such as Henry Russell and John Howard Payne. He chronologically outlines the contributions of numerous Jews involved in minstrel shows, the song repertoire of the Civil War era, parlor songs of the gay nineties, burlesque, and vaudeville. The second major section of the book is devoted to chapters offering biographies of notable American musicians such as Henry Russell, Monroe Rosenfield, Charles Harris, Irving Berlin, Lorenz Hart, Richard Rodgers, Oscar Hammerstein, Jerome Kern, and George and Ira Gershwin. Kanter concludes with a selection of illustrated covers of American Jewish sheet music.

BAUMGARTEN, the general editor of Judaism, oversaw a special section to volume 47 that contains selected conference papers from the Klezmer Research Conference at Wesleyan University. The collection explores the phenomenal recent revival in klezmer music and includes a history of klezmer in the United States, detailed analyses of influences on and by klezmer music, a discussion of the argot peculiar to this musical subculture, and insiders' views of the vibrant nature of the current klezmer music scene.

JUDITH S. PINNOLIS

See also Music: Art Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Cantillation; Music: Cantorial Music; Music: Middle Eastern Music; Music: Sephardi Music; Music: Views on Music

Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music

- Cahan, Yehuda Leyb, Yidishe folkslider mit melodien [Yiddish Folk Songs with Melodies], edited by Max Weinreich, New York: Yivo Institute for Jewish Research, 1957
- Coopersmith, Harry (editor), Songs of Zion, New York: Behrmans Jewish Book House, 1942
- Flam, Gila, Singing for Survival: Songs of the Lodz Ghetto, 1940–1945, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1992
- Heskes, Irene, Yiddish American Popular Songs, 1895 to 1950: A Catalog Based on the Lawrence Marwick Roster of Copyright Entries, Washington, D.C.: Library of Congress, 1992
- Nathan, Hans (editor), Israeli Folk Music: Songs of the Early Pioneers, Madison, Wisconsin: A-R Editions, 1994
- Rubin, Ruth (editor), A Treasury of Jewish Folksong, New York: Schocken, 1950
- Sharvit, Uri, Chassidic Tunes from Galicia, Jerusalem: Renanot, 1995
- Slobin, Mark (editor and translator), Old Jewish Folk Music: The Collections and Writings of Moshe Beregovski, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982
- Vinaver, Chemjo, Anthology of Hassidic Music, edited, introduced, and annotated by Eliyahu Schleifer, Jerusalem: Jewish Music Research Centre, Hebrew University, 1985

In the broadest sense, Ashkenazi folk music includes the vernacular, popular, and oral traditions of the Jewish communities of Central and Eastern Europe, where Yiddish or German was commonly a lingua franca, alongside the various national languages and regional dialects. Ashkenazi folk music is both secular and sacred, and its history often unfolds as a documentation of the tensions between these domains in Jewish society. Different tensions result from the ways in which folk music forms at the fault lines between rural and urban, oral and written, and Jewish and non-Jewish cultural practices. Studies and collections of Ashkenazi folk music often narrate such tensions, and they document moments of historical change, notably the challenge of modernity to traditional Jewish life, the immigration of Ashkenazi Jews to North America and Israel, the pressures of antisemitism, and the destruction of Ashkenazi civilization through pogroms and the Holocaust.

HESKES provides synopses of 3,427 Yiddish songs published in the United States during the first half of the 20th century, which constituted a golden age for the Yiddish stage and for Yiddish popular music. Though each song is documented with detailed information about its composition, publication, and musical content, Heskes' approach is that of a social historian, using song to illuminate the culture of the Ashkenazi immigration to North America. The introductory essays, Yiddish guide, bibliographies, lists of sources, and illustrations from Yiddish sheet music make this volume very accessible for anyone with an interest in Ashkenazi oral and popular traditions. The volume stands also as crucial documentation of the Jewish contribution to American popular song.

CAHAN was the most important collector of Ashkenazi folk music from the turn of the century until the 1920s. This volume contains repertoires from different projects undertaken by Cahan throughout East and East-Central Europe. This edition follows several earlier editions, in Lithuania and New York, and it is one of the most comprehensive of all collections of Ashkenazi folk music from pre-Holocaust Europe. The bulk of the texts and commentaries are in Yiddish, but Max Weinreich introduces the volume in English, and the song texts are romanized. In addition to the 205 pieces with transcribed melodies, folk poetry and other song texts appear, organized according to genre and function. The volume is crucial to understanding Ashkenazi folk music in the decades prior to the Holocaust.

NATHAN gathers an anthology of folk-song settings commissioned by the Keren Kayemet (Jewish National Fund) in the late 1930s. The folk songs themselves were collected on kibbutzim and were usually poems by such distinguished poets as Nathan Alterman and Hayyim Nahman Bialik. The composers accepting the invitation to create a national art song were Aaron Copland, Paul Dessau, Artur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, Erich-Walter Sternberg, Ernst Toch, Kurt Weill, and Stefan Wolpe, and their compositions in this volume reflect their individual interpretations of Jewish music as well as their perceptions of unifying national traits. The volume opens and closes with historical and analytical essays by Philip V. Bohlman, whose concluding afterword is an extensive study of the relation between Jewish folk and art music.

COOPERSMITH compiles a volume of 209 songs in a work that enjoyed enormous success in the 1940s. The songs reflect the time of their compilation, particularly the emigration from Europe to North America and Palestine and the in-gathering and formation of new communities and traditions. The songs are divided between folk traditions (126 Yiddish and Hebrew folk songs, many with Zionist themes) and religious functions, most of them intended for holidays. Coopersmith was the most important Jewish music educator in the United States during the mid-20th century, and the book is conceived in such a way as to be profitably used in Jewish education. The songs and melodies lend themselves to easy performance, with many also in English translation.

FLAM draws on exhaustive interviews with survivors of the Łódź ghetto and on archival sources in Israel, Europe, and the United States to create a historical portrait of song in one of the ghettos formed by the Nazis. The interaction between folk and popular song traditions provided a narrative continity to ghetto life, connecting the Jews of Łódź to their pasts, while at the same time providing them with a common set of experiences that allowed some form of survival. Flam follows certain songs as they unfolded in a history of their own, which simultaneously reflected the social changes in the ghetto. Just as some songs passed from domestic use to the workplace and public stage, others circulated as street songs or chronicled particular figures in the ghetto, especially Chaim Rumkowski, the political leader of the Jewish community. Folk and popular song provides a lens for drawing the reader closer to the everyday world of the Łódź ghetto.

VINAVER gathers folk songs from the Eastern European hasidic communities in which he worked as a collector and folklorist prior to his immigration to the United States in the late 1930s. Although Vinaver did not restrict himself to religious folk music—he was especially interested in the music for the Yiddish stage—his hasidic collections are the first to establish a framework for explicitly religious songs as folk music. The religious folk music of the hasidim, Vinaver found, spilled out of the synagogue and reflected the distinctive history of the Eastern European sects. The genres recognized by Vinaver, for example, the textless nigun (literally, “something played,” a “melody”), have become standard symbols of the folk culture of Ashkenazi Jews, especially in the revival of Ashkenazi folk music at the end of the 20th century. Eliyahu Schleifer not only gathers together a superb anthology from Vinaver's collections and publications, but he also provides splendid musicological commentary.

SLOBIN translates and edits some of the core work of Moses Beregowski (1892–1961), the most important Soviet folk-music scholar and ethnologist, whose research examined Jewish traditions in different parts of the Soviet Union but focused on the most intensely Jewish regions of Ukraine. This volume contains both analytical essays and Beregowski's transcriptions, most of them published previously but here available in the West and with English translations for the first time. Beregowski struggled against Soviet authorities and scientific ideologies throughout his life, but he succeeded nonetheless in amassing large collections, several of which are under study and being prepared for publication. Beregowski's scientific perspectives were distinctive in the Jewish music scholarship of his age, particularly his recognition that Jewish folk music did not exist in a cultural vacuum and that it reflected fairly widespread cultural exchange.

RUBIN gathers Jewish folk songs, most of them Ashkenazi and from Eastern European sources, in one of the first popular collections compiled after the Holocaust and Israeli statehood. The selection and format of the volume reflect folklore theory of the mid-20th century, with the first part devoted to events in the life of the Jewish community, the second part to holidays, and the third part to historical events (songs of partisans and of Israel). The tone of Rubin's introduction and of her commentaries is nostalgic, and she regards the volume as preserving traces of a way of life that has been lost or destroyed. This collection of folk songs, however, has become a classic and has been particularly influential on Ashkenazi folk music in North America.

SHARVIT brings an ethnomusicological and analytical approach to folk songs and dances from Galicia, a thoroughly Yiddish-speaking Jewish region that included parts of modern Poland and Ukraine. The volume includes melodies from genres across the Jewish culture of Galicia: synagogue and liturgical music; Tischlieder (table songs) and other songs from the home; and song and dance for hasidic celebration. Sharvit analyzes the modal infrastructure of these repertoires, and he presents this as a typology that represents a musical and cultural unity in the region. The tunes appear as transcriptions from collections gathered by the author's father, Elazar Sharvit (Schwerd), a Galician hasid himself and descended from a notable hasidic lineage. The volume, therefore, has a broader ethnographic and deeper personal quality than most collections of hasidic song and dance.

PHILIP V. BOHLMAN

See also Music: American Jewish Music; Music: Art Music; Music: Cantillation; Music: Cantorial Music; Music: Middle Eastern Music; Music: Sephardi Music; Music: Views on Music

Music: Sephardi Music

- Adler, Israel, Musical Life and Traditions of the Portuguese Jewish Community of Amsterdam in the XVIIIth Century (Yuval Monograph Series, 1), Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1974
- Adler, Israel, The Study of Jewish Music: A Bibliographical Guide, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1995
- Bunis, David, Sephardic Studies: A Research Bibliography Incorporating Judezmo Language, Literature and Folklore, and Historical Background (Garland Reference Library of the Humanities, vol. 174), New York: Garland, 1981
- Cohen, Judith R., "Judeo-Spanish Songs in the Sephardic Communities of Montreal and Toronto: Survival, Function and Change," Ph.D. diss., Université de Montréal, 1989
- Cohen, Judith R., "Women's Role in Judeo-Spanish Song," in Active Voices: Women in Jewish Culture, edited by Maurie Sacks, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995
- Cohen, Judith R., "Sonography of Judeo-Spanish Song," Jewish Folklore and Ethnology Review, 18(1-2), 1996
- Dorn, Pamela J., "Change and Ideology: The Ethnomusicology of Turkish Jewry," Ph.D. diss., Indiana University, 1991
- Etzion, Judith and Susana Weich-Shahak, "The Music of the Judeo-Spanish Romancero: Stylistic Features," Anuario Musical, 43, 1988
- Hemsi, Alberto and Edwin Seroussi (editors), Cancionero Sefardí, Jerusalem: Jewish Music Research Center of Hebrew University, 1995
- Katz, Israel Joseph, Judeo-Spanish Traditional Ballads from Jerusalem: An Ethnomusicological Study, 2 vols., recording, Brooklyn, New York: Institute of Mediaeval Music, 1972-1975
- Katz, Israel Joseph, "Pre-Expulsion Tune Survivals Among Judeo-Spanish Ballads? A Possible Late Fifteenth Century

French Antecedent," in M. Gerli and H. Sharrer, eds. Hispanic Medieval Studies in Honour of Samuel G. Armistead, Madison: Hispanic Seminary of Medieval Studies, 1992

- Seroussi, Edwin, Mizimrat Qedem: The Life and Music of R. Isaac Algazi from Turkey, with 2 cassettes, Jerusalem: Renanot, 1989
- Seroussi, Edwin, "New Directions in the Music of the Sephardi Jews," Studies in Contemporary Judaism 9, 1993
- Seroussi, Edwin, "Sephardic Music: A Bibliographic Guide with a Checklist of Notated Sources," Jewish Folklore and Ethnology Review, 15(2), 1993
- Seroussi, Edwin, Spanish-Portuguese Synagogue Music in Nineteenth-Century Reform Sources from Hamburg: Ancient Tradition in the Dawn of Modernity (Yuval Monograph Series, 11), Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1996
- Shiloah, Amnon, Jewish Musical Traditions (Jewish Folklore and Anthropology Series), Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1992
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, Judeo-Spanish Moroccan Songs for the Life Cycle (Yuval Music Series, 1), with cassette, Jerusalem: Jewish Music Research Center of Hebrew University, 1989
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, "Adaptations and Borrowings in the Balkan Sephardic Repertoire," Balkanistica, Spring 1998

This survey concentrates on studies of the song repertoire in Judeo-Spanish (popularly known as "Ladino," a term that technically refers to literal translations from classic Hebrew texts rather than to a vernacular). The published research in this field is mostly in Spanish, and many of the most important contributions are found as journal articles, book chapters, encyclopedia entries, and even liner notes accompanying sound recordings rather than as monographs. This list, then, reflects a small sample, concentrating on material in book form and available in English. Musical anthologies (Manuel Alvar, Arcadio de Larrea Palacin, Isaac Levy, Leon Algazi) have not been included, but most are listed in the bibliographies in Seroussi 1993 and Cohen 1989. Musical analysis of Judeo-Spanish song has lagged behind textual analysis, so that many more titles are available that discuss the song texts only, with little or no reference to the music. With respect to Balkan Sephardi music, articles by Ankica Petrovic (Bosnia), Nikolai Kaufman (Bulgaria), Gisela Sulteanu (Romania), and S. Kaludova must also be mentioned, though they are not discussed here.

ADLER (1974) gives a good general idea of liturgical and art music in 18th-century Amsterdam's Sephardi community. His book also serves as a useful reference tool, giving the musical incipits of many melodies. ADLER (1995) is an important recent reference work, although not, of course, restricted to Sephardi music.

BUNIS surveys only the period up to the early 1980s, but he does include some out-of-the-way articles, and he also provides valuable information about early (78 rpm) recordings of Ottoman Sephardi singing.

COHEN (1989) focuses on Sephardi communities in Canada, primarily from Spanish-speaking northern Morocco (reflecting a significant part of the Canadian Sephardi community), with some material from the eastern Mediterranean as well. The dissertation offers historical background, a review of the literature, and a discussion of the songs in their social context. Also included are several brief oral histories and character sketches. Cohen proposes a reclassification of Judeo-Spanish song, downplaying the emphasis on the ballad corpus (romancero) and giving full attention to other genres, both life cycle and year cycle songs of considerable antiquity and newer aspects of the repertoire: lyric, topical, and recreational songs. Specifically musical aspects discussed include performance practice (with comparisons of current performance traditions and early-20th-century transcriptions) and some melodic analysis. Some 70 songs appear with musical transcriptions, and there is a concordance facilitating comparisons with other published versions. Cohen also has published a number of articles and book chapters; in addition she has produced recordings of Judeo-Spanish songs, as a soloist as well as with the Moroccan Sephardi ensemble Gerinaldo, directed by Oro Anahory-Librowicz. Anahory-Librowicz herself has published widely on Judeo-Spanish song texts and other traditional literature.

COHEN (1996) updates earlier versions (appearing in 1993 and 1995 in Jewish Folklore and Ethnology Review) of a sonography of Judeo-Spanish song, listing 78 rpms, LPs, cassettes, CDs and some films and videos, with brief commentaries. This work is probably the most complete published discography available at the time of writing. Several documentary recordings are given special attention. Another version, with fewer entries but more information on selected items, may be found in the second edition of World Music: The Rough Guide (London: World Music Network, 1999).

Women have been the main singers and transmitters of Judeo-Spanish song; COHEN (1995) examines their role in detail. The article discusses the changing roles for women, who in a more traditional setting would have transmitted songs to their daughters but now transmit them to noninsider singers and scholars, who often assume a variant of a daughter's role.

DORN follows several intriguing articles with her dissertation, an informative overview of musical life in the Sephardi communities of Turkey with a strong anthropological orientation. Included are discussions of disemia, culture contact, and epistemological aspects of change. The community is described in historico-political and ethnographic detail, providing a solid context for discussions of influences from Balkan, Greek, Turkish, and Western musical cultures on the song repertoire and performance styles. Both traditional and new styles are given serious attention. More musical transcriptions would have been welcome, but those that are provided are well chosen and cogently discussed.

The article by ETZION and WEICH-SHAHAK, one of a small group of studies carried out by these two Israeli scholars, reflects their respective expertise in early Iberian musicology and in Judeo-Spanish song. Their articles comprise the first serious treatment of concrete musical relationships between the Sephardi and early Spanish romanceros, using systematic analysis of a defined corpus.

A select team of specialists in different aspects of Judeo-Spanish traditional literature, headed by ethnomusicologist

Edwin Seroussi, has produced HEMSI and SEROUSSI, a landmark critical edition of Hemi's early-20th-century transcriptions/arrangements of eastern Mediterranean Judeo-Spanish songs. This edition includes a detailed account of Hemi's life and work and discussions of the different song genres in the edition (for another view of classification, see Cohen 1989). The small, seldom-discussed corpus of Ladino prayers is also included, as are Hemi's previously unpublished melodies and commentaries, as well as useful concordances and other reference materials. Susana Weich-Shahak provides related song versions from her field collections at the National Sound Archives in Jerusalem, and Samuel G. Armistead, the "dean" of Judeo-Spanish studies, ends the volume with an erudite but highly readable postscript. Paloma Díaz-Más, José Manuel Pedrosa, and Elena Romero seldom publish in English, so their contributions here are another boon of this publication; an accompanying recording would have been ideal.

Katz may be considered the pioneer of a serious ethnomusicological approach to Judeo-Spanish song. His numerous articles and analyses of Judeo-Spanish and Iberian music are scattered over a wide range of monographs, journals, and conference proceedings, but KATZ (1972–1975), a two-volume work, is the only book-length publication of which he is the sole author. Katz is known particularly for his collaboration in studies of the Judeo-Spanish romancero by Samuel G. Armistead and Joseph Silverman, notably the monumental, ongoing series Folk Literature of the Sephardic Jews (University of California). His work with both medieval Iberian music manuscripts and regional traditions has added to the value of his publications, which focus on painstaking, systematic musical transcriptions and analyses, particularly of the romances, rather than on social context and personalities. In this book Katz gives a historical introduction and review of the literature—to that point, some 25 years ago—and a very detailed musical examination of ballads recorded from eastern Mediterranean traditional singers in Jerusalem. The second volume consists of comparative transcriptions of the variants of five ballads. A small soft-plastic phonograph recording is included, particularly valuable in that it was recorded in the 1960s, when very few documentary recordings were made. For another approach to the question of Sephardi–early Iberian musical links discussed by Etzion and Weich-Shahak, and others, see KATZ (1992).

SEROUSSI (1996) explores a little-known aspect of Sephardi music, that of the community of Hamburg, providing thorough historical background, musical transcriptions, and analysis. It is a short but thoroughly researched and densely packed study that should stimulate further research on the music of the Portuguese Jewish communities of Western Europe and their relationship to Jewish musical traditions of Spain and Portugal, on the one hand, and to those of North Africa and the former Ottoman lands, on the other.

SEROUSSI (1989) is a monograph that accompanies the welcome remastering of 78 rpm phonograph recordings by the great Turkish Sephardi singer and cantor Isaac Algazi. The two cassettes include material in Hebrew and Judeo-Spanish, as well as some in Turkish. The Judeo-Spanish songs are sung in virtuoso Turkish style, in maqam (the complex system of Middle Eastern musical modes) and with unobtrusive instrumental accompaniment, often on the oud (lute). The monograph gives musical and text transcriptions, as well as biographical and historical background and musical analysis; the set is invaluable for understanding the Ottoman Sephardi musical tradition.

SEROUSSI (1993b) is a very useful bibliography, referring both to Judeo-Spanish and to "Sephardi" music in the broader sense of the term. Seroussi has written extensively on the contemporary state of the Judeo-Spanish tradition; see, for example, SEROUSSI (1993a).

SHILOAH is a valuable guide to the music and musical life of a wide variety of Jewish communities. Rather than organize the study geographically or by culture, the author examines different aspects of musical life, referring in each chapter to a wide range of Jewish cultures. Inevitably, with this sort of wide-ranging study, there is no shortage of omissions, but Shiloah's expertise and experience make this a very important reference and a stimulating point of departure for the discussion of how to approach the study of Jewish music. Again, a recording would have enhanced the book's value greatly.

Weich-Shahak has produced a plethora of articles, scholarly anthologies, and documentary (and more recently semidocumentary) recordings based on her extensive field collection of Judeo-Spanish songs, part of the National Sound Archives at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. WEICH-SHAHAK (1989) is in book form, with a cassette of documentary recordings of Judeo-Spanish life cycle songs from Morocco, mostly performed by women now living in Israel. One key singer was recorded two decades earlier by both Henrietta Yurchenco (CD "Alegrias y Duelas de la Novia," Global Village 145) and Manuel Alvar (unpublished, Arias Montano Institute, Madrid); this offers an unusual opportunity to compare the singer's style over a 20-year range. The book includes—as do almost all of Weich-Shahak's publications—detailed musical and text transcriptions, along with background material.

WEICH-SHAHAK (1998), a valuable counterpart to the Moroccan study of 1989, is a long article that examines Balkan, particularly Bulgarian and Greek, sources for Judeo-Spanish songs and follows logically from her earlier articles on Bulgarian Sephardi song (Orbis Musicae 1979–1980 and 1981–1982; Revista de Dialectologia y Tradiciones Populares 44, 1989) and the documentary recordings from her field collection (AMTI, Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Tecnosaga, Madrid).

JUDITH R. COHEN

See also Music: American Jewish Music; Music: Art Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Cantillation; Music: Cantorial Music; Music: Middle Eastern Music; Music: Views on Music

Music: Middle Eastern Music

Dorn, Pamela J., "Change and Ideology: The Ethnomusicology of Turkish Jewry," Ph.D. diss., Indiana University, 1991

- Halper, Jeff, Edwin Seroussi, and Pamela Squires-Kidron, "Musica Mizrahit: Ethnicity and Class Culture in Israel," Popular Music, 8(2), 1989
- Hirshberg, Jehoash, Music in the Jewish Community of Palestine, 1880–1948: A Social History, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1995
- Horowitz, Amy, "Performance in Disputed Territory: Israeli Mediterranean Music," Musical Performance, issue title: The Performance of Jewish and Arab Music in Israel Today, 1(3), 1997
- Idelsohn, Abraham Z. (editor), Thesaurus of Oriental Hebrew Melodies, 10 vols., Berlin: Harz, 1914–1932; New York: Ktav, 1973
- Idelsohn, Abraham Z., Jewish Music in Its Historical Development, New York: Holt, 1929
- Kligman, Mark, "Modes of Prayer: Arabic Maqamat in the Sabbath Morning Liturgical Music of the Syrian Jews in Brooklyn," Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1997
- Seroussi, Edwin, "The Turkish Makam in the Musical Culture of the Ottoman Jews: Sources and Examples," Israel Studies in Musicology, 5, 1990
- Seroussi, Edwin, "Sephardic Music: A Bibliographic Guide with a Checklist of Notated Sources," Jewish Folk and Ethnology Review, 15(2), 1993
- Sharvit, Uri, "The Musical Realization of Biblical Cantillation Symbols (Te'amim) in the Jewish Yemenite Tradition," Yuval, 4, 1982
- Shelemay, Kay Kaufman, Music, Ritual, and Falasha History, East Lansing: African Studies Center, Michigan State University, 1986
- Shelemay, Kay Kaufman, Let Jasmine Rain Down: Song and Remembrance among Syrian Jews, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998
- Shiloah, Amnon, The Musical Tradition of Iraqi Jews: Selection of Piyyutim and Songs, Or Yehuda: Iraqi Jews' Traditional Culture Center, 1983
- Shiloah, Amnon, Jewish Musical Traditions, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1992
- Shiloah, Amnon, The Dimension of Music in Islamic and Jewish Culture, Brookfield, Vermont, and Aldershot, Hampshire: Variorum, 1993
- Tasat, Ramon Alberto, "The Cantillations and the Melodies of the Jews of Tangier, Morocco," D.M.A. diss., University of Texas at Austin, 1993

The use of "Middle Eastern" for the present summary denotes Jewish life in the lands to the south and east of the Mediterranean. The term "Oriental" was commonly used in earlier studies denoting these non-European regions, but "Middle Eastern" is more to the point. Arabic and Turkish styles in this region are the predominant influences in music and other aspects of cultural life. Two areas on the periphery of this region, Yemen and Ethiopia, are also included. Studies of the music of Jews living in the Middle East, and those from the Middle East living in other areas, are few. No comprehensive or comparative studies exist. Research has focused on particular communities, and most are even more specialized, investigating music in a particular context.

SEROUSSI (1993) provides a general bibliography of Sephardi music, Middle Eastern traditions included.

Idelsohn was among the first to study this region. IDELSOHN (1914–1932) covers music practiced in many areas and the practice of these traditions in Palestine. The traditions, as labeled by Idelsohn, are Yemenite, Babylonian, Persian, Bukharan, Dagestani, Oriental Sephardi (including Syrian and Egyptian), and Moroccan. Idelsohn noticed similarities in the practice of Jews from Syria, Egypt, and Lebanon. This practice by the mid-20th century was combined and is known as the Yerushalmi-Sephardi tradition, the music common to the Levantine Sephardim of Jerusalem. The monumental work of Idelsohn has been the source material for other scholars ever since. These volumes include explanations of the music, historical and theoretical material, and transcriptions of melodies he heard.

One attempt to look comparatively at Jewish musical practices in order to theorize a common origin was undertaken by IDELSOHN (1929). He looked particularly at Torah cantillation practice in various communities and noted similarities. SHILOAH (1992) provides a critical assessment of Idelsohn's approach in light of recent findings and methodology. Both are broad studies dealing with Middle Eastern as well as European music and provide a fundamental basis for the study of Jewish music.

Documentary sources are usually limited, if available at all, due to the largely oral transmission of these traditions. SEROUSSI (1990) investigates the makam (Middle Eastern musical modes) and piyyut (paraliturgical religious text singing) practices in the Ottoman region. Piyyut texts often provide indications for the origins of the music. SHELEMAY (1986) focuses on the history of the Beta Israel, or Falasha, community in Ethiopia through their liturgy, noting the similar practices of Ethiopian Christian monks. A range of historical issues and concerns related to Middle Eastern Jews is offered in SHILOAH (1993), including use of musical instruments, similarities to Arabic and Islamic practice, religious attitudes toward music, and mysticism. This publication is a collection of his articles and essays.

Most regional studies discuss the interrelationship of Jewish music to that of the local Turkish or Arabic styles. Thus, Seroussi (1990) looks at the similarities to Turkish music of piyyut singing in the Ottoman Empire, noting its decline in the 1920s. DORN looks broadly at the range of music among Jews in Turkey during the 1980s. She shows how the Turkish (a la Turka) and European (a la Franka) styles are blended with a preference for the latter, since it is considered modern. Singing in the synagogue is an exception, and more Turkish, less European melodies are favored.

The music of Syrian Jews has been studied outside of its native context. SHELEMAY (1998) researched Syrian Jews in Brooklyn, New York, Mexico, and Israel, focusing on pizmonim, non-synagogal piyyutim. This tradition includes the singing of Hebrew texts to known Arabic melodies. Her focus is on the lives of the individuals who perpetuate this tradition. Issues such as history and memory, tradition and change, transmission, ethnicity, and immigration frame her work. KLIGMAN focuses on the Sabbath liturgy of Syrian Jews in Brooklyn. Arabic music, singing styles, and aesthetics are incorporated into the liturgy on many levels. The makamat (plural of makam) serve as the bridge; the weekly Torah reading is associated with a makam that becomes the central mode of liturgical singing for that day. The synthesis of Arabic musical styles in a Jewish religious context is used in Kligman's approach for an ethnomusicological study dealing with culture contact.

The music of Morocco is studied by TASAT, who focuses on the liturgical music of Tangier Jewry. He shows the range of musical styles, European and Maghrebi, common in this region. Tasat includes musical examples and descriptions of the liturgical contexts. Studies of other regions, not as comprehensive, include SHILOAH (1983) on the Iraqi tradition, where musical transcriptions make up the bulk of the study along with historical and stylistic comments; and SHARVIT on Yemenite Torah cantillation. The range of chants employed in the course of Torah study and public Torah reading in this tradition are compared.

Other studies focus on the incorporation of Middle Eastern musical styles in new contexts. HIRSHBERG looks at contemporary Israeli art music in its earliest years of formation, noting how European immigrant composers adapted Middle Eastern music into a Western context. Studies of popular music, found in HALPER, SEROUSSI, and SQUIRES-KIDRON and in HOROWITZ, focus on the growth of muzikah mizrakhit yam tikhonit (Eastern music of the Mediterranean) from an informal context in the 1970s into an industry. The music is a pan-ethnic style that integrates Hebrew lyrics that commingle with Arabic, Persian, Kurdish, and Turkish texts, and Eastern European, Greek, Turkish, or Arabic tunes and musical styles. Halper, Seroussi, and Squires-Kidron focus on the history of the genre and on Ashkenazi-Sephardi tensions in Israel. Horowitz shows how local aesthetic markers draw in Egyptian, Jordanian, Lebanese, Syrian, and Palestinian listeners.

MARK KLIGMAN

See also Music: American Jewish Music; Music: Art Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Cantillation; Music: Cantorial Music; Music: Sephardi Music; Music: Views on Music

Music: Views on Music

Gradenwitz, Peter, The Music of Israel: Its Rise and Growth through 5000 Years, New York: Norton, 1949; as The Music of Israel: From the Biblical Era to Modern Times, Portland, Oregon: Amadeus, 1996

Idelsohn, A.Z., Jewish Music in Its Historical Development, New York: Holt, 1929; as Jewish Music: Its Historical Development, London: Constable, and New York: Dover, 1992

Maimonides, Moses, The Responsum of Maimonides (1135–1204) Concerning Music, translated by Boaz Cohen, New York: Posy-Shoulson, 1935

Mendelsohn, Ezra (editor), Modern Jews and Their Musical Agendas (Studies in Contemporary Jewry, vol. 9), New York: Oxford University Press, 1993

Sendrey, Alfred, Music in Ancient Israel, New York: Philosophical Library, and London: Vision, 1969

Sharvit, Uri (editor), Jewish Musical Culture: Past and Present, special edition of The World of Music, 37(1), 1995

Shiloah, Amnon, Jewish Musical Traditions (Jewish Folklore and Anthropology Series), Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1992

Werner, Eric, Hebrew Music, Cologne: Arno Volk Verlag, 1961

The extensive literature devoted to views on Jewish music falls into two larger ontological and aesthetic categories. First, scholars concern themselves with the fundamental questions of what Jewish music really is, or even if it has a metaphysical presence of its own. Crucial to this first area of concern is the acceptability of music in Jewish religious practices. Second, there is considerable tension between views on Jewish music that regard it as bounded and those that regard it as unifying. The former position considers Jewish music to be a set of repertoires and practices that lend themselves to definition, and the latter sees it as diverse and responsive to the changing contexts of history and diaspora. Writings on Jewish music are therefore split according to views that argue for exclusivity and those that espouse inclusivity. Modern ethnomusicological scholarship increasingly embraces the diversity of Jewish music and music cultures, preferring to celebrate the ways it represents the different communities of Israel and the diaspora.

The most influential writer of the Middle Ages on almost all aspects of Jewish life, MAIMONIDES' views on music are no exception. Echoed by other medieval Sephardi decisors and still more widely honored in the breach, his position reflects a general rabbinic ambivalence toward the arts. Against a background in which Arabic music-making, with its largely amatory thematic conventions, enjoyed immense popularity and was feared liable to distract if not debauch, he draws a distinction between secular and sacred music, ruling against the former "be it unaccompanied, accompanied, or purely instrumental" while approving the latter for its capacity to "heighten the spiritual emotions of joy and sorrow." Maimonides' writings also connect the use of specific repertoires to the various liturgies and holidays of the Jewish calendar.

SENDREY surveys concepts and uses of Jewish music from biblical times through rabbinic sources until the sixth century. Drawing on his other bibliographic projects, Sendrey organizes this large book historically and according to the textual and contextual functions of music. The book is remarkable for the breadth of its scope. Not only does Sendrey consider every type of ancient text in which Jewish music of any kind might appear, but he also considers Jewish music in cultural processes that are by no means exclusively Jewish. Non-Jewish influences are seen to be critical as early as biblical times because of the extent of contact with neighboring cultures. The conceptual breadth of the book is most fully evident in sections devoted to dance, instrumental music, and women, subjects rarely included in earlier books on Jewish music.

IDELSOHN drew upon his experiences as a cantor and musicologist, his comparative studies of European Jewish liturgical and folk music, and, most significantly, years of pioneering fieldwork in Palestine to write the classic historical study of Jewish music. The title of the book clearly points to Idelsohn's belief that Jewish music developed historically, that is, has responded to the different conditions in the places and times in which Jews live. Jewish music is therefore dynamic, and it is not restricted to specific genres or even religious settings. Idelsohn concerns himself with a wide range of modal, liturgical, and functional frameworks, especially those of Ashkenazi traditions in the post-Haskalah era but also the Sephardi and Eastern communities of the early 20th century. This book offers an extremely valuable point of departure for any reader wanting to understand Jewish music in its variety.

WERNER employs the methods of comparative musicology to show the ways in which Jewish melody disseminates throughout the diaspora, retaining certain core similarities but acquiring variants that distinguish one community and its repertoires from another. Morphological tables make it possible to group variants so that their similarities unify them, often with certain variants presented as if they were original or authentic within the grouping. Methodologically, Werner treats all repertoires and genres in the volume as if they were traditional, which primarily means that they were transmitted orally. Accordingly, his concept of "Hebrew music" embraces cantillation, Psalm tunes, prayer, and folk music.

GRADENWITZ proposes several imaginative root metaphors (e.g., the flute-playing shepherd in the desert) to give unity to a sweeping history of music in "the eternal land." The book is broadly comparative, but in a style inherited from European comparative musicology prior to World War II, and many comparative assertions are therefore very tendentious. The author has, nonetheless, gathered an extraordinary amount of information, and as one of Israel's foremost music publishers during the early decades of statehood, he has access to many details about the formation of individual and national compositional styles. The biographical sketches of Israeli composers are complemented by focused discussions of noteworthy works. Though the author's perspectives are highly personal and somewhat biased, the book provides a detailed introduction to Jewish music and to the music of Israel for the reader with little previous knowledge of these areas.

MENDELSONH gathers seven essays in a symposium to investigate the ways in which Jews and Jewish communities have used music to respond to the pressures of modernity. Topics examined here range from assimilation to Zionism to Israeli nation-building to the preservation of Sephardi traditions. The concept of music itself varies from one "musical agenda" to the next, revealing both aesthetic breadth and a high degree of ambivalence about music's Jewishness. In each essay music contributes substantially to Jewish identity and empowers the transformation of Jewish communities in their diverse responses to modernity. Essays by Ezra Mendelsohn, Philip V. Bohlman, and Judit Frigyesi consider the presence of music as a form of Jewish identity in 19th- and early 20th-century Europe. Edwin Seroussi, Natan Shahar, Jehoash Hirshberg, and Lionel Wolberger examine the proliferation of distinctive genres in modern Israel.

SHILOAH views diversity and an extensive capacity to change and respond to new cultural contexts as fundamental to the wide range of traditions that represent Jewish music in the late 20th century. Musical pluralism is no less a factor in Israel, where Jewish musical traditions have been concentrated since statehood, than in the diaspora, where Jewish music continues to reflect the entire range of Jewish ethnic and religious diversity. Shiloah employs the methodologies of modern ethnomusicology, thereby dividing the book's chapters according to music's genres, functions, and contexts. Jewish music history, therefore, does not adhere to a central core and teleology of return, but rather it consists of myriad historical processes. His treatment of mystical and paraliturgical traditions, as well as Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jewish communities, is particularly valuable.

SHARVIT gathers five essays from distinguished Jewish-music scholars Eliyahu Schleifer, Edwin Seroussi, Kay Kaufman Shelemay, Mark Slobin, and Sharvit himself, who examine the problems and methods of studying Jewish music in its cultural contexts. Unifying the essays is the attempt to distinguish the realities of Jewish music, especially variation and difference, from the myths about it, especially its presumed unity and capacity to connect the present to the past. All the essays examine the ways Jewish music shapes and is shaped by the experiences of diaspora; they also examine how music is a powerful form of responding, even adapting, to the shifting contexts of non-Jewish cultural surroundings. As a whole, the volume provides a superb set of new approaches for the modern and postmodern study of Jewish music.

PHILIP V. BOHLMAN

See also Music: American Jewish Music; Music: Art Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Cantillation; Music: Cantorial Music; Music: Middle Eastern Music; Music: Sephardi Music

Mysticism see Gnosis and Early Mysticism; Kabbalah

This page intentionally left blank

N

Nahmanides see Moses ben Nahman

Nahman of Bratslav 1772–1811

Podolian hasidic saint and messianic theologian

Green, Arthur, Tormented Master (Judaic Studies Series), University: University of Alabama Press, 1979

Kaplan, Aryeh, Until the Mashiach: Rabbi Nachman's Biography: An Annotated Chronology, edited by Rabbi Dovid Shapiro, Brooklyn, New York: Breslov Research Institute, 1985

Sternharz, Nathan, Tzaddik: (Chayey Moharan): A Portrait of Rabbi Nachman, translated by Avraham Greenbaum, New York: Breslov Research Institute, 1987

Considering the importance of Rabbi Nahman as a Jewish leader and thinker, the dearth of biographies or even biographical material on him is somewhat surprising. The Breslov Research Institute deserves credit for the little material that does exist. However, many of their publications are reprints of Nahman's own songs and stories rather than books about him. The original source for information about the life of Nahman is his closest disciple, Nathan STERNHARZ. Sternharz deifies Nahman to an almost blasphemous degree. He writes, "Who can describe . . . all the great and awesome wonders performed by our leader, teacher and Rebbe, light of lights. . . . He raised one up from the dust and dunghill and brought me to himself. In his love he drew me closer than anyone else, and appointed me to receive and write down his Torah teachings." The book takes an unabashedly subjective, highly laudatory approach to the rabbi, intended to bring the nonbeliever closer to God. In many ways it reads like a messianic text, promising that Nahman will save those who come to his graveside, donate money to charity in his name, and recite ten psalms he had prescribed. At the same time, though, and in spite of the often overzealous voice of the author, the book opens readers to the teachings of Nahman because of its straightforward organization and pithy presentation of his words. Segments of Nahman's teachings, for example, "His Wit," "His Devotion to God," and "His Spiritual Struggles," allow readers to come to grips with Nahman, Sternharz himself, and some of the fundamentals of Bratslav Hasidism. As the translator points out in his introduction, some readers may have trouble believing that Sternharz's words represent the absolute truth, although the depth of his faith is unquestionable. For readers who are new to the ideas of Rabbi Nahman, though, the sections "Conversations Relating to His Lessons" and "Conversations Relating to His Stories" are particularly useful; in both sections, Sternharz plays the part of the simpleminded student and asks the rebbe questions for the benefit of the reader. This book cannot function as a modern critical biography of Nahman, but as a historical text and as an introduction to Bratslav thought, it is of central importance.

A similar but more recent volume is KAPLAN. Also published by the Breslov Research Institute, this volume approaches Nahman similarly. It includes a very brief history of the Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment movement) and a sketch of shtetl life in the Pale of Settlement in order to set a backdrop for the story of Rabbi Nahman. Unlike Sternharz's book, though, Kaplan's biography is based less upon Nahman's own stories and more upon chronology; it is structured by a day-to-day timeline of events. Much of the information is ultimately the same as the information in Tzaddik—and Tzaddik was clearly one of Kaplan's primary texts in researching his own volume—but the book as a whole resembles a sort of third-person diary rather than a traditional biography. The appendixes may be worth examining. They include several maps, Nahman's letters, a list of other tzaddikim, descriptions of important centers in Eastern Europe and the Holy Land as they were at the time of Nahman, a comprehensive list of Nahman's writings, and a glossary of Yiddish and Hebrew terms. The bulk of the book, though, directly echoes Sternharz's earlier writings.

GREEN is the only critical biography of Nahman available. He has taken on a daunting task, as he points out in his introduction, because almost all his evidence comes from Nahman himself or from Sternharz or from subsequent Bratslav hasidim. Green takes it as a given that hasidic texts about the rabbis are "embellished," often because "there is a worry that the master will be degraded as he is humanized." In this version, the rabbi is indeed humanized through a psychological reading of his life and teachings. He is not, however, degraded and is instead approached as a vitally important leader, thinker, and, most interestingly, man. The deified Nahman portrayed by both Sternharz and Kaplan is not the subject of Green's book; his Nahman is a brilliant, learned, widely influential man, but a man nonetheless.

This biography also includes an account of “messianic strivings” prior to Nahman and a fascinating chapter on Nahman’s journey to the land of Israel. Because this book encompasses and interprets all previous material in a sensitive and effective way, and because it corresponds to what most contemporary readers would expect of a biography, this is probably the most useful place to begin.

GILLIAN D. STEINBERG

Nasi Family

- Garshowitz, Libby, “Gracia Mendes: Power, Influence and Intrigue,” in Power of the Weak: Studies on Medieval Women, edited by Jennifer Carpenter and Sally-Beth MacLean, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995
- Ravid, Benjamin, “Money, Love and Power Politics in Sixteenth Century Venice: The Perpetual Banishment and Subsequent Pardon of Joseph Nasi,” Italia Judaica, Rome: Ministero per i beni culturali e ambientali, 1983
- Roth, Cecil, The House of Nasi: Dona Gracia, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1948
- Roth, Cecil, The House of Nasi: The Duke of Naxos, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1948
- Salomon, Herman Prins and Aron di Leone Leoni, “Mendes, Benveniste, De Luna, Micas, Nasi: The State of the Art (1532–1558),” Jewish Quarterly Review, 88, 1998
- Saperstein, Marc, “Martyrs, Merchants and Rabbis: Jewish Communal Conflict as Reflected in the Responsa on the Boycott of Ancona,” Jewish Social Studies, 43, 1981

The Nasi family was one of the wealthiest and most powerful families in Jewish history. The story of the Nasi family has been reconstructed from sources such as diplomatic correspondence, personal diaries, Hebrew chronicles, and rabbinic literature. Dona Gracia Nasi, born Beatrice de Luna in Portugal in 1510, married Francisco Mendes (or Benveniste) who, in partnership with his brother Diogo, maintained major business ties in Antwerp. Francisco died in 1535, leaving Dona Gracia a large estate. She soon left Portugal with her sister, Brianda de Luna, her daughter (Ana, Brianda, or Reina, depending on the author), and her nephews Samuel and Joseph Nasi, born Bernardo and Joao Micas (Miques or Miguez). In Antwerp, after marrying Brianda (with whom he had a daughter, Beatrice), Diogo died in 1543. He left Dona Gracia Nasi, in addition to several other guardians, in charge of the entire family’s financial and charitable enterprises, devoting resources to resettle conversos as the Inquisition encroached upon them. Gradually, she moved her family from Flanders through France to Venice. After they arrived in Venice, living outside the ghetto as Christians, Brianda (Dona Gracia’s sister and Diogo’s widow), resented Dona Gracia’s control of the family fortune and denounced her for Judaizing. The Turks, thereupon, interceded to save Dona Gracia and her huge fortune while she fled to Ferrara. There she reverted to Judaism, may have changed her name, and worked with other former New Christians in communal and cultural matters such as publishing. With the sultan’s support, the entire family arrived in the Ottoman Empire where Dona Gracia supported many Jewish activities. The studies that have emerged concerning the family have successively built upon and critiqued their predecessors. The information offered in these endeavors, from mundane matters of spelling to the identification of significant individuals, constitutes a vague and sometimes contradictory mass of information from which it is difficult to draw definitive conclusions. The classic studies in English represent not a summation of the material but only a raw beginning.

GARSHOWITZ provides a summary of all previous research on Dona Gracia Mendes. In particular, Garshowitz touches on the fascinating questions in Jewish law concerning the validity of Catholic marriages of New Christians and the nature of inheritance among them. Her documentation on this aspect of the Nasi family history is rich in primary and secondary sources.

RAVID’s study draws on his meticulous archival research to re-create the story of Joseph Nasi’s abduction of his cousin Beatrice in order to save her from suitors outside the limited family circle and to protect both the family’s assets and its religious secrets. Beyond the abduction, marriage, consummation, and ban passed on Joseph, Ravid explores the subsequent reconciliation between Joseph Nasi and the Republic of Venice. Ravid’s study, however, leaves some questions unanswered. Where was Dona Gracia during this intrigue? How does his account reconcile with the fact that most writers have Beatrice eventually marrying Bernardo Micas (Samuel Nasi) and Joseph marrying Reina (Ana), Dona Gracia’s daughter?

ROTH’s (1948a, 1948b) reluctance to document his sources, his overblown prose, his gratuitous and often misguided judgments, and his lack of precision (mixed with a sentimental and romantic approach) diminish the contribution of much of his work. In particular, Roth tries to depict Joseph Nasi, especially his plans to resettle Tiberias, as an early Zionist, intent on solving the Jewish question of his day. These reservations do not reflect recent changes in historical sensibilities or the nature of scholarly writing but were expressed as early as 1948 in Ellis Rivkin’s review in the Jewish Quarterly Review. He noted Roth’s inflation of meager sources, repetitiousness, subjective asides, and extraneous references. Rivkin, an astute observer, noted that Roth depicted Don Joseph as vacillating, whimsical, arbitrary, unpredictable, and flamboyant. These characterizations are not only tedious but inaccurate and inconsistent with Roth’s attempt to paint him as a powerful leader of the Jewish people. The failure of Jews to sustain the community in Tiberias reflects a lack of Jewish interest in maintaining settlements in the land of Israel and is not, as Roth suggests, a symptom of Arab and Christian abuse of the land.

SALOMON and LEONI have done a splendid job of combing the world for information about the career of the Nasi family. This article includes new material concerning many fascinating aspects of the history of the family and rereadings of earlier articles. The finds include the 1531 letters that King João III of Portugal and his wife Catarina wrote to Emperor Charles V protesting the arrest and expropriation of the property of Diogo Mendes. The bold revisions that the article proposes to the often hazy morass of names and dates connected with this family cannot always be accepted. For example, if it is certain that Dona Gracia left with her household for Constantinople during the summer of 1552, it is not clear how the abduction of young Beatrice by João Micas could have taken place in January 1553 with her mother's secret connivance. Given the confused nature of the data that all the scholars are working with, referring to reconstructions by others as "aberrations" and suggesting that they contain "howlers" may be not only harsh but wrong.

SAPERSTEIN reviews the account of Pope Paul IV's initiation in July 1555 of an action in Ancona against Judaizing New Christians who were living under the protection of previous papal privileges. About 100 individuals were arrested and their property confiscated, although around 30 escaped. The rest were tortured by inquisitional tribunal. In the autumn of 1555 and spring of 1556, Dona Gracia tried to intervene and had Sultan Süleyman I send an envoy to Ancona for the protection of Turkish subjects. The Inquisition found many of those arrested guilty: 38 returned to the church, 26 were sent to row galley ships as punishment, and 24 or 25 were sentenced to strangulation and then burning, which took place over several days in April and June of 1556. In April 1556 the idea was raised that all Jewish merchants of the Ottoman Empire boycott the port of Ancona and use instead Pesaro. This would both punish the pope and prove to the duke of Pesaro, Guidobaldo II, that he would be better off with Turkish Jewish trade than with good relations with the pope. Dona Gracia and her nephew Joseph tried to get all the rabbis—most of whom were paid by them—to support the boycott by imposing a ban against anyone who traded with Ancona. There was some support for this, especially by rabbis of Iberian origin who thought that such a movement would protect Sephardim everywhere from similar treatment. Similarly, the Jews of Pesaro supported the boycott, because they did not want to anger the duke if the boycott failed after he had gone against the pope. Opposition, however, grew in Italy, especially among Italian Jews of Ancona who feared that they would be ruined and blamed for the losses of the whole city and who claimed that the treatment of the Jews in Pesaro had been no better than in Ancona. The boycott thus soon collapsed and the duke of Pesaro expelled many Jews. An attempt by the Jews to organize a similar boycott against products from Nazi Germany in April 1933 failed for very similar reasons and a comparison of the two events is highly instructive.

HOWARD TZVI ADELMAN

Nehemiah, Book of see Ezra and Nehemiah, Books of

Neoplatonism

Altmann, A. and S.M. Stern (editors), Isaac Israeli: A Neoplatonic Philosopher of the Early Tenth Century; His Works Translated with Comments and an Outline of His

Philosophy (Scripta Judaica, 1), London: Oxford University Press, 1958; Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1979

Goodman, Lenn E. (editor), Neoplatonism and Jewish Thought (Studies in Neoplatonism, vol. 7), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992

Idel, Moshe and Bernard McGinn (editors), Mystical Union and Monotheistic Faith, New York and London: Macmillan, 1989

Matt, Daniel C., "Ayin: The Concept of Nothingness in Jewish Mysticism," in The Problem of Pure Consciousness: Mysticism and Philosophy, edited by Robert K.C. Forman, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990

Sells, Michael A., Mystical Languages of Unsaying, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994

Wolfson, Harry Austryn, Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (Structure and Growth of Philosophic Systems from Plato to Spinoza, 2), 2 vols., Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1947, 4th edition, 1968

Neoplatonism, while difficult to systematize, officially begins with the Platonic innovations of the Greek philosopher Plotinus in the third century C.E. Following Plato's doctrine of the unity of the divine, Neoplatonism considers the nature or essence of the divine One; the nature of the One's self-relation; the One's relation to the created cosmos; the relations among the things that are not the One; and the identities of singular and composite things. These matters are commonly understood according to a descending hierarchy of levels or orders of creation, each level outflowing or overflowing into the one following, a scheme that is usually characterized by the term "emanation." A restricted view of Neoplatonism will understand it to have ended with the closing of the Platonic Academy in Athens by Justinian in 529 C.E.; a periodized view will understand it according to founders, schools, and successors such as the theurgical Syrian school of Iamblichus and his followers (245–325 C.E.); a broader view will consider the affinities between Neoplatonic metaphysics, ontology, and cosmology, and modern and postmodern philosophies and religions.

GOODMAN, in the preface to the volume of essays deriving from the International Conference on Neoplatonism and Jewish Thought held in 1987, makes the bold claim that "it would not be an exaggeration to say that Neoplatonism was the philosophy that was most influential upon the formation of Jewish thought" during the Hellenistic, Roman, and medieval periods, and that it plays "a significant role, if not the dominant role, in the whole development of modern Jewish thought." The essays are arranged chronologically beginning with David Winston's article on Philo and concluding with Richard Popkin's piece on Spinoza, with an additional essay by Robert McLaren devoted to the whole of Jewish Neoplatonism and the question of its psychodynamic propaedeutic, its service to and by the heart. Although the articles cover a wide variety of themes, texts, and authors (with a number devoted to Maimonides), it would be appropriate to say that the notion of mediation holds them together: each essay explores the problem of the affirmation of an absolutely transcendent deity, of God's radical separation from the created order, and the ways in which Neoplatonism's dialectical innovations on the problem have been appropriated by and integrated into Jewish philosophy and religion. Bernard McGinn's article on "Ibn Gabirol: the Sage among the Schoolmen" is instructive. Interest in the number three certainly is not a Christian innovation. Philosophies grounded in Neoplatonism often propound a triadically arranged system. In Gabirol, for instance, one finds the science of matter and form, the science of Will, and the science of First Essence. Since the oneness of the One and the otherness of the cosmos are basic convictions, any relationship between them must be mediated by or through some third thing or essence or combinatory element, something one might call a one-many. The nature of this third thing and its relationship to both sides of the dialectic and its self-relation is a constant matter of dispute primarily for the reason that the One can never be, but somehow always is, a related member. For Plotinus this third was Nous; for ibn Gabirol it was Will or voluntas. According to McGinn, ibn Gabirol's "fundamentally Jewish concern with protecting divine transcendence" produces the principle that the Will is actually and not only potentially multiple, thereby assuring that the First Essence is strictly and absolutely unknowable.

The preface to the volume of essays edited by IDEL and MCGINN explains that its occasion was a series of invited lectures on the theme of Kabbalah held at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York in 1985. The expressed purpose of the lectures was to relate to Moshe Idel's then forthcoming text, Kabbalah: New Perspectives (Yale University Press, 1988), in which he argues against the notion "that there is little, if any, talk of mystical union among the Jewish Mystics." In Idel's own contribution to the lecture series, "Universalization and Integration: Two Conceptions of Mystical Union in Jewish Mysticism," he furthers his argument, in particular by focusing upon the term devekut, which, he claims, is "a term whose large mystical semantic field includes a variety of meanings, from imitating divine behavior to total fusion with the divine." Idel reduces these meanings to two, reflected in the essay's title: universalization, referring to imitation, and integration, referring to fusion or, as he puts it in a subtitle, entering God. Idel directly attributes this latter possibility to "the role played by the Neoplatonic conception of the basic affinity and even the continuity of the divine and the human spiritual powers" and the influence of these conceptions upon Jewish mysticism.

MATT provides the reader with an excellent survey of key Neoplatonic themes that have influenced Jewish philosophy and Jewish mysticism. He uses as his rubric an analysis of the kabbalistic notion of ayin, nothingness, and its functional place within the emanatory system of the sefirot, within which ayin is associated with keter 'elyon, the highest crown or first sefirah. Here one learns how Plato's positive notion of creation by design was reversed by Plotinus, who insisted that nothing positive could be said about the divine, it being absolutely One without internal division or attribute, without the will to create an absolute limit to comprehension. One will therefore find in all Neoplatonically influenced discourses an emanation scheme of levels or orders of creation that, in effect, maintains an absolute separation between the One and the created order. Therefore, nothing, paradoxically, becomes a certain sort of positively negative attribute of the divine that one may indicate only through a process of negation, a process that may be characterized as a return to or unification with nothing—the One. Matt traces this method of negative theology through the philosophy of Philo, the formative Christian mysticisms of Pseudo-Dionysius, John the Scot Eriugena, Meister Eckhart, and certain Islamic versions, into the works of Maimonides and medieval Jewish mystics such as Moses de Leon and Azriel of Gerona. Finally Matt considers the vital and allegedly self-annihilating interiorization of the notion of ayin in Hasidism. Matt concludes: "The reality that animates and surpasses all things cannot be captured or named, but by invoking ayin the mystic is able to allude to the infinite, to alef the ineffable." The reader should pay particular attention to Matt's notes, which contain important references and helpful additional commentary.

In the important volume by SELLS, which is not devoted to Neoplatonism per se but to the discursive process of apophasis (the process of speaking away or unsaying objectifying propositions or names meant to identify the divine), the interested reader will find an essential guide to understanding the peculiar referential logic of philosophical or mystical texts influenced by Neoplatonism. Over the course of a work that begins with Plotinus, considers and analyzes the works of Dionysius, Eriugena, ibn 'Arabi, Marguerite Porete, and finally Meister Eckhart, Sells argues steadily and persuasively for the reasonableness of apophatic language, a discursive logic that includes an anarchic (without first principle or origin) meaning event. Such a meaning event in fact ensures the integrity of apophatic language rather than draining it of meaning and sense, a charge often dismissively leveled against discourses that move according to a logic of negation or contradiction. Sells finds such a meaning event in the logic of the epistrophe or the "turning back" of a first proposition upon itself by another, a semantic movement that produces "a semiotic spiral motion ever deeper into the pre-referential ground (or groundlessness) of the discourse." Such a gesture can be found in the Plotinian notion that all things are in and from the One without duality for the very reason that there is nothing in the One. The second statement turns against the first and unsays it, a turn that does not annihilate its sense but instead poses a dilemma of fused and split references within which distinctions are made and broken down. Sells notes and analyzes other strategies such as "regress from reference," "double-proposition semantics," "subject-predicate fusion," "ingress into symbol," and others that thereafter become the lenses through which the authors named above are read. Sells's end-notes are rich and exhaustive, and they should not be missed. The connections made between apophasis and postmodern discourses, particularly those of Jacques Derrida and (by this author's lights) Emmanuel Levinas, are provocative and telling.

ALTMANN and STERN's text on Israeli, perhaps the earliest Jewish Neoplatonist (c.855–c.955 C.E.), consists of two parts: the first is a translation of and commentary on Israeli's Book of Definitions, fragments of the Book of Substances, the Book on Spirit and Soul, and the Chapter on the Elements. Not included is Israeli's Book on the Elements. The texts were originally written in Arabic, though there are Hebrew and Latin translations. Those works still available in Arabic were translated from the Arabic, though most are based on a Hebrew translation of an Arabic original. The second part of the work, perhaps of most interest to readers, is a survey of Israeli's complete philosophy, which the authors divide into two parts titled "The Downward Way" (from the creator to the elements and composite substances) and "The Upward Way" (which concerns the process of purification toward union with the divine). The prefatory material includes a basic introduction to the texts and a biographical note on what may be known of Israeli's life and influence. It is undoubtedly true that Israeli's Chapter on the Elements (also known as the Mantua Text for the Italian city in which the single extant fragment is preserved) was formative for the rise of Kabbalah in the 13th-century Gerona circle. Ezra ben Solomon cites it, as does Azriel of Gerona, though they were probably unaware that the text was Israeli's, since the text seems ascribed to Aristotle, though it is actually a commentary upon a pseudo-Aristotelian text. The Jewish mystics of Gerona were intrigued by the affinities between Israeli's Neoplatonic doctrine of emanation and their system of the sefirot. Maimonides also mentions Israeli, although only to censure his work as primitive and lacking philosophical sophistication.

WOLFSON'S magisterial commentary on Philo of Alexandria remains unparalleled with respect to the ground it covers, the way it seeks to systematize Philo's evolving thought, and its grand arrangement of the material within a stated framework of philosophical problems common not only to Philo but to "religious philosophies" spanning the following 17 centuries. It is both an exegesis of Philonic philosophy and an unrepentant history of big and transcending ideas. Today this style of philosophy appears rather suspect with its uncritical endorsement of an intellectual world of pure and co-implicated ideas, but it is nonetheless breathtaking in scope and in the grandiosity of its claims. A reader's reward continues to be found in Wolfson's exegetical and interpretive labors, which are meticulously informed and clearly presented. One will leave Wolfson's Philo with the distinct impression that a certain Neoplatonically construed metaphysical framework may be the very philosophical theology by which the three monotheisms are most implicitly ecumenical. In a certain respect it is also a testimony to Philo's understanding of the universal implications of Judaism. Volume one considers Philo's historical situation within Hellenistic Judaism and his biblical-allegorical philosophical method, God, the intelligible world and the logos, creation, the logos immanent to the world and the laws of nature, the nature of the soul, and the freedom of the will. Volume two considers types of knowledge and the functions of prophecy, Philo's proofs for the existence of God, the role and status of divine predicates with respect to the tenet of the unknowability of God, and Philo's moral and political philosophies. Wolfson concludes with a section on Philo's innovations.

ERIC C. HELMER

Netherlands, The

- Blom, J.C.H., Renate Fuks-Mansfeld, and I. Schöffer (editors), The History of the Jews in the Netherlands, Oxford: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 1999
- Bloom, Herbert I., The Economic Activities of the Jews of Amsterdam in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries, Williamsport, Pennsylvania: Bayard, 1937
- Bodian, Miriam, Hebrews of the Portuguese Nation: Conversos and Community in Early Modern Amsterdam (Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997
- Frank, Anne, The Diary of a Young Girl: The Definitive Edition, edited by Otto Frank and Mirjam Pressler, translated by Susan Massotty, New York: Doubleday, 1995; London: Viking, 1997
- Gans, Mozes Heiman, Memorbook: History of Dutch Jewry from the Renaissance to 1940, London: Bosch and Keuning, 1977
- Leydesdorff, Selma, Wij hebben als mens geleefd: Het joodse proletariaat van Amsterdam, 1900–1940, 1987; translated by F. Henry as We Lived with Dignity: The Jewish Proletariat of Amsterdam, 1900–1940, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1994
- Michman, Joseph, The History of Dutch Jewry during the Emancipation Period, 1787–1815: Gothic Turrets on a Corinthian Building, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1995
- Moore, Bob, Victims and Survivors: The Nazi Persecution of the Jews in the Netherlands, 1940–1944, New York and London: Arnold, 1997

The story of Jews in the Netherlands spans from a still obscure medieval presence to an apogee of dazzling Baroque creativity and on to tragedy in the 20th century, followed by the regrouping of survivors. The Portuguese Marranos who settled in Amsterdam in the 16th and especially 17th centuries and proceeded to recreate their Sephardi traditions were joined in the mid-17th century by Ashkenazi refugees fleeing the massacre of Polish Jews by the Cossacks in 1648 and 1649 and the persecution of Lithuanian Jewry following Sweden's invasion of that nation in 1655. Jews in the Netherlands enjoyed comparative tolerance and security and the community flourished, attracting further Jewish immigration. By 1933, the Jewish population of the country had grown to 110,000, and during that decade it was supplemented by an additional 30,000 Jewish refugees from Germany and other parts of Nazi-dominated Europe. Between 1942 and 1945, 107,000 of the 140,000 Jews in Holland were deported by the Nazis, moving by rail directly from the internment camp of Westerbork to the death camps at Auschwitz and Sobibor; a mere five percent survived. At the end of the 20th century, the Dutch Jewish community numbered around 30,000 residents.

The substantial volume edited by BLOM, FUKS-MANSFELD, and SCHÖFFER offers the one comprehensive survey of the whole of Dutch Jewish history through the end of the 20th century. The book, a collection of studies on successive periods by some of the most accomplished scholars in the field, makes clear its aim of strenuously avoiding original research in favor of a clear synopsis of the state of the art. Schöffer's introduction reviews the historiography of the Jews of the Netherlands. He is followed by B.M.J. Speet on the Middle Ages, D.M. Swetchinski's "Between the Middle Ages and the Golden Age, 1516–1621," Jonathan Israel's "Economic Activities in the Dutch Republic until c.1750," and Y. Kaplan's "Religious, Cultural and Social Life, 1600–1750." Next comes Fuks-Mansfeld's extensive treatment of the little-known history of the period from 1750 through 1870, followed by Blom's absorbing study of the decades from 1870 to the Nazi occupation. F.C. Brasz's discussion of the postwar period brings to a close a useful and distinguished compilation.

GANS covers the history of Dutch Jewry from the Renaissance to 1940. For the period up to the eve of the decimation of the community by the Nazis, it offers a comprehensive picture, superbly constructed, beautifully illustrated (with a total of 1,100 images), and highly readable. Each chapter commences with a series of quotations that provide insight into the key themes. At the end of the book, there is a short historical summary, endnotes, a detailed names index, and a shorter subject index. (The table of contents appears on the very last page of the book.) Because of its bulk (852 folio pages), this book is probably more useful as a reference work than as an introductory text, but it is nevertheless a must for lay reader and scholar alike.

BLOOM's book on the economic activities of the Jews of Amsterdam illuminates an important facet of Dutch Jewish history. While there are a great many books dealing with the intellectual accomplishments of Amsterdam Sephardim, this book offers the most detailed analysis of their economic activities. Bloom provides a comprehensive outline of the trades and crafts that Jews developed in the city (such as the silk industry and the sugar, diamond, tobacco, printing, and book trades), and he identifies the trade routes in Europe, the Middle East, and the New World (both India and the Americas) that Jews helped expand. His final chapters examine trade in money and securities and discuss the affluence and subsequent decline of Dutch Portuguese Jewry. Bloom's fascinating study of the socioeconomic status of the Sephardim, which is contrasted with that of Amsterdam's Ashkenazim, as well as his detailed use of sources, facts, and figures makes this book an invaluable resource.

BODIAN's study of the Portuguese conversos (descendants of Jews who had converted to Christianity) who settled in Amsterdam beginning in the late 16th century is a seminal work. Drawing on recent research by scholars such as I.S. Revah, Y.H. Yerushalmi, Yosef Kaplan, and Jonathan Israel, as well as a careful study of the relevant primary sources, the author has created a clear and incisive picture of the complex Jewish identity of the conversos. Following a superb introductory chapter analyzing the nature of Marrano life in the Iberian peninsula, Bodian discusses the formation of the Jewish community in Amsterdam; the Dutch context; the continuing influence of the Jews' Iberian and New Christian heritage; the conflictual process of re-Judaization; and the continuing links that ex-conversos, or the "Nation," maintained with conversos both in Amsterdam and across Europe. Bodian has managed to achieve her aim of breaking "out of the mold of converso research" by highlighting the double dichotomy of a highly complex identity: Portuguese and Dutch, Catholic and Jewish.

MICHMAN has written a detailed history of the emancipation of Dutch Jewry from 1787 to 1815, including the key Napoleonic period of the Batavian Republic and Kingdom of Holland (1795–1815), which was previously all but ignored in the English-language literature on Dutch Jewry. In his preface, Michman states that he hopes the book will ensure that Dutch Jewry's story during this "momentous period" will claim its "rightful place in Jewish historiography," and he has definitely met his objective through his careful scholarship, detailed discussion, and intelligent analysis of events, which is amply supported by his footnotes. This is a book more suited to the scholar than the general reader.

LEYDESDORFF has produced a sensitive, well-crafted sociological study of the Jewish proletariat of Amsterdam, examining their lifestyles, their areas of settlement, and the assistance provided to the poor. Drawing from oral histories and writings from the period 1900 to 1940, she seeks to recreate a world destroyed by the Holocaust. The introductory chapter includes a valuable discussion of memory and the significance of oral history.

FRANK's diary, which has been translated into more than 50 languages, has been described by Bob Moore as "an icon of the Holocaust." While providing invaluable insights into the conditions experienced by Jews hiding from the Nazis in Amsterdam, this personal perspective does not, of course, offer a complete picture of Dutch Jewry during the Holocaust or the circumstances surrounding Frank's tragedy. MOORE, on the other hand, is a major systematic study of the Jews of the Netherlands during the Holocaust. The book focuses on the historical debate over the Netherlands' record during the Holocaust, examining such facts as the high mortality rate of Dutch Jewry (compared to Jews in other Western European nations) that challenge the picture of strong Dutch resistance that emerged after World War II. Moore's approach is basically chronological: he begins by placing the Dutch Jews in both their historical and social context before discussing the stages after May 1940 of identification, isolation, and deportation. He also examines survival strategies, such as legal exemptions and hiding, and he evaluates the roles of those Dutch who assisted their Jewish neighbors as well as the fates of foreign Jews. There is a chapter dealing with the persecutors and an account of liberation. While Moore's analysis is weakened by his failure to provide a distinct section on the Dutch Nazi Party, he has synthesized recent scholarship to produce an accessible, cogently argued, and readable book, which should certainly be consulted by lay and academic readers.

SUZANNE D. RUTLAND

Neturei Karta

Domb, Jerahmeel Israel Isaac, The Transformation: The Case of the Neturei Karta, London: Domb, 1958; 2nd edition, Brooklyn, New York: Hachomo, 1989

Lamm, Norman, "The Ideology of the Neturei Karta: According to the Satmarer Version," Tradition, 12, Fall 1971

Landau, David, Piety and Power: The World of Jewish Fundamentalism, New York: Hill and Wang, and London: Secker and Warburg, 1993

Marmorstein, Emile, Heaven at Bay: The Jewish Kulturkampf in the Holy Land, London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1969

The Neturei Karta (Aramaic for "Guardians of the City") is an anti-Zionist, ultra-Orthodox, extremist Jewish group that does not recognize the State of Israel. While the overwhelming majority of Eastern European rabbinic authorities initially opposed political Zionism and even Religious Zionism (Mizrachi), they came to an accommodation with the State of Israel once it was established. The Neturei Karta, however, has consistently opposed the State of Israel and has professed support for the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and called for the internationalization of Jerusalem.

DOMB has written an ardent and passionate manifesto in support of Neturei Karta. He describes the origins of this group in the early 1940s, when Amram Blau and others left Agudat Israel because they felt that it had compromised its viewpoint with the ideology of secular Zionism. The partisan nature of Domb's advocacy is evident in his celebration of how, in the War of Independence, the Old City of Jerusalem "miraculously" remained in Jordanian hands "in order to prevent the eventual profanation of the place of the Holy Sanctuary which might have taken place, had it been included in the Zionist redemption." (In the aftermath of the Six Day War in 1967, when Jerusalem was reunited and the Western Wall became accessible, a revisionist explanation would be offered stating that "miracles" are miracles only when they occur in conformity with the Torah and Jewish law; otherwise like the legend of the miracle-workers in Pharaoh's Egypt, they are deceptions of Satan.)

LAMM demonstrates that the views of Neturei Karta are not without basis in classical Jewish sources, but he contends that the texts have been interpreted in a one-sided and sometimes arbitrary manner. In addition, texts that are of a homiletic nature have been interpreted as if they were legal pronouncements. The locus classicus on which Neturei Karta relies is a passage in the Talmud (Ketubot 111a) that states that at the time of the destruction of the Temple and the beginning of the exile, God administered three oaths to the Jews to govern their survival in the diaspora: God adjured Israel (1) not to use force to enable a mass return to the land of Israel; (2) not to rebel against the nations among which they are dispersed; and (3) not to take the initiative in hastening the advent of the Messiah prematurely. At the same time God adjured the gentile nations that they should not oppress Israel beyond their endurance. All authorities now agree that the gentile nations violated their oath. The question then arises as to the status of the three oaths that Israel took. Some eminent talmudists, such as Rabbi Meir Simhah of Dvinsk, maintain that the oaths are interdependent, and that since the gentiles violated their oath, Israel is released from its oaths. Neturei Karta, and their great collaborator and ideologue, Rabbi Yoel Teitelbaum of Satmar, strongly disagree with this interpretation and consider the various oaths as independent covenants. Either way, however, the Balfour Declaration and the United Nations vote of 1947 would seem to negate the assertion that Zionism violates the oaths forswearing rebellion against gentile governments and forcible immigration to Palestine. Lamm sums up the major thesis of Neturei Karta as follows: there can be only divine, not human, political initiative; spiritual return must precede political redemption; the agents of redemption must be the pious—those committed to God and Torah; and the Jewish State must be a thorough theocracy, not a democracy.

MARMORSTEIN provides an answer to the question of why Neturei Karta, whose numbers probably never exceeded 3,000, had at one time such a powerful influence over religious society in the State of Israel. He thinks it is misleading to envisage the religious struggle as one of a monolithic group of believers waging war against a group of militant secularists in defense of their religious views and principles. Rather, he considers the religious camp as a three-tiered structure. He compares the religious situation in Israel to a territory under siege. The citadel is manned by zealots, while the metropolis itself is inhabited by fervent, if less flamboyant, believers. The population of the area between the metropolis and the border is familiar with the modes of expression and conduct prevalent on both sides of the frontier and is sensitive to variations. Proximity to people outside the territory, as well as a prevalence of professional skills and broad cultural interests, fosters an attitude of tolerance, if not respect, for outsiders on the part of the borderers. There is a continuous stream of traffic in and out of the borderland. Defectors are replaced by new arrivals. Sometimes the children of borderers who have been sent to the metropolis for their religious education and spiritual advancement are reluctant to leave; and indeed, a trickle of recruits for manning the citadel come from their ranks.

In this extended analogy, Neturei Karta, the Guardians of the City, represent the shock troops who man the citadel; the ultraorthodox Agudat Israel and its offshoots represent the metropolis; and the former Mizrachi or National Religious Party (NRP), representing the Modern Orthodox Religious Zionists, constitute the borderers. Now, in theory, the common enemy of all religious parties are the secularists, but in practice, claims Marmorstein, the real enemy is the group slightly to the left on the spectrum. Thus Neturei Karta assails Agudat Israel for accepting government subsidies for their schools, while Agudat Israel vociferously attacks the NRP for permitting mixed swimming in their rural settlements. Finally, the NRP is inhibited from engaging in dialogue and cooperating with secular elements. The effect, therefore, of Neturei Karta's stance is an overall shift to the right.

LANDAU examines some of the reasons for the decline of the influence of Neturei Karta after 1967, and why its dwindling numbers have been marginalized even by the ultra-orthodox, noting five factors. First, some of its positions have become too extreme and extravagant. For example, the unification of Jerusalem and access to the Western Wall, the holiest shrine in Judaism, was welcomed by the Agudah-type of ultraorthodox who flocked there from the moment it was captured, while Neturei Karta called for the internationalization of Jerusalem. Second, there has been no colorful and charismatic leader of the group since the death of Rabbi Amram Blau in 1974. Third, financial support has dwindled since the death of Rabbi Yoel Teitelbaum in 1979. Fourth, the group has lost credibility with its intemperate attacks on Rabbi Eliezer Menahem Shach, the venerable head of the famous Ponevezh yeshivah and spiritual leader of the Degel Hatorah Party, himself widely considered to be something of an extremist. Finally, Neturei Karta's very success has led to its marginalization. The initiative for street campaigns and demonstrations on religious issues, for example, has passed from Neturei Karta to the religious parties of the ultra-orthodox "establishment."

JACOB HABERMAN

New York

- Encyclopaedia Judaica*, 16 vols., Jerusalem: Keter, 1971
- Franks, Abigail, The Lee Max Friedman Collection of American Jewish Colonial Correspondence: Letters of the Franks Family, 1733–1748 (Studies in American Jewish History, no. 5), edited by Leo Hershkowitz and Isidore S. Meyer, Waltham, Massachusetts: American Jewish Historical Society, 1968
- Glazer, Nathan and Daniel P. Moynihan, Beyond the Melting Pot: The Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Jews, Italians, and Irish of New York City, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963, 2nd edition, 1970
- Goren, Arthur A., New York Jews and the Quest for Community: The Kehillah Experiment, 1908–1922, New York: Columbia University Press, 1970
- Grinstein, Hyman B., The Rise of the Jewish Community of New York, 1654–1860, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1944
- Gurock, Jeffrey S., When Harlem Was Jewish, 1870–1930, New York: Columbia University Press, 1979
- Hershkowitz, Leo (editor), Wills of Early New York Jews, 1704–1799 (Studies in American Jewish History, no. 4), New York: American Jewish Historical Society, 1967
- Howe, Irving, World of Our Fathers, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1976; as The Immigrant Jews of New York, 1881 to the Present, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1976
- Jackson, Kenneth T. (editor), The Encyclopedia of New York City, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1995
- Kessner, Thomas, The Golden Door: Italian and Jewish Immigrant Mobility in New York City, 1880–1915 (Urban Life in America Series), New York: Oxford University Press, 1977
- Moore, Deborah Dash, At Home in America: Second Generation New York Jews (Columbia History of Urban Life), New York: Columbia University Press, 1981
- Poll, Solomon, The Hasidic Community of Williamsburg, New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1962

Rischin, Moses, The Promised City: New York's Jews, 1870–1914, New York: Harper and Row, 1962

Sanders, Ronald, The Downtown Jews: Portraits of an Immigrant Generation, New York: Harper and Row, 1969; London: Constable, 1987

Wenger, Beth S., New York Jews and the Great Depression: Uncertain Promise (Yale Historical Publications), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1996

The largest urban Jewish community in the world and in Jewish history is New York City. Its estimated 1,765,000 Jews in 1927 constituted 29.5 percent of the city's population and reached 2,035,000 in 1937, about 28 percent of the city's population. This was probably the high point of Jewish population, and there were 1,335 congregations. There were only an estimated 1,048,000 New York City Jews in 1995, a decrease due to large-scale movement to the suburbs and to emigration as well as a low birthrate. The Jews of New York have maintained a vast assortment of organizations for religion, culture, education, charity, defense, Zionism, and trade unionism, as well as Jewish theaters and newspapers. They weigh heavily in the city's economy, particularly in commerce, finance, and the professions, and are influential in the city's politics. Jews occupy a central position in the city's renowned cultural life.

Basic reference works such as the ENCYCLOPAEDIA JUDAICA and JACKSON contain numerous articles pertaining to the Jews of New York, including personalities, institutions, and general themes. Works on American Jewish history refer constantly to New York, as the center of American Jewry and by far its largest community.

Two books, FRANKS and HERSHKOWITZ, provide close views of New York Jewish life, especially its social and economic aspects, during the city's colonial era, thanks to their detailed notes and introductions. For the early period GRINSTEIN remains the standard, detailed institutional history, written from an Orthodox perspective and now somewhat dated. Grinstein also deals with social welfare, religious observance, and conversion. The major phase of New York City Jewish history occurred during the East European mass immigration from 1881. Several substantial works examine this central period when the Jewish population boomed from about 80,000 in 1870 to 1,765,000 in 1927 and continued to rise.

RISCHIN is a basic work on the city's immigrants. He treats admirably their economic and social history and trade union movement and sets them within the broadening parameters of urban society. It is implicit in his view that Jewish developments parallel those of general urban life during the Progressive era; his book, however, is short on religious and communal history.

What Rischin abbreviates or omits is thoroughly discussed in GOREN. This is an excellent study of the communal and cultural life of masses of "downtown" immigrants and the relations between them and "uptown" Americanized middle-class Jews. Goren relates the significant but in the long run unsuccessful attempt to unite New York Jews in one communal organization (kehillah).

Not to be overlooked is the large, famous work by HOWE, which narrates with deep sensitivity the story of the East European immigrants from their departure from Russia and Poland to their arrival and life of struggle in New York City. Individual memoirs presented with psychological insight are central to Howe's narrative. He is particularly attentive to Yiddish culture and socialism somewhat at the expense of more conservative movements.

SANDERS, a readable and lively book, concentrates like Howe on the Yiddish cultural and socialist environment of the immigrants, especially the press. A significant study of Jewish immigrant mobility, placed in a fruitful comparative context, is KESSNER.

An excellent study of a "second settlement" neighborhood is GUROCK. It uses to good effect printed and manuscript data of the United States census alongside more customary press and institutional records.

The vast generational cohort that made the transition from immigrants to natives between 1920 and 1940 is skillfully presented in the imaginative work by MOORE. It emphasizes the prosperous 1920s rather than the depressed 1930s. This shortcoming is more than compensated for by the excellent study of WENGER, which deals mainly with social and economic problems of the 1930s. The Jews of New York City since 1945 have yet to receive the attention of historians.

Several studies have been devoted to the ultraorthodox, including hasidic, groups. An early, effective example is the sociological study of POLL. The Jews' place among the city's ethnic and racial groups is analyzed in the lively study by GLAZER and MOYNIHAN, who regard ethnicity not as transitory but as a permanent factor in New York City's life.

LLOYD P. GARTNER

New Zealand see Australia and New Zealand

Nieto, David 1654–1728

Italian-born London rabbinical leader, philosopher, theologian, and controversialist

Gaster, Moses, History of the Ancient Synagogue of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, the Cathedral Synagogue of the Jews in England, Situate in Bevis Marks, London, 1901

Goldish, Matt, "Newtonian, Converso and Deist: The Lives of Jacob Henrique de Castro Sarmento," Science in Context, 10, 1997

Loewe, Raphael, "The Spanish Supplement to Nieto's Esh Dath," Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, 48, 1981

Petuchowski, Jakob J., "Haham David Nieto and Deistic Trends in Eighteenth-Century Judaism," Journal of Jewish Studies, 5, 1954

Petuchowski, Jakob J., The Theology of Haham David Nieto: An Eighteenth Century Defense of the Jewish Tradition, New York: Bloch, 1954; revised edition, New York: Ktav, 1970

Roth, Cecil, "Haham David Nieto," in his Essays and Portraits in Anglo-Jewish History, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1962

Roth, Leon, "David Nieto and the Orthodoxy of Spinozism," Chronicum Spinozanum, 1, 1928

Ruderman, David, "Jewish Thought in Newtonian England: The Career and Writings of David Nieto," Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, 58, 1992; as chapter 11 in Jewish Thought and Scientific Discovery in Early Modern Europe, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1995

Solomons, Israel, David Nieto and Some of His Contemporaries, London: Spottiswoode, Ballantyne, 1931

David Nieto was haham (rabbi) of London's Portuguese Jewish community from 1701 until his death in 1728. A Sephardi physician and scholar from Italy with wide interests, he found himself the spiritual leader of an unruly congregation of former conversos recently returned from Catholicism. His writings offer a unique window into the problems of Jewish tradition in Newtonian England, though they had relatively little influence either on subsequent generations or in other communities. Haham Nieto appears to have possessed a mild character, but his convictions were strong and his best-known works are polemical in character.

SOLOMONS remains the most important biographer of Nieto. He deals with Nieto's life in detail and explains the basic background behind his various writings. He also disentangles the publication history of these works, much of which was previously unclear. An especially useful feature of this study is the inclusion of key documents in English translation. At the end Solomons includes an extremely detailed bibliography of Nieto's works and a series of appendixes dealing with important personalities in Nieto's circle.

GASTER, though an older and more popular work than those of Solomons and Petuchowski, still contains some details of Nieto's biography and thought that are useful and of interest to those seeking a complete picture of Nieto.

Cecil ROTH offers another brief biographic study of Nieto, based mainly on Solomons and Petuchowski but not lacking in his own keen observations. Roth, a pioneering historian of the former conversos and of Italian Jewry, presents Nieto's life and works in a characteristically readable and easily accessible manner.

PETUCHOWSKI (1954b) remains the only monograph on Nieto's thought. As a reform theologian, Petuchowski is particularly interested in the forms of Jewish heterodoxy that arose among the London Portuguese former conversos and in Nieto's attempts to combat these doctrinal deviances. Following a biographic summary, Petuchowski enters into a detailed discussion of the various challenges to traditional Judaism offered by both rationalists and mystics among the Portuguese Jews. He then turns to Nieto's responses to these challenges, which he characterizes as reflecting a "scientific" approach. Nieto's views on traditional doctrines of revelation, the oral law, the talmudic sages, and God are examined, and a chapter is added on Nieto's place in the history of Judaism. Much research has been done on attitudes toward these issues in the period since Petuchowski wrote, but his book still holds up remarkably well and remains the standard work on Nieto's theology.

PETUCHOWSKI (1954a) presents a more specific interdisciplinary study about one major episode in Nieto's London career: the accusation of heresy leveled at him by certain congregants in 1703. Despite Nieto's exoneration by the great Haham Tsevi Ashkenazi, Petuchowski contends that in his claim that "God is nature and nature is God," there is still ample evidence that Nieto was indeed influenced by the deism. He adduces assorted evidence to this effect.

Leon ROTH simply published a critical document in the aforementioned debate over Nieto's orthodoxy, an English translation of Haham Tsevi's responsum exonerating Nieto from the charge. There is nothing more to the article, but Roth's title, "David Nieto and the Orthodoxy of Spinozism," indicates clearly that Roth saw Nieto's position on God and nature as Spinozist. This differs from Petuchowski's view that Nieto was a deist, but they share a common view that Nieto's accusers were somehow correct about his heterodoxy.

LOEWE's important article was the first in a long while to advance materially understanding of Nieto and his milieu. The subject of this study is a short manuscript supplement to Nieto's work Esh Dat, a polemic against the Sabbatian kabbalist Nehemiah Hayun. Loewe transcribes and translates the supplement, and he offers a penetrating analysis of its significance. He claims that the deep concern Nieto expressed over the Hayun affair was mainly the result of his fear that the Jews' somewhat tenuous settlement rights in England would be threatened if Hayun's messianic heterodoxy became known to the authorities.

RUDERMAN's interest in Nieto concerns an area mainly overlooked by previous scholars: Nieto's deep preoccupation with science, which figures significantly in all his works. Ruderman offers convincing arguments that Nieto, in attempting to impress sophisticates in his congregation as well as to satisfy his own curiosity, absorbed much of the "Newtonian synthesis" between science and religion then current in England. The ideas expressed in the Boyle Lectures delivered by Samuel Clarke, a leading student of Newton and proponent of the Newtonian synthesis, appear to have been most influential on Nieto. While he may or may not have come in direct contact with these lectures, Nieto's thinking is unquestionably in harmony with Clarke's design argument and Newtonian proofs for divine providence.

Prompted by Ruderman's study, GOLDISH investigates the impact of Nieto's "Jewish Newtonian synthesis" on his leading student, Jacob de Castro Sarmento. Goldish contends that Nieto's scientific proofs of Jewish doctrine exercised a powerful but temporary influence over the brilliant Sarmento, who abandoned Judaism little by little after Nieto's death.

MATT GOLDISH

North Africa

- Abitbol, Michel, The Jews of North Africa during the Second World War, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1989
- Attal, Robert, Les Juifs d'Afrique du Nord: Bibliographie, Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute, 1973
- Chouraqui, André N., Between East and West: A History of the Jews of North Africa, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1968
- Cohen, Mark R. and Abraham L. Udovitch (editors), Jews among Arabs: Contacts and Boundaries, Princeton, New Jersey: Darwin, 1989
- Goitein, Shlomo Dov, A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967-1993
- Hirschberg, Haim Zeev, Toldot ha-Yehudim be-Afrikah ha-Tsefonit, 1965; as A History of the Jews in North Africa, 2 vols., Leiden: Brill, 1974-1981
- Laskier, Michael M., North African Jewry in the Twentieth Century: The Jews of Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria, New York: New York University Press, 1994
- Seminar on Muslim-Jewish Relations in North Africa, Proceedings of the Seminar on Muslim-Jewish Relations in North Africa, New York: World Jewish Congress, 1975
- Slouschz, Nahum, Travels in North Africa, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1927; as The Jews of North Africa, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1944

Throughout the Middle Ages, North Africa absorbed large numbers of Sephardim, who greatly shaped the character of its ancient indigenous Jewish communities. Another major influence since the 19th century resulted from French cultural intervention and political involvement. Most Jews emigrated in or after 1948, mainly to France, Israel, and the Americas, though sizable communities remain in Morocco and Tunisia. Much research has been conducted on the region as a whole and even more on individual communities, especially on Morocco, mainly in Hebrew and French as well as in English.

ABITBOL divides his book on the Maghreb during World War II into three chronological parts. In the first he examines the position of the Jews in Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia on the eve of World War II, paying special attention to French-Jewish and Muslim-Jewish relations and to antisemitism among European settlers. He then discusses the anti-Jewish legislation under the Vichy regime and its implementation in each country as well as the impact of the German presence, especially as it relates to Tunisia. Among the issues dealt with are help for refugees (mainly from Europe), work camps, internment, and the attitude of the Muslims toward the condition of the Jews. The third part analyzes the reasons for and the process of the slow recovery following the Allied landing and liberation.

ATTAL's bibliography includes more than 10,000 entries on North African Jews. The bibliography starts with the region as a whole, followed by sections on Libya, Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco. Each part is divided into sequences documenting literature in Hebrew and Roman script, and its arrangement is alphabetical by author and chronological for entries with no known author. Author and subject indexes in Hebrew and Roman script are included, and the sequence of items for the region and country in question is printed at the bottom of each index page to facilitate the search. This is the major bibliography on the subject. Though most entries are in Hebrew and French, many are in English.

CHOURAQUI provides a historical survey of North African Jews as well as an examination of their communal life. The survey starts with the Carthaginian through Roman periods but focuses on the Muslim and colonial eras. The earlier periods are discussed generally, whereas the later ones are divided by specific countries. Much attention is given to cultural issues, population trends, and the intellectual, social, economic, and political impact of the West on North Africa in general and on the Jews in particular. Chouraqui deals also with the impact of nationalism—Arab and Jewish—on the region, the mass Jewish emigration following the establishment of the State of Israel, and the struggle for independence culminating in the establishment of independent Maghrebi states. Statistical data and bibliography are included.

COHEN and UDOVITCH's collection includes six articles exploring the experience of Jewish communities of North Africa and Iraq in the 19th and 20th centuries as an example of interaction between a religio-ethnic group and the dominant Arab-Muslim society. The articles examine the practical and symbolic exchanges between communities, shared traditions and cultural forms, and the boundaries between the communities. The articles deal with literature, marriage celebrations, foodways, language, and trade. Although limited in the number of countries and subjects covered, this collection includes important studies and new approaches for an understanding of the life of minorities.

GOITEIN's pioneering work based on the Cairo Genizah documents examines the medieval Mediterranean society and is considered a classic. The study deals both with the Jewish communities and with the gentile societies among which they lived. It opens with a discussion of the Cairo Genizah itself and a survey of the historical, economic, and social background. Among the main topics of the study are economic life, communal organization, education, interfaith relations, daily life, family life, the home, and the individual—a portrait of a Mediterranean personality of the high Middle Ages. The six-volume study concludes with a volume of cumulative indexes covering text and notes. In its wealth of data and depth of analysis, this work is indispensable for the study of Jewish and gentile Mediterranean medieval society and is a must-read even for those focusing on the modern period.

HIRSCHBERG's two-volume book is the broadest study, both geographically and chronologically, on Maghrebi Jews: it covers the region from Morocco to Libya from antiquity to the 1950s. Based on numerous publications in Hebrew and European languages, Hirschberg discusses developments in communal organization, economic and spiritual life, and the implications of political changes for the Jews. For the period after the 16th century, the countries are treated separately. Although many monographs have been published since Hirschberg's book using archival sources that have subsequently become available, it remains the most comprehensive survey on North Africa as a whole.

Based on a wide range of public and private archival sources as well as on numerous publications in several languages, LASKIER examines the political history of Maghrebi Jews before, during, and following colonial rule. Among the issues examined are the condition of the Jews during World War II, Zionism, emigration (including clandestine operations), the involvement of international organizations (primarily Jewish) in favor of Maghrebi Jews, Jewish-Muslim relations, Jewish self-defense operations, and Jewish relations with the nationalist movements. This study adds much new information on North African Jews in an integrated, analytical way.

The SEMINAR ON MUSLIM-JEWISH RELATIONS IN NORTH AFRICA was one of the first meetings focusing on Maghrebi Jews in which leading figures in the field participated: S.D. Goitein, N.A. Stillman, J. Gerber, and R. Press. They examined aspects of Jewish-Muslim relations during the medieval and modern periods, mainly in Morocco, and their articles reflect various points of view. The discussion that followed included several remarks by people originating from the Maghreb who added their own impressions regarding Jewish-Muslim relations as they experienced them or heard about them.

SLOUSCHZ's 1927 book describes his travels among the Jewish communities of the four countries comprising North Africa during the years 1906 to 1914. He visited the major urban centers and smaller hinterland communities and benefited from the information provided by indigenous Jewish scholars. The book starts with Slouschz's visit to Tripoli and its surroundings as well as the Tripolitanian Saharan communities. This is followed by his visits to Tunisia (including the island of Djerba), Algeria, and Morocco. The book examines the history of the communities, their organization, customs, and social, economic, and cultural life. Slouschz, an epigraphist, is especially interested in Jewish antiquities and the Jewish origin of local peoples. The book was republished in 1944 as The Jews of North Africa, unchanged except for the title.

RACHEL SIMON

See also Algeria; Libya; Morocco; Tunisia

Numbers, Book of

- Douglas, Mary, In the Wilderness: The Doctrine of Defilement in the Book of Numbers (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 158), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1993
- Hackett, Jo Ann, The Balaam Text from Deir 'Alla (Harvard Semitic Monographs, no. 31), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1984
- Levine, Baruch A., Numbers 1–20: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (Anchor Bible, vol. 4A), New York: Doubleday, 1993
- Milgrom, Jacob, Numbers/Ba-midbar: The Traditional Hebrew Text with the New JPS Translation (JPS Torah Commentary Series), Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1990

Olson, Dennis T., Numbers (Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching), Louisville, Kentucky: Knox, 1996

The fourth book of the Bible, the Book of Numbers, has been perceived widely as the Bible's basement, into which an editor, divine or human, has dumped all the laws and stories that do not seem to fit anywhere else. Applying the literary methods in vogue in the academic study of the Hebrew Bible at the close of the 20th century, however, OLSON succeeds in demonstrating that the very structure of the Book of Numbers, far from being haphazard, is a work of art crafted to express a series of messages. Drawing from the full gamut of contemporary Jewish and Christian exegesis of Numbers as well as ancient exegesis contained in such places as the rabbinic and patristic corpora, Olson provides for each and every pericope a clear exposition both of its probable original meaning and of its contemporary relevance to such issues as setting boundaries, showing respect for leaders, and the need for those leaders to be open to their own flaws.

If Olson seems to draw out for his target audience of preachers and teachers the eternal verities contained in the Book of Numbers read in light of an exegetical consensus, MILGROM demonstrates that modern biblical studies is a field of exciting new discoveries and debates in which there are winners and losers. For example, he goes to great lengths to explain how Mayer Gruber's findings put to rest the scholarly myth that ancient Israel was peopled with sacred prostitutes (women who engaged in extramarital sex at temples and elsewhere in order to increase by sympathetic magic the fertility of the land). By summarizing and explaining major issues in the ancient, medieval, and modern study of the Book of Numbers, Milgrom shows that vital issues in religion and life are contained in the fourth book of the Bible.

In contrast to Milgrom's nontraditional Jewish commentary, LEVINE provides a detailed, nonsectarian scholarly analysis of Numbers. (Interestingly, the two authors switch roles when commenting on Leviticus; in that instance, Levine writes for a Jewish audience, while Milgrom offers the nonsectarian interpretation.) Notwithstanding their continual disagreement over issues very important to them and to other professional biblical scholars—notably the relative dating of Leviticus and Deuteronomy—Milgrom and Levine epitomize a rare and vanishing breed of Jewish scholar, whose native language is English but who are steeped in Hebrew of all periods, acquired (like their Yiddish) in childhood. Both are ordained Conservative rabbis whose mastery of Semitic languages and literatures has earned them international reputations. Both, however, have devoted much of their energy in recent years to expounding the message of the Bible to the People of the Book and disseminating ancient and modern Jewish exegesis to the larger world of academicians, students, and educated laity.

If the works by Milgrom and Levine successfully combine summaries of their respective contributions with a fair hearing to other biblical scholarship on the Book of Numbers, the works by Douglas and Hackett are uniquely significant contributions on specific issues. The importance of these two studies to the Book of Numbers and to 20th-century biblical scholarship is amply demonstrated by the attention they receive in the other works cited here. Going beyond her seminal contribution almost 30 years before of an anthropological perspective on the dietary laws of the Book of Leviticus, DOUGLAS's work makes sense of much of the Book of Numbers that previously had been discussed, allegorized, diagrammed, or condemned all without being understood. Christian Bible criticism has often taken for granted that the purity laws characteristic of Leviticus and Numbers were Judaism's strategy for turning away from other nations. This corollary was drawn by Max Weber in Das antike Judentum (1921), where he contended that "the negative attitude of the Jews themselves was rather the decisive factor for anti-semitism in antiquity." Douglas's work demonstrates, however, that in Leviticus and Numbers "defilement is caused not by contact with other people; it comes out of the body, or it comes out of moral failure. Everybody is liable to be defiled or to defile. This should be totally unexpected to the anthropologist used to purity codes in other religions." In addition, Douglas contends that Hebrew Scripture's concept of defilement can be elucidated most clearly by treating the Book of Numbers as a literary unit rather than as the Bible's junk room.

In 1967 an Arab worker at Deir 'Alla in Jordan discovered a set of tablets among material that archaeologists had thrown onto the refuse pile. Inscribed on the tablets in black and red ink in early-seventh-century B.C.E. Ammonite script and in a South Canaanite dialect was a brief narrative concerning a diviner named Balaam, son of Beor. While Palestinian archaeology has shed much light on the material culture of Iron-Age Israel, it is still quite infrequent that inscriptions from the ancient Near East actually refer by name to some person heretofore known only from the Bible. In fact, the Deir 'Alla Balaam tablets are the only extant Iron-Age texts that refer by name to a personality mentioned in the Pentateuch. Thus, these tablets seem to preserve a record of how Iron-Age non-Israelites viewed the very Balaam who receives a mixed reception from Israelites in the biblical books of Numbers and Deuteronomy. HACKETT's work is the single most comprehensive and levelheaded treatment in English of these ancient texts. Hackett's edition, translation, and commentary on the Balaam texts therefore forms part of the necessary background for reading the Book of Numbers and its religious messages in its ancient context.

MAYER IRWIN GRUBER

Numbers and Numerology

Abrams, Daniel, "From Germany to Spain: Numerology as a Mystical Technique," Journal of Jewish Studies, 47(1), Spring 1996

Levias, C., "Gematria," in The Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 5, edited by Isidore Singer, New York and London: Funk and Wagnalls, 1901, new edition, 1925

Lieberman, Stephen J., "A Mesopotamian Background for the So-Called Aggadic 'Measures' of Biblical Hermeneutics," Hebrew Union College Annual, 58, 1987

Locks, Gutman G., The Spice of Torah—Gematria, New York: Judaica Press, 1985

Scholem, Gershom, "Gematria," in Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 7, edited by C. Roth, Jerusalem: Keter, 1971
 Wolfson, Elliot R., "Letter Symbolism and Merkavah Imagery in the Zohar," in 'Alefi Shefer, Studies in the Literature of Jewish Thought, edited by Moshe Halamish, Ramat-Gan: Bar Ilan University Press, 1990

Corresponding in turn to the numbers one through ten, to multiples of ten through 90, and to multiples of 100 through 400, the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet have been used as hermeneutical tools by which words are given numerological values and compared with the values assigned to other words.

Gematria, the calculation of the numerical value of letters, is the 29th of the 32 hermeneutical rules countenanced by the rabbis for valid aggadic interpretation of the Torah, but it is by no means a strictly Jewish notion. To the contrary, there is evidence of gematria in the Greek tradition, in cuneiform hermeneutic texts, and in Christian commentary on the Hebrew Bible. Some scholars trace the etymology of the term to the Greek geometria (or to the related notion of geometrical number); others contend that the root of the word is found in the Greek grammateia, from grammateus (secretary or scribe), or directly from gramma (letter). In the Jewish mystical tradition, there are as many as 75 different varieties of gematria. Consult LEVIAS for the best current enumeration of some of these many varieties.

SCHOLEM's short encyclopedia entry on gematria is a concentrated repository of relevant distinctions as well as primary and secondary source materials. Scholem draws attention to the variety of types of gematria, and he outlines—and briefly explains—seven of the nine kinds listed by Moses Cordovero in Pardes Rimmonim. With respect to the influence of gematria on early kabbalistic literature, Scholem notes that it was "not considerable on the greater part of the Zohar and on the Hebrew writings of Moses b. Shem Tov de Leon" and that the impact is seen instead in the latter half of the 13th century, especially in the works of Abraham Abulafia. Scholem also notes that Joseph Gikatilla—a student of Abulafia—made extensive use of gematria, and that the influence can be seen in later zoharic literature (but not the Zohar itself).

In his article on letter symbolism, WOLFSON offers a detailed, essentially linguistic (that is to say, letter-focused) discussion of medieval interpretations of the chariot (merkabab) imagery of Ezekiel chapter 1. The article's focus on the importance of letters to the merkabab speculation of Joseph Gikatilla and of Moses de Leon in his writings prior to the appearance of the Zohar helps to reveal the extent of the numerological significance of those letters in these early texts, as well as in the Zohar itself. As such, Wolfson's discussion suggests the emergence of a decidedly numerological underpinning to the Zohar and pre-Zohar Sephardi mystical texts. This numerological slant may be seen specifically in the employment and analyses of merkabab imagery in Gikatilla and de Leon. Both employ cosmological systems in which the relation between the divine unity—the charioteer—and the plurality that follows—the chariot—is defined (at least partially) through specific recourse to, among other things, the numerological value of the tetragrammaton in the case of de Leon, and involving a mode of letter permutation in the case of Gikatilla.

ABRAMS's article, as its title suggests, examines possible textual links between the Ashkenazi and Sephardi mystical traditions in the Middle Ages. Focusing on the use of numerology in both of these traditions, the author discusses the greater numerological focus found in the Ashkenazi mystics, finding in Abraham Abulafia alone a real extension of the German approach among the Sephardim. The article analyzes the experiential role of numerology, in which the repetitious act involved in calculating the numerological values of words, rather than the values of the words per se, is understood as the primary means by which the mystic seeks to achieve a mystical experience in the form of a heightened spiritual (or altered mental) state.

LOCKS provides a manual for numerological analysis of biblical texts. His volume lists each word that occurs in the Pentateuch in numerical order—that is, according to the numerical value of its letters. The book starts with the number three and ends with 1,500, and under each numerical value, Locks presents the relevant words in order of their first occurrence in the biblical text. Each word entry is presented in fully vocalized Hebrew script accompanied by an exact citation and an English translation. The work also includes a very useful introductory chapter by Immanuel Schochet.

LIEBERMAN demarcates the analogues of gematria in cuneiform, Greek, Arabic, and other texts, noting that the earliest recorded occurrence of gematria is attributed to an eighth-century B.C.E. Assyrian king. The author distinguishes between constitutive and interpretational uses of gematria: the latter method uses numerological techniques to interpret words, and the former method employs numerology to select a name, a term, or a spelling (e.g., Eleazar of Worms named his book Rokeah because that title shares the numerical equivalent of 308 with his own name, Eleazar). In addition to the naming of books, Lieberman also discusses the implications of numerological considerations for the processes of indicating calendrical dates and naming years, and he recounts the general connection between numbers and letters in many textual traditions. Lieberman concludes that, given the employment of numerological techniques before and during the composition of the Hebrew Bible, it is entirely possible that gematria (as well as notarikon, the interpretation of selected words in the biblical text as if they were acronyms) was employed within the Bible itself, encoding hidden messages into the text that were to be discovered by employment of gematria or notarikon analysis (the at-bash code of the Book of Jeremiah being a case in point).

This page intentionally left blank

O

Onomastics

- Beider, Alexander, A Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Russian Empire, Teaneck, New Jersey: Avotaynu, 1993
- Demski, Aaron, Joseph Reif, and Joseph Tabory (editors), These Are the Names: Studies in Jewish Onomastics, Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1997
- Fowler, Jeaneane D., Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew: A Comparative Study (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 49), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1988
- Grabbe, Lester L., Etymology in Early Jewish Interpretation: The Hebrew Names in Philo (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 115), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988
- Guggenheimer, Heinrich W. and Eva H. Guggenheimer, Jewish Family Names and Their Origins: An Etymological Dictionary, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1992
- Kaganoff, Benzion C., A Dictionary of Jewish Names and Their History, New York: Schocken, 1977; London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1978
- Kolatch, Alfred J., Complete Dictionary of English and Hebrew First Names, Middle Village, New York: David, 1984
- Mettinger, Tryggve N.D., Namnet och närvaron: Gudsnamn och Gudsbild i Böckernas Bok, 1987; translated by Frederick H. Cryer as In Search of God: The Meaning and Message of the Everlasting Names, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988
- Tigay, Jeffrey H., You Shall Have No Other Gods: Israelite Religion in the Light of Hebrew Inscriptions (Harvard Semitic Studies, 31), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1986

Onomastics (from the Greek onoma) is the study of names. An examination of the name that an individual bears can reveal much information concerning that person's origin, identity, religious worldview, social status, and mores. As the following works make clear, playing "Jewish geography" can also be an academic enterprise.

KAGANOFF is one of the best starting points for the layperson interested in learning about Jewish names and onomastics. In the first part of the book, Kaganoff presents a general introduction to the study of Jewish names, tracing both the history of Jewish naming practice and the history of Jewish names. Two slightly subversive conclusions may be drawn from this section: first, that there is no standard Jewish way of naming, and second, that many of the names that are considered typically Jewish in the modern world actually originated in non-Jewish contexts. The second part of the book provides a short dictionary of Jewish family names that complements the discussion in the first section. Kaganoff's presentation of these names emphasizes their meanings and derivations. His work, however, has been criticized as superficial by professional onomasticians.

KOLATCH has made a career of publishing reference books on names for a popular Jewish audience. The main body of this catalog of 11,000 first names in use in both the English- and Hebrew-speaking worlds alphabetically lists boys' and girls' names. Kolatch includes each name's meaning and variant forms (for example, Moe and Moyse for the English Moses and its Hebrew equivalent Moshe), and an appendix organizing Hebrew names according to their English definitions will assist readers seeking Hebrew equivalents for "secular" names. An introduction provides a brief overview of how names developed and how Jews in particular have chosen names over the course of time.

BEIDER's major scholarly work is devoted to the cataloging and analysis of some 50,000 Jewish surnames from the Russian Jewish Pale of Settlement. In the first part, the author introduces the reader to the study of Jewish onomastics; analyzes the primary data according to source language, type, and linguistic criteria; and places the material in a historical context. The second part of the volume lists the names with their translations, geographic distribution, and possible etymologies. Because the various languages use diverse methods to transcribe Jewish names, the third part provides a phonetic key to finding name listings. Thus, one can find the surname of the painter Marc Chagall, even though it is spelled Shagal according to Beider's system of transcription.

The dictionary by GUGGENHEIMER and GUGGENHEIMER is broader than Beider's work in scope but not in depth. The Guggenheimers list and give etymological explanations for the surnames employed by Ashkenazi, Sephardi, Oriental, and Israeli Jews in the modern world. While the authors treat the first two categories as comprehensively as possible, they admit that their access to sources for Oriental surnames was limited and that they were unable to include Ethiopian surnames in their work. The book includes a brief introduction, followed by the distinctive dictionary that offers Yiddish-, Hebrew-, Arabic-, and some Russian-derived names in the original script of the respective languages.

DEMSKI, REIF, and TABORY's collection of essays delivered at a conference on Jewish onomastics at Bar-Ilan University includes five essays written in English along with four articles in Hebrew that are summarized in English. There are four essays on Jewish names in antiquity; four more on names and naming patterns among Sephardi and Yemenite communities, particularly during the 19th and 20th centuries; and one article on the anthropology of Jewish names. The centerpiece of the book, however, is an annotated bibliography on Jewish onomastics, which concentrates mainly on works in English. Overall, the volume is an accessible scholarly source for those desiring to delve deeper into the subject.

More specialized studies include TIGAY's controversial attempt to reconstruct the history of Israelite religion on the basis of the contemporaneous extrabiblical onomasticon. According to Tigay's analysis, close to 50 percent of the approximately 1,200 names known from ancient Hebrew inscriptional sources contain theophoric or divine elements, the overwhelming majority of which allude to the tetragrammaton. Less than six percent refer to other gods. Tigay therefore concludes that ancient Israelite religion, at least during the eighth through sixth centuries B.C.E., was overwhelmingly monotheistic. It should be noted that his conclusions diverge from the theory supported by most contemporary biblical researchers, namely that the religion of Israel prior to 586 B.C.E. and the Babylonian Exile was polytheistic or just possibly monolatrous, a system pledging allegiance to one deity without denying the existence of other gods.

FOWLER is an exhaustive study of Hebrew names from biblical times that include either direct or implicit references to God. Drawing from both the biblical onomasticon and names found in ancient Hebrew epigraphic sources, Fowler identifies the elements that refer to God in the first part of her work, while in the second part she subjects the various theophoric names to a rigorous semantic analysis. The final sections of the study compare the religious concepts that the author derives from the biblical onomasticon with those that she identifies from other ancient Semitic onomastica. Like Tigay, Fowler challenges the preeminent view in modern biblical studies as she concludes that the evidence of the biblical onomasticon supports the traditional contention that Israelite religion was monotheistic and in many respects distinct from other religions in its ancient Near Eastern environment.

METTINGER is a work of Christian biblical theology that nonetheless conveys some very useful information concerning the names and designations of God in the Hebrew Bible. Mettinger surveys the philology, history, and theological meaning of the various divine names in the Bible, including YHWH, 'el(ohim), and 'el-shadday, and he places these names into a relatively conservative reconstruction of the history of the religions of Israel and its neighbors in antiquity. He also analyzes the import of various divine designations, including YHWH tseva'ot, 'elohim hayyim, and God as "king," "redeemer," "savior," and "creator." His concluding sections deal with the images of God in the book of Job and the issue of God-language and gender studies.

GRABBE explores how the Hellenistic-Jewish philosopher Philo used etymologies in his allegorical method of scriptural interpretation. Grabbe has isolated 166 biblical names for which Philo presents etymologies. These go beyond the level of the purely etiological and appear influenced more by the Hellenistic (rather than the Jewish) sphere. Yet, unlike his Hellenistic intellectual forebears, Philo draws from a tradition that had knowledge of the Jewish languages of his time, namely Hebrew and Aramaic. Philo did not know these languages himself, however, and Grabbe therefore posits that the philosopher had at his disposal a preexisting onomasticon, albeit corrupted in the course of its scribal transmission.

CARL S. EHRLICH

Oral Tradition

Elman, Yaakov, Authority and Tradition: Toseftan Baraitot in Talmudic Babylonia, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1994

Faur, José, Golden Doves with Silver Dots: Semiotics and Textuality in Rabbinic Tradition (Jewish Literature and Culture), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986

Fraade, Steven D., From Tradition to Commentary: Torah and Its Interpretation in the Midrash Sifre to Deuteronomy (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991

Gerhardsson, Birger, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, foreword by Jacob Neusner, Copenhagen, Denmark: Munksgaard, 1961; as Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity; with, Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1998

Neusner, Jacob, Oral Tradition in Judaism: The Case of the Mishnah (Garland Reference Library of the Humanities, vol. 764), New York: Garland, 1987

Zlotnick, Dov, Iron Pillar—Mishnah: Redaction, Form, and Intent, New York: Ktav, 1988

The study of oral tradition in Judaic cultures has proceeded within a number of disciplines and focused on a wide variety of topics. The present essay addresses a setting of special interest to historians of the religious dimension of Judaic culture—the relation of ancient oral tradition to the surviving records of the classical rabbinic writings of late antiquity (c.200–650 C.E.). Such writings include, most famously, legal compendia such as the Mishnah and the Tosefta, various collections of biblical interpretation known as Midrash, and the Talmuds of Palestine and Babylonia.

In these writings, and especially in later medieval theological, jurisprudential, and historical thought, rabbinic knowledge regarding law, history, and biblical interpretation is commonly termed "Oral Torah." That is, rabbinic tradition is viewed as stemming from a primordial revelation on Sinai that complements the "Written Torah" of Moses himself. The rabbinic understanding is that Moses transmitted this Oral (unwritten) Torah by word of mouth to his disciples and they to theirs, in an unbroken line of transmission. According to rabbinic thought, this Oral Torah survives more or less intact in the extant rabbinic writings of antiquity.

Most modern students of the rabbinic writings of late antiquity are prepared to doubt that much, if any, rabbinic Oral Torah originates in Mosaic revelation. Of much greater interest is the degree to which the surviving writings can provide access to earlier, exclusively oral forms of rabbinic or even pre-rabbinic traditions of the Second Temple or early post-Temple periods. Similarly, many are interested in the role that oral mastery and performance of rabbinic tradition played in the intellectual and moral formation of rabbinic disciples. There are at present no comprehensive treatments of all the issues relating to rabbinic oral tradition in late antiquity, nor does any one book even consider the entire surviving literature from the perspective of oral tradition. But the books discussed here constitute important steps in opening the topic to disciplined academic inquiry.

GERHARDSSON, despite huge theoretical paradigm shifts in rabbinic studies since he wrote, remains the most important first introduction to the various issues surrounding rabbinic oral tradition. The new edition of his book, with Jacob Neusner's foreword, is most welcome. Gerhardsson gathers exhaustively the most important rabbinic sources that shed light on the oral dimension of rabbinic tradition. His main concern is to recover the pedagogical and mnemonic methods by which oral tradition was composed, mastered, and transmitted in the circles of rabbinic discipleship. The chief flaws in Gerhardsson's work are theoretical: his way of citing rabbinic sources obscures the degree to which later, theologically motivated perspectives on oral transmission might shape descriptions of early practices, and he implicitly assumes that rabbinic tradition circulated in an exclusively oral form prior to its transcription in writing.

Jacob Neusner, in reviews and other articles, has become the most important critic of these theoretical weaknesses (although he appears to have repented in his foreword to the new edition of Gerhardsson). NEUSNER offers a comprehensive profile of the mnemonic system of the Mishnah in particular, focusing on such issues as the way literary forms serve to shape conceptual contents, the role of formulaic patterns in aiding memorization, and the degree to which the Mishnah, as a memorized text, gave birth to (rather than grew out of) an oral tradition. In his view, the act of writing down rabbinic traditions has profoundly altered them: "Those who wish to trace the history of oral tradition cannot find an exemplary case in the Mishnah. Those who propose to explain how a statement in oral form takes shape and enters into a continuous tradition by contrast will find in the Mishnah's later history a source of probative examples indeed."

ZLOTNICK's volume focuses on the Mishnah as well, offering an overall introduction to the history of the mishnaic tradition and the nature of the Mishnah as a literary work. His conception of the relation of the extant mishnaic text to antecedent rabbinic oral tradition, however, represents a methodological step backward from Neusner's achievement, failing to refute or even to address any of Neusner's major theoretical proposals. Nevertheless, Zlotnick's discussions of the mnemonic traits of mishnaic discourse are astute and insightful on their own terms. The book offers a useful contrast to the formalistic analyses preferred by Neusner.

ELMAN's work is by far the most sophisticated in its use of contemporary anthropological and literary-historical approaches to orality as a route into interpreting the earliest history of rabbinic oral tradition. He addresses the Tosefta, a legal compendium roughly contemporary with the Mishnah and parallel to it in style and content. His penetrating comparisons of texts preserved in extant manuscripts of the Tosefta with their parallels in the two Talmuds yields the claim that the Tosefta benefited from transmission as both an oral and a written text. The written rendering is of Palestinian provenance and represents an earlier form of the text than its orally transmitted Babylonian counterpart. Elman cautiously avoids generalizations about whether this dual track transmission characterizes all rabbinic texts. His work constitutes a crucial turn in the discussion of the nature of rabbinic literary tradition as found in the Mishnah and Tosefta, and it has important implications for other compilations as well.

FAUR's theoretical point of departure is in semiotics. From this vantage he offers a global theory of rabbinic literature as a medium of oral and written communication. A key contribution is his mining of the rich medieval rabbinic tradition for insights into how the tradition itself understood the implications of the dual media of textual transmission. Despite a tendency to accept at face value the rabbinic mythologization of oral tradition as revelation, Faur's is an informative and stimulating investigation into the oral dimension of rabbinic textuality.

FRAADE's work focuses on an important midrashic text of the early rabbinic period. While not primarily concerned with problems of oral tradition per se, the volume offers numerous stimulating observations regarding the performative dimension of rabbinic text-making. Fraade sees the composition of midrashic texts as a way of embodying key rabbinic values and of participating in the production of Torah. The interpretive process of the midrashic text represents for Fraade "the literary face of an otherwise oral circulatory system of study and teaching by whose illocutionary force disciples became sages and sages became a class that could extend their teachings . . . into Jewish society more broadly."

MARTIN S. JAFFEE

Orthodox Judaism see Haredim; Modern

Orthodox Judaism

Ozick, Cynthia 1928–

American novelist and critic

Bloom, Harold (editor), Cynthia Ozick (Modern Critical Views), New York: Chelsea House, 1986

- Cohen, Sarah Blacher, Cynthia Ozick's Comic Art: From Levity to Liturgy (Jewish Literature and Culture), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994
- Friedman, Lawrence S., Understanding Cynthia Ozick (Understanding Contemporary American Literature), Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991
- Kauvar, Elaine M., Cynthia Ozick's Fiction: Tradition and Invention (Jewish Literature and Culture), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993
- Kielsky, Vera Emuna, Inevitable Exiles: Cynthia Ozick's View of the Precariousness of Jewish Existence in a Gentile Society (Twentieth Century American Jewish Writers, vol. 2), New York: Lang, 1989
- Lowin, Joseph, Cynthia Ozick (Twayne's United States Authors Series, 545), Boston: Twayne, 1988
- Pinsker, Sanford, The Uncompromising Fictions of Cynthia Ozick (Literary Frontiers, no. 29), Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1987
- Strandberg, Victor, Greek Mind/Jewish Soul: The Conflicted Art of Cynthia Ozick (Wisconsin Project on American Writers), Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994
- Walden, Daniel (editor), The World of Cynthia Ozick (Studies in American Jewish Literature, vol. 6), Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1987

Cynthia Ozick is unique among American writers, particularly Jewish-American writers, for her synthesis of Jewish ideals with secular mores and her presentation of Judaica within all contexts—religious, cultural, and ethnic. Her fiction, laced with irony and mordant satire, chiefly revolves around two themes: the age-old struggle between Judaism (monotheism) and Hellenism (paganism); and contemporary Jewry's reconciliations with the post-Holocaust world. The growing number of scholarly works devoted to Ozick acknowledge her literary achievement.

BLOOM's compilation of essays provides a "representative selection" of criticism of her work and thought. Arranged chronologically up to the year 1983, it contains two reviews of Trust, Ozick's first novel, and her shorter works (i.e., Pagan Rabbi, Bloodshed and Other Novellas). Bloom's book is a good introduction to Ozick's fiction and its recurrent influences—biblical, midrashic, and mythological.

Another compilation of essays can be found in the journal issue edited by WALDEN and devoted entirely to Ozick. Articles by prominent critics cover all her works up to The Messiah of Stockholm, published in 1987, and delve into various topics—for example, the "hasidic voice" in Ozick's prose, her use of memory, and, inevitably, her broad use of Jewish lore and literature.

PINSKER explores the dilemmas of being both a Jewish writer and a Jewish-American writer. He discusses comparisons between Ozick and Flannery O'Connor as well as Ozick's admiration of Henry James, whose style she emulated and incorporated into Trust. While learning the craft of writing in the English language from gentile writers, Ozick tried to forge at the same time a literary English that could serve as a "new Yiddish," concerning herself with things religiously Jewish and expanding the concept of a Jewish-American writer in ways that differed radically from her predecessors, Philip Roth, Saul Bellow, and Bernard Malamud.

LOWIN also examines the issues concerned with being Jewish and being a writer and provides a good overview of Ozick's works, with a lengthy bibliography at the end. He arranges her work chronologically (up to 1987) in order to show its evolution of style and prose. Lowin praises Ozick for her intensity "about conveying a greater understanding of the role Judaism has played—and continues to play—in the development of Western civilization." Lowin views many of Ozick's stories as "polemics against storywriting," since the inherent imagination, in Ozick's view, risks transgressing the biblical injunction against idol worship.

KIELSKY concentrates on the moralism behind Ozick's fiction, discussing her condemnation of the diaspora mentality and how resulting attempts at assimilation have been disastrous for the Jewish people. Kielsky asserts that the failure of Ozick's characters to transform themselves into modern Hellenists serves to call for a return to the ways of the forefathers—the path of Torah—which Ozick stresses as the salvation of Jewry.

The raging conflicts within Ozick's fiction also provide the springboard for FRIEDMAN, who declares assimilation "anathema, involving as it does the yielding up of Jewish identity, the homogenization of Jewish uniqueness . . . the Jewish writer must resist aping Gentile culture." Even while combining Jewish and Greek symbols in her work, Ozick views their cultures as fundamentally incompatible, and her characters' internalization of moral dilemmas shows the futility of trying to escape ancestral roots. The bibliography at the end of this book is useful and extensive.

KAUVAR discusses Ozick's Jewish sources—Torah, Talmud, Kabbalah—as well as Jewish philosophers and gentile authors. The critic compares Ozick's novella The Cannibal Galaxy not only to Henry James but also to Nathaniel Hawthorne; she likens The Messiah of Stockholm to the work of authors such as Pär Lagerkvist, Julian Tuwim, and Balzac. This is a broad and rigorously academic work covering virtually all the writings that influenced Ozick.

While COHEN acknowledges Ozick's debt to earlier masters, she concentrates mainly on Ozick's unique comedic gifts. This exuberant book discusses how "in her originally clever fashion, she tells the whole embarrassing truth, which the art of comedy is dedicated to telling." Ozick's pathetically confused, "self-deluded characters" serve as symbolic weapons with which to mock and attack not only human foibles but what she views as intellectual presumptuousness and artistic hubris.

STRANDBERG provides a dense but comprehensive overview of all of Ozick's works—not only her fiction but also her essays and critical works. He analyzes the recurrent themes, for example the fusion and conflict between Jewish identity and secular culture and Ozick's use of Judaic and pagan symbols, and he lauds her intellectual rigor and mastery of style.

Ozick's praise is much deserved. Only a master storyteller such as Ozick, so steeped in Jewish and secular learning, can combine both worlds with such skill and display the Jewish paradox, and ultimately, the human condition.

P

Pappenheim, Bertha 1859–1936

Austrian-born German social worker and leader of German Jewish feminist movement

Freeman, Lucy, The Story of Anna O., New York: Walker, 1972; London: Aronson, 1994

Kaplan, Marion A., The Jewish Feminist Movement in Germany: The Campaigns of the Jüdischer Frauenbund, 1904–1938 (Contributions in Women's Studies, 8), Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1979

Rosenbaum, Max and Melvin Muroff (editors), Anna O.: Fourteen Contemporary Reinterpretations, New York: Free Press, 1984

A pioneering Jewish German feminist who founded the German Jewish feminist movement in the late 1920s and initiated relief efforts on behalf of the Jewish community after the rise of Nazism in the late 1930s, Bertha Pappenheim also launched a campaign against the “white slavery” commerce in young Jewish and non-Jewish girls in Eastern Europe between the two world wars. A scholar, public speaker, and translator, she is also known as one of Sigmund Freud’s earliest patients, under the pseudonym of Anna O.

KAPLAN offers a brief biography of Bertha Pappenheim and an analysis of the goals and achievements of the Jewish feminist movement in Germany in the first three decades of the 20th century. She investigates the conflicts and tensions between Jewish and German feminism and explains the structure and functions of the German Jewish feminist movement; she discusses Pappenheim’s campaign against the clandestine commerce in prostitution in the Jewish and non-Jewish sectors; and she describes Pappenheim’s critique of the male leadership of the Jewish community in Germany. In the Nazi era, the Jewish Feminist Bund (JFB) focused on relieving the distress of both men and women in the face of intensifying persecutions, and it carried on social and cultural activities until it was outlawed. Kaplan shows the extent to which Pappenheim was an admirer and friend of the philosopher Martin Buber and argues that she was equally committed to feminism and to her Jewish heritage. In addition, Kaplan discusses Pappenheim’s “career” as a patient of Freud, and she notes that Pappenheim was a writer and a scholar as well as a translator. Among her translations into German was Gluckel of Hamelin’s Yiddish biographical memoir and Mary Wollstonecraft’s A Vindication of the Rights of Woman. Kaplan’s account of Pappenheim’s life is the most informative and detailed available to date.

FREEMAN uses fictional reconstruction in her attempt to introduce Bertha Pappenheim as the psychiatric patient who may have helped to constitute the “talking cure” as the foundation of modern psychoanalysis. Freeman traces the development of Anna O.’s speech from disconnected memories and hallucinations to more focused language, and she describes Anna O.’s paralyzing symptoms and their gradual disappearance. Freeman describes Pappenheim’s growing interest in rendering social services for the poor and needy, and she highlights Pappenheim’s work in various orphanages, her eventual discovery of feminism, and her work organizing a federation for women, which is correlated to journeys she undertook to Eastern Europe, Turkey, and Palestine. Freeman also discusses Pappenheim’s struggle against Nazi oppression. This fictional biography is not a scholarly study, but it is worthy of examination given the relatively limited number of historical works.

ROSENBAUM and MUROFF offer a collection of essays on various aspects of Bertha Pappenheim’s role as the psychiatric patient Anna O. The essays range from biographical and historical treatments to cultural and psychological reconstructions. Several essays argue that Anna O.’s psychiatric illness should be understood as a result of the historical and cultural strictures placed on women’s lives at the turn of the 20th century. The introduction and the conclusion offer information on Josef Breuer, Anna O.’s first psychiatrist, who hypnotized his patient in an attempt to induce her to speak about her repressed desires and memories. The book sheds light, too, on the hysterical symptoms of Anna O., who as a patient in a Swiss psychiatric hospital developed a hysterical pregnancy. The volume as a whole emphasizes Anna O.’s contribution to the development of the “talking cure” as one of the basic methods pioneered first by Breuer and later by Freud. The collection attests to scholarly interest in the contribution that Anna O. made in her capacity as a patient, but it would seem that more work needs to be done to explain the mysterious link between the hysterical patient and the vibrant social activist.

ESTHER FUCHS

Papyri see Elephantine

Passover

Bokser, Baruch M., The Origins of the Seder: The Passover Rite and Early Rabbinic Judaism, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984

Gaster, Theodor H., Passover: Its History and Traditions, New York: Schuman, 1949; London: Abelard-Schuman, 1958

Kitchen, K.A., Pharaoh Triumphant: The Life and Times of Ramesses II, King of Egypt, Warminster: Aris and Phillips, 1982

Saldarini, Anthony, Jesus and Passover, New York: Paulist, 1984

Sarna, Nahum M., Exploring Exodus, New York: Schocken, 1986

Passover is the festival of redemption and renewal: it marks the start of the biblical year, and it is associated with a story that may be considered the beginnings of Jewish communal history. The holiday is an identification with the events of the Israelites' enslavement in Egypt and, more specifically, with their exodus. God is portrayed in the Passover story as directly intervening to enable the Israelites' liberation, while, on a more secular level, Moses is the hero of the exodus, acting as God's prophet and undertaking the Herculean task of releasing the Hebrews from their bondage. The main ritual of Passover is the recitation of the story of Egyptian enslavement, particularly to inculcate in the young a sense of obligation to God the emancipator; that ritual emphasizes the act of redemption and includes a presentation of various symbolic foods related to the drama of the exodus.

GASTER focuses on the remote origins of Passover, arguing that it can be traced to an ancient pattern of seasonal rituals that celebrate the beginning of the agricultural year. The author maintains that the central feature of the entire ancient ceremony is a common meal eaten by all members of a family at full moon; indeed, the Israelite writers who describe the tradition warn that those who abstain from the ritual will cut themselves off from the rest of the people. Gaster contends that the real significance of Passover lies in the idea of freedom: as the holiday celebrates the physical and social emancipation of a particular people from bondage, it becomes a festival celebrating the ideal of liberty. Additionally, Gaster posits that, while family reunion and celebration are essential to the holiday, it is also important to understand the role of the supernatural in this particular tradition. God is clearly united with humans during the recitation of the story of the exodus, and the Passover feast of reunion seeks divine alliance and assistance in the coming year. Gaster describes the essence of the seder recital and ritual; he recounts the narrative text of the Haggadah, which is based on the story of the escape of the Israelites from Egypt as summarized in the Book of Deuteronomy, and he traces the history of the Haggadah from its probable origins in the first century C.E. through its completion in the 15th century.

BOKSER dedicates his book to the origins of the seder and particularly to its relation to Mishnah Pesahim chapter 10; he focuses his argument on the authors of that Mishnah and their understanding of the Passover evening celebration.

Bokser contends that the seder exemplifies the rabbis' "program for a religious life without a central cultic temple," for the participants in the seder ritual manage to accomplish in the home practices that are full of cultic meaning. Although he primarily emphasizes the Mishnah and the efforts of the rabbis to restructure the rites and ideological meaning of Passover, the author also examines how the wider Hellenistic environment may have affected the seder and its rituals, particularly the emphasis on banquets and fraternal meals. Finally, Bokser analyzes the meaning of the prescribed recitation of the exodus experience, suggesting that the ritual is an intellectual experience for adults as well as children. Moreover, he notes that the various blessings included in the Passover Haggadah deepen the practitioners' sensitivity to the divine dimension of the event.

SALDARINI interprets the significance of Passover in a Christian framework. He identifies descriptions of Passover in the New Testament, specifically reviewing the possibility that the Last Supper was a Passover meal, but he cautions that the New Testament references should not be viewed as descriptions of a Jewish holiday. The gospels do not portray the Passover meal as a celebration of the exodus; instead, they reinterpret the ritual to relate it to Jesus' death and the future of Christianity. Thus, the unleavened bread that symbolizes deliverance in the original story becomes the salvational body of the Messiah, and the wine becomes his sacrificial blood, the sign of redemption. Saldarini demonstrates that early Christians did not focus on the exodus; rather, he contends that they converted the Last Supper into an event that anticipated the salvation of the community. The gospels concentrate their attention on Jesus' death as a permanent sacrifice and his message to his disciples that they must await the coming salvation. By comparison, the rabbis suggested that by eating the Passover meal, the Jews were partaking in the experience of salvation.

In a study that accepts the basic historicity of the events remembered in the Passover celebration, SARNA investigates distinctive themes and motifs in the Book of Exodus. He posits, that, unlike the gods of the pagans, the God of Israel is outside and above nature; thus, God uses the plagues depicted in the exodus story to illustrate his supernatural power. Sarna also argues that the text introduces God as an entity that cannot be defied by humans, even though they do have free will, and he explores how the Book of Exodus demonstrates that history is not haphazard and accidental; rather, it unfolds as God's grand design to redeem humans from injustice and oppression. Sarna explains, too, how the exodus affects the religious calendar and ritual practices of Israel: the new year begins in the spring; the sabbath is linked to the Israelites' liberation from Egypt; and foodways are related to that great event. Finally, Sarna asserts that the motif of the exodus serves as a motivation for ethical behavior, for God's redemptive acts require that humans imitate him and attempt to live justly.

Like many other scholars, KITCHEN notes the very strong written and oral exodus traditions related to the celebration of Passover and its many rituals, and he argues that these traditions are sufficient proof that the exodus story is grounded in historical fact. He admits that there is no independent historical evidence to verify the biblical story of the plight of the Israelites and their exodus, but he claims that there is sufficient evidence in the text of the Book of Exodus to speculate that the events did in fact occur in Egypt. He contends that the book demonstrates an understanding of uniquely Egyptian labor and magic practices, and he posits that the exodus route described in the text fits very well with other geographical descriptions of the region from the 13th century B.C.E. Also, the status of Moses suggests a cosmopolitan New Kingdom environment for the story, and the various techniques associated with the building of the tabernacle and the portable ark also appear to be Egyptian in origin, dating from the late second millennium B.C.E. Kitchen argues that the fact that there is no Egyptian record of the exodus or of the Israelites proves nothing, because the Egyptians would not necessarily have recorded a loss of the magnitude that the Book of Exodus describes.

For Kitchen, the presence of so many Egyptian references in the book not only suggests that the book has some historicity, it also reflects a literary triumph for Pharaonic culture. While the Israelites claim the moral high ground and exhibit military might, Kitchen proposes that the textual evidence shows that Exodus historians were deeply affected by Egyptian influences.

ITA SHERES

See also Haggadah, Passover

Patriarchate

Alon, Gedalia, Toldot ha-Yehudim be Erets-Yisra'el bi-tekufat ha-Mishnah v'ha-Talmud, 1980; translated by Gershon Levi as The Jews in Their Land in the Talmudic Age (70–640 C.E.), 2 vols., Jerusalem: Magnes, 1980–1984; Cambridge, Massachusetts; Harvard University Press, 1989

Avi-Yonah, Michael, The Jews of Palestine: A Political History from the Bar Kokhba War to the Arab Conquest, Oxford: Blackwell, and New York: Schocken, 1976

Goodman, Martin, "The Roman State and the Jewish Patriarch in the Third Century," in The Galilee in Late Antiquity, edited by Lee Levine, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1992

Levine, Lee I., The Rabbinic Class of Roman Palestine in Late Antiquity, Jerusalem: Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi, and New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1989

Mantel, Hugo, Studies in the History of the Sanhedrin (Harvard Semitic Series, 17), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1961

There is no single book in English that focuses exclusively on the history of the Jewish patriarchate, but several works dealing with the history of Palestine in the rabbinic period provide extensive albeit often diffuse discussion of the patriarchal office, usually noting its relationship to the world of the talmudic sages. There are two major groups of sources on the Jewish patriarchate. Rabbinic texts by and large reflect the situation of the second and third centuries C.E. and depict the patriarchs essentially as talmudic sages wielding considerable administrative power. Roman and Byzantine sources stem from the late third through the fifth century C.E. and concentrate on patriarchal status in relation to the imperial government. Both the chronology and the content of these sources can be contradictory, creating difficulties for contemporary scholars. Modern historians have tended to regard the patriarchs as part of the rabbinic elite, almost always relying on the rabbinic texts and their view of patriarchs as the starting point for historical analysis. The works of Avi-Yonah and Mantel reflect this more traditional way of understanding the place and function of the patriarchate in Jewish society. Both authors depict the patriarch as wielding centralized power over Jewish communities in both Palestine and the diaspora, and they contend that the office represented the Jews in dealings with the Roman government and also supervised judicial appointments on the local level. This view has been substantially challenged in recent studies, however, which tend to downplay the role of the rabbis in general, and that of the patriarch in particular, in running Jewish communities of that period. Instead, the revisionist scholars suggest that from the very beginning Jewish communities had a considerable autonomy that they struggled to preserve. The consequences of this approach for the study of the patriarchate are especially clear in the works of Goodman. In recent years the more traditional approach has been steadily abandoned because of serious methodological problems.

ALON discusses various issues pertaining to the early history of the Jewish patriarchate (second and third centuries C.E.). He maintains that the office of the patriarch originated immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in 70 C.E. He also argues that Rabban Johanan ben Zakkai was the first person to exercise the functions of patriarch, subsequently stepping down in favor of Rabban Gamaliel from the dynasty of Hillel. The author discusses the alleged patriarchate of Rabban Johanan in some detail, paying special attention to Jewish opposition to his rule and the reasons for his ultimate replacement by Rabban Gamaliel. Although Alon clearly recognizes the contradictions and inconsistencies contained in the stories about Rabban Johanan, he still contends that one can use these tales as historical sources. This work is therefore important because it represents one of the rare attempts to evaluate rabbinic sources critically without completely rejecting them as historically unreliable. Alon depicts the rabbinic movement as by no means unanimous; rather, he asserts that it consisted of various, often antagonistic, factions. As a result, he analyzes the patriarchate as part of the complex of relationships among the different groups of the Jewish population in Palestine.

AVI-YONAH describes the history of Palestine in the second through seventh centuries C.E. and devotes a significant part of his book to the analysis of the Jewish patriarchate. He singles out two main periods in its history. The first started immediately after the Bar Kokhba rebellion with the election of Simeon ben Gamaliel as patriarch. According to Avi-Yonah, it was Rabban Simeon, rather than Judah the Patriarch, who took the crucial steps toward becoming an absolute ruler of the Jewish people. In many respects, the rule of Rabbi Judah the Patriarch resembled that of a king. He had absolute authority to appoint judges in the Jewish community, and he wielded power not only in Palestine but also in the diaspora. During this period, the interests of the patriarch and the rabbis usually coincided, and in fact the former helped to secure rabbinic authority among the Jewish people. During the second period, which started in the middle of the third century, patriarchal power considerably decreased. The ordination of judges passed from the patriarchs to the Sanhedrin, comprising the leading sages of that time. The sages took over leading positions at the court and often rebuked patriarchs for their incompetence. The abolition of the patriarchate was caused by the attempts of the Christian imperial government to undermine Jewish positions in Palestine and to further conversion among the Jewish population of the empire. Despite his extensive use of sources, Avi-Yonah's work is very much out-of-date in terms of its methodology. It is based on the uncritical assumption that the rabbis were in charge of communal life in Palestine from the third century on. The patriarchate is seen as first and foremost a rabbinic institution, inaugurated by the decision of the Sanhedrin and afterward carefully supervised by scholars. Avi-Yonah accepts the idea of a highly centralized Jewish government in this period, with administrative power concentrated in the hands of the patriarchs and legislative power held by the Sanhedrin. His picture of the activities of the Roman government is overtly polemical and one-sided. Avi-Yonah clearly favors rabbinic narratives and usually accepts them as historically reliable.

GOODMAN has called into question a number of assumptions usually made about the patriarch. He does not think that sufficient evidence supports the hypothesis that the rise to power of the patriarchs occurred earlier than the time of Judah the Patriarch (who is the first patriarch about whose status we have indisputable information), and he argues that even in the cases of Judah the Patriarch and his third-century successors, the power wielded by the patriarchs and their courts was far from absolute. Goodman doubts whether the office of patriarch was officially recognized by Roman authorities prior to the fourth century, asserting that before the reign of Constantine, the Romans tended to turn a blind eye to the activities of the patriarchs, regarding them as unofficial leaders of the Jews. Goodman also questions whether patriarchs ever supervised such essential administrative tasks as the collection of taxes. Instead, he posits that the power of the patriarch was largely based on his economic standing as a rich landowner and his recognition within the Jewish community. Goodman maintains that the social structure of ancient Galilee was, as a whole, based on relatively independent and self-sufficient rural communities, which opposed any interference in their affairs either by the Galilean cities or by the patriarchs. Hence, he concludes that one should not exaggerate the power of the patriarch even within Galilean Jewish society, let alone in the diaspora. Goodman's approach reflects tendencies in modern scholarship to critically revise previous claims about uncontested and centralized rabbinic leadership in Palestine in the third through the fifth centuries.

LEVINE offers one of the most recent attempts to synthesize the history of rabbinic Judaism in Roman Palestine. He devotes a significant part of his book to the discussion of the role of the patriarchs in Jewish society, concentrating on their standing relative to the sages, as well as to the local Jewish aristocracy. The scope of Levine's work is limited to the third century C.E., although he makes occasional reference to later periods. As a result, he uses rabbinic texts as his major sources, checking them now and again against later non-rabbinic material. According to Levine, the patriarchs were crucial throughout the period under discussion. They wielded considerable power in Jewish internal affairs both in Palestine and in the diaspora, and they granted appointments to the sages, fixed the Jewish calendar, and collected taxes for the Roman government. At the same time, individual sages (such as Rabbi Johanan) played a prominent role at the patriarchal court: supervising appointments, advocating the interests of other sages before the patriarch, and furthering patriarchal interests among the sages. Despite occasional quarrels between patriarchs and sages, the relationship between them was one of close cooperation. In terms of social status, however, the patriarchs were part of the rich, urban aristocracy, maintaining close and amicable contacts with others of this class. For the period under discussion, Levine calls into question the very existence of the Sanhedrin, which has been seen as an alternative source of power rivaling that of the patriarchs, and thus denies that there was any sustained rabbinic opposition to patriarchal rule. As a result, the patriarchate becomes in his account the one and only central Jewish institution of that period, acting on the behalf of the rabbinic sages, as well as the lay Jewish aristocracy.

MANTEL analyzes the history of the patriarchal office in terms of its relationship to the Sanhedrin, examining interactions between these two bodies of Jewish self-government and their respective roles in running Jewish communal life. The author considers a tremendous volume of material, but his final conclusion does not go beyond the fact that "the relations between the Nasi and the Sanhedrin were highly complex." He observes that their functions often overlapped, thus causing friction between the two institutions. According to Mantel, the patriarch wielded exclusive power to appoint the sages, intercalate the calendar, excommunicate, lift bans of excommunication under certain circumstances, and collect funds. The patriarch maintained his influence in the diaspora by sending his messengers to collect funds and preside in the courts if necessary. Mantel portrays the Jewish leadership of that period as highly centralized, placing both Palestine and the diaspora (with some reservations) under the sway of patriarchal authority. The Nasi firmly belonged to the class of rabbinic scholars and as such participated in sessions of the Sanhedrin, whose functions and standing relative to the patriarch Mantel fails to determine. As a whole, Mantel's research strongly reflects a romantic perception that late antique Jewish society in Palestine was ruled by scholars. Mantel does use non-Jewish sources, but he derives his conclusions largely from the rabbinic material without calling into question this material's basic reliability. Therefore, the methodological value of his work is highly questionable. On the other hand, the number of accumulated and analyzed sources (both rabbinic and Roman) makes this book extremely valuable for any new research in the field.

Paul and Judaism

- Boyarin, Daniel, A Radical Jew: Paul and the Politics of Identity (Contraversions, 1), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994
- Davies, W.D., Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology, London: S.P.C.K., 1948; 3rd edition, London: S.P.C.K., 1970; 4th edition, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980
- Hengel, Martin with Roland Deines, The Pre-Christian Paul, Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, and London: SCM, 1991
- Hengel, Martin with Anna Maria Schwemer, Paul between Damascus and Antioch: The Unknown Years, Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster John Knox, and London: SCM, 1997
- Montefiore, Claude, "The Genesis of the Religion of St. Paul," in his Judaism and St. Paul: Two Essays, London: Goschen, 1914; New York: Dutton, 1915
- Sanders, E.P., Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion, Philadelphia: Fortress, and London: SCM, 1977
- Sanders, E.P., Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983; London: SCM, 1985
- Sandmel, Samuel, The Genius of Paul: A Study in History, New York: Farrar, Straus and Cudahy, 1958
- Schoeps, H.J., Paulus: Die Theologie des Apostels im Lichte der jüdischen Religionsgeschichte, 1959; translated by Harold Knight as Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History, Philadelphia: Westminster, and London: Lutterworth, 1961
- Segal, Alan, Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1990, new edition, 1992
- Stendahl, Krister, "The Apostle Paul and the Introspective Conscience of the West," Harvard Theological Review, 56, 1963; reprinted in Paul among Jews and Gentiles, and Other Essays, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976; London: SCM, 1977
- Westerholm, Stephen, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: Paul and His Recent Interpreters, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1988

During the present century many scholars have challenged the common view of an irreconcilable opposition between Paul's inherited Judaism and his eventual Christianity. Several leading Jewish authors have attempted sympathetic readings of Paul as a Jew, while Christian Paulinists strive to leave behind a jaundiced outlook on Judaism.

MONTEFIORE was a Jewish liberal who, at the dawn of the 20th century in Britain, broke with tradition and expressed admiration for Paul. Although modest about his learning—his gentlemanly prose breezes along with only occasional erudite references or footnotes—his monograph-length essay swept aside ancient Jewish-Christian polemics and prepared the ground for fruitful dialogue among Pauline specialists of both faith communities. It has been immensely influential. After castigating Jewish and Christian contemporaries for lack of mutual sympathy, the essay asks against which form of first-century Judaism did Paul react. A summary of talmudic religion follows, designed to lay to rest Christian distortions of rabbinic Judaism based on Paul's epistles rather than on living experience. A rabbi of 500 C.E. would have viewed God as warm and close, the Torah as a gift and a privilege, the commandments as a joy to keep, and human failings as reparable by prayer and repentance. To judge from Paul's views on corresponding points, the apostle could not have known such a happy religion prior to his conversion. Paul must therefore have been raised in a poor kind of Hellenistic Judaism. Like many Christian scholars of the "history of religions" school of thought, Montefiore held that Paul gathered many of his Christian ideas from paganism.

DAVIES's work, a landmark in the field of Pauline studies (passing through four editions), was created in the middle of the 20th century, when "history of religions" scholars were turning from pagan Hellenism to Palestinian Judaism, Hellenized to some degree, to mine for parallels that might shed light on Paul. An opening chapter sharply questions Montefiore's thesis that Paul was unfamiliar with Pharisaism, as well as its underlying assumption that the rabbinic, apocalyptic, and Hellenistic types of Judaism were clearly distinct. The chapters that follow isolate important Pauline concepts such as the flesh and sin, Adam, Christ as the divine Wisdom, the Spirit, the atonement on the cross, and the resurrection, and find corresponding categories in rabbinic writings. Davies, a Christian, concludes that Paul was basically a Pharisee who never gave up his rabbinic modes of thought even after he became convinced that the messiah had come in Jesus.

SANDELMEL offers a wide-ranging, nontechnical, careful study of Paul by a prominent Jewish historian of religion and expert on Philo of Alexandria. Paul was a Jew of the diaspora, concludes Sandmel, but contrary to the opinion of Montefiore this does not imply a negative value judgment about Paul's Judaism. Neither Philo nor Paul absolutized the Torah, although Paul's reason for limiting it was a personal (and un-Philonic) chafing under its demands (Romans 7). Disputes with Palestinian Christians who held to the eternal validity of the Torah colored some of the apostle's more bitter statements on the subject. In spite of his mistakes, Paul remains a genius whose positive legacy was a powerful critique of institutionalized religion of all forms and a championing of the rights of the individual conscience.

STENDAHL's now classic essay was first published in Swedish in 1960. Himself a Lutheran minister (later briefly a Swedish bishop) and a Harvard academic, Stendahl boldly critiqued the Reformation notion of Paul as Luther's prototype. Because Paul, looking back, could say that he had been "as to righteousness under the Torah blameless" (Philippians 3:6), his conversion, argues Stendahl, was not in fact motivated by a tormented conscience before God, but by an objective call to preach Christ to the gentiles. On this showing, the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith apart from works of Torah was an answer, not to the soteriological problem of how sinful humanity can find a gracious God but to the missionary problem of how gentiles as such, without undergoing proselytization, can have full status among God's people. The essay engages with secondary literature in footnotes but was first delivered as a lecture to the American Psychological Association and remains, in revised form, accessible to the nonspecialist.

In SCHOEPS's scholarly monograph, a fully equipped Jewish historian of religion seeks to put something like Montefiore's general outline in a more scientific context. The product has been widely hailed as a major contribution to Pauline studies. The complete round of possible religious influences on Paul are surveyed—mystery religions, Gnosis, Hellenistic Judaism, Palestinian exegesis, and apocalyptic ideas—and none excluded, although Paul is seen as a diaspora Jew. Overall Schoeps shows by detailed comparisons how “the theology of the apostle Paul arose from overwhelmingly Jewish religious ideas.” The two exceptions, decisive for Paul's break with mainline Judaism, were his Christology and his view of the Torah. Paul's idea of a divine redeemer is alien to Judaism and finds its natural antecedents in pagan myths. The (mis)translation of torah in the Greek Septuagint by nomos (“law”) and of berit by diatheke (“disposition”) obscured for Paul the Jewish view of the divine-human covenant as a reciprocal relationship within which performance of the commandments takes on its meaning, and it left Paul free to oppose the saving covenant to the killing letter of the Law. When the Christian Church adopted Paul as its theological fountainhead, its misunderstanding of Judaism was fated from the beginning.

SANDERS (1977), building on the work of Davies, was the chief catalyst in bringing about the current “new perspective” on Paul among New Testament scholars and won for its author, who describes himself as a secularized Protestant, a deserved place in the front rank of his field. Although few of its main points were new, Sanders documented his case with a range and a vigor, and he took his colleagues to task with a vehemence that seized their attention and inaugurated a paradigm shift in mainline Anglo-American New Testament scholarship. The book is a comparative study of the way to salvation in ancient Judaism and Christianity. Nearly three-quarters of its 550 pages are devoted to Jewish sources dating from between roughly 200 B.C.E. and 200 C.E., presented with a view to demolishing a caricature of Judaism that had established itself in Germany through the influence of F. Weber, E. Schürer, W. Bousset, R. Bultmann, and others and erecting in its place a construction drawn from the sources themselves. This is the part of the book that has made its mark. Gone is the view of Judaism as a religion of works-righteousness wherein a fearful human suppliant performs the commandments to earn merit and wrest favors from a cold, calculating deity; instead Judaism appears much as Jewish apologists such as Montefiore or Christians such as G.F. Moore had long been presenting it. In comparing patterns of religion, Sanders asks of Judaism and of Christianity respectively what it takes to get into the divine-human covenant and to remain within it. He concludes, broadly speaking, that in either religion one gets in by divine grace (election) and stays in by good works. On that score, he thinks, there was little difference between Hillel and St. Paul. Thus for Sanders the question becomes acute why Paul turned from Judaism to Christianity. He supposes that Paul had no complaint about Judaism. Rather, taking Christ and especially the cross as his starting point and reasoning backward from solution to plight, Paul came to hold that salvation is solely in Christ.

SANDERS (1983) expands on Paul's tension with his fellow Jews. Insisting on a distinction between Paul's arguments and his real reason for conversion, Sanders produces a Paul who basically criticized his kinsmen for two things: lack of faith in Christ and relegating gentiles to an inferior status outside of the covenant. Paul denounced the Torah not on the grounds that it led to self-righteousness or was unfulfillable, but only insofar as it was a symbol of Jewish exclusivism.

WESTERHOLM is a young Christian New Testament specialist. The first half of his technical monograph surveys 20th-century research into Paul's view of the Torah, judiciously selecting and reviewing contributions by W. Wrede, A. Schweitzer, C.G. Montefiore, H.J. Schoeps, W.G. Kümmel, K. Stendahl, R. Bultmann, U. Wilckens, E.P. Sanders, J.W. Drane, H. Hübner, and H. Räisänen. The second half of the monograph (with frequent Greek quotations and footnotes) gives Westerholm's own view. Westerholm adopts the post-Sanders new perspective on ancient Judaism, with the proviso that even after Christian accounts of Paul's ancestral religion have been purged of inaccuracies, Judaism remains more positive about human moral ability than Paul is. For Paul sin is an intractable, ontological trap, and therefore the failure of the Torah is really the failure of fallen human nature to perform it. Hence only God's grace, available through the atoning death of Christ, can undertake to provide a redemption in which humans cannot effectively cooperate under the mere letter of the Torah. This neo-Lutheran reading of Paul represents the measured reception that Sanders and his followers have found among German critics as well as in conservative Protestant circles in Britain and the United States.

SEGAL presents a fresh reading of Paul by a young Jewish historian of religion who has a special interest in describing varieties of early Judaism that after 100 C.E. got branded as heretical by the rabbis. Joining those who have abandoned theories of Paul's nurture in Hellenistic Judaism, Segal takes seriously Paul's own claims to have been a thoroughly trained Pharisee. He compares Paul's visions of the risen Christ to heavenly revelations reported by Jewish mystics in, say, the Merkabah tradition. A sociological model of conversion sheds light on the radical about-face that ensued for Paul's beliefs and community membership and goes far to explain many of Paul's extreme Christian positions. Perhaps Segal's most signal contribution is his methodological reclamation of Paul as a major source for understanding first-century Judaism as such in several ways. Parallels in Paul can warrant early dates for some otherwise undateable rabbinic traditions. Enough of the Pharisee remains in the apostle to enable scholars to ferret out, with care, data for pre-70 C.E. Pharisaism. Paul the apocalypticist and Christomystic, who never saw himself as anything other than a faithful Jew, illustrates one more fascinating item on the menu of pre-Orthodox Jewish options.

Two recent monographs on Paul with Martin Hengel as their principal author aim to correct lingering distortions of the older “history of religions” school. Hengel represents the most learned of moderately conservative but critical scholarship in his field. With a characteristic wealth of primary documentation and copious endnotes, Hengel combs over the Pauline corpus for tidbits about Paul's early life, conversion, and early development as a Christian, and he draws a portrait resting on the New Testament sources and credible in Paul's Greco-Roman-Jewish context. Hengel believes that the evidence, if not dismissed in favor of pet hypotheses, points firmly to Paul's having been raised by Aramaic-speaking, observant Jewish parents. Paul became a Pharisee under the guidance of Rabban Gamaliel in Jerusalem but broke from the moderation of his master in order to persecute zealously the fledgling Jewish-Christian movement on the charges that it questioned the permanence of Temple and Torah and proclaimed a crucified messiah. During this period Paul was confident in his Pharisean piety. Only an encounter with the risen Christ reversed his view of Jesus and provoked a rethinking of many details of his beliefs while leaving the Jewish structure of his thought intact. All the main features of Pauline theology derive from Hellenized Palestinian Judaism (HENGEL and DEINES), and not from some syncretistic religion of Tarsus or Antioch (HENGEL and SCHWEMER).

BOYARIN calls himself a talmudist and postmodern Jewish cultural critic. His concern is for justice toward marginalized persons, especially for Jews and women in western countries, and for Arabs in the state of Israel. Boyarin's utopia would be a multicultural society free of hierarchies, in which no group dominated another. Current obstacles to such a utopia are an ethnocentrism that excludes the Other, exemplified by Israeli policies, and a cultural imperialism that absorbs all and subordinates (or eradicates) people who persist in being genuinely different. The latter, typical of Christian culture, is the more dangerous error, for it led to the Holocaust, and Boyarin traces its roots back to Paul, admitting it runs contrary to Paul's own intentions. The essay is not a historical description of Paul as he was but rather a postmodernist conversation with Paul as the author reads him, one possible reading among others. Not because Paul himself says so, but because Boyarin considers it morally and politically urgent, the key to Paul is found in his statement that in Christ there is no Jew or Greek, neither male nor female (Galatians 3:28). Boyarin takes this to mean that Paul's gospel of universal salvation tended to obliterate people's peculiarities. Paul supported it by allegorizing the scriptures (e.g., circumcision becomes baptism) and by valuing the soul at the expense of the body. Paul, a Hellenistic Jewish monotheist, came to this position through an insight that Jesus is now the universal Lord, after a period of being troubled by Jewish nationalism and its lack of concern for gentiles. Hence Paul too was a cultural critic addressing Jews of his day from within Judaism, as he saw it. Even though Paul's Platonizing solution to the dilemma of universality and particularity unwittingly contained the seeds of antisemitism and so must be rejected, his profound wrestling with the issue can still challenge Jews to move toward a pluralism that retains Jewish identity but remains open to others. One chapter in Boyarin's work is devoted to a selective survey of recent contributions on the subject of Paul and Judaism by, among others, J. Gager, L. Gaston, J.D.G. Dunn, and F. Watson.

PAUL A. RAINBOW

Peace see War and Peace

Pentateuch

- Blenkinsopp, Joseph, The Pentateuch: An Introduction to the First Five Books of the Bible (Anchor Bible Reference Library), New York: Doubleday, and London: SCM, 1992
- Campbell, Antony and Mark O'Brien, Sources of the Pentateuch: Texts, Introductions, Annotations, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1993
- Carpenter, J. and G. Harford-Battersby, The Hexateuch According to the Revised Version, 2 vols., London and New York: Longmans, Green, 1900
- Cassuto, Umberto, Torat ha-te'udot ve-siduram shel sifre ha-Torah: Shemonah shi'urim, 1941; translated by Israel Abrahams as The Documentary Hypothesis and the Composition of the Pentateuch: Eight Lectures, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1961
- Crüsemann, Frank, The Torah: Theology and Social History of Old Testament Law, translated by Allan Mahnke, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1996
- Habel, Norman, Literary Criticism of the Old Testament (Guides to Biblical Scholarship), Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971
- Kaufmann, Yehezkel, Toldot ha-emunah ha-Yisre'elit, 1937; translated and abridged by Moshe Greenberg as The Religion of Israel: From Its Beginnings to the Babylonian Exile, Chicago: University of Chicago, and London: Allen and Unwin, 1960
- Knohl, Israel, Mikdash ha-demamah, 1992; translated by Jackie Feldman and Peretz Rodman as The Sanctuary of Silence: The Priestly Torah and the Holiness School, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1995
- Noth, Martin, Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch, 1948; translated by Bernhard Anderson as A History of Pentateuchal Traditions, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1972
- Rendtorff, Rolf, Das Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Problem des Pentateuch, 1977; translated by John Scullion as The Problem of the Process of Transmission in the Pentateuch (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 89), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1990
- Tigay, Jeffrey (editor), Empirical Models for Biblical Criticism, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985
- Wellhausen, Julius, Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel, Edinburgh: Black, 1885
- Whybray, R.N., The Making of the Pentateuch: A Methodological Study, Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1987

The Pentateuch is an unusually diverse anthology containing cultic ordinances, narratives, civil and criminal law, architectural directions, genealogies, travel itineraries, and poems. It invites many different types of analysis, and the scholarly approaches that have been applied to it are as varied as its contents. Consequently, the study of the Pentateuch must overlap many areas of biblical scholarship, such as the study of biblical narrative, the investigation of biblical law, and the history of Israelite religion.

BLINKINSOPP provides an excellent introduction to the wide-ranging field of modern Pentateuchal studies. His first chapter reviews the last two centuries of scholarship in a readable fashion. Subsequent chapters treat the structure of the Pentateuch as a whole, its major sections, and its overarching themes. Significantly, he does not limit his holistic reading to the narrative material (as many other scholars do), and he attends to covenantal and legal aspects of the work as well.

Pentateuchal scholarship in the last two centuries has been dominated by source criticism—that is, the attempt to identify the various documents or sources from which the Pentateuch is built and to use the study of those documents to understand how the religion of Israel developed. The most well-known source-critical theory is the Documentary Hypothesis, according to which four main documents comprise the Pentateuch (or perhaps the Hexateuch, since many scholars believe that the Book of Joshua was originally part of the literary collection that includes Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy). These sources are usually referred to by the sigla J, E, P, and D.

A readable introductory summary of the Documentary Hypothesis is found in HABEL (who refers to source criticism as “literary criticism,” by which he means the attempt to discover the literary sources of the Pentateuch, not the attempt to interpret its texts). He analyzes the first nine chapters of Genesis in order to exemplify how the theory works. Subsequently, he summarizes the salient characteristics and attitudes of the P and J sources. Habel does not, however, offer a detailed defense of the theory. His book allows the reader to become familiar with the main outlines of the Documentary Hypothesis but not to form an opinion as to whether the theory is accurate.

For a defense of the Documentary Hypothesis one can, however, turn to CARPENTER and HARFORD-BATTERSBY. The first volume of their work sketches the development of the theory in great detail, starting with medieval Jewish scholars who began tentatively to question whether the theory of Mosaic authorship was tenable, through the seminal work of Spinoza, and into the full flowering of the Documentary Hypothesis in the mid-19th century. Carpenter and Harford-Battersby then offer an extensive treatment of the evidence in favor of the theory, a description of the various sources (along with lists of their characteristic vocabulary), and a discussion of the redaction of the documents into the Hexateuch as we know it. The second volume consists of a translation of the Hexateuch in which the assignment of each passage, verse, or word to a source is made clear and is defended in considerable detail.

Not all scholars have accepted the classical Documentary Hypothesis in the form it took during the middle and late 19th century. NOTH doubts the existence of a five-part Pentateuch, arguing that Deuteronomy originally was written as an introduction to the historical writings in the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. While he agrees that the preceding four books (or Tetrateuch) were built from the J, E, and P sources, he does not always agree with his predecessors regarding the nature and extent of those sources. Moreover, he emphasizes the documents’ prehistory, and he attempts to reconstruct the traditions on which they were based. These traditions were often peculiar to a particular tribe or region; they were brought together at an early period of Israelite history and were then used as the basis for each of the written sources, which in turn were later combined to form the Tetrateuch and Deuteronomy.

A synopsis of Noth’s source-critical theory is given in the convenient work by CAMPBELL and O’BRIEN, which presents translations of Noth’s P, J, and E separately, along with discussion of each. Campbell and O’Brien disagree with Noth on several points: for example, they point out that E has a great many gaps, and therefore they (like many other scholars) view E not as a separate source but as a supplement to J. They emphasize the use that Noth’s source-critical model has for a literary reader—for one who looks at the patterns and ideas in the final form of the Torah, which (they assert) achieves unity from its diversity.

RENDTORFF represents a more radical break from the Documentary Hypothesis. He follows Noth and others in emphasizing the history of traditions underlying the Pentateuch and concludes that a traditio-historical analysis in fact undermines the notion that one can find four main sources that run from beginning to end of the Pentateuch or Tetrateuch. Rather, the main thematic and narrative units (such as the primeval history, the Abraham stories, and the Moses stories) arose independently and were combined to form the Pentateuch. A postexilic priestly editor added final touches; these editorial additions resemble but are far shorter than the classical P source.

Some scholars, especially of a more conservative bent, reject the source-critical model altogether. CASSUTO maintains that many contradictions noticed by source critics are not contradictions at all, and he wonders whether any texts in the ancient world were actually composed by the cumbersome combination of originally disparate documents; after all, no copies of J, E, P, or D have ever been found, and their existence is a matter of scholarly speculation.

Similarly, WHYBRAY argues that the Pentateuch was composed in the exilic period by a single author who used a very large number of older texts and traditions. Thus he suggests a fragmentary rather than a documentary basis for the Pentateuch, acknowledging that a redactor used older texts but denying that these older texts were discrete and recoverable wholes. Moreover, Whybray (like Cassuto) emphasizes the creative role of the redactor/author. The very fact that redactors put these texts together into a narrative whole shows that what appear to be inconsistencies to modern readers were not necessarily viewed as such by ancient readers, authors, and editors; consequently, one cannot be sure that an apparent contradiction or repetition really does show the existence of more than one author. Rather, modern readers need to become more familiar with the poetics of ancient narrative.

This line of reasoning, however, fails in light of careful attention to ancient Near Eastern texts and their literary history. TIGAY collects a number of studies that provide an empirical basis for the source-critical model. These studies show that ancient Near Eastern writers did produce new texts by combining older ones that are known to archaeologists. He shows, for example, that originally separate tales about Gilgamesh known from early-second-millennium Mesopotamian tablets were brought together to form the Old Babylonian Gilgamesh epic extant in tablets dating to the mid-second millennium. Subsequently, additional stories known from independent mythological texts (for example, the story of the flood, which is found as a freestanding narrative on various tablets) were added to the epic. As a result, the first millennium (or "Standard") copies of the epic differ significantly from the Old Babylonian version. The late or Standard version displays precisely the sort of terminological and stylistic variation that source critics claim to find in the Pentateuch, and those differences can be traced in the late text to their sources in the earlier texts. For example, the phrasing used to introduce a character's speech varies in the late epic. This stylistic variation might lead a source critic to suspect that two documents have been combined to form the late epic, especially since one form of phrasing appears only in sections dealing with the flood while the other never appears there. This source-critical hypothesis is confirmed by an examination of older documents: one form of phrasing appears consistently in the Old Babylonian epic, the other in the originally independent flood story. Tigay's work does not prove the existence of J, P, or E, but it does show that the sort of composition through combination and editing posited by scholars of the Pentateuch did occur in the world of ancient Israel, and it demonstrates that the editorial process left differences of wording and style in the original texts largely intact.

A central debate in Pentateuchal studies involves the dating of the P source, which seems to give structure to the Pentateuch as a whole and provides much of the Pentateuch's cultic and ritual material. WELLHAUSEN argues that P is the latest source and dates it to the exilic or postexilic period. He points out that P reflects the most highly developed (and hence the latest) legal and cultic system. This highly artificial system appears divorced from the agriculturally based and spontaneous religion of the pre-exilic era. Wellhausen's position is summarized in Carpenter and Harford. Others scholars (especially Israeli and Jewish ones) argue that P is the earliest source or that P was composed over a long period of time beginning as early as the premonarchic era. Highly developed legal and ritual systems, after all, are known from ancient Near Eastern cultures older than Israel, and Wellhausen's description of the P source as artificial and lacking spontaneity reflects his own religious prejudice rather than an ancient Israelite worldview. The classic exposition of this thesis appears in KAUFMANN; a more recent argument appears in Knohl (with important bibliographic references to other research on the dating of P). This debate does not merely pertain to one Pentateuchal source but has implications for the history and nature of Israelite religion. Scholars who date P to the exile imply (or assume) that the cultic and legalistic concerns of the Torah were not original to the religion of Israel; those who believe that P is early uphold the view that law and ritual were central to Israel's relationship with its God from the beginning of the nation's existence.

Many studies provide literary or exegetical analyses of the Pentateuch. Attention to the legal and cultic framing of the Five Books as a unit is less frequent but no less important given the predominance of legal and cultic material in the Pentateuch. KNOHL examines the tension between two strands within the priestly source. He shows that one older strand shuns popular forms of religion (which may be tainted by paganism), emphasizes the transcendence of God, and recoils from any form of anthropomorphism. Further, this austere strand argues that the cult must be practiced for its own sake, not for any hope of divine reward, and thus it separates morality from the cult. A later strand is more open to popular practices, which it reinterprets in a monotheistic fashion. It attempts to justify legal practices rather than seeing them as ends in themselves; it stresses the reciprocal nature of God's relationship with Israel and links morality and cult. Because priestly literature provides the framework for the Pentateuch, Knohl's analysis of the tension between these priestly schools has important repercussions for an understanding of the Pentateuch as a whole.

CRÜSEMANN also attends especially to the legal shape of the Pentateuch. He argues that the identification of the law with revelation at Sinai is a late development in the tradition-history of the Pentateuch. Much of his book examines the relationships among the four law codes found in the Pentateuch. While his dating of the codes is not novel, his attention to the social setting from which the codes arose is of particular interest. Thus the covenant code (Exodus 20:22–23:33) stemmed from northern Israel, while Deuteronomy was promoted by free landholders. Crüsemann argues that the Pentateuch as a whole combines contradictory materials in order to forge a united authoritative text for the post-exilic nation attempting to remain distinct while living under largely benign Persian rule.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Peretz, Isaac Leib 1852–1915

Polish Yiddish and Hebrew writer

Frieden, Ken, Classic Yiddish Fiction: Abramovitsh, Sholem Aleichem, and Peretz (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish Literature and Culture), Albany, New York: State University of New York Press, 1995

Howe, Irving and Eliezer Greenberg, "Introduction," in Selected Stories [of I.L. Peretz], New York: Schocken, 1974; London: Elek, 1975

Samuel, Maurice, Prince of the Ghetto, New York: Knopf, 1948; London: University Press of America, 1988

Wisse, Ruth R., "Introduction," in The I.L. Peretz Reader (Library of Yiddish Classics), New York: Schocken, 1990

Wisse, Ruth R., I.L. Peretz and the Making of Modern Jewish Culture (Samuel and Althea Stroum Lectures in Jewish Studies), Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1991

Yiddish and Hebrew poet and author Isaac Leib Peretz is, along with Mendele Moykher-Sforim and Sholem Aleichem, one of the three so-called "classic" Yiddish writers. Born in Zamosc, Poland, Peretz eventually settled in Warsaw, where he lived most of his adult life. Peretz made his literary debut in Yiddish in 1888 with the poem "Monish," after first writing in Polish and Hebrew. An experimenter in several different literary genres, Peretz is best known for his short stories such as "Bontshe the Silent" and "If Not Higher," and his plays The Golden Chain and At Night at the Old Market.

In his introductory survey of modern Yiddish literature and its three founding fathers, Mendele Moykher-Sforim, Sholem Aleichem, and I.L. Peretz, FRIEDEN discusses the place of Peretz in the Yiddish canon and his influence as a cultural activist, as the first writer of psychological fiction in Yiddish, and as the first exponent of Yiddish literary modernism. This book is a well documented and admirable introduction to the beginnings of modern Yiddish literature. Frieden gives a detailed chronology of events in the life of Peretz and a valuable interpretative survey of his works.

Literary critic and anthologist HOWE and GREENBERG, a Yiddish poet and critic, together assembled several volumes of Yiddish prose, poetry, and essays and did much to introduce Yiddish writers to an English reading audience. In this short yet valuable essay they offer useful biographical and analytical remarks on Peretz and consider his role as a cultural hero. Their work demonstrates a clear familiarity with both primary and secondary sources as they situate Peretz within the contexts of Jewish belles lettres and American and European literature. They view Peretz's later works, in particular his collections Hasidic and Folk Tales, as his best works and see his earlier stories as weak.

SAMUEL recreates some of Peretz's most famous stories, taken in particular from Peretz's books Hasidic and Folk Tales. He accomplishes this by retelling many of these stories through his own free translation and interpretation. The stories are interspersed with critical commentary and analysis.

WISSE (1991) argues the case for Peretz's central role in the creation of modern Jewish culture. Wisse posits that through his contribution to Yiddish literature, Peretz attempted to develop a creative and unifying tool for Jews, people with neither a land of their own nor collective political power. Wisse claims that Peretz wanted literature to fill these voids in Jewish life and to offer some form of empowerment. Wisse's careful analysis of Peretz's writings demonstrates a comprehensive knowledge not only of Peretz's oeuvre in Yiddish and Hebrew but also of the large corpus of secondary literature on the author. She examines the great influence of Peretz on succeeding generations of writers as well as the authority he wielded over a large segment of the Jewish people during his lifetime. Peretz was a humanist who believed that antisemitism could be overcome and rapprochement attained between Jews and gentiles. Through cultural advancement, Peretz believed that Jews could become more secular and therefore acceptable to the non-Jewish world. Wisse concludes that Peretz's optimism was belied and his influence curtailed by subsequent events: "While Peretz was shaping an earthly culture that outrivaled heaven's in its goodness, others were shaping an earthly culture that outrivaled hell's in its venom. The school children of Vilna and of all Poland were murdered with the words of Peretz on their lips."

WISSE (1990) is the introduction to an anthology of writings by Peretz in English translation, which forms part of Schocken's Library of Yiddish Classics, of which Wisse is the editor. Her introduction begins with the claim that "Isaac Leib Peretz was arguably the most important figure in the development of modern Jewish culture." Wisse explains that Peretz, the first Yiddish literary modernist, differed from the other two fathers of modern Yiddish literature in that he felt more of a need to express himself as an individual and break from the traditional Jewish collective. After a short yet comprehensive account of Peretz's formative years, Wisse turns to his writing and shows in particular his use of traditional Jewish sources, such as the Yiddish folktale and the hasidic story, as the tools of his literary craft.

MARC MILLER

Pharisees

- Baumgarten, A.I., "The Name of the Pharisees," Journal of Biblical Literature, 102(3), 1983
- Bowker, John, Jesus and the Pharisees, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973
- Cook, Michael J., Mark's Treatment of the Jewish Leaders (Supplements to Novum Testamentum, vol. 51), Leiden: Brill, 1978
- Goodblatt, D., "The Place of the Pharisees in First Century Judaism: The State of the Debate," Journal for the Study of Judaism, 20, 1989
- Neusner, Jacob, The Rabbinic Traditions about the Pharisees before 70, 3 vols., Leiden: Brill, 1971
- Saldarini, Anthony J., Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach, Wilmington, Delaware: Glazier, 1988
- Sanders, E.P., Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE–66 CE, Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, and London: SCM, 1992; 2nd impression with corrections, 1994
- Schwartz, D.R., "Josephus and Nicolaus on the Pharisees," Journal for the Study of Judaism, 14, 1983
- Smith, Morton, "Palestinian Judaism in the First Century," in Israel: Its Role in Civilization, edited by Moshe Davis, New York: Seminary Israel Institute of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1956
- Telford, W.R., "Review of Mark's Treatment of the Jewish Leaders, by M. Cook," Journal of Theological Studies, 31, 1980

The Pharisees were one of many Jewish sects that existed in Palestine during the late Second Temple period. Within the extremely variegated Judaism of the time, the Pharisees are perhaps the most widely represented Jewish group in extant sources. Indeed, two authors important for any reconstruction of the social and historical dimensions of Judaism, Flavius Josephus and Paul of Tarsus, claim membership in the Pharisaic party. Nevertheless, the available information on the Pharisees is quite sparse. Furthermore, the modern researcher faces the added difficulty of sifting through often conflicting accounts of the Pharisees presented in the three major primary sources: Flavius Josephus, the New Testament, and rabbinic literature.

BAUMGARTEN discusses the meaning of the name "Pharisees." Many scholars have supposed that the name derives from the Hebrew perushim, "separatists," in either an appro-bative or a derogatory sense. After a lexical analysis of the term akribeia, “accurate,” in the Greek sources, which is used in connection with the Pharisees by Josephus, the Acts of the Apostles, and Nicolaus of Damascus, Baumgarten proposes that the Hebrew root prs was probably understood by the Pharisees and their opponents as “to specify,” even if the root’s original etymology conveyed a different meaning. Thus, the Pharisees presented themselves as the “specifiers” to indicate that they could provide precise knowledge of the law. Baumgarten’s article may provide valuable evidence of the way that the Pharisees wanted to be seen by their contemporaries in an age when exact knowledge of the law was prized.

SMITH’s article is a seminal challenge to the scholarly consensus that the Pharisaic variety of Judaism constituted an orthodox or normative Judaism. According to Smith, the Pharisees were simply one of several sects—albeit the “largest and ultimately most influential”—that were competing for the attention of the unaffiliated majority. He notes that Josephus’s summaries of Pharisean influence and control are not substantiated by individual accounts. A critical rereading of Josephus, which takes into account the omission of any description of the influence of the party in his Jewish War (in contrast to Antiquities), suggests that Josephus was attempting to persuade the Roman authorities to entrust the leadership of the Jewish population to the Pharisees by overstating the latter’s influence. Similarly, Smith posits that the description of Pharisees in rabbinic literature needs to be reinterpreted in light of its distinct bias in favor of the Pharisees.

The rabbinic traditions about the Pharisees of the Second Temple period have been systematically collected and analyzed from redactional and literary-critical perspectives by NEUSNER. In his three-volume work, Neusner catalogs the types and forms of rabbinic traditions about the Pharisees and compares them with traditions about other groups in ancient Judaism. Neusner concludes that the rabbinic traditions pertain chiefly to the half-century that preceded the destruction of the Temple. At that time, the Pharisees were primarily a society for table-fellowship, which functioned as “the high point of their group.” This transition from a political party during the Hasmonean period to a table-fellowship sect was largely the work of Hillel, who directed the Pharisees into more passive and quiet paths, enabling them to survive the reign of Herod.

SCHWARTZ offers two theses that challenge the views of Neusner and others who argue that the Pharisees, who had been politically active in the Hasmonean period, withdrew from politics in the time of Herod and remained withdrawn until the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 C.E., after which they renewed their bid for political power. First, he insists that most of Josephus’s sources on the Pharisees can be attributed to Nicolaus of Damascus and were not created for propaganda reasons. Second, Schwartz asserts that the historians’ claims that the Pharisaic center at Yavneh was recognized by the Roman government and that negotiations for this recognition were carried on in the 90s “rest on virtually nothing.” In conclusion, Schwartz proposes that Josephus created his “incorrect but safe” portrayal of the Pharisees in his Jewish War as uninvolved in politics—and, therefore, uninvolved in rebellion—in the anti-Jewish political climate that immediately followed the First Jewish Revolt against Rome. By the time

Josephus wrote his Antiquities, the political climate was less hostile to Jews and, hence, Josephus felt freer to use other sources that indicated Pharisaic involvement in politics and even in rebellion.

GOODBLATT usefully summarizes the views of different scholars on the debate about the political influence of the Pharisees in first-century C.E. Judaism. He challenges Schwartz’s proposal that the very fact that Josephus in his Jewish War describes the Pharisees as the “first sect” implies that they exercised considerable political influence. In addition, he maintains (again contra Schwartz) that he can find no explanation of Gamaliel’s rise to power after 70 except that he received a Roman appointment. This thesis is based on his understanding of the Roman policy of interventionism in the internal affairs of subject peoples.

COOK applies source-critical analysis to the Gospel of Mark as he seeks to determine how familiar Mark was with different Jewish groups and how he obtained his information about them. Cook contends that the Evangelists themselves were unclear about the identities of the various Jewish groups, including the Pharisees, active in Jesus’ time. The Evangelists did not adequately define and distinguish between the different Jewish groups because they could not make such categorizations. The treatments of Jewish leadership groups in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke are essentially no more than preservation and occasionally free embellishment of the Markan account. Thus, the appearance of a given Jewish leadership element in the later synoptic gospels does not necessarily enhance current knowledge of that group or even confirm Mark’s assumption that such a group confronted Jesus during his ministry.

TELFORD, while agreeing overall with Cook’s case, challenges him in three areas. First, Telford disputes Cook’s argument that the Gospel writers could not have known about the Jewish groups in Jesus’ time. According to Telford, this conclusion is largely based on debatable presuppositions regarding the provenance of the synoptic gospels, including the unconvincing dismissal of the possibility of a Palestinian provenance for the Gospel of Mark. Furthermore, Cook’s suggestion that Matthew’s treatment of the leadership groups is simply an embellishment of the Markan account fails to take into account some distinctly Matthean passages that cannot easily be treated as revisions of Mark. Second, Cook’s claim to isolate specific controversial sources is based on one factor alone—the distribution of group titles—without taking linguistic and theological factors into account. Third, Cook’s assertion that “scribes” and “Pharisees” are synonymous fails to take into account the more difficult reference in Mark to “the scribes of the Pharisees.”

SANDERS’s substantial and sympathetic work on the practice and beliefs of Judaism in the late Second Temple period includes two chapters devoted to the history and practice of the Pharisees. He carefully distinguishes between the popularity of the Pharisees and their ability to control official and public events. When describing Pharisean beliefs, Sanders resorts to rabbinic literature, particularly tannaitic midrashim, thereby linking Pharisaism and Rabbinitism. Sanders concludes that the beliefs and practices of the Pharisees fit into a theological rubric of what he terms “covenantal nomism.” Sanders challenges the assumption by many earlier scholars that the Pharisees believed that the common people were excluded from the sphere of the divine and sacred. Rather, the “people of the land” were one step lower on the purity ladder than the Pharisees themselves, who were one step below the priests outside the temple.

BOWKER has conveniently collected all the primary references to the Pharisees from Josephus and rabbinic literature. Bowker intends his introductory book “to serve as a companion to studies of the Pharisees.” Included in his book is a very useful chapter on the problems of identifying the Pharisees in extant sources. Bowker’s great contribution is his reexamination of the scholarly assumption that the perushim of rabbinic literature actually do refer to the pre-70 C.E. Pharisees. It is, he contends, equally possible that the term perushim refers to individuals or groups who separated themselves in some manner but were not a clearly defined sect. In effect, Bowker questions the thesis that the perushim of the late Second Temple period were the ancestors of the rabbis of Yavneh and beyond.

SALDARINI dismisses the reconstructions of first-century Pharisaism by many scholars who have based their results on literary criticism without taking into account the social conditions in which Palestinian Jews lived under the Roman Empire. Challenging reconstructions centered on the rabbinic material, Saldarini notes that the tannaitic authors did not identify themselves as Pharisees. He assumes that, after the losses of the Temple, the Jerusalem leadership, and the clear political identity of Jews, there must have been major adjustments to the Jewish understanding of the world and to Judaism’s symbolic systems, behavioral patterns, and values. The scarcity of evidence about Pharisees in the primary sources means that the few references must be interpreted in a larger historical and sociological context, and this is precisely what Saldarini aims to do in his study. He concludes that the Pharisees were a literate, corporate, voluntary association that constantly sought influence with the governing class. Thus, Saldarini rejects Neusner’s description of the Pharisees as a sect-like table-fellowship. The Pharisee association probably functioned as a social movement seeking to change society and establish a new communal commitment to a strict Jewish way of life based on adherence to their covenant.

D.P. O’BRIEN

Philo of Alexandria c.20 B.C.E.–c.50 C.E.

Neoplatonist philosopher and Bible commentator

Belkin, Samuel, Philo and the Oral Law: The Philonic Interpretation of Biblical Law in Relation to the Palestinian Halakah (Harvard Semitic Series, vol. 11), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1940

Birnbaum, Ellen, The Place of Judaism in Philo’s Thought: Israel, Jews, and Proselytes (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 290; Studia Philonica Monographs, 2), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1996

Borgen, Peder, Philo of Alexandria: An Exegete for His Time (Supplements to Novum Testamentum, vol. 86), New York: Brill, 1997

Cohen, Naomi G., Philo Judaeus: His Universe of Discourse (Beiträge zur Erforschung des Alten Testaments und des Antiken Judentums, vol. 24), New York: Lang, 1995

Colson, F.H., G.H. Whitaker, and Ralph Marcus (translators), Philo in Ten Volumes (and Two Supplementary Volumes) (Loeb Classical Library), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, and London: Heinemann, 1929–1962

Goodenough, Erwin R., By Light, Light: The Mystic Gospel of Hellenistic Judaism, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1935

Goodenough, Erwin R., The Politics of Philo Judaeus: Practice and Theory, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1938

Goodenough, Erwin R., An Introduction to Philo Judaeus, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1940; 2nd edition, New York: Barnes and Noble, and Oxford: Blackwell, 1962

Haase, Wolfgang (editor), Religion: Hellenistisches Judentum in römischer Zeit: Philon und Josephus (Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt: Geschichte und Kultur Roms im Spiegel der neueren Forschung, part 2, vol. 21, section 1), New York: de Gruyter, 1984

Mendelson, Alan, Philo’s Jewish Identity (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 161), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988

Morris, Jenny, “The Jewish Philosopher Philo,” in The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, (175 B.C.–A.D. 135): Volume 3, Part 2, by Emil Schürer, revised and edited by Géza Vermès, Fergus Millar, and Martin Goodman, Edinburgh: Clark, 1987

Radice, Roberto and David T. Runia, Philo of Alexandria: An Annotated Bibliography: 1937–1986, New York: Brill, 1988, 2nd edition, 1992

Runia, David T., “How to Read Philo,” Nederlands Theologisch Tijdschrift, 40, 1986; reprinted in his Exegesis and Philosophy: Studies on Philo of Alexandria, Aldershot, Hampshire: Variorum, and Brookfield, Vermont: Gower, 1990

Runia, David T., Philo of Alexandria and the Timaeus of Plato (Philosophia Antiqua, vol. 44), Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1986

Runia, David T., “Philo in a Single Volume,” Studia Philonica Annual, 6, 1994

Sandmel, Samuel, Philo of Alexandria: An Introduction, New York: Oxford University Press, 1979

Sterling, Gregory E. (editor), Philo of Alexandria Commentary Series, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, forthcoming

Tobin, Thomas H., The Creation of Man: Philo and the History of Interpretation (The Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series, no. 14), Washington D.C.: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1983

Winston, David, Logos and Mystical Theology in Philo of Alexandria, Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1985

Wolfson, Harry A., Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (Structure and Growth of Philosophic Systems from Plato to Spinoza, 2), 2 vols., Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1947, 4th edition, 1968

Yonge, C.D. (translator), The Works of Philo: Complete and Unabridged, Peabody, Massachusetts: Hendrickson, 1993

Philo of Alexandria, also called Philo Judaeus, is the most prominent example in antiquity of a writer who brought together Jewish tradition and Greek philosophy. Some authors, in fact, have debated which influences are more predominant, the Jewish or the Greek. Well-acquainted with both Jewish and Greek culture, Philo has been considered from multiple perspectives—as a Greek philosopher, mystic, Jew, biblical interpreter, allegorist, and rhetorician, among others. Not only has Philo generated interest in his works for their own sake, but scholars have also been drawn to him for the light he sheds on such varied topics as Greek philosophy, the history of Judaism, Hellenistic and Roman culture, ancient Alexandria, Gnostic thought, the New Testament, and writings of the Church Fathers. In recent decades, studies on Philo have proliferated, leading some to speak of a “Philo renaissance.” As a result, those interested in Philo will find many resources at hand to assist their pursuits.

English-language readers can acquaint themselves with Philo’s writings in a 12-volume translation by COLSON, WHITAKER, and MARCUS. For those who would like Philo’s (nearly) complete works in one volume, YONGE is also available. This translation, however, is problematic for a number of reasons, as detailed by RUNIA (1994). At least one new English translation, edited by STERLING, is being planned, though this will likely not be published in its entirety for several years. This series will represent a collaborative effort by several scholars to publish translations of and commentaries on Philo’s writings. Whichever translation one uses, any student of Philo—whether novice or veteran—will benefit from consulting RUNIA’s article (1986a) on how to read Philo.

In the introduction to their indispensable annotated bibliography, which includes works from 1937 through 1986, RADICE and RUNIA describe the flourishing of Philonic scholarship in the late 20th century. The bibliography—which aims to be comprehensive, at least in English—is indexed according to authors, reviewers, biblical passages, Philonic passages, subjects, and Greek terms. Each year the bibliography is updated in a publication titled The Studia Philonica Annual. In this journal, readers will also find articles—generally in English—covering Philo from several points of view. Similarly, the volume edited by HAASE collects a number of essays in English on different subjects, providing a good illustration of the multifaceted approaches in Philonic research.

GOODENOUGH (1962) emphasizes the human factors involved in becoming acquainted with Philo—factors that pertain to Goodenough himself as the author, to the reader as a unique individual, and to Philo the man. Explaining his own predilections about religion, Goodenough views Philo as a mystic whose Judaism departed from “‘normative’ Judaism,” because Philo’s Judaism was influenced by “the pagan idea of salvation, that is, that the spirit be released from the flesh in order to return to its spiritual source in God.” Cautioning that any reader of Philo will view him in terms of his or her own personal proclivities, Goodenough offers some useful methodological guideposts. Among these is the need to pay attention to the context of Philo’s works, specifically their purpose and likely intended audience. Besides its emphasis on method, another strength of this introduction is its express purpose “of helping the beginner to make a start in an intelligent reading of Philo”; to this end, Goodenough suggests a program of reading to guide the learner through Philo’s various works. In other chapters, he discusses Philo as a political thinker, Jew, philosopher, and mystic.

GOODENOUGH (1935) sets forth the hypothesis for which he is perhaps best known, namely, that Philo was but one representative of a Hellenized, mystical Judaism, the goal of which was to rise above the created, material world in pursuit of knowledge of God, the Absolute. Arguing that Philo was writing for potential proselytes as well as for Jews, Goodenough spells out the details of what he calls the Jewish “Mystery,” based upon Philo’s allegorical commentaries. To support his contention that there existed a wider, non-“normative” Judaism, he supplements the evidence from Philo with a discussion of non-Philonic writings.

GOODENOUGH (1938) argues that Philo was strongly influenced by Hellenistic notions of the ideal king, though he stopped short of ascribing divinity to any ruler. Best known for his high esteem of contemplation, Philo was nevertheless also active in the political life of his Jewish community and often stressed the importance of cultivating both the practical and the theoretical life. Of special interest is the way Goodenough analyzes Philo’s works with an eye toward understanding their aims and audiences. For example, Goodenough uses this approach to explain why in one set of works Philo portrays the figure of Joseph as an arrogant politician, while in another set of works he depicts Joseph as an ideal ruler. Also, Goodenough concludes that Philo’s two extant political treatises (several others were lost) were written for non-Jewish rulers as a warning that their potential success or failure depended upon how well or badly they treated the Jews.

SANDMEL, writing some 40 years after Goodenough, his teacher, aims at a simpler presentation of Philo that incorporates scholarship from the intervening four decades. Sandmel focuses upon Philo’s use of allegorical interpretation, explaining that Philo viewed biblical narrative as an allegory of “the spiritual journey which each of us can make.” With this useful orientation, Sandmel guides the reader through Philo’s works and thought with additional chapters devoted to Philo and Palestinian Judaism, Philo and Gnosticism, Philo and Christianity, and a consideration of Goodenough’s position on Philo. While agreeing with Goodenough’s evaluation of Philo’s Hellenized mystical religiosity, Sandmel believes Goodenough went too far in positing the existence of a more widespread, marginal Judaism.

MORRIS’s extended essay offers a careful and worthwhile synthesis of scholarship through the mid-1980s on a variety of issues but especially on matters related to Philo’s individual treatises. She emphasizes that most of these treatises are commentaries on Jewish Scripture, a feature that underscores Philo's commitment to Jewish tradition. Noting that as an expositor of Scripture, Philo did not offer a systematic presentation of his ideas, Morris briefly comments on his most prevalent notions pertaining to God; divine intermediaries and the divine Logos; the creation and preservation of the world; theory of man; and ethics.

WOLFSON's Philo is very much a systematic philosopher whose Judaism was "of the same stock" as the Judaism of his Pharisaic contemporaries. Paying little heed to Philo's mystical side, Wolfson masterfully collects and organizes his positions on a wide array of philosophical topics, showing continuities and discontinuities with earlier and contemporary positions. As the finest representative of the Hellenistic Jewish endeavor to harmonize the truths of Scripture and philosophy, Philo, according to Wolfson, established a trend that was continued by the Church Fathers and medieval Jewish, Christian, and Muslim thinkers, to be overturned only centuries later by Spinoza. No one interested in Philo's philosophy can ignore Wolfson's work, but readers should keep in mind that Wolfson's systematization is more characteristic of his own way of thinking than of that of Philo.

WINSTON highlights both the philosophical and the mystical bents of Philo's writings. He focuses upon Philo's Logos concept, arguing that according to Philo one cannot approach God directly but only through the Divine Mind, or Logos. Describing Philo as "an unabashed Platonist," Winston sees the purpose of Philo's scriptural commentaries as "to trace the return of the human soul to its native homeland by means of the allegorical method of interpretation." Although the inherently individualistic mystical goal of knowledge of God through the Logos was supremely important to Philo, Winston also sees in his thought a tension between "nationalism and universalism, the mystical and the this-worldly."

RUNIA (1986b) recognizes in Philo a complex mixture of philosopher, exegete, mystic, and Jew, characterizing him primarily as a "philosophically orientated exegete of Scripture." Runia investigates in impressive detail the ways in which Philo understood and used the Timaeus of Plato. Concerned with the origins of the world, the Timaeus provided Philo with an important exegetical tool with which to understand and elucidate the structural framework and thought of the writings of Moses and to demonstrate the harmony between philosophy and Scripture. Acknowledging that Philo undoubtedly had Jewish exegetical predecessors, Runia calls him a pioneer who was the first to bring together "in a grand scale" Greek philosophical thought and the biblical view of God's activity in history.

TOBIN sees Philo as a scriptural exegete who was not completely original but stood within a tradition of interpretation. Based upon Philo's discussions of the creation of man in Genesis 1–3, Tobin identifies layers of interpretations with the aim of "sort[ing] out what is Philo and what is traditional material." While many scholars have recognized that Philo must certainly have used traditional elements in his writings, Tobin's work is significant for its effort to identify these elements and to correlate them with contemporary philosophical currents in Alexandria. He concludes that Philo's exegesis incorporates an earlier "consistent, Platonically oriented interpretation of the creation of man" and that Philo himself introduced the allegory of the soul, whereby events in the biblical account are understood to describe internal conflicts and activities within the individual, especially within the soul.

BORGEN portrays Philo as "an exegete for his time" by showing that his scriptural interpretations were integrally related to the contemporary political and social background and that they paralleled, in content and form, other ancient Jewish and Christian interpretations. According to Borgen, Philo's view that the Mosaic laws embodied the universal cosmic law suggested that the Jews had a universal purpose: to bring proselytes into the nation. In Borgen's detailed presentation of Philonic exegetical levels and forms, readers may find certain categorizations somewhat general and may wish for more discussion of the significance of identifying the forms. Nonetheless, Borgen's correlations between Philonic interpretations and contemporaneous political and social factors, while necessarily speculative at times, are frequently suggestive, refocusing our attention upon a valuable and often neglected dimension of Philo's writings.

MENDELSON explores Philo's identity as a Jew in relation both to other Jews and to non-Jews. Among Jews, Philo was an "elitist" who expounded the esoteric meaning of Scripture through allegorical interpretation, albeit for the benefit of anyone capable of understanding this meaning. Nonetheless he also remained deeply committed to the entire Jewish polity, and Mendelson outlines in noteworthy detail the beliefs and practices that would have constituted "the minimum requirements" for belonging to this Jewish polity. Responding to negative perceptions by non-Jews, Philo emphasized the openness and humanity of his people, Mendelson claims, but when speaking of pagan beliefs and practices, he adopted a sense of spiritual superiority.

BELKIN focuses upon Philo's knowledge of Jewish law, arguing that his interpretations are largely in accord with Palestinian tannaitic halakhah. In this opinion, Belkin stands apart from other scholars who emphasize the differences between Philo and the Palestinian rabbis on legal matters. The only book-length study on this subject in English, Belkin's work must be used with caution. Because he wrote before the Dead Sea discoveries, he does not include valuable sources for this period, and the later rabbinic works he does use are not infallible witnesses to first-century practices. Until it is replaced, however, this volume introduces English-language readers to an important issue in Philonic studies.

COHEN, like Belkin, compares Philo with Palestinian sources in an attempt to portray him as "thoroughly Jewish (in the traditional sense)." Positing what she calls the "Palestinian/Diaspora midrashic tradition," Cohen argues that Philo was familiar with this common treasury of Jewish interpretations—both legal and nonlegal. She also maintains that Philo used a special "Judeo-Greek vocabulary," the words of which carry specifically Jewish nuances alongside their generally accepted, and occasionally philosophical, meanings. Some, but not all, of Cohen's evidence is convincing. A recent example of the longstanding effort to establish a link between Philo and other Jewish sources, this book shows that effort to be worthwhile but challenging.

BIRNBAUM examines how Philo evaluated the importance of being a Jew in relation to the potentially universal, philosophical goal of “seeing God” and also to the biblical claims that God chose the particular nation of Israel to be his special people. Noting that Philo understood “Israel” to mean “one that sees God,” Birnbaum studies his different uses of the words “Israel,” “Jew,” and “proselyte,” as well as his approach to such notions as the covenant and the chosen people. In contrast to authors who assess Philo’s Jewishness by comparing him with other Jewish and Greek sources, Birnbaum focuses on Philo’s own thought to understand how and why Judaism was important to him. She concludes that for Philo, believing in, or “seeing,” God was paramount—a goal attainable by non-Jews as well as Jews. Although Philo’s special devotion to Judaism and the Jews was profound, this devotion, Birnbaum claims, is not ultimately explained by his thought, which emphasized a potentially universal goal, but by his life, which was clearly marked by an active concern for and participation in the particular community of the Jews.

ELLEN BIRNBAUM

Philosemitism

- Bevan, Edwyn R. and Charles Singer (editors), The Legacy of Israel, Oxford: Clarendon, 1927
- Braybrooke, Marcus, Children of One God: A History of the Council of Christians and Jews, London and Portland, Oregon: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1991
- Edelstein, Alan, An Unacknowledged Harmony: Philosemitism and the Survival of European Jewry (Contributions in Ethnic Studies, no. 4), Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1982
- Grose, Peter, Israel in the Mind of America, New York: Knopf, 1983
- Katz, David, The Jews in the History of England, 1485–1850, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1994
- Kobler, Franz, The Vision Was There: A History of the British Movement for the Restoration of the Jews to Palestine, London: Lincolns-Prager, 1956
- Lindemann, Albert S., The Jew Accused: Three Anti-Semitic Affairs (Dreyfus, Beilis, Frank) 1894–1915, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991
- Rappaport, Solomon, Jew and Gentile: The Philo-Semitic Aspect, New York: Philosophical Library, 1980
- Rubinstein, William D. and Hilary L. Rubinstein, Philosemitism: Admiration and Support in the English-Speaking World for Jews, 1840–1939, London: Macmillan, 1999

Philosemitism is a complex notion, but it may be defined as admiration for Jews by non-Jews as well as support for Jews by non-Jews during times of antisemitic oppression. There was an early, fairly well-examined tradition of Christian philosemitism from medieval times through the Enlightenment, which often emphasized tolerance for the Jews (or their restoration to Palestine) as a necessary prelude to the Second Coming. Philosemitism in the post-Enlightenment period stemmed from a variety of sources, especially from liberal and progressive activists and theorists, from many Christians, especially Protestants, from gentile Zionists, and from a surprising number of political conservatives who viewed the Jews as a worthy, time-honored elite group. The assumption that most philosemites have been Christian conversionists with an ulterior motive to their Jewish sympathies is naive: surprisingly early, many viewed Judaism as deserving of respect for being the ancestral religion of Christianity, while many Protestants associated antisemitism with medieval persecutions carried out by the Catholic Church, which they deplored.

Philosemitism is arguably a much more important phenomenon in the modern history of the Jews than is generally credited. For instance, the warmth of the United States government and most Americans for the State of Israel has its origins in a remarkable tradition of American support for Jewish resettlement in Palestine that predates the Herzlian Zionist movement by many decades; a similar tradition can be found in Britain. The centrality of antisemitism for modern Jewish history, culminating in the Holocaust, has regrettably caused the strength of philosemitism to be downplayed or, indeed, denied altogether. The subject of philosemitism remains exceptionally unexplored and manifestly underresearched and is one in which scholars have the opportunity of producing work of considerable importance and originality.

BEVAN and SINGER is a collection of 13 essays, mainly by non-Jewish British academics, about the Jewish contribution to Western civilization. Typical essays include “The Debt of Christianity to Judaism,” by F.C. Burkitt of Cambridge, and “The Influence of the Old Testament on Puritanism,” by W.B. Selbie of Oxford. A somewhat surprisingly early volume of its kind to come from the Oxford University Press, its essays are still valuable.

BRAYBROOKE surveys the history of the (British) Council of Christians and Jews. Founded in 1942 as a response to the Holocaust, it met early opposition from Roman Catholics and Orthodox Jews and in recent decades has faced considerable left-wing Christian opposition on account of Israel’s Palestinian policies. Nevertheless it has become a prime focus of Britain’s interfaith dialogue.

EDELSTEIN’s pioneering work appeared two years after Solomon Rappaport’s. It is a more comprehensive work, tracing philosemitism from the Middle Ages to the contemporary period and attempting an analysis. Its most provocative thesis is that the survival of the Jews in Europe depended in large measure on Christian admiration and support.

GROSE demonstrates the long-standing support given by American elites and opinion-leaders to the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine, support that long predates the Zionist movement. Founded in Protestantism and liberalism, it helps to explain America’s strong support for the State of Israel since 1948.

KATZ’s comprehensive history of the Anglo-Jewish community from the 15th to the mid-19th century summarizes the author’s important research on the role of philosemitism in the readmission of Jews to England by Oliver Cromwell in 1656 and discusses subsequent British philosemites. Its very complete bibliography refers to numerous other publications on this subject.

KOBLER's work was an early attempt to examine the long history of proto-Zionism by British gentiles, a tradition that was highly relevant to the promulgation of the Balfour Declaration in 1917. Kobler does not conceal the variety of motives among early restorationists, including conversionism, but also emphasizes its philosemitic aspects.

LINDEMANN's very controversial study of three celebrated antisemitic affairs of the 1894–1915 period (in France, Russia, and the United States) attracted both widespread praise and considerable hostility from critics. Lindemann emphasizes the ambiguousness of the allegedly antisemitic component of these incidents, as well as the real contribution of each of the protagonists to his own tragedy. Its relevance here lies in the author's pioneering study of the very wide philosemitic support received by Dreyfus, Beilis, and Frank, often from the most unlikely sources.

RAPPAPORT is probably the first modern account of philosemitism and its dimensions. The work, by a Vienna-born South African rabbi, consists of 11 essays on philosemitism, covering the medieval and modern periods. Useful distinctions are made, while the ambiguities in the stances of philosemites are not glossed over.

RUBINSTEIN and RUBINSTEIN analyze philosemitism in the English-speaking world since the Damascus Affair of 1840, based largely upon primary and contemporary sources. Their book examines the philosemitic response of many prominent gentiles during well-known antisemitic crises up to and including the Nazi period and offers a typology of philosemitism: liberal and progressive, Christian, Zionist, and elitist/conservative.

WILLIAM D. RUBINSTEIN

Philosophy: General

Blau, Joseph L., The Story of Jewish Philosophy, New York: Random House, 1962

Cohn-Sherbok, Dan, Fifty Key Jewish Thinkers (Key Concepts Series), London and New York: Routledge, 1997

Frank, Daniel and Oliver Leaman (editors), History of Jewish Philosophy (Routledge History of World Philosophies, vol. 2), London and New York: Routledge, 1997

Guttman, Julius, Philosophies of Judaism: The History of Jewish Philosophy from Biblical Times to Franz Rosenzweig, London: Routledge, and New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1964

Katz, Steven, T. (editor), Jewish Philosophers, New York: Bloch, 1975

Seeskin, Kenneth, Jewish Philosophy in a Secular Age, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990

Seltzer, Robert M., Jewish People, Jewish Thought: The Jewish Experience in History, New York: Macmillan, 1980

Historians of Jewish philosophy have two options: to survey, in chronological order, the work of individual thinkers or periods of thought through the centuries; or to focus on specific philosophical concepts central to Jewish thought and trace their development and relevance today.

BLAU's survey is a successful attempt to address, in clear and simple language, the interested layperson rather than the specialist. Instead of offering an in-depth study of selected issues, Blau presents the very broad range of Jewish philosophy with emphasis on "the continuities and changes that have taken place in Jewish philosophic thought from the Bible to the 20th century." The book's easy legibility does not preclude its seriousness, and it certainly covers much ground: the reader is taken from a discussion on the nature of philosophy itself and a comparison with biblical ethics, via an exposition of the wisdom of the prophets and the Jewish encounter with Hellenism, to rabbinic modes of thought and on to the Kabbalah. Also discussed are the great Jewish medieval philosophers, Renaissance thinkers, and Spinoza and how Enlightenment thought led to Reform Judaism and, eventually, to Jewish existentialism. This is a most useful introductory overview for the beginner.

Another introductory survey, quite different in style and content, is the panorama of 50 key Jewish thinkers (philosophers, theologians, kabbalists, and theoreticians of Zionism) presented in alphabetical order and selected by COHN-SHERBOK for their "importance in the history of Judaism from post-biblical times to the present day." This manual devotes no more than three pages to each of its 50 thinkers, and it is therefore primarily a reference book and of special interest to the layperson seeking a quick overview of a particular thinker. The summary of each thinker's work also contains a biographical sketch and select bibliography of primary and secondary sources.

Contributions on individual Jewish philosophers prepared as articles for Encyclopaedia Judaica (Jerusalem, 1972) have been collected and edited by KATZ into an illustrated, comprehensive history of Jewish philosophers, to which Katz himself has added a survey of Jewish thought since 1945. The glossary, biographical index, and bibliography will assist readers at an introductory level to engage the major Jewish philosophers as well as the theological traditions from which "the hybrid known as Jewish philosophy" emerged.

GUTTMANN's masterly critical history of Jewish philosophy has remained the standard work by a single author written for the serious student. Surveying the period from biblical times to Franz Rosenzweig, it aims at an impartial analysis and a methodological description of Judaism in terms of its correspondence to philosophical categories. Using philosophical tools to elucidate the content of Judaism, Guttman follows Immanuel Kant's demand for a separation of the religious concept of truth from the metaphysical concept of truth. This being the task of reason itself, Guttman's history of philosophy is essentially a history of rational Jewish philosophy. Certain to remain authoritative and indispensable, this survey not only provides a profound analysis of Judaism and its philosophies but also demonstrates how closely bound they remained to the non-Jewish sources from which they originated and drew much inspiration.

The recently published voluminous, comprehensive, chronological survey edited by FRANK and LEAMAN is bound to become a new standard work in the field, presenting in a collection of essays all major and minor philosophers of Judaism according to their respective schools of thought. The essays are written by an international team of experts and feature extensive bibliographies. Contributions range from a discussion of the nature of Jewish philosophy itself and its beginnings in the Bible to a forecast of its future. This substantial volume encompasses the whole range of Hellenistic, medieval, modern, and contemporary Jewish thought and covers present-day issues such as nationalism, Zionism, feminist and postmodern Jewish thought, and the Holocaust. Emphasis is given throughout to the dialectical interchange between Jewish ideas and influential non-Jewish sources in their parallel development. The result is a unique approach to the history of Jewish philosophy that covers an unprecedented variety of perspectives and ideas and helps significantly to establish Jewish philosophy as a discipline in its own right rather than as a mere addendum to Jewish religion or general philosophy. This is an indispensable reference book for serious study of Jewish philosophy.

SEESKIN offers a careful analysis of selected philosophical issues central to Jewish thought that addresses the notion of Jewish philosophy itself. He goes on to deal with past and present discussions of such issues as divine attributes, creation, revelation, the problem of evil and the Holocaust, the idea of God, and autonomy and ethics. The author's aim is to trace a dialogue between great Jewish and non-Jewish philosophers across the ages (Maimonides, Halevi, Spinoza, Cohen, Buber, Rosenzweig and Plato, Aristotle, Descartes, Kant, and Kierkegaard). He claims that this dialogue remains relevant and seeks to encourage secular philosophers "to pay more attention to Jewish philosophy and to get Jewish philosophers to pay more attention to secular philosophy." Although this problem-oriented study is clearly written, a reader with some background in both Jewish and secular philosophy is most likely to be stimulated and to benefit from the constructive solutions it offers.

SELTZER's voluminous contribution can best be characterized as a history of ideas of the Jewish people from earliest times to the present, documenting "periods of conscious encounter with the most sophisticated general modes of philosophy and scientific thought." The emphasis is clearly on the history, with the ideas themselves occupying a subordinate role. Yet this comprehensive study does offer a concise description of philosophical developments through the ages and may therefore serve as a useful introduction to Jewish philosophy by illuminating the historical framework that has shaped philosophical considerations over time.

ESTHER I. SEIDEL

See also Philosophy: Medieval; Philosophy: Modern

Philosophy: Medieval

Bleich, J. David (editor), With Perfect Faith: The Foundations of Jewish Belief, New York: Ktav, 1983
 Husik, Isaac, A History of Mediaeval Jewish Philosophy, New York: Macmillan, 1916, new edition, 1930

Hyman, Arthur and James J. Walsh (editors), Philosophy in the Middle Ages: The Christian, Islamic, and Jewish Traditions, New York: Harper and Row, 1967; 2nd edition, Indianapolis, Indiana: Hackett, 1983

Jacobs, Louis (compiler), Jewish Ethics, Philosophy and Mysticism (The Chain of Tradition Series, vol. 2), New York: Behrman House, 1969

Kellner, Menachem, Dogma in Medieval Jewish Thought: From Maimonides to Abravanel (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986

Lasker, Daniel J., Jewish Philosophical Polemics against Christianity in the Middle Ages, New York: Ktav, 1977

Sirat, Colette, A History of Jewish Philosophy in the Middle Ages, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985

There are different ways to approach medieval Jewish philosophy, which by nature is closely bound and subservient to religion. Histories of medieval Jewish philosophy provide surveys covering the whole spectrum of Jewish thought from the ninth to the 15th century in varying detail. Other studies are arranged according to the central issues discussed by Jewish medieval thinkers. The view that Jewish philosophy proper can only be identified as a phenomenon of the Middle Ages and that it never went beyond that period has been challenged by recent studies.

Since its first publication in 1916, HUSIK's "history of medieval Jewish rationalistic philosophy" has gone through a number of reprints and remains a popular work, both for the intelligent nontechnical reader and for the professional student. The discussion ranges chronologically from Isaac Israeli in the ninth century to Joseph Albo in the 15th century, covering all the major Jewish thinkers of the Middle Ages and aiming "to interpret their ideas from their own point of view as determined by their history and environment and the literary sources, religion and philosophy, under the influence of which they came." The result is a readable and objective, albeit not too critical, exposition, based largely on the study of the original sources, with a synoptic introduction and valuable conclusions as to the nature of Jewish philosophy, which, according to Husik, "never passed beyond the scholastic age."

A broader range of Jewish medieval philosophy, which includes the Italian Jewish philosophers of the Quattrocento, is expounded by SIRAT, who, in addition to the main discussions of the thought of the great Jewish medieval thinkers, also devotes much attention to lesser-known authors. Reflecting on the different and wider connotations the word philosophy comprised across the centuries, Sirat also includes in her discussion astrology and Kabbalah, for "as long as traditional texts were referred to in order to justify a philosophical doctrine . . . one can speak of Jewish philosophy." The comprehensive bibliography, together with lengthy quotations often from little-known works in manuscript, which are commented upon critically and placed within their historical and philosophical context, make this study not only a thorough introduction but also an indispensable reference tool for the serious student of medieval Jewish thought.

Anyone interested in a wider view of medieval philosophy in general, within which Jewish philosophy occupies only a part, should look to the volume edited by HYMAN and WALSH, which has become, since its first appearance in 1967, "a standard work for teaching medieval philosophy." This study is the result of a laudable attempt to focus on the large area of philosophical common ground between Christianity, Judaism, and Islam, exemplified to a great extent by their respective representatives of Neoplatonism and Aristotelianism. Although the section on Jewish philosophy only comprises Saadia, ibn Gabirol, Maimonides, Gersonides, and Crescas, the careful choice of primary sources not only offers a valuable introduction to each individual thinker but also reflects issues of general relevance to all three faiths, with discussions of such topics as causality, God's knowledge, and the divine attributes. This important anthology, although "not intended as a substitute for a fully fledged history of medieval philosophy," offers an understanding of the issues common to all three faiths and highlights their "different theological commitments" and their respective contributions to the philosophical discussion.

JACOBS's introductory study offers short selections in modern translation from the works of great medieval Jewish thinkers. It is subdivided into three sections, each prefaced by a short introductory note. The extracts are interspersed with Jacobs's own commentaries and interpretation, and the concise and clear language used throughout will help both the general reader and the beginner in their approach to medieval text study. The three sections focus, respectively, on ethics (which is defined in contrast to Jewish law and is represented here from ten different sources, chiefly from the Musar literature), philosophy (addressing creation, the concept of God, and free will), and mysticism. This last topic is often excluded from historical surveys of philosophy because of its highly speculative nature. Here it is introduced by the teachings of leading kabbalists, from the Zohar via the hasidic movement to A.I. Kook, exemplifying various "contemplative exercises on God's nature in His relationship to the created world."

"Representative selections from the writings of major medieval Jewish philosophers" are also at the heart of the volume edited by BLEICH. Although, regrettably, Bleich was obliged to use some older and less reliable translations of the material here presented, this collection of a wide range of primary sources provides a valuable text base for undergraduate students. Selections are organized around Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith and enable the student to draw comparisons between the arguments of the great medieval thinkers with respect to each of those principles: God's existence, unity, incorporeality, eternity and omniscience, prayer, prophecy, revelation, reward and punishment, belief in the Messiah, resurrection, and the immutability of the Torah. Bleich's introduction discusses the development of and opposition to dogmatic principles within Judaism, while the selections themselves are representative of the medieval systematic approach to the essential notions of Jewish belief still relevant today.

The systematic development of creed formulation in Judaism, initiated by Maimonides, is also addressed by KELLNER. Demonstrating the background against which Maimonides elaborated his principles and tracing their pervative influence, Kellner's study follows the responses to this challenge in the writings of Duran, Crescas, Albo, Abravanel, and a number of lesser-known figures down to the 16th century. This thoughtful book will appeal to philosophers and theologians alike, as it provides a successful argumentation that the dispute concerning the nature of dogmas or principles of faith "makes sense primarily in the context sufficiently influenced by Greek philosophical categories to understand the content of faith in propositional, not attitudinal terms." Kellner also addresses the reasons why philosophical reflection declined in popularity, and with it "Jewish dogmatics."

LASKER's study is a systematic investigation of Jewish anti-Christian literature. It examines the relationship between Judaism and Christianity from the perspective of the Jewish polemical literature of the Middle Ages that attempted to use tools of philosophy to cement faith and to refute accusations against it. Lasker carefully considers the various types of argument employed in a number of polemical sources. He examines the use of reason in religious debates and expounds various Jewish refutations of such key Christian doctrines as trinity, incarnation, transubstantiation, and virgin birth. The concluding chapter considers the role of philosophy in Jewish-Christian polemics and advances general conclusions about the nature of those polemics. With scholarly notes citing sources in their Hebrew and Arabic original, a comprehensive bibliography, and an index of citations, this is a masterly study of great benefit to anyone interested in philosophical critiques of Christianity, in Jewish-Christian relations, or in the differences between the two religions.

ESTHER I. SEIDEL

See also Philosophy: General; Philosophy: Modern

Philosophy: Modern

- Baeck, Leo, Das Wesen des Judentums, 1905; translated by Victor Grubwieser and Leonard Pearl as The Essence of Judaism, London: Macmillan, 1936; revised by Irving Howe, New York: Schocken, 1948
- Buber, Martin, Ich und du, 1923; translated by Walter Kaufmann as I and Thou, New York: Scribner, and Edinburgh: Clark, 1970
- Cohen, Hermann, Die Religion der Vernunft aus den Quellen des Judentums, 1919; translated by Simon Kaplan as Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism, introductory essay by Leo Strauss, New York: Ungar, 1972; new introductory essays by Steven S. Schwarzschild and Kenneth Seeskin, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1995
- Fackenheim, Emil L., To Mend the World: Foundations of Future Jewish Thought, New York: Schocken, 1982; as To Mend the World: Foundations of Post-Holocaust Jewish Thought, New York: Schocken, 1989
- Guttman, Julius, Die Philosophie des Judentums, 1933; translated by David W. Silverman as Philosophies of Judaism: The History of Jewish Philosophy from Biblical Times to Franz Rosenzweig, New York: Holt, Rinehart

- and Winston, and London: Routledge, 1964; as The Philosophy of Judaism: The History of Jewish Philosophy from Biblical Times to Franz Rosenzweig, London and Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1988
- Heschel, Abraham, God in Search of Man: A Philosophy of Judaism, New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1955; London: Calder, 1956
- Kaplan, Mordecai M., Judaism as a Civilization: Toward a Reconstruction of American-Jewish Life, New York: Macmillan, 1934; enlarged edition, New York: Reconstructionist Press, 1957
- Levinas, Emmanuel, Totalité et Infini: Essai sur l'extériorité, 1961; translated by Alphonso Lingis as Totality and Infinity: An Essay on Exteriority (Duquesne Philosophical Series, vol. 24), Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: Duquesne University Press, 1969
- Mendelssohn, Moses, Jerusalem, oder Über religiöse Macht und Judentum, 1783; as Jerusalem, or, On Religious Power and Judaism, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1983
- Rosenzweig, Franz, Der Stern der Erlösung, 1921; translated by William W. Hallo as The Star of Redemption, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1971
- Spinoza, Benedictus de, The Chief Works of Benedict de Spinoza, vol. 1: Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, translated by R.H.M. Elwes, London: Bell, 1883, revised edition, 1900; as The Chief Works of Benedict de Spinoza, vol. 1: Theologico-Political Treatise, New York: Dover, 1951

Modern Jewish philosophy, sometimes referred to as modern Jewish thought, can be understood as a conversation between modern Jews and the modern world. The subjects of this conversation include both the philosophical and the Jewish, or the secular and the religious.

SPINOZA is sometimes considered the earliest exponent of modern Jewish philosophy, although this claim is debatable. On the one hand, this 17th-century philosopher lived before the "modern" era had clearly begun; he was excommunicated from the Jewish community, and he did not clearly present himself or his thought as Jewish. On the other hand, Spinoza's approach may be considered modern in its commitment to a rational exploration of theology; he was a Jew, and there are major Jewish influences in his thought. Unlike later modern Jewish philosophers from the 18th and 19th centuries who attempt to harmonize Jewish thought with Western philosophical notions in order to vindicate the rationality or morality of Judaism, Spinoza develops a religious philosophy that is grounded in the Hebrew Bible without explicitly advocating Judaism. Blending biblical exegesis and political treatise in order to argue for freedom of thought and religious practice, Spinoza rejects the medieval goal of harmonizing revelation and reason, for he contends that philosophy searches for truth, while religion promotes acceptance and obedience. He argues that the Bible has a social and pedagogical function as it teaches ethics to the pious masses; the philosophically minded person, however, can learn the "habit" of virtue through reason alone. Spinoza further rejects all anthropomorphic or androcentric ideas of God, insisting that God can only be conceptualized as the apotheosis of universal, rational law.

Living almost a century after Spinoza, MENDELSSOHN is often cited as the first modern Jewish philosopher. The most persuasive voice for Jewish emancipation of his time, Mendelssohn wrote for both Jewish and non-Jewish audiences. He argues that both religion and the state, when grounded in reason, share the same ultimate goal of promoting human happiness. Neither the state nor religion has the authority to constrain personal freedom of thought and conviction, though the state does have the right to prohibit atheism because atheism is injurious to the public good. This treatise is often polemical when it compares Judaism to Christianity. Disputing the assertion that Christianity liberates its adherents from the burdensome laws and rituals of Judaism, Mendelssohn argues that Christianity actually limits freedom of thought through its coercive dogmas, which deny that God's incontrovertible existence is discoverable through reason, independent of revelation. He argues that Christianity claims to be the exclusive bearer of revelation, but Judaism claims only that Jewish law is incumbent on the Jewish people, providing the Jewish path toward salvation. The corollary of this assertion is that Jews must be emancipated so they may be full members of society while continuing to observe that law that applies particularly to them.

Many modern Jewish philosophers have been inspired by COHEN's argument that what makes Jewish philosophy specifically Jewish is its concern for ethics. Strongly influenced by Immanuel Kant, Cohen argues that religions must be evaluated scientifically on the basis of their rationality. Accordingly, Judaism is conspicuous for its ideal moral conception of God that humans are expected to emulate. While Christianity has a modified form of monotheism that reifies the Holy Spirit, the essence of Judaism is moral and rational because of its emphasis on the ethical, as exemplified in the writings of the prophets. The rationality of Jewish texts is what gives them their qualitative edge. For Cohen, one's ethical relationship with other people is inseparable from one's relationship with God. The Spirit of Holiness (ruah ha-kodesh) between humans and God is a manifestation of their essential relation or correlation with one another. Humans become co-creators with God through the covenant of their relation. Cohen optimistically believes in human perfectibility and judges that it is humanity's task to transform the natural relationships among humans into ethical relationships where humans exist in loving, covenantal communion with one another.

Written and published decades before he was interned in the Theresienstadt concentration camp, BAECK's treatise is implicitly a polemical response to The Essence of Christianity, by liberal Protestant thinker Adolf Harnack. Baeck creates a typology of Judaism in which he outlines the essential elements of Jewish faith and existence, and he contends that the primacy of ethics in Judaism makes that religion unique. He argues that Jews understand themselves to be in continuity with other Jews in history, insisting that membership in this Jewish world places a person in the minority, often persecuted, always different. The intellectual, moral, and spiritual consciousness that emerges from this experience distinguishes Judaism from other religions. Intellectually, Jews have always needed to adapt in order to survive as a minority. Morally and spiritually, Judaism's ethical monotheism, as epitomized in the prophets, derives from the Jews' realization that moral law is absolute and that God is the source of that law. Baeck concludes that monotheism is the logical result of Judaism's ethical optimism: there is good; God is the source of good; humans have the power and potential to realize that good.

A dominant theme in modern Jewish philosophy is the phenomenological premise that the self exists in relationships and that relationships among humans can be correlated with relationships with God. BUBER's definitive and influential exploration of the theme of relationality is presented in three parts. In part one, Buber introduces the argument that all experience is relational, as he presents the ideal language of relationships. Buber differentiates among types of relationships by using the word pairs I/It and I/Thou. I/It relationships are mundane relationships, operating at the cognitive rather than the ethical level, while I/Thou relationships occur between persons; they are ethical, reciprocal, mutual, and transformative. Part two refines the discussion of relationality by philosophically examining relationships in terms of human history, which, Buber argues, demonstrates the continual natural devolution of I/Thou relationships into I/It relationships. In part three, Buber explores humanity's relationship with God, asserting that God, unlike people, cannot be reduced to an object in an I/It relationship. God is always Thou, and humans glimpse this ultimate relationship in all their other I/Thou relationships with persons. Thus, Buber sees interpersonal relations as extraordinarily empowering because they illuminate relations with the divine.

Like Buber, LEVINAS stresses that the ethical is located in the interpersonal relationship. While Buber contends that the I/Thou relationship is mutual, however, Levinas uses the model of the face-to-face encounter to stress the asymmetry of ethical relationships. Levinas understands the self to be in an obligatory relationship with a wholly other person, and he uses a phenomenological approach to present the Other as feminine, represented by the biblical archetype of "the poor, the widow, the orphan." While the vulnerability of this figure prompts the self to feel radical responsibility for the Other, Levinas argues that the Other is actually "higher" than the self. It is in fact the height of the Other, glimpsed as Infinity in the Face of the Other, that commands the self to act responsibly, as master and teacher. This relationship, then, extends to community when a third person enters into the relationship, for each human is capable of assuming the roles of self, Other, and third person. Thus, the responsibility the self experiences is also experienced by the Other or the third person. Like Buber, Levinas understands that one's relationship with other persons is the prerequisite to a relationship with God. He stresses that there can be no knowledge of the relationship with God except through the establishment of interpersonal relationships.

While its difficult prose has made it inaccessible to many readers, ROSENZWEIG's text is widely respected as one of the great works of modern Jewish philosophy. The treatise is divided into three parts, each of which is in turn divided into three books. Through a method he calls "absolute empiricism," Rosenzweig develops a philosophy based on experience, which he uses to disclose the three essential elements discussed in part one: God, world, and humans. Part two examines God's creation of the world; God's revelation to humans; and humanity's redemption of the world. Part three considers the roles of Jewish and Christian communities in redemption. Unlike Cohen and other rationalists, Rosenzweig gives extraordinary primacy to the experience of revelation. Defining revelation as God's loving encounter with the self, which is immediately recognized in the form of commands, he asserts that redemption occurs when a person who has experienced God's loving revelation turns toward others, breaking down the existential isolation that all persons experience. Like Buber and Levinas, Rosenzweig argues that the interpersonal relationship is the model of the relationship between God and humans.

FACKENHEIM's systematic response to the Holocaust considers and rejects the positions of both Jewish and non-Jewish philosophers as the author seeks a philosophical foundation for the spiritual, cultural, and historical survival of the Jewish people. He begins from a position of faith, asserting that the God of Israel acts in history and that Jewish history is marked by such epoch-making events as the exodus from Egypt, the revelation at Sinai, and the destruction of the First and Second Temples. In the modern period, Fackenheim identifies Emancipation, the Holocaust, and the creation of the State of Israel as epoch-making events of equal importance to those of biblical times, for these unique modern episodes similarly usher in new phases in Jewish history by changing the ways in which Jews reflect back and understand their own past. Most importantly, each epoch-making event imposes new demands on the Jewish people, as well as upon humanity as a whole. Fackenheim concludes with a passionate and compelling affirmation of the importance of teshuvah (literally, "return"), which he identifies as the underlying theme of this work. Fackenheim describes teshuvah throughout his text as the divine-human turning toward each other, and he contends that Jews and humans as a whole must not only turn toward God but they must also work toward tikkun 'olam, the Jewish mystical goal of mending the world.

A sequel to his work, Man Is Not Alone: A Philosophy of Religion, HESCHEL's popular and often poetic text is divided into three sections, God, Revelation, and Response. Heschel discusses religion and the Bible; examines humanity's relationship with God; and concludes that because Jews must be understood as living in a sacred or holy dimension, the preservation of Judaism is a spiritual act. Contending that the central message of the Hebrew Bible is that God expresses his love by choosing the Jewish people, Heschel proposes that Jews can only understand their common history, from biblical misfortunes to the horrors of Auschwitz, in terms of that divine loving choice. The Jewish history of survival, Heschel argues, teaches that one must move beyond ordinary standards of behavior in order to achieve genuine humanity; similarly, Jews need to be more than a people: they must be a holy people. Being chosen by God requires self-transcendence on the part of the individual and of the people as a whole.

KAPLAN's magnum opus focuses on the question of Jewish continuity. Rather than defining Judaism as a religion, Kaplan characterizes it as the evolving religious civilization of the Jewish people, and he proposes a philosophy for understanding and developing the next stage of this civilization. Asserting that Jewish civilization includes those religious and cultural features that are essentially Jewish (language, history, folk arts, social structures, spiritual ideals, and standards of conduct), Kaplan states that the protection and promotion of these features are essential to the continuity of Judaism both in the diaspora and in a Jewish homeland. However, Kaplan does not think that Judaism need be homogenous, as no single pattern of Jewish life is adequate to meet the needs of diverse Jewries. He argues that the future continuity of Jewish civilization cannot depend on blind acceptance of traditional beliefs; instead, it must rest on the vital study of, and interest in, those elements of Jewish literature, such as the Torah and Talmud, that are central to traditional belief. Repudiating the doctrine of being the chosen people as an elitist notion that leads to bigotry, Kaplan advocates the reconstruction of Judaism through an engagement with evolved intellectual, socioeconomic, political, ethical, and religiocultural ideals.

GUTTMANN's volume presents both the earliest major scholarly analysis of modern Jewish philosophy and Guttman's own modernist philosophical position. The third and last section of the text deals exclusively with modern Jewish philosophy, examining the views of well-known thinkers, such as Mendelssohn, Cohen, and Rosenzweig, as well as less familiar figures, such as Solomon Formstecher, Nachman Krochmal, and Moritz Lazarus. Guttman places all these thinkers in the wider context of modern Jewish philosophy, identifying their original contributions to the field as well as their intellectual debts to other philosophers. The result is an insightful overview of the dominant themes of Jewish philosophy prior to the 20th century.

DEIDRE BUTLER

See also Philosophy: General; Philosophy: Medieval

Pilgrimages see Veneration of Saints, Pilgrimages, and Holy Places

Piyyut

Elbogen, Ismar, Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, translated by Raymond P. Scheindlin based on the author's Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung (1913) and the annotated Hebrew translation ha-Tefilah be-Yisra'el be-hitpathutah ha-historit (1972), Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1993

Hoffman, Lawrence A., The Canonization of the Synagogue Service, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1979

Petuchowski, Jakob J., "The Poetry of the Synagogue," in Literature of the Synagogue, edited by Petuchowski and Joseph Heinemann, New York: Behrman House, 1975

Petuchowski, Jakob J., Theology and Poetry (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1977

Scheindlin, Raymond P. (compiler), The Gazelle: Medieval Hebrew Poems on God, Israel, and the Soul, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1991

Spiegel, Shalom, "On Medieval Hebrew Poetry," in The Jews: Their History, Culture, and Religion, edited by Louis Finkelstein, 3rd edition, New York: Harper, 1960

Weinberger, Leon, Jewish Hymnography (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), London and Portland, Oregon: Vallentine Mitchell, 1998

Hebrew devotional poetry, known as piyyut (plural piyyutim), is an important part of the synagogue service. Liturgical poems were written to be recited during the service and follow specific forms and deal with specific themes. From the inception of the piyyut tradition and through medieval times, piyyutim were written by payyotanim, professional poets who were also cantors and rabbis. Their poetic creations were recited publicly in the communal prayer service. This tradition was widely practiced and each community composed unique piyyutim. The use of religious poetry in the synagogue service continues today, but public recital of new and original verse is a custom that has all but vanished.

Since recorded information about ancient prayer services is scarce, the exact beginning of piyyut is unknown. Many issues concerning the early use of piyyut in the service remain problematic. For this reason, several theories exist explaining the initiation of piyyut.

For a general overview of the evolution of piyyut, ELBOGEN's comprehensive history of Jewish liturgical life is ideal. Originally published in German in 1913, this English translation includes notes from the 1972 Hebrew edition. The notes correct and update the original text with scholarship based primarily on discoveries from the Cairo Genizah. New datings and supplementary information on poets and their work contribute significantly to the chapters on piyyut.

Elbogen analyzes the development of piyyut and reviews the major liturgical poets of Palestine, Christian Europe, and Spain. Concerning the origins of piyyut, he distinguishes two distinct periods—a period in which prayer was established and a period for the development of piyyut. The fixed standard prayers were established at the close of the talmudic period, and piyyut developed later as an adornment to the prayers. In addition, Elbogen believes that piyyutim were never used as actual prayers but were attachments recited in addition to the standard prayers.

SPIEGEL, whose narrative style makes for easy reading, discusses the origins of synagogue poetry, illustrates the way that piyyutim thematically correspond with the prayers, and reviews the major liturgical poets and their contributions. Ascribing great antiquity to piyyut, he argues, in contrast to Elbogen, that standard prayer and synagogue poetry developed simultaneously. The original choice for liturgical poetry was the Psalms, but communities felt they had new things to say. Ancient rabbis desired to preserve an element of spontaneity in the prayers and paved the way for new liturgical poetry. During the Middle Ages some rabbinic authorities discouraged the addition of piyyutim. However, the charm and excitement inherent in the addition of new piyyutim to the fixed formula of the synagogue service overcame these objections, and this freer form of religious expression flourished.

HOFFMAN focuses on the medieval controversy concerning the use of piyyutim. Citing geonic sources from the ninth and tenth centuries, he contextualizes the issue as one which was, in fact, part of the struggle between Palestinians and Babylonians for hegemony in the Jewish world. The objections to piyyut, according to Hoffman, reflect the conflict between Palestinian custom and Babylonian authority. Since piyyutim were Palestinian in origin, Babylonian authorities attempted to bar their use. The resistance of the geonim finally ended with Saadia Gaon, who included Palestinian piyyutim as well as his own compositions in the prayer book that he compiled.

By far the most comprehensive and thorough overview, in English, of the entire history of piyyut is WEINBERGER. Arranged historically and by region, the book outlines the innovations of each period, analyzing the particular contributions of the individual poets in terms of language and style. The development of different genres of synagogue poetry is clearly laid out, with explanations of the function, theme, and placement of each type of poem in the liturgy. Of particular interest are the chapters on the poets of Byzantium, the Ottoman Empire, and the Karaite community. The inclusion of this material is an important contribution.

A close examination of individual piyyutim can be found in PETUCHOWSKI (1975), which includes a selection of 15 piyyutim translated into English. The translations are literal rather than poetic, shying away from recreating the original poetic styles. This exciting selection of poems from different ages is arranged chronologically; it begins with an example of an ancient piyyut from the Cairo Genizah and ends with an example from 12th-century France. Each poem is introduced with biographical data about the poet and a discussion of the poem's liturgical use. Notes on each poem comment on biblical and literary allusions in the text. In addition, the essay provides a succinct summary of the Hebrew scholarship on piyyut, posing some major questions and explaining the views of Mirsky, Schirrmann, and Fleischer.

PETUCHOWSKI (1977) assembles a selection of synagogue poems that express "unconventional and daring theological ideas." Each poem is preceded by a brief history of the religious concept it conveys. The Hebrew poem is followed by an English translation and commentary. Subjects such as anthropomorphic descriptions of God, God's suffering, and Israel's redemption are considered. This study reveals the varied theological views expressed and tolerated in the long-standing "Orthodox liturgical tradition."

The piyyutim of Golden Age Spain ushered in a new approach to Hebrew language. Before this period, poets made extensive use of biblical quotations and midrashic allusions. In Spain, however, the language of the Bible was freed from its original context and used to express new themes. SCHEINDLIN presents a selection of these poems, with each Hebrew piyyut set on the page facing that of its English translation. A short explanatory essay follows each poem. These poems amply illustrate the degree of cultural integration achieved in the Golden Age. Golden Age poets successfully merged Jewish literary tradition with the science and philosophy of the surrounding Arabic culture and thereby created a new type of synagogue poetry. Surprisingly, the same style and language utilized in Hebrew secular love poems was also used by the Spanish poets to convey a religious message in sacred poetry. Scheindlin divides the poems into two groups. In one, romantic images are used to depict God's relationship with the collective community of Israel. In the other, this imagery is used to express the individual's love for God.

NEHAMA EDINGER

Poetry: Biblical

- Alter, Robert, The Art of Biblical Poetry, New York: Basic Books, 1985; Edinburgh: Clark, 1990
- Berlin, Adele, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985
- Berlin, Adele, Biblical Poetry through Medieval Jewish Eyes (Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991
- Coogan, Michael David, Stories from Ancient Canaan, Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978
- Freedman, David Noel, Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy: Studies in Early Hebrew Poetry, Winona Lake, Indiana: Eisenbrauns, 1980
- Hrushovski, Benjamin, "Note on the Systems of Hebrew Versification," in The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse, edited by T. Carmi, New York: Viking, and London: Lane, 1981
- Kugel, James, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1981
- Lowth, Robert, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, London: Johnson, 1787; new edition, New York: Leavitt, 1829; 4th edition, London: Tegg, 1839
- Parker, Simon (editor), Ugaritic Narrative Poetry (Writings from the Ancient World, vol. 9), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1997
- Petersen, David and Kent Richards, Interpreting Hebrew Poetry (Guides to Biblical Scholarship, Old Testament Series), Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1992
- Watson, Wilfred G.E., Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (Journal for the Study of the New Testament Supplement Series, 26), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1984, 2nd edition, 1986

The modern study of biblical poetry is generally thought to begin with the work of LOWTH, professor of poetry at Oxford and later bishop of London. Lowth identified "parallelism," rather than strict meter familiar from classical verse, as the main structure of biblical poetry. He showed that most lines of ancient Hebrew verse consist of two or three members (or half-lines) that echo each other on a semantic level. Lowth's identification of three types of parallelism in many ways continues to set the agenda. These categories are: synonymous parallelism, in which the second half-line echoes the first; antithetical, in which the second opposes the first; and synthetic, in which the nature of the semantic parallel is not obvious.

Subsequent scholars have attempted to find other structures that work with or even instead of parallelism. Some maintain that biblical poems use a stress or accent-based meter, in which each half-line has a set number of stressed syllables; others (especially FREEDMAN) count all syllables (stressed and unstressed), arguing that each line contains two members with an equal number of syllables. Successive lines, however, do not necessarily have the same number of syllables. These metrical explanations of Hebrew verse are vitiated by the lack of definite knowledge regarding Hebrew pronunciation during the biblical period and by the failure of biblical authors to follow the rules decreed by these scholars. Indeed, the scholars in question are frequently compelled to emend texts or remove "prose accretions" in order to demonstrate that their theories work (see especially the discussion in Kugel).

HRUSHOVSKI emphasizes that parallelism involves not only semantic counterparts (which at times fail to appear, as Lowth was loath to admit; note his catch-all third category) but also equivalences of syntax, accent, and phonology. In light of the latter equivalences, the attempts to find a strict metrical basis for biblical poetry fall away; they are revealed to be an occasional result of parallelism of accent.

BERLIN (1985) applies perspectives from theoretical linguistics to the study of parallelism (primarily, but not exclusively, in poetic texts), demonstrating that parallelism often exists within a line's deep grammatical structure. Like Hrushovski, she notes the existence of phonological parallels involving assonance and sound-play. These other forms of parallelism show the phenomenon to be more prevalent than some scholars have recognized and allow more meaningful substitutes for Lowth's synthetic category.

In the first chapters of their respective books, KUGEL and ALTER emphasize the dynamic nature of the parallel line, in which the second half not only reiterates the first but also intensifies or specifies it. Thus they move decisively beyond Lowth in arguing that parallel lines are forceful because of their attempts to move beyond their own parallelism. However much they agree on the dynamic nature of parallelism in their highly readable yet sophisticated discussions, Kugel and Alter debate the meaning of the term poetry itself. Alter finds the term useful, but Kugel argues that no clear distinction exists between prose and poetry in biblical texts; rather, the texts usually called "poetry" display certain rhetorical features with great regularity (e.g., in the Book of Psalms), while the passages normally labeled as "prose" display those features only sporadically (e.g., most examples of narrative prose in Genesis). Other texts lie in the middle of a continuum (e.g., many prophetic texts, such as parts of Ezekiel, the classification of which as prose or poetry has been an area of disagreement among scholars; and texts such as Genesis 1:1–2:4a that are unusually rhythmic and majestic, though not quite as regular in their parallelism as a psalm). The attempt to categorize these "in-between" texts as either prose or poetry is, according to Kugel, so much striving after the wind.

In the remainder of his book, Alter proceeds to offer very sensitive readings of ancient Hebrew poems from the Book of Psalms, wisdom literature, and prophecy. In these readings (which show affinities to New Criticism) Alter richly demonstrates the relevance of his observations on the structure of the poetic line from the outset of his book. In spite of their own linguistic sensitivity, it should be noted that neither Kugel nor Alter requires knowledge of Hebrew on their readers' part.

The remainder of Kugel's book traces the history of the poetics of biblical poetry—how ancient, medieval, and some modern readers have understood or forgotten the system of ancient Hebrew poetry Kugel describes at the outset of his book. Another detailed discussion of medieval Jewish approaches to biblical poetry, including precursors to Lowth's theory, is found in BERLIN (1991), which contains a history of scholarship and analyses of medieval Jewish texts in relationship to their own historical settings and to modern work on poetry. In the second half of this book, Berlin provides translations with introductions of several important medieval Jewish texts that provide theoretical discussions of biblical poetry.

While the amount of scholarship on ancient Hebrew poetry is vast, students are aided by the existence of several helpful overviews of the field. PETERSEN and RICHARDS have provided an admirable and readable introductory work. A far more detailed discussion (yet well organized and hence readily usable) is found in WATSON. Watson's book is outstanding not only for its comprehensive review of the field and its copious examples but also for its attention to the strong points of contact between biblical and other ancient Near Eastern poetry, especially that of ancient Ugarit (a topic treated to some extent by Kugel and Freedman as well). Translations of Ugaritic poems, whose connections to biblical poetry are readily evident, are found in PARKER and in COOGAN; the former also contains the Ugaritic texts and detailed notes, while the latter's introductions are geared more toward the reader with no prior knowledge.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Poetry: Medieval Hebrew

- Brann, Ross, The Compunctious Poet: Cultural Ambiguity and Hebrew Poetry in Muslim Spain, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1991
- Carmi, T. (editor and translator), The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse, Harmondsworth, Middlesex, and New York: Penguin, 1981
- Hamori, Andras, On the Art of Medieval Arabic Literature, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1974
- Pagis, Dan, Hebrew Poetry of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991
- Scheindlin, Raymond, Wine, Women, and Death: Medieval Hebrew Poems on the Good Life, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1986
- Scheindlin, Raymond, The Gazelle: Medieval Hebrew Poems on God, Israel, and the Soul, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1991
- Schippers, Arie, Spanish Hebrew Poetry and the Arab Literary Tradition: Arabic Themes in Hebrew Andalusian Poetry, Leiden and New York: Brill, 1994
- Schirmann, Jefim, "The Function of the Hebrew Poet in Medieval Spain," Jewish Social Studies, 16, 1954

Schirmann, Jefim, "Problems in the Study of Post-Biblical Hebrew Poetry," Proceedings of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 2(12), 1967

Schirmann, Jefim, "Introduction," in reprint of Israel Davidson's Otsar ha-shirah ve'ha-piyut: Thesaurus of Medieval Hebrew Poetry, vol. 1, New York: Ktav, 1970

Stern, Samuel Miklos, Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry: Studies, selected and edited by L.P. Harvey, Oxford: Clarendon, 1974

Scholarship on the Hebrew poetry of the High Middle Ages typically stresses one of three topics: continuity with older Hebrew liturgical poetry, the innovative aspects of the new kind of Hebrew poetry written in Arabic meter that was created and developed in Muslim Spain, or the history of Hebrew poetry in Italy.

CARMI's excellent bilingual anthology of Hebrew poems from the Bible to the present time offers in the introduction a general perspective on the history of Hebrew poetry. The author underlines that poems have been written in Hebrew virtually without interruption for 3,000 years, moving from one center to another and usually assimilating the thematic and prosodic conventions of the surrounding culture. He describes the flowering of liturgical poetry in Palestine and the radical innovations of the Andalusian school and its continuation in Christian Spain, among other distinct historical periods of Hebrew literature. A short but very adequate description of the characteristics of poetry in the Middle Ages is complemented by a "note on medieval Hebrew genres," limited to the main types of liturgical poetry as well as a "note on the systems of Hebrew versification," written by B. Hrushovski. The selection of poems is very judicious, and the translation, in prose, reproduces the content with precision and without being unduly literal.

Schirmann was the teacher of several generations of scholars in the field of medieval Hebrew poetry. Most of his works are written in Hebrew, but the three articles selected here are among his most famous contributions in English. SCHIRMANN (1970) deals with the emergence of research on Hebrew poetry, particularly during the 19th and early 20th centuries. He offers an appreciation of the work of pioneers such as Zunz, Delitzsch, Dukes, Kaempf, Sachs, Geiger, and Luzzatto, and he discusses the significance of the great reference work prepared by Davidson, indexing more than 36,000 Hebrew poems. SCHIRMANN (1967) is a reflection on the main difficulties faced by scholars of medieval Hebrew poetry, such as its chronological and geographical diffuseness, the number of manuscripts, the lack of critical editions, and the need for knowledge of many ancillary subjects. He argues the need for describing the history of Hebrew literature from a new viewpoint, clarifying the milieu in which each poet lived, his cultural inheritance, and the special traits that are attributable to his character and the influences to which he was exposed. SCHIRMANN (1954) was the first important sociological study of Hebrew poetry. It explores the ethos of commitment to poetry as a profession and clarifies the origins and circumstances of the poets and their readers and hearers. Also treated are the differences between secular and liturgical poetry, the phenomenon of wandering poets, the relationship between the poet and his patron, the role of music in the recitation of poetry, and the collection and dissemination of poems.

PAGIS's posthumously published book includes three lectures on different technical aspects of medieval and Renaissance poetry: individuality and stylization; imagery; the conviction that poetry is not only a game but also an essential vehicle for expression and characterization; and the merging of convention and experience in the premodern Hebrew love poetry of Spain and Italy. As in Schirmann's studies, Pagis underscores here the confluence of tradition and innovation in this poetry and its readiness to absorb foreign influences, whether Arabic or, later, Spanish and Italian. Pagis was one of the great experts on medieval Hebrew secular poetry, as amply demonstrated by his many books and articles in Hebrew. Even though the volume under discussion does not provide a systematic exposition, his erudition and refined sensibilities are evident in these interesting English lectures, full of brilliant, incisive remarks and well-chosen examples.

Scheindlin elaborates a new image of the Hebrew Andalusian poets, opening fresh paths for research in the comparative fields of Arabic and Jewish poetry. SCHEINDLIN (1986) contains a selection of poems written in those circles of "wealthy Jews, thoroughly educated in Arabic language and literature . . . who were also pious, learned, and fiercely loyal to Jewish interests." Accepted in Muslim society, "the price was acculturation, not conversion." These Jews assimilated the Arabic literary tradition and synthesized it with their own literary heritage. The poets, according to Scheindlin, kept religion and social life carefully separated in their work. Their courtly poems, about conventional themes, deal with the pleasures of life such as wine parties, love, and desire, or are reflections on the brevity of life and display "the aristocratic ideals of harmony, balance, and control in the medium of rhythm and rhetoric." After an informative general introduction, each section presents the peculiarities of a particular genre, and there is a bilingual selection of 31 poems featuring beautiful translations and brief commentaries that afford easy reading even for nonspecialist readers.

SCHEINDLIN (1991) complements the first book and deals with topics related to Hebrew-Andalusian synagogal poetry. Both Scheindlin's works have in common a profound comprehension of the Arabic and the Jewish cultural world of the Middle Ages, and the two books share a similar approach. The Gazelle examines the introduction of Arabic secular imagery into the closed world of Jewish liturgical prayer in al-Andalus. The author asks himself how the same poets could write both classes of poetry—secular poems for Jewish courtiers and liturgical poems for the synagogue. From a very modern perspective, Scheindlin poses the question of how much non-Jewish culture a Jew could in conscience adopt in the Middle Ages and to what extent he could arrive at a kind of cultural symbiosis, belonging at the same time to Israel and to the international class of intellectuals. The introduction, dealing with the spiritual atmosphere and the innovations of the Spanish school of synagogal poetry, is followed by two main sections, about "God and Israel" and "God and the Soul," with an annotated translation of 30 liturgical poems written by Solomon ibn Gabirol, Moses ibn Ezra, Judah Halevi, Isaac ibn Ghayyat, Levi Altabban, and Abraham ibn Ezra. The exquisite precision of his translation is counterbalanced by a technical, enlightening, well-elaborated explanation of the poems, which takes into consideration not only the subject matter but also the literary form of the compositions. The poems are interpreted with reference to the spiritual atmosphere of the epoch, and frequent comparison is made to the Arabic models.

BRANN offers a highly original panorama of the spiritual and cultural atmosphere in which the Andalusian Hebrew poets lived among their Muslim neighbors. Two processes, urbanization and Arabization, transformed the Jews under medieval Islam. Secular Hebrew poetry became one of the most significant manifestations of the "cultural convivencia" for Jews and Muslims in al-Andalus and for Jews and Christians in Christian Spain; it may be described as a Hebrew subcultural adaptation of Arabic poetry carried out by the so-called courtier-rabbis, Jews educated both in their own tradition and in the dominant Arabic culture of the court. According to Brann, Hebrew secular poetry represents the "fusion of Arabic prosody, form, and style with biblical Hebrew diction and imagery." The main part of Brann's book is devoted to the study of the topos of the "compunctious poet": "it serves as an emblem of the poet's contradictory attitudes toward poetry and as a sign of the ambiguities and conflicts inherent in their culture." The poets lived in two cultural worlds governed by systems of values that were very different and sometimes opposed; they tried to be true to Jewish tradition without renouncing the ideals of their Arabic education. This cultural ambiguity is reflected in the curious attitude of the repentant poet, who regrets in his old age having composed poetry in Arabic style when young but never ceases to write. The topic, also known among Arab poets, is examined in the Jewish tradition, in particular among great Andalusian poets such as Moses ibn Ezra and Judah Halevi, and in other poets of the Christian kingdoms, such as Shem Tov ibn Falaquera, Meshulam de Piera, and Todros Abulafia. Brann's very suggestive book can serve as an excellent introduction to the world of Hebrew-Spanish poetry for the uninitiated and has much that is new to say to readers at all levels of expertise.

STERN was, prior to his early death in 1972, one of the most outstanding scholars of Arabic and Hebrew strophic poetry (muwashshah), and he revolutionized knowledge of the field by deciphering the Romance final refrains (kharja) found in some of these compositions. This volume, which appeared after his death, contains some of his periodical articles in English and an abridgment of his unpublished doctoral dissertation on strophic poetry in al-Andalus. Even with the passing of the years, his observations on the history of this kind of poetry originating in Muslim Spain, his readings of the Romance kharjas, his studies on a more popular kind of Arabic strophic poetry, the zajal, and his reflections about the possible connections between the Islamic literary world and the literary atmosphere of medieval Western Europe remain indispensable for any reader interested in the field.

HAMORI provides a general study of some essential aspects of medieval Arabic poetry, and his penetrating, acute, and delightful exposition of the character and evolution of the genres and techniques used by the Arabic poets is a great help for understanding Andalusian Hebrew poetry, too, written as it was in the same cultural atmosphere. In his analysis of the theme of time, Hamori includes a fine commentary on a Hebrew descriptive poem by Samuel ibn Nagrella ha-Nagid. The book is written for the student of literature as well as for the specialist in Arabic or Hebrew, and it deals with the transformations from the sixth to the tenth century in poetic genres and in the poets' attitudes toward time and society. Some questions about poetic technique and methods employed in the composition of prose also are addressed.

SCHIPPERS offers a survey of the poetic themes and motifs occurring in Hebrew Andalusian poetry that were borrowed from Arabic literature, in particular during the 11th century. He concentrates on the work of the four main Hebrew poets of the Golden Age—Samuel ha-Nagid, Solomon ibn Gabirol, Moses ibn Ezra, and Judah Halevi—and he presents Hebrew poetry as an imitation of Arabic poetic genres, images, and motifs in a revived Classical Hebrew language. The study begins with some consideration of convention, imitation, and originality, followed by a sketch of the social and historical situation of Jews and Muslims in Spain. The main part of the book deals with the comparison of the genres employed in Hebrew and those of Arabic poetry: the themes of wine, love, and nature, descriptions of war, laudatory compositions, elegies, and poems about poetry itself. The underlying idea is that the Hebrew poets were in essence not very different from the Arabic poets, lived in the same cultural atmosphere, and employed similar techniques, even if they had some distinctive views and methods. The war poems of Samuel ha-Nagid and the elegies also have many parallels in Arabic poetry. The author underlines how oriental Arabic poets, such as al-Mutanabbi, exerted a great influence in Muslim Spain, serving as models even for the Hebrew poets, although each poet showed his own originality in his personal elaboration of the standard topics.

ANGEL SÁENZ-BADILLOS

Poetry: Modern Hebrew

Halkin, Simon, Modern Hebrew Literature, New York:

Schocken, 1950, new edition, 1970

Jacobson, David C., Does David Still Play before You?

Israeli Poetry and the Bible, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1997

Kohn, Murray, The Voice of My Blood Cries Out: The Holocaust as Reflected in Hebrew Poetry, New York: Shengold, 1979

Kronfeld, Chana, On the Margins of Modernism: Decentering Literary Dynamics (Contraversions, 2), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996

Preil, Gabriel, Israeli Poetry in Peace and War (Herzl Institute Pamphlet, no. 13), New York: Herzl, 1959

The rise of modern Hebrew poetry is generally associated with the emergence of a secular Jewish culture among Eastern European Jewry in the 1880s. This development principally manifested itself in the circle of Ahad Ha'am, who advocated "cultural Zionism"—a movement that promoted the revival of Jewish literary creativity in the Hebrew language. The movement bore its first fruit in the highly original verse of Hayyim Nahman Bialik and Saul Tchernichovsky, who quickly established themselves as the leading poetic voices of the Hebrew revival. By the 1920s, the center of poetic creativity had shifted to Palestine, where Hebrew was already established as the language of daily discourse, thus becoming a natural medium for poetic expression. Nathan Alterman, Leah Goldberg, and Abraham Shlonsky were leading poets of this period, and their verse mirrored a new Jewish identity taking root in its original homeland. When the State of Israel was declared in 1948, Hebrew poetry became an integral part of Israeli cultural life, reflecting the nation's struggles, triumphs, and contradictions. In recent years, the poet Yehuda Amichai has been widely regarded as Israel's unofficial poet laureate, perhaps because he manages to capture in his modernist verse the conflicting sides of contemporary Israeli life. His poems combine heroic defiance, subdued idealism, and existential doubt, while simultaneously reflecting the spiritual realities of an often turbulent history.

HALKIN provides a good introduction to the study of modern Hebrew poetry, devoting almost a third of his book to a discussion of the social and political forces that led to the creation of a distinctly modern literature in Hebrew. Halkin proceeds both chronologically and thematically, linking the work of some of the first modern Hebrew poets through, for example, their common tendency to portray the individual Jew as physically heroic. He then explores some of the experimental features of the verse written in the pioneering era that preceded the founding of the State of Israel. Chapters seven through nine discuss the various ways in which Hebrew poets responded in verse to the tragic fate of the Jews in Nazi Europe, and the book concludes with a penetrating analysis of the prevalence of religious themes in modern Hebrew poetry by apparently secular poets. This latter discussion is one of the most valuable aspects of the book, for it treats a subject that has received little attention from other literary historians.

Although short on words, PREIL's book is long on content. In a mere 33 pages, he provides an incisive analysis of some of the major themes in modern Hebrew poetry. The first half of the essay discusses the work of three poets—Uri Zvi Greenberg, Goldberg, and S. Shalom—and cites the work of such major influences as William Butler Yeats and Walt Whitman in order to place the three authors in a larger context. In the second half, Preil compares Hebrew poetry written during Israel's War of Independence in 1948 to similar texts composed in other difficult times, including critical moments of the biblical era and of the Jewish experience in medieval Spain. Through this comparison, Preil brings to light the ways in which modern poets both absorb and transform the traditions of earlier generations.

KRONFELD applies postmodernist literary theory to modern Hebrew poetry. Concerned with the apparent contradictions in such notions as "marginality" and "canonization" as they apply to belles lettres, Kronfeld attempts to redefine the terms through her study of Hebrew (and Yiddish) poetry. The book is marked by substantial use of technical language, but Kronfeld's interpretations of individual poems by writers such as Esther Raab, David Fogel, and Amichai are both discerning and instructive.

JACOBSON's book focuses on the use of biblical sources in modern Hebrew poetry. His study is limited primarily to lyrical poetry written after Israeli independence, from the late 1940s to the early 1990s. Dividing the chapters along topical lines, Jacobson concentrates on contemporary issues such as the Israeli-Arab conflict and the tension between religion and secularism in Israel. Jacobson's book has a clear political agenda, seeking to dispute "the assumption of many religious Jewish Israelis that territorial compromise with the Arabs is in violation of biblical teachings." Unfortunately, the polemical nature of this book detracts from its usefulness as an objective source, marring what is otherwise a thorough and enlightening analysis of biblical motifs in modern Israeli poetry.

KOHN investigates how modern Hebrew poets have responded in verse to the destruction of European Jewry during World War II. He identifies the poems according to "psychological" categories and divides his chapters accordingly, employing such headings as "The State of Shock," "Despair," and "Confession." Of particular value are the citations from poems written by lesser-known Hebrew poets from within the ghettos of Nazi Europe. Unfortunately, Kohn cites only portions of the poems under discussion, rather than presenting works in their entirety. This approach leaves the reader uncertain as to whether Kohn's interpretations are sustainable. This book also lacks an index, which, given the admirable breadth of material that Kohn treats, would have made it considerably more useful for reference purposes.

SHARON GREEN

Poetry: American Jewish

- Bloom, Harold, "The Sorrows of American Jewish Poetry," Commentary, 53(3), March 1972
- Gitenstein, R. Barbara, Apocalyptic Messianism and Contemporary Jewish-American Poetry (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish Literature and Culture), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1986
- Gitenstein, R. Barbara, "American-Jewish Poetry: An Overview," in Handbook of American-Jewish Literature: An Analytical Guide to Topics, Themes, and Sources, edited by Lewis Fried, New York: Greenwood, 1988
- Hollander, John, "The Question of Jewish American Poetry," Tikkun, 3(3), May/June 1988
- Liptzin, Solomon, The Jew in American Literature, New York: Bloch, 1966
- Mersand, Joseph, Traditions in American Literature: A Study of Jewish Characters and Authors, New York: Modern Chapbooks, 1932
- Pacernick, Gary, Sing a New Song: American Jewish Poetry since the Holocaust (Brochure Series of the American Jewish Archives, no. 9), Cincinnati, Ohio:

American Jewish Archives, 1991

American Jewish poetry has been overshadowed by the American Jewish novel, and as result, much of the scholarly work on this body of writing has been conducted as a sidebar to studies of American Jewish fiction. While there are numerous excellent studies on such individual American Jewish poets as Delmore Schwartz, Charles Reznikoff, and Allen Ginsberg—often including some analysis of their poetry's Jewish content—and a few chapters and articles about American Jewish poetry, there have been almost no book-length studies. Readers are therefore obliged to scan a variety of sources for scant material on the subject. Apart from the works discussed here, readers are encouraged to pursue periodicals such as Studies in American Jewish Literature, Judaism, and the Jewish Book Annual, all of which occasionally contain essays about poetry and review individual collections as they appear.

BLOOM's famous essay can perhaps be partially blamed for the lack of critical studies on this topic. His forcefully argued dismissal of Jewish American poets' accomplishments cast a critical shadow over the field from which, in some ways, it still struggles to emerge. In the midst of his expressions of disappointment, Bloom does manage some useful discussion of Reznikoff and Karl Shapiro. However, this article is perhaps more notable for its dismissive tone than for any of its insights.

GITENSTEIN (1988) is as complete as a brief essay can be. Discussing a variety of authors from the early poets Penina Moïse and Emma Lazarus through some writers born in the 1940s and 1950s, Gitenstein's study is wide-ranging and generally accurate. One could add a number of poets to her discussion—Philip Levine is missing, as are Gerald Stern and Ginsberg—but one must take the brevity of the essay into account, and her discussion of some poets who are often overlooked, such as Jack Hirschman and Irving Feldman, is excellent.

GITENSTEIN (1986) focuses on the specific importance of apocalyptic messianism for contemporary Jewish American poetry. She discovers some compelling parallels between the less-than-mainstream strands of kabbalistic messianism in Judaism and the less-than-mainstream art of poetry, and she asserts that this messianism has had a rich influence on contemporary poets as diverse as John Hollander and Jerome Rothenberg.

For an insightful exploration of the idea of American Jewish poetry, see HOLLANDER. Hollander is himself an outstanding poet, whose work is discussed in the Gitenstein (1988) and Bloom articles listed here, and his prodigious knowledge is justifiably renowned. In this essay, he foregoes a general listing and review of poetic works in favor of an exposition of what it means to write a Jewish poem. His discussion is nuanced and extremely well informed without being overly erudite, and it is an ideal starting point for any investigation of this field.

Although frustratingly brief, the discussion on poetry in LIPTZIN is useful because it includes some of the leading Yiddish poets, particularly of the early part of the 20th century. One wishes for a more in-depth examination, but, like most critics of Jewish American literature, Liptzin is more interested in the mid-20th-century novelists than he is in the poets.

MERSAND was one of the first to attempt a comprehensive survey of Jewish American literature, including novels, plays, and poetry. Although more bibliographical than scholarly, the book gives a useful overview of the themes and writers of the decades before World War II. Mersand's survey highlights such figures as James Oppenheim, Babbette Deutsch, and Samuel Hoffenstein, who were eclipsed by later writers in subsequent studies.

PACERNICK's monograph is a brief effort to explore the Jewish content of the works of a number of contemporary Jewish American poets, including Marge Piercy, Hollander, and Reznikoff. Pacernick prefers to focus on very specific references to Judaism at the expense of any full exploration of a poet's work. However, the monograph can be a useful starting place for further research on contemporary American Jewish poets.

ADAM SOL

Poland

- Bacon, Gershon C., The Politics of Tradition: Agudat Yisrael in Poland, 1916–1939, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1996
- Dubnow, S.M., History of the Jews in Russia and Poland: From the Earliest Times until the Present Day, 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1916
- Gutman, Israel et al. (editors), The Jews of Poland between Two World Wars (Tauber Institute for the Study of European Jewry Series, 10), Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1989
- Mahler, Raphael, Hasidism and the Jewish Enlightenment: Their Confrontation in Galicia and Poland in the First Half of the Nineteenth Century, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1985
- Rosman, Murray Jay, Founder of Hasidism: A Quest for the Historical Ba'al Shem Tov (Contraversions, 5), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996
- Weinryb, Bernard D., The Jews of Poland: A Social and Economic History of the Jewish Community in Poland from 1100 to 1800, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973, 2nd edition, 1976

The name "Poland" has referred to various political entities at different times. A Polish kingdom first emerged in the late tenth century. Tied to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in a dynastic union from 1386, Poland became part of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in 1569, which at its height extended almost from the Oder River to the outskirts of Kiev. By 1795, however, the entire commonwealth had been partitioned between Russia, Austria, and Prussia. An independent Polish state was created again after the World War I, only to be repartitioned between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union in 1939. Following World War II, a Communist government ruled a portion of Poland's prewar territory; it was replaced by a parliamentary regime in 1991.

For most of its history Poland was home to one of the largest and most influential Jewish communities in the world—a situation ended by the Nazi Holocaust. This community played a central role in the development of Jewish religious law, thought, and practice. The most important scholarship about the religious life of Polish Jewry, however, has been written in Hebrew. Works in other languages have concentrated more on the political, economic, social, and organizational aspects of the community's life. An exception is the Hasidic movement, which has attracted the attention of several scholars writing in English.

DUBNOW's three-volume work is a classic survey of Polish Jewish history. The first historian of the Jews to write extensively about Eastern Europe, Dubnow saw the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth as the premier center of world Jewry in its time. His first volume traces the origins and growth of that center, its decline after the Cossack massacres of 1648 and 1649, and the absorption of its largest part into the Russian empire between 1772 and 1825. This volume includes a section on rabbinic scholarship, concentrating on the work and methods of Moses Isserles, Solomon Luria, Mordecai Jaffe, Meir Lublin, and Joel Sirkes. There are also sections discussing the impact of Lurianic Kabbalah in Poland, the growth of Musar literature, the Sabbatean and Frankist movements, the rise of Hasidism, and opposition to Hasidism among the mitnagdim and maskilim. However, these discussions are not central to the narrative, which emphasizes the function of autonomous Jewish communal institutions. The second and third volumes focus almost exclusively on the relations between Imperial Russia and the Jews, with Polish Jewry discussed mainly from the perspective of Polish-Jewish relations. Religious life is mentioned only in passing, as a backdrop to the volumes' dominant theme of secularization.

WEINRYB's work devotes the final third of its 400-plus pages to three great religious movements—Sabbateanism, Frankism, and Hasidism. Where Dubnow claimed that Sabbateanism "made a particularly deep impression in Poland," Weinryb argued that "belief in the messianism of Sabbatai Zevi either did not exist or was of little interest" there. His discussions of Frankism and Hasidism deal largely with the question of why these movements were more popular in southern Poland than in other parts of the country. This focus is in keeping with the book's main emphasis on demography, economics, and social structure. The religious phenomenology of the three movements is considered (there is even a ten-page appendix summarizing "Aspects of Hasidic Doctrine"), but Weinryb's strength and originality lie in his socioeconomic analyses.

ROSMAN's effort "to call attention to materials, interpretations, and methodological considerations that should now be taken into account" when discussing the famed founder of Hasidism, Israel Ba'al Shem Tov (the Besht), continues Weinryb's search for a contextual explanation of the movement's rise. Much of the first part of the book reconstructs the sociopolitical environment in which the Besht lived. Then, through close reading of traditional sources relating to the Besht, supplemented by relevant material from Polish archives, the discussion evaluates the Besht's relationship with his immediate community. The result is an argument that "the Besht was much more a representative and perpetuator of existing religious, social, political, and...economic realities than he was an innovator."

This portrayal of the Besht as conservative contrasts with the tendency of some earlier writers to emphasize the radical aspects of Hasidism. MAHLER was a leading exponent of this view, depicting Hasidism as a movement of social protest against a rabbinic Judaism that had made common cause with wealthy communal leaders at the expense of the masses. According to Mahler (a Marxist and Jewish nationalist), Hasidism acquired a conservative character only after 1815 when it was confronted by a new revolutionary Jewish movement, Haskalah. This movement, which developed in the parts of Poland under Russian and Austrian rule after partition, demanded that Jews acquire a modern general education; in Mahler's view it paved the way for the ever-increasing rationalization and secularization of East European Jewish life. Mahler's extensive research in Austrian and Polish archives also exposed the influence of the imperial governments on both movements.

The years from the middle of the 19th century to the reemergence of independent Poland represent a largely unexplored chapter in English-language writing on Polish Jewry, not to mention on the history of Judaism in Eastern Europe. Even with regard to the interwar period, which has seen much work published in English on modernizing movements among Polish Jews, Polish-Jewish relations, and the economic and social situation of the Jewish population, English-language studies of the Jewish religion in Poland are scarce. BACON attempts to redress this imbalance in his treatment of the orthodox political party Agudat Yisrael, but even this book deals largely with such secular concerns as organization, electoral campaigns, and communal, municipal, and parliamentary activities. Nevertheless, the well-researched chapters on ideology, youth movements, and education tell much about the religious attitudes and behaviors of traditional Jews in interwar Poland. The volume edited by GUTMAN et al. also contains important articles on rabbinic literature, the Musar movement, and religious education in Poland between the two world wars in addition to sections dealing with politics, antisemitism, socioeconomic conditions, literature, and historiography. Central aspects of modern Polish Jewish religious life, including 20th-century Hasidism, the world of the yeshivot, religious Zionism, and religious reform, remain largely untreated, however, especially in English.

DAVID ENGEL

Political Theory

- Elazar, Daniel J., Covenant and Polity in Biblical Israel: Biblical Foundations and Jewish Expressions (Covenant Tradition in Politics, vol. 1), New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction, 1995
- Melamed, Abraham, "Medieval and Renaissance Jewish Political Philosophy," in History of Jewish Philosophy

- (Routledge History of World Philosophies, vol. 2), edited by Daniel H. Frank and Oliver Leaman, New York and London: Routledge, 1997
- Sharkansky, Ira, Israel and Its Bible: A Political Analysis (Garland Reference Library of Social Science, vol. 1031), New York and London: Garland, 1996
- Walzer, Michael, Exodus and Revolution, New York: Basic Books, 1985
- Wildavsky, Aaron, The Nursing Father: Moses as a Political Leader, University: University of Alabama Press, 1984
- Wildavsky, Aaron, Assimilation Versus Separation: Joseph the Administrator and the Politics of Religion in Biblical Israel, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction, 1993

It is natural to begin with the question of whether there is any such thing as Jewish political theory. If by this term we would designate a uniform body or tradition of political philosophy, then the answer would have to be, "No." Jewish sources are rich in political insight and teaching, but they do not express that teaching in unambiguous political-philosophical treatises corresponding to Plato's Republic or Aristotle's Politics. Political teaching can be found in the Bible, in the aggadic and halakhic writings of the rabbis, in medieval philosophy and commentary, as well as in other settings. Why no political-philosophical treatises as such?

MELAMED, in his useful survey of medieval and Renaissance Jewish political thought, suggests that the writing of a treatise presupposes the distinctiveness of the political realm vis-à-vis other fields of human endeavor, as well as vis-à-vis the spiritual realm. This was possible in a Christian setting where a City of Man was juxtaposed to a City of God (and consequently politics could be distinguished as a discrete and inferior dimension), but not in a Jewish (or Muslim) setting where revelation was purported to legislate for the whole of life. Revelation, given in the form of a holy law, has as its object the creation of a holy commonwealth. Revelation is thus fundamentally political in Judaism: it intends an ideal Jewish polity as its goal.

In a sense, then, Jewish political theory is less a discrete body of thought within Judaism than simply a way of understanding Jewish thought. Whenever Jewish thinkers try to apply biblical and rabbinic teaching to the classic dilemmas of social life (individual vs. community, rights vs. duties, consent vs. dissent, grounds of legitimate authority, power and its uses, forms of governance, etc.), they are somehow employing "Jewish political theory." Yet this claim may seem too broad, for it fails to distinguish political theory from ethics or law. Although these fields of inquiry certainly overlap, some distinction is possible. For moderns, a distinguishing factor has been that political theory has had to do with the state. For Jews, however, this referent is not necessarily helpful. Jews have long lived in political communities far more compact and with considerably less power than states. Yet Jews have continued to reflect thoughtfully about what the meaning of their political experience has been. Jewish political theory is concerned with political institutions, thought, and behavior in a variety of political contexts, not just in states.

As a point of departure for constituting a broadly inclusive yet distinctive Jewish political theory, let us turn to a remarkable phenomenon: the return to the Bible as a source of political wisdom. Modern political theory began, in a sense, with the rejection of Scripture as an authoritative source of political teaching. Early modern political philosophers such as Thomas Hobbes, John Locke, and Baruch de Spinoza had to engage the Bible (the common coin of intellectual discourse in their cultures), but they did so largely to dismiss it. They wanted to found a new political teaching on a "scientific" basis. In the works considered in this article we have a late modern reversal of this early modern abandonment. Scripture, studied through the lens of traditional Jewish commentary, once again receives a politically sensitive reading. Let us consider the interpretations of four leading political scientists who, in returning to Scripture, have returned to their Jewish roots.

Wildavsky's works arise from the twin convictions that the Bible has much to say to modern political scientists and that modern political science can illuminate biblical teaching. WILDAVSKY (1984) sees the Torah as, in effect, a treatise on how Moses learned to become a leader. As a theorist, Wildavsky argues that leadership is tied to the political culture or regime in which leaders operate. Moses operated under four successive regimes, finally crafting a mixed regime of equality and hierarchy as the ideal political framework for his people. Wildavsky seeks to show how existing political theorizing on leadership can learn from Mosaic teaching and how biblical study can be enriched by attention to the political teaching embedded in the text.

WILDAVSKY (1993) contrasts the revolutionary statesman, Moses, with Joseph. Joseph represents the path not taken, an antitype to Moses. Joseph, faithful servant to Pharaoh who despoiled and enslaved the entire Egyptian people, represents the dangers of assimilation to an invidious political and religious system. While Moses led his people out of Egypt, Joseph led them in. Joseph helped to lay the basis for the despotic Egyptian regime that later enslaved Israel. In both of these books, Wildavsky sees the basic problem of Jewish history as a problem of how to participate in politics (in order to survive) without losing identity based on faith in God (and thus ceasing to survive). Using midrash, critical biblical commentary, and contemporary political theory, Wildavsky produces a reading in which sacred and secular elements are mutually supportive.

WALZER's project resembles Wildavsky's in that he also finds two basic tendencies in Jewish political experience: Exodus politics and its intemperate opposite, messianic politics. Walzer shows how the Exodus narrative is the basis of the Western radical tradition. Moses led a revolutionary regime out of which emerged a covenantal nation with its own understanding of freedom, responsibility, and social justice. This covenantal culture has been committed to the long march through history. Opposed to this is an apocalyptic mentality that wants liberation not just from historical injustice and political oppression but from history as such. This abiding temptation is a root of the mystical, radical nationalism found in some segments on the right of the Israeli spectrum today.

SHARKANSKY also orients his study of the political themes of the Bible to the situation in Israel in the 1990s. He relates traits of Israeli political culture, such as morally charged public criticism of officials, to traits of biblical political culture, such as prophecy. Taking a less reverent, more forthrightly secular approach to the Bible, Sharkansky claims that the Bible has no unambiguous political principles or teaching. Its authors and editors are responsible for a contradictory, dissonant text. That, indeed, is the Bible's greatest strength: it engendered a moral and political Jewish culture able to cope with contradiction, paradox, and compromise. Jewish political thought from the Bible on is characterized by pragmatic coping.

ELAZAR's work is the first of a four-volume historical-theoretical study of the covenant tradition in politics. The Bible is informed by a dominant albeit contested idea: covenant. Free people form themselves into a nation through voluntary association based on shared moral and religious ideals. Elazar traces the presence of significant covenantal themes in many biblical books, writes a history of biblical regimes in relation to the ideals of covenantalism, and continues the story through subsequent Jewish history. Elazar, the founder of modern Jewish political studies, has written a foundational text.

It is too early to know whether this return to Scripture is the beginning of a trend or just an idiosyncratic event. At any rate, it does constitute, in the aggregate, a Jewishly engaged expression of political theorizing.

ALAN MITTLEMAN

Portugal

Altabé, David Fintz, Spanish and Portuguese Jewry before and after 1492, Brooklyn, New York: Sepher-Hermon, 1993

Beinart, Haim, "The Conversos in Spain and Portugal in the 16th to 18th Centuries," in his Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy, vol. 1, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1992

Bodian, Miriam, Hebrews of the Portuguese Nation: Conversos and Community in Early Modern Amsterdam (Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997

Herculano, Alexandre, Historia da origem e estabelecimento da Inquisicao em Portugal, 1852; translated by John C. Branner as History of the Origin and Establishment of the Inquisition in Portugal (Stanford Studies in History, Economics, and Political Science, vol. 1, no. 2), Palo Alto, California: Stanford University Press, 1926

Kaplan, Yosef, "The Intellectual Ferment in the Spanish-Portuguese Community of Seventeenth Century Amsterdam," in Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy, vol. 1, edited by Haim Beinart, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1992

Lipiner, Elias, Two Portuguese Exiles in Castile: Dom David Negro and Dom Isaac Abravanel (Hispania Judaica, 10), Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1997

Nahon, Gérard, "From New Christians to the Portuguese Jewish Nation in France," in Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy, vol. 1, edited by Haim Beinart, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1992

Raphael, David (editor), The Expulsion 1492 Chronicles: An Anthology of Medieval Chronicles Relating to the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain and Portugal, North Hollywood, California: Carmi House, 1992

Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim, The Lisbon Massacre of 1506 and the Royal Image in the Shebet Yehudah (Hebrew Union College Annual: Supplements, no. 1), Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, 1976

Information about the first Jewish settlements in the Iberian Peninsula is sketchy, but by the time that the separate Portuguese state emerged in the 12th century, Jewish communities had been established in the territory for centuries. From the 12th century to 1497, Jews enjoyed a relatively tranquil life, living in judarias and usefully serving the monarchy, both as taxpayers and as court physicians, astrologers, astronomers, cosmographers, mathematicians, and polyglots. In return, many of them enjoyed individual privileges, concessions, and exemptions. The Portuguese Jews were organized in corporations called comunas, which were governed by the arrabi mor (chief rabbi), who had supreme authority over the Jews of the whole kingdom, and by arrabis menores (lower judges). Some restrictions on the liberty of the Jews were declared as early as the establishment of the separate kingdom, but these rules were not strictly enforced. Prior to 1497, many Jews occupied important positions: for example, Moses Navarro was chief treasurer of the kingdom during the reign of Alfonso IV (1325–1357) and Pedro I (1357–1367). His successor was Judah Aben Menir. The most famous personality in the history of Portuguese Jewry was Isaac Abravanel, who, in addition to his scholarly activities as prominent theologian and Bible commentator, was counselor and favorite of King Alfonso V (1438–1481). In 1497, capitulating to pressure from Spain, the Portuguese government mandated the conversion of its Jewish subjects to Catholicism. The later history of Portuguese Jewry is therefore divided between the story of New Christians who remained in Portugal and the experiences of those who emigrated.

In the majority of non-Portuguese books on the history of Jews in Portugal, that history is described jointly with that of Spain. The works devoted solely to Portuguese Jewry are few, and they usually focus on one aspect, one particular event, or one personality instead of providing a broad survey. This essay reviews some of the most recent English-language works on the topic, giving priority to the most broadly informative studies.

ALTABÉ describes some aspects of Jewish life in Portugal, emphasizing events between 1492 and 1497 and the lives of conversos (Jews who converted to Christianity, variously designated New Christians, Marranos, or Crypto-Jews) in the centuries following those years of persecution. He identifies several ways that Portuguese Jews were able to preserve their Jewish identities after the forcible conversion of 1497, some by escaping Portugal, some by leading double lives.

LIPINER collects and comments upon Portuguese documents from the Arquivo da Torre do Tombo related to the events that forced two important 15th-century Jewish figures, David Negro and Isaac Abravanel, to flee from Portugal to Castile. The author also provides a useful overview of the history of the Jews of Portugal, in order to place the contents of the documents in historical perspective.

BODIAN's history of Portuguese Jewry in Amsterdam begins with an account of the Portuguese conversos prior to their arrival in the Netherlands. The author does not focus on the details of historical events; instead, she concentrates on analyzing the historical meanings of the term "nation" as it was used in the Iberian Peninsula to distinguish the conversos from other Christian residents. Tracking the emergence of the converso class from the Spanish pogroms of 1391, the author demonstrates that the status of converso became an inherited condition for several generations before the anti-converso violence of the late 15th century. Activities of the Inquisition and the Spanish decrees of expulsion from Spain in 1492 and of mass conversion in Portugal in 1497 triggered a new wave of conversions, and the experiences of persecution and violence prompted the New Christians to solidify their sense of shared identity apart from the rest of the population. Meanwhile the Iberian use of the term los de la nación (those of the nation) to refer to the conversos emphasized their purported ethnic or racial traits. Beginning in 1449, the racist "estatutos de limpieza de sangre" (laws regulating the "purity" of bloodlines) were instituted in Castile and later adopted by the Portuguese. Moreover, in Portugal, the application of the term "nation" to describe the conversos directly referred to the idea that Jews have historically constituted a distinct people. Following this important introductory account of the history of the conversos in Portugal, Bodian devotes the bulk of her perceptive study to the dynamic history of emigrants from that community who settled in Amsterdam, beginning in the early 17th century.

YERUSHALMI documents a tragic event in the history of the New Christians of Lisbon: the massacre perpetrated by a Christian mob in April 1506 in which between 1,200 and 1,930 conversos were killed. He compares the historical accounts of the violence in the Hebrew chronicle Shevet Yehudah, by Solomon ibn Verga, and the German account Von dem christenlichen Streyt, by an anonymous writer who reported the massacre immediately after the event. A number of King Manuel's letters and edicts concerning the episode and punishment of the perpetrators are appended to the volume.

HERCULANO's book is dated, but, with the exception of chapter one (which has been supplanted by later research), the volume remains an important source. Herculano was a pioneer in the study of the history of the Inquisition in Portugal. This study is confined to the initial period of persecution, from 1492 to 1547, but for this period, the author provides very complete and fully documented coverage, focusing objectively on such issues as King Manuel's orders concerning the abduction and baptism of Jewish children in the 1490s and their seclusion on the equatorial island of São Tomé for Catholic reeducation. The preface by Y.H. Yerushalmi clarifies important themes and motifs used by the author, providing proof of the study's historical and moral credibility.

RAPHAEL publishes numerous historical chronicles from 1492 and the period thereafter, including a few texts related to events in Portugal. For example, the Portuguese chronicles of Rui de Pina and Garcia de Resende describe conditions imposed on the Jews expelled from Spain who wished to enter Portugal; the accounts by Abraham Zacuto, Samuel Usque, Damião de Góis, and Jerónimo Osório recount tragic events that occurred between December 1496 and February 1497, including the forced baptism of Jewish children, the forced conversion of adult Jews, and the ensuing wave of suicides. Other selections (by Elijah Capsali, Abraham ben Solomon, and Abraham Saba) depict tortures of those Jews who refused to convert. The edict outlawing Judaism in Portugal and its territories is reprinted among other appendixes.

BEINART considers the status of conversos who remained in Spain and Portugal after Catholic conformity had been imposed across the peninsula. Topics discussed include the Spanish royal proclamation that promised Spanish exiles in Portugal that their property would be restored if they returned to Spain as converts; the gruesome events of December 1496 through Passover 1497; and the transformation of the entire Iberian Jewish population into a converso class after 1497. Following anti-converso rioting in 1506, King Manuel granted the conversos permission to emigrate from Portugal on 1 March 1507. Between 1507 and 1521, the conversos enjoyed a period of relative tranquility, but by 1540 a national inquisition had been established, initiating a new age of unprecedented persecution of the conversos that lasted until 1821. Although the majority of the conversos were sincere Christians, some of the documents and other putative evidence of the Inquisition suggest that among them lived some Crypto-Jews (that is, those who secretly maintained a Jewish identity or observed Jewish customs).

At different times, special permissions were given to particular conversos or entire groups of conversos to travel or to emigrate from Portugal, and many used these permissions, creating new Portuguese communities outside of Portugal. One of these communities—in France—is described in a very informative article by NAHON. He relates how the new immigrants obtained permission to settle in France and recounts how eruptions of popular antisemitism sometimes forced the conversos either to leave their towns of residence or to face severe repression. Although the Portuguese were legally permitted to settle anywhere in the French kingdom, they chose primarily to reside in such cities as Bayonne, Bordeaux, and Auch in southwestern France. Additional communities were settled on the Atlantic coast from Saint Jean de Luz to Rouen, and several small communities were established in the French interior.

KAPLAN deals with another—and undoubtedly the greatest—of such communities of Portuguese emigrants, that of Amsterdam, where many conversos were able to return to Judaism. Among those of Portuguese Jewish descent in Amsterdam were observant Jews, intellectuals who disputed rabbinic views, and atheists. The spectrum of religious and philosophical views of many conversos who grew up in a Catholic culture influenced by the thought of Aquinas and Erasmus contradicted the views of traditional Judaism to which most Portuguese emigrants returned when they settled in Amsterdam. In some cases, new immigrants refused circumcision, and a number of individuals in the Amsterdam community, such as Juan de Prado, David Farrar, and Uriel da Costa, were accused of harboring Karaite leanings. Kaplan contends that the opposition of these intellectuals to the oral tradition reflects Protestant influence on their beliefs, and he identifies the responsa of Leone Modena, the intellectualist rabbi of Venice, as a key source for grasping many of the theological controversies that arose among the Portuguese in Amsterdam.

HAYIM Y. SHEYNIN

Prague

Altshuler, David (editor), The Precious Legacy: Judaic Treasures from the Czechoslovak State Collections, New York: Summit, 1983

Cohen, Gary, "Jews in German Society: Prague 1860–1914," Central European History, 10, 1977

Dagan, Avigdor et al. (editors), The Jews of Czechoslovakia: Historical Studies and Surveys, 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1968–1983

Demetz, Peter, Prague in Black and Gold: Scenes from the Life of a European City, New York: Hill and Wang, 1997

Kieval, Hillel, The Making of Czech Jewry: National Conflict and Jewish Society in Bohemia, 1870–1918 (Studies in Jewish History), New York: Oxford University Press, 1988

Muneles, Otto (editor), Prague Ghetto in the Renaissance Period (Jewish Monuments in Bohemia and Moravia, vol. 4), Prague: Orbis, 1965

Neher, André, Jewish Thought and the Scientific Revolution of the Sixteenth Century: David Gans (1541–1613) and His Times (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), translated by D. Maisel, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986

Pawel, Ernst, The Nightmare of Reason: A Life of Franz Kafka, New York: Farrar, Straus, Giroux, and London: Harvill, 1984

For the thousand-year history of the Jews of Prague, there are two survey works, both of which are useful as a point of departure.

DEMETZ surveys all of Prague history, not only the history of its Jews. He provides a series of vignettes and studies of crucial periods in Prague's history, highlighting two features in particular. The first is the multicultural (Czech, German, Jewish, Italian) character of Prague and its long history of intergroup tensions and violence. The second is a tradition of thought, from the Middle Ages to the turn of the 21st century, that Demetz characterizes as rationalistic, practical, socially progressive, and reformist. He contrasts this tradition with the image created by other writers (as well as by the Prague tourist industry) of "Magical Prague" or "Mystical Prague." Demetz pays considerable attention to the Jewish community. His treatment of Jewish history is especially strong on the Middle Ages.

A second survey work is ALTSHULER. It is a catalog of an exhibition from the Jewish Museum in Prague and includes hundreds of exceptionally beautiful illustrations, a visual history of the community that complements the written record. It also contains a lengthy essay on the history of the Jews in Prague by Hillel Kieval. Kieval covers the history of the Prague Jewish community from its medieval origins and through the Holocaust and beyond. He discusses communal organization, politics, economics, and culture. His interpretation is upbeat, showing the vitality and cultural creativity of the Prague Jewish community and its generally positive interactions with the Christian milieu. He plays down the theme of persecution. In general the relative importance of persecution and tolerance, exclusion and assimilation has been the major focus of scholarly debate over the history of the Prague Jews.

Two periods of Prague Jewish history have attracted special attention, the Golden Age (roughly 1570 to 1620) and the period from 1870 to 1918. During the last decades of the 16th century, Prague was home to the court of the Hapsburg emperor Rudolph II, and as such the city became a center of European art and science. In the Jewish community, the Golden Age was the period of Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel (Maharal).

NEHER's biography of David Gans studies one of the outstanding scholars of the Jewish community in the time of Maharal. Gans was a historian and an astronomer who worked briefly with the Danish astronomer Tycho Brahe. Like Kieval, Neher stresses the theme of tolerance. Brahe was happy to discuss astronomy with his Jewish colleague; Gans was open-minded toward the new astronomy of Copernicus; and the Jewish community was accepting of Gans's interest in science.

The essays collected by MUNELES discuss the social and cultural history of the Prague Jews in this period. In keeping with the tendencies of Marxist history (the volume was produced under Communist rule), individual personalities, such as Maharal and Gans within the Jewish community and Rudolph II outside it, are not emphasized. Two essays on social history document the polarization of Prague Jewry during this period into the very wealthy and the very poor. They also stress the ongoing hatred of Jews among the Christian population of Prague. Two other essays briefly survey the religious and artistic works produced by Prague Jews in this period. This is practically a "coffee-table book"; there are many beautiful illustrations but no footnotes.

The second period that has attracted extensive scholarly attention, the turn of the 20th century, roughly 1870–1920, is the period of Franz Kafka. KIEVAL presents the story of the Jewish community in this period as a classic Zionist narrative. The period of political liberalism in the mid-19th century was accompanied by widespread Jewish assimilation. Assimilation in Bohemia could move, however, in either of two directions: toward German culture or toward Czech culture. The surge of political antisemitism in about 1890 brought about the rise of Zionism in Prague and Bohemia and a renewed consciousness of Jewish national identity.

COHEN, by contrast, regards the trend toward assimilation into German culture as the predominant one in this period. He warns against a tendency to assign Czech and Jewish national identities to 19th-century Prague Jews. People should, he argues, see them as they saw themselves, that is, as Germans who happened to be Jewish by religion.

Much of the study of Prague Jews in this period centers around Kafka, and his life provides insight into the Jewish community of the period. PAWEL locates Kafka within a social context of Jewish family, friends, and fellow writers, and Pawel provides sketches of a great many of them. He also shows Kafka's contacts with the larger world of Jewish culture: the visiting Yiddish theater, the Zionist movement, and the Hasidim whom Kafka met at Czech health resorts. In Pawel's view, however, Kafka's contact with Jewish religion was quite minimal and overwhelmingly negative. He suggests a reading of Kafka (and by extension, of a large part of Prague Jewry) close to Isaac Deutscher's model of the "non-Jewish Jew."

The major work on the period 1918 to 1948, including the Holocaust period, is DAGAN's three-volume collection of essays. The essays are very diverse and focus generally on Czechoslovakian Jewry, rather than specifically on Prague Jewry. They survey, among other topics, the arts, literature, music, sports, the Zionist movement, synagogues, the legal status of Jews and Judaism, and Jewish involvement in the Czech economy and politics. The essays are long on facts and lists and short on interpretation. Prague Jews occupy a dominant place in many of these essays; in some (such as the essay on literature), nearly everyone discussed is a Prague Jew. The excellent essays on the Holocaust period (volume three) provide a detailed narrative of the destruction of Prague Jewry and their road, together with the other Jews of Bohemia and Moravia, through Terezin to the death camps. An essay by Erich Kulka tells the much less widely known story of armed resistance to the Nazis among Czechoslovak Jews.

JOSEPH M. DAVIS

Prayer see Liturgy, History of; Liturgy, Reform

Priesthood: Biblical

Blenkinsopp, Joseph, Sage, Priest, Prophet: Religious and Intellectual Leadership in Ancient Israel (Library of Ancient Israel), Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/Knox, 1995

Grabbe, Lester L., Priests, Prophets, Diviners, Sages: A Socio-Historical Study of Religious Specialists in Ancient Israel, Valley Forge, Pennsylvania: Trinity Press International, 1995

Haran, Menahem, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel: An Inquiry into the Character of Cult Phenomena and the Historical Setting of the Priestly School, Oxford: Clarendon, 1977; as Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel: An Inquiry into Biblical Cult Phenomena and the Historical Setting of the Priestly School, Winona Lake, Indiana: Eisenbrauns, 1985

Knohl, Israel, Mikdash ha-demamah, 1992; translated as The Sanctuary of Silence: The Priestly Torah and the Holiness School, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1995

Levine, Baruch, Numbers 1–20: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (Anchor Bible, vol. 4), New York: Doubleday, 1993

Milgrom, Jacob, Leviticus 1–16: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (Anchor Bible, vol. 3), New York: Doubleday, 1991

Priests (kohanim) were the primary actors in the biblical pattern of divine worship. Although all Israel was intended to form a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exodus 19:6), the sanctity of the people was symbolized by the priesthood, which became a basic element of ancient Israelite civilization. The kohanim were distinguished from the tribe of Levi, which was recognized as having a special religious status secondary to that of the priests. As evidenced by the common use of the term khn, the institution of the priesthood was widespread in the ancient Near East, although the qualifications and purposes of such priests may have been different in each religion.

In the biblical period, the tasks of the kohanim included officiating at rituals connected to the sacrificial system; blessing the people; sounding the trumpets on festivals and new moons; blowing the shofar on Yom Kippur of the Jubilee year as well as on the first day of the seventh month and whenever the Ark of the Covenant was moved; ascertaining the will of God through oracular means; determining and treating impurities on the skin, clothing, or buildings; working with the elders to judge the people; and more generally preserving traditions and instructing the people.

While in the age of the Tabernacle and Temple, the kohanim were essential to the sacrificial ritual; following the destruction of the Temple, the role of the kohanim was significantly altered. Their presence was not necessary for public prayer to take place in the synagogue. Nonetheless, a restricted status for kohanim was preserved because it was assumed that the holiness of the kohanim did not end with the destruction of the Temple. The priests were given both social and legal recognition that has continued, in some form, throughout Jewish history.

HARAN discusses the history of the priesthood and the cult of ancient Israel. He explores the history of the priesthood and contends that in open cultic areas outside of cities, there was neither regular sacrifice nor priestly officiants. Permanent sanctuaries, however, were the domain of the priests and were not places of community worship. Haran examines the differences among various biblical sources regarding the relationship between the Levitical tribe and the priests. He differentiates sharply between the hypothetical documents posited by higher criticism as biblical source material. Thus, he maintains that in P sources, the Levites were always set aside as a priestly tribe and that the Zadokite priesthood was not a predecessor to the Aaronide priesthood but a refinement of it. On the other hand, he identifies a common orientation to the priesthood in J, E, and D: all males from the tribe of Levi were eligible to serve as priests, but only if they were in the chosen place.

KNOHL suggests that the Holiness Code (H) is not merely a literary unit that forms part of the Priestly Source (P). Instead, H represents a later effort by the priests to fuse the realm of ritual with legal and social rules. The priesthood responded to the prophetic critique of the religious and social problems of the eighth century B.C.E. by infusing holiness with moral content, applying it to the whole community (not just the priests) and extending it to the entire land of Israel (not only the sanctuary). MILGROM agrees with Knohl's dating and situating of H, but he argues that the cultic-ritual legislation of the first part of Leviticus encompassed ethical elements, so that this characteristic of the Holiness Code was not a radically new development. He disputes Knohl's contention that the priesthood was a closed group that barred the laity from access to the sanctuary. To the contrary, Milgrom argues that while elitists formed a zealous hereditary elite, they ensured that the ordinary householder was given a degree of access to elements of the Israelite cult without parallel in the ancient Near East. Following Yehezkel Kaufmann, Milgrom contends that only the sacrificial act was carried out in silence and that the evidence is compelling that music, psalms, and the priestly blessing were used as part of the cult. Knohl, however, argues that the entire sanctuary ritual was conducted in silence to distinguish it from the magical incantations associated with other ancient religions.

In LEVINE's commentary, he argues that Numbers is not an idealized and unrealistic source of information about the kohanim. To the contrary, Numbers reflects a dimension of religious praxis that is far more realistic than are prophetic pronouncements. Levine contends that the Tabernacle traditions and other compilations of priestly material are later developments, for other sources do not refer to the priest-Levite stratification that he traces to the exilic policy of Ezekiel 44. He also argues that the Levites in Leviticus may not be different from Deuteronomy, in which priests and Levites are interchangeable terms.

In the course of a "history from below," GRABBE examines the priests, one of many classes of "religious specialists" in ancient Israel. He recognizes the methodological difficulties of reconstructing the history of the Bible, but he claims that textual hints, cross-cultural comparisons, and some "authentic" texts allow for the writing of social history. He reviews numerous biblical references to priests as well as cross-cultural parallels in order to articulate a description of the functions, duties, and structure of the priesthood. Grabbe notes that while cultic functions were exclusive to the priests, the duties and skills of the kohanim occasionally overlapped with those of the diviner and the sage, and he posits that some priests were also prophets and scribes, resulting in a complex pattern of interaction among various religious authorities.

BLINKINSOPP also presents a social history of the intellectual leadership in Israel as exercised by sage, priest, and prophet, but he emphasizes the difficulty in tracing the history of the priesthood and the particular challenges presented by ancient sources as a basis for an anthropologically grounded history. Echoing Max Weber, Blinkinsopp notes that the crucial difference between prophet and priest is that the priest alone is appointed, so his salvific authority is derived by virtue of office and not through charisma. The role of the priest was to facilitate ritual and to maintain the continuous operation of the cult with its sacred norms, places, and times. This role required specialized training and resulted in an intellectual tradition particular to the priesthood. Priests also served as diviners and teachers, but not preachers. The relationship between the Aaronide, Zadokite, and Levite priesthoods is presented as being complex and uncertain, and the gradual demise of the priesthood after the destruction of the Second Temple is discussed as part of a transition to the nascent rabbinic tradition.

BARUCH FRYDMAN KOHL

See also Priesthood: Postbiblical

Priesthood: Postbiblical

- Cohen, Stuart A., The Three Crowns: Structures of Communal Politics in Early Rabbinic Jewry, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990
- Goodblatt, David, The Monarchic Principle: Studies in Jewish Self-Government in Antiquity (Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum, 38), Tübingen: Mohr (Siebeck), 1994
- Liver, Jacob, "'The Sons of Zadok the Priests' in the Dead Sea Sect," Revue de Qumran, 21(6), 1967
- Olyan, Saul M., "Ben Sira's Relationship to the Priesthood," Harvard Theological Review, 80(3), 1987
- Schürer, Emil, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.–A.D. 135), vol. 2, revised and edited by Geza Vermes and Fergus Millar, Edinburgh: Clark, 1979
- Schwartz, Seth, Josephus and Judaeon Politics (Columbia Studies in the Classical Tradition, 18), New York: Brill, 1990
- Smallwood, E.M., "High Priests and Politics in Roman Palestine," Journal of Theological Studies, 13, 1962
- Stern, M., "Aspects of Jewish Society: The Priesthood and Other Classes," in The Jewish People in the First Century (Compendia rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum), vol. 2, edited by Stern and S. Safrai, Assen: Van Gorcum, 1975

Priesthood emerged from the biblical period to become a dominant factor in Jewish society during the Second Temple era. To a large extent, a study of the vicissitudes of the priesthood is necessarily a study of the political and social history of the Jewish people in Judea during the Second Temple period.

The state of the priesthood during the early Hellenistic period is addressed by OLYAN in his discussion of the relationship between the Book of Ben Sira and the priesthood. Beginning with the premise that Ben Sira was himself a priest, the author attempts to locate Ben Sira in his priestly context. Olyan argues that on the issue of priesthood, Ben Sira's ideology was faithful to the priestly writings of the Pentateuch. Ben Sira supported the pan-Aaronide priesthood and wrote polemics against other views of the priesthood, such as the exclusionary Zadokite and inclusive Levite ideologies.

LIVER examines the unique degree of authority and leadership ascribed to the sons of Zadok in the literature of the Dead Sea Sect (DSS). He also discusses some of the issues surrounding the priesthood in general relating to the DSS, noting that references to the sons of Zadok appear frequently in, and seem to be peculiar to, the sectarian literature. Zadokite lineage is generally assumed to be an important component in the origins of the DSS, and many scholars suppose that the DSS split from the wider community on the basis of a claim that the Hasmonean clan lacked the legitimate Zadokite lineage required by custom to fulfill their leadership role in the temple. Liver compares other sources that stress the sons of Zadok, such as the Books of Ezekiel and Ben Sira. He concludes that references to sons of Zadok reflect both the prominence of the Zadokite line in the era when the literature was written and the importance of members of Zadokite descent among the founders of the DSS, but, he argues, there is insufficient evidence to prove that sectarian opposition to the Hasmoneans was based on the claim that the Hasmoneans were not Zadokites. His analysis suggests that references to the sons of Zadok in the literature of the DSS do not imply controversy over, or opposition to, other priestly categories. In general, Zadokite priests are mentioned in conjunction with their position of authority within the sect and not in relation to cultic matters. In short, there is no sign of a polemical tone in the references to the sons of Zadok.

GOODBLATT theorizes that priestly, monarchic hegemony was the rule throughout the Second Temple period, thereby disputing the widely held view that a national council, sometimes called the gerousia or Sanhedrin, shared leadership roles with the high priesthood and occasionally surpassed that office in importance during this period. This council was at most, he argues, a local Jerusalem council, not a national institution. His source analysis is systematic and thorough. His discussion of priestly ideology is particularly fascinating. Further studies may lead to a more nuanced conclusion, but Goodblatt's research has greatly challenged the theory that the council and high priesthood shared authority. This volume is rich in source material; the author's style is a little wordy, but the book is very readable.

The updated and revised edition of SCHÜRER's monumental history contains a detailed account of the priesthood throughout the Second Temple period and describes the social stratification of the priesthood. The book provides an informative, systematic description of the Temple and its administration and offers an excursus on the evolution of the various priestly entitlements and emoluments. The copious notes help to make this book a reservoir of source material and relevant scholarly research.

The social and political influence of the priesthood as a class are probed by STERN. Although his essay concentrates on the first century C.E., the author also examines issues pertaining to the rise in priestly hegemony in the previous centuries, especially around the time of the Hasmonean revolt. Stern highlights the internal aspects of the priestly divisions, such as the family ties that helped determine priestly allegiances, in particular among the high priestly families, and he evaluates how these relationships colored the social interactions and politics of the time.

SMALLWOOD considers the role of the high priesthood in the politics and intrigue of the period between the end of Herod's reign and 70 C.E. Josephus recorded two very different accounts of the part played by the high priesthood in the revolt against Rome of 66–70 C.E. In his earlier account, The Jewish War, Josephus intentionally cleared the high priests of active complicity in the actions of the Jewish war camp, but he contradicts this account in his later depiction of the events, Jewish Antiquities. Smallwood examines these discrepancies and concludes that high priests were more involved in the anti-Roman politics before and during the revolt than Josephus was eager to acknowledge.

Like Smallwood, SCHWARTZ seeks to understand why Josephus excuses high priests from direct culpability in the revolt in The Jewish War, which was written around 80 C.E., whereas in Antiquities of the Jews, written nearly 20 years later, Josephus practically goes out of his way to incriminate the priesthood. Schwartz argues that the differences between the two chronicles reflect Josephus's changing assessment of the relative influence exerted by the various leadership groups, including the high priestly oligarchy, after 70 C.E., as well as corresponding changes in Josephus's expectations, hopes, and fears. Schwartz also discusses the integration of priests into the evolving rabbinic movement. Although Josephus abandons the cause of the high priestly families, the upper priesthood, with whom he identifies, still continues to enjoy his support.

The history of the priests after Josephus's account ends has not enjoyed a full scholarly treatment. Nevertheless, several important studies of this topic have appeared in Hebrew in recent years, and COHEN is an attempt to digest these studies and develop them into a coherent account. This book is essentially a work on Jewish political theory in the early centuries of rabbinic Judaism. Cohen describes leadership conflicts in which the rabbis emerge as the ultimate victors. The title of the volume refers to the notion that within Jewish society there were three separate "crowns," that is, competing claimants for terrestrial power: the priesthood, royalty, and the possessors of Torah scholarship. Royalty was represented by the various claimants to Davidic lineage: the Patriarchs in Palestine and the Exilarchs in Babylonia. According to Cohen, the priests began to decline in influence following the destruction of the Temple. This decline was gradual, however, and priests competed with the rising rabbinic ethos for a couple more centuries. Much remains to be studied in this fascinating period of change, and the author's tripartite model may well be too simplistic to account for all the diversity that characterized Jewish society in late antiquity. Recent epigraphic discoveries in Palestine, as well as studies on piyyut (liturgical poetry) and Genizah documents all raise the possibility that priests may have continued contending for the leadership in Jewish society for many more centuries than Cohen admits.

GEOFFREY HERMAN

See also Priesthood: Biblical

Printing, Early Hebrew

Amram, David W., The Makers of Hebrew Books in Italy: Being Chapters in the History of the Hebrew Printing Press, Philadelphia: Greenstone, 1909; London: Holland, 1963

Hill, Brad S. (editor), Incunabula, Hebraica and Judaica: Five Centuries of Hebraica and Judaica, Rare Bibles, and Hebrew Incunables from the Jacob M. Lowy Collection: Exhibition Catalogue, Ottawa, Ontario: National Library of Canada, 1981

- Hill, Brad S., Hebraica (Saec. X ad Saec. XVI): Manuscripts and Early Printed Books from the Library of the Valmadonna Trust: An Exhibition at the Pierpont Morgan Library New York, London: Valmadonna Trust Library, 1989
- Hill, Brad S., Books Printed on Vellum in the Collections of the British Library, compiled by R.C. Alston, with a Catalogue of Hebrew Books Printed on Vellum compiled by Brad Sabin Hill, London: British Library, 1996
- Offenberg, A.K., Hebrew Incunabula in Public Collections: A First International Census (Bibliotheca Humanistica and Reformatorica, vol. 47), Nieuwkoop: De Graaf, 1990
- Offenberg, A.K., "The Spread of Hebrew Printing," in The Image of the Word: Jewish Tradition in Manuscripts and Printed Books: Catalogue of an Exhibition Held at the Jewish Historical Museum, Amsterdam (14 September–25 November 1990), Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Library and Jewish Historical Museum, 1990
- Offenberg, A.K., A Choice of Corals: Facets of Fifteenth-Century Hebrew Printing (Bibliotheca Humanistica and Reformatorica, vol. 52), Nieuwkoop: De Graaf, 1992
- Popper, William, The Censorship of Hebrew Books, New York: Knickerbocker, 1899; reprint, with introduction by Moshe Carmilly-Weinberger, New York: Ktav, 1969

The apostles of Gutenberg's epoch-making invention of 1450 were itinerant Germans who carried their printing presses throughout the Holy Roman Empire and over the Alps. Within 20 years their apprentices had come to include Jews, and specifically German Jewish refugees in Italy, who had begun to apply the technology of movable type to the dissemination of Hebrew literature. The decades that followed proved among the most eventful in Jewish history, and, particularly as a result of the ensuing dislocations, the earliest printing in many parts of the world, from Portugal and North Africa to the Balkans and the Middle East, was in Hebrew.

OFFENBERG (1990b) covers more than five centuries of Hebrew printing and provides a well-structured, if somewhat staccato, general introduction to the field. The presentation is primarily chronological, secondarily geographical. All major Hebrew printing centers, printers, and important printed editions are mentioned, and the article provides a number of useful bibliographical references.

Another general introduction to early Hebrew printing (in the 15th and 16th centuries) is HILL's (1989) tastefully executed catalog of Hebraica from the Valmadonna Trust Library. This work represents both the personal bibliophilic interests of the London-based collector, Jack V. Lunzer, and Hill's scholarly concerns. Almost all of the books discussed in the catalog reflect Lunzer's love of special copies (that is, those with special provenance, executed on special materials such as colored papers or parchment, or exquisitely bound), and the volume demonstrates Hill's sound knowledge of the history of Hebrew bibliography, his ability to indicate new possible areas of research, and his awareness of the importance for Hebrew bibliography of flawless indexes.

HILL (1981) is a catalog from an exhibition at the National Library of Canada in Ottawa, where the author served as curator of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection from 1979 to 1989. The volume presents a thematic overview of the history of Hebraic and Judaic books and may be considered as an incunabulum of Hill's bibliographic oeuvre.

Two works by Offenberg are important examples of modern research into Hebrew incunabula. OFFENBERG (1990a) lists 139 editions of Hebrew books that can safely be assumed to have been printed before 1501. Approximately 40 presses in Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Turkey printed these editions. Somewhat more than 2,000 copies are extant, in more than 150 collections worldwide. The census provides as much information on the individual copies as possible, and a sound introduction and indexes augment it.

OFFENBERG (1992), which borrows its title from a medieval work by Solomon ibn Gabirol, contains revised versions of seven of the author's articles about 15th-century printing, originally published between 1969 and 1990. Chapters include a highly informative overview titled "Literature on Hebrew Incunabula since the Second World War" and "A List of Copies of Hebrew Incunabula, Disappeared from Public Collections since the Outbreak of the Second World War." The value of the volume is augmented by the many x-ray photographs of watermarks related to the various works under discussion.

HILL (1996), a catalog of Hebrew books printed on vellum in the British library, is more limited in scope than the other two texts of his reviewed here. The introduction explains the chronology of printing of Hebrew texts on this deluxe material and deals with the subjects of vellum, Jewish languages, Judaica on vellum, marginal annotation, format, and provenance. The catalog contains 75 entries and includes ample bibliographical references. The Hebrew incunabula appear in a separate listing of incunabula printed on vellum, which is based on data from the British Library's automated incunabula catalog. Regrettably, this source uses different headings and slightly different romanizations than those used by Hill.

Although not always very reliable and somewhat outdated, AMRAM's work is still the only introduction to Hebrew printing in its most important center, Italy. After an introductory chapter, Amram discusses the pioneers of Hebrew printing in Italy between 1475 and 1482 (overlooking the fact that the first Hebrew incunabula were produced in Rome between 1469 and 1472). The author then considers the Soncino dynasty of printers, the famous Christian printer Daniel van Bomberghen of Venice, and Hebrew printing in other Italian towns. An especially interesting chapter is devoted to the public quarrel of the two Venetian printers Giustiniani and Bragadini over an edition of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, a dispute which would eventually lead to the condemnation of the Talmud by the Catholic Church and a halt to Hebrew printing in the city of Venice.

Christian reservations about the publication of Jewish books is the topic of POPPER's fascinating and groundbreaking work on censorship, which provides a detailed, if often outdated, discussion of the strategies of the Inquisitions, as well as of the reactions of the Jews. Special attention is paid to the late 16th and early 17th centuries (what Popper calls the "Golden Era") in Italy, during which time most Hebrew books that came from Italian presses were checked and often expurgated by such Christian censors as Camillo Jaghel and Luigi da Bologna. Popper's illustrated list of Italian censors, with identifications of their often hardly legible signatures, is particularly useful. Carmilly-Weinberger's introduction to the 1969 reprint updates Popper's insights, placing his work in a wider historical perspective and discussing the significance of Jewish self-censorship in early modern times.

EMILE G.L. SCHRIJVER

Prophecy

Aune, David, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1983

Barton, John, Oracles of God: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel after the Exile, London: Darton, Longman, and Todd, 1986; New York: Oxford University Press, 1988

Blenkinsopp, Joseph, A History of Prophecy in Israel from the Settlement in the Land to the Hellenistic Period, Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983; London: SPCK, 1984; 2nd edition, Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster John Knox, 1996

Heschel, Abraham J., The Prophets, 2 vols., New York: Harper and Row, 1962

Heschel, Abraham J., Prophetic Inspiration after the Prophets: Maimonides and Other Medieval Authorities, edited by Morris Fierstein, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1996

Kaufmann, Yehezkel, Toldot ha-emunah ha-Yisre'elit, 1937; translated and abridged by Moshe Greenberg as The Religion of Israel: From Its Beginnings to the Babylonian Exile, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, and London: Allen and Unwin, 1960

Kaufmann, Yehezkel, History of the Religion of Israel, vol. IV: From the Babylonian Captivity to the End of Prophecy, translated by C.W. Efraymson, New York: Ktav, 1977

Scholem, Gershom, Sabbatai Sevi: The Mystical Messiah, 1626–1676, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973

Sommer, Benjamin, "Did Prophecy Cease? Evaluating a Re-evaluation," Journal of Biblical Literature, 115(1), 1996

von Rad, Gerhard, The Message of the Prophets, New York: Harper and Row, 1965; London: SCM, 1968

Wilson, Robert, Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980

Several book-length discussions of biblical prophecy and the work of individual prophets are available. VON RAD begins with a discussion of general issues: the literary and theological traditions within which individual prophets worked, major concepts running through most of the prophetic literature, and speculation regarding the nature of prophets' experiences and of their claims to knowledge of the divine will. Discussions of the classical or literary prophets follow, focusing on the message of each prophet rather than on the literary history of each text (though he does not completely ignore the latter issue). Von Rad pays little attention to preclassical prophets such as Elijah and Elisha in this book.

HESCHEL (1962) devotes a great deal of attention (especially in his second volume) to the nature of the revelations the biblical prophets experienced. He examines the philosophical implications of their utterances and of their claims to have had contact with the divine. Further, he analyzes the image of God that emerges from the prophetic corpus; this part of his discussion has many points of contact with his works on rabbinic and modern Jewish thought. Heschel's first volume includes summaries of the messages of selected prophetic books; as in von Rad, scant notice is given to the preclassical figures. Although he is aware of questions regarding the composition of prophetic books, Heschel devotes his energies to elucidating the texts themselves, not to reconstructing their history. His presentations of these texts are vivid and readable.

A very different approach emerges from the work of BLENKINSOPP. He is especially interested in the connections among preclassical, classical, and post-exilic prophecy, and thus he provides more of a historical narrative on the growth and changes within Israelite prophecy and less of a theological work than von Rad or Heschel. He also provides an excellent history of scholarship, reviewing in a clear and lively fashion the various trends that have emerged since the mid-19th century. Blenkinsopp is especially interested in the redaction of the biblical texts. He devotes a great deal of attention to three questions: How much of a prophetic book is likely to record the actual teachings of the prophet? To what extent did later disciples or editors alter or enlarge the text, and to what ends? What is the relation between a prophet and the book that bears the prophet's name?

A significant counterbalance to Blenkinsopp's approach appears in the work of KAUFMANN (1937). Writing decades before Blenkinsopp, Kaufmann responds to the assumptions underlying the later scholar's work. He provides strong arguments that most prophetic books underwent little editorial revision after they were composed by the prophet (though he acknowledges, of course, that some books—for example, Isaiah—are composite works). His discussions of individual books, in which he focuses on their historical setting as well as their place in the development of Israelite religion, are exemplary. Each figure emerges from his presentation as an individual; Kaufmann does not neglect the extent to which prophets took issue with each other and with other streams of biblical tradition. His treatment of prophets up until Ezekiel appears in his 1937 work; he discusses prophets after Ezekiel in KAUFMANN (1977).

WILSON is also interested in the development of prophecy and Israelite religion, but he uses a more anthropological and sociological approach. He emphasizes the social location of each prophet, the extent to which the prophet was part of the power structure of his day or was a peripheral figure, and the support groups that allowed the prophet to function. His descriptions of two main streams of Israelite prophecy may not be valid, but his review both of the history of biblical scholarship on prophecy and of anthropological descriptions of prophets and mediums throughout the world is enormously helpful. Further, he includes an excellent discussion of prophecy in the ancient Near Eastern societies out of which Israel grew.

Prophecy remains a relevant topic for Jewish studies outside the biblical period. BARTON describes how prophetic texts became canonical in the Second Temple period (indeed, his discussion of the formation of the biblical canon is one of the finest available), and he shows how other literature, such as apocalyptic texts, took the place of prophecy. AUNE presents early Christianity as a prophetic movement, emphasizing points of contact between early Christians on the one hand and biblical prophecy, apocalyptic and messianic prophets of the Second Temple period, and Greco-Roman prophetic figures on the other. He also argues against the position (found in Kaufmann [1977]) that biblical prophecy declined early in the Second Temple period and maintains that prophets continued to flourish up until and after the destruction of the Second Temple. A similar thesis appears in HESCHEL (1996), who contends that the prophetic spirit remained active in medieval Judaism as well. Prophetic elements were particularly strong in medieval Jewish mystical circles (especially those of a messianic character), but these elements also appear on rare occasion even in halakhic literature. SOMMER argues against this thesis, however. He shows that prophecy was viewed as dormant in the various forms of Judaism that existed in the late Second Temple period, though Jews generally acknowledged that prophecy would reappear with the coming of the Messiah. An example of the resurgence of prophecy (or of the belief that prophecy had reappeared) in a messianic movement is examined by SCHOLEM in his study of the Sabbatians. Adherents of this group, like the early Christians before them, surmised that prophecy had returned along with the Messiah, who, inconveniently, committed apostasy and died. A more recent example of this sort of belief can be found among some Lubavitch hasidim, whose zeal for their dead messiah-prophet will no doubt be the topic of forthcoming studies.

BENJAMIN D. SOMMER

Prophets, Former and Latter

- Brenner, Athalya (editor), A Feminist Companion to the Latter Prophets (The Feminist Companion to the Bible, vol. 8), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995
- Bronner, Leila Leah, The Stories of Elijah and Elisha as Polemics against Baal Worship (Pretoria Oriental Series, vol. 6), Leiden: Brill, 1968
- Carroll, Robert P., When Prophecy Failed: Reactions and Responses to Failure in the Old Testament Prophetic Traditions, London: SCM, 1979
- Gunn, David M., The Fate of King Saul: An Interpretation of a Biblical Story (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, vol. 14), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1980
- Long, V. Philips, The Reign and Rejection of King Saul: A Case for Literary and Theological Coherence (Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series, vol. 118), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1989
- Rost, Leonhard, Die Überlieferung von der Thronnachfolge Davids, 1926; translated by Michael D. Rutter and David

- M. Gunn as The Succession to the Throne of David, Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1982
- Watts, James W. and Paul R. House (editors), Forming Prophetic Literature: Essays on Isaiah and the Twelve in Honor of John D.W. Watts, Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996
- Wilson, Robert R., Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980

The very different types of literature in the Former and Latter Prophets sections of the canon have resulted in sharply differing approaches being used to interpret them. Much of the recent research on the former prophets, for example, has consisted of narrative-critical studies and detailed analyses of major characters within the narrative.

LONG's doctoral dissertation considers the 1 Samuel account of the life of King Saul from a narratological perspective, and it is typical of the new-critical, narrative-based analysis that was common in the 1970s and 1980s. Long identifies a number of key historical and theological issues provoked by the Saul texts, which have proven troublesome to interpreters for many years—particularly the interpretative crux of 1 Samuel 10:7–8 and the claim of Saul's rejection by God—and suggests that these problems result from difficulties with the literary interpretation of the text. Having considered some specific features of Hebrew narrative style, he then proceeds to use the insights of contemporary literary approaches and concludes that 1 Samuel is broadly neutral on the question of kingship in general and rather critical of Saul himself, but that it holds an extremely negative view of the people's request for a king. Long takes account of the work of Gunn but differs from him on a number of points of detail, and in particular he sees little reason to blame God for his treatment of Saul. Rather, in his view it is the people who are to blame for their unreasonable request.

GUNN sees the story of King Saul's life as a work of high tragedy in the same tradition as King Oedipus, Macbeth, Tess of the D'Urbervilles, and the like, and also as a piece of writing exhibiting immense literary skill and a highly significant moral dimension. Gunn is troubled by God's treatment of Saul, whom he sees as doomed to failure not because of his own waywardness or disobedience but largely because of the intervention in Saul's life of "forces beyond his control." Israel's first king therefore becomes a victim of circumstance—and of the deity—as much as of his own stupidity. In particular, he has to deal with many more obstacles to and restrictions upon his rule than his successor David. Gunn traces these themes throughout the life of Saul and concludes by summarizing the characterization of Saul and God in the Deuteronomistic History. He examines in particular Saul's jealousy and his knowledge of his rejection and God's readiness to condemn Saul, even to manipulate him by sending an evil spirit upon him.

Although his suggestions have come under increasing criticism in recent years, ROST is a classic and is fundamental for any study of the united monarchy. Based on a detailed source-critical analysis of Samuel and Kings, Rost postulates an originally independent Succession Narrative written early in Solomon's reign, presumably by an author from within the court, and demonstrates how it seeks to justify the ascent of Solomon to his father's throne. The Succession Narrative along with the story of the ark and Nathan's prophecy to David in 2 Samuel 7 are then examined in detail in a masterpiece of "tendency criticism," as Rost investigates the historical circumstances of the end of David's reign and the beginning of Solomon's and outlines the distinctive theological perspectives of the various authors.

BRONNER seeks an explanation for the strong miraculous element in the biblical narratives concerning Elijah and Elisha. Rejecting the scholarly tendency to rationalize the miracle stories away or see them as legendary and secondary additions to the genuine historical data contained in the narratives, she argues that they have a vital role to play. She sees the battle for ascendancy between Ba'al and YHWH as being a key theme of the biblical text, and she suggests that these "wonder stories" feature strongly in the comparison of YHWH, the living and active God, and the inactive, impotent, and incompetent Ba'al. They are primarily a polemic against paganism. The miraculous elements of the text are therefore essential to the author's rhetorical strategy and serve to magnify the deity rather than his servants the prophets. In support of her thesis, Bronner finds parallels in Ugaritic literature that confirm her suspicions, noting how both Elisha and Elijah seem to have powers that in the pagan sources are ascribed to Ba'al alone, such as control over the weather, the ability to resurrect the dead, the privilege of ascending to heaven, and so on. By giving YHWH authority over these powers, the biblical narrator is seeking to reject the claim of Ba'al to any sort of authority and thus to undermine popular conceptions of Canaanite mythology.

Turning to the latter prophets, a number of important works have enhanced understanding of what prophecy is and how it relates as a phenomenon both to ancient Israel and to biblical scholars and faith communities today. CARROLL's classic book uses the social-psychological concept of cognitive dissonance to seek an explanation for the surprisingly large number of apparent "failed" prophecies in the Hebrew Bible. Dissonance theory considers the result of a subject holding two mutually contradictory beliefs or pieces of data and examines how such scenarios are resolved or avoided. In terms of biblical prophecy, Carroll demonstrates how failed prophecies may be reinterpreted by the community and examines the response of believers within and without the text to "disconfirmed" or contradicted predictions and statements, looking at their attempts to bridge the gap between expectation and reality. Working from the observation that "dissonance gives rise to hermeneutic," Carroll shows how religious communities have dealt with cognitive dissonance by qualifying and reinterpreting one or other of the cognitions, by appealing to the need for faith, or by understanding their circumstances differently or working to change them to avoid dissonance in the first place. He concludes that popular frustration at this continuing reinterpretation may have been among the causes of the rapid demise of classical prophecy after the exile and the move toward the less easily verifiable apocalyptic.

WILSON's book is perhaps one of the clearest and most thorough of the many great introductions to the prophetic phenomenon that have appeared in the second half of the 20th century. Writing again from a sociological perspective, he stresses the need for an interdisciplinary approach to understanding biblical prophecy, one that will stretch across the boundaries of time and location as well as social context. Wilson examines apparently prophetic or mystic figures in contemporary societies, considering whether concepts of possession, divination, and manticism prevalent in tribal societies today are able to throw any light on biblical understandings of the prophet as an intermediary between God and humans. He then applies those conclusions to the available extrabiblical evidence from the ancient Near East before applying the results of his background research to an analysis of prophetism in Israel and Judah, which reveals a number of notable differences in prophetic activity between the twin states. Wilson also establishes a distinction between the central prophets, who apparently desired to work within the system for change (or sometimes to maintain the status quo), and peripheral prophets, who rejected the traditions and ideologies of their society to the extent that they became outcasts and found it necessary to critique their nation from outside. Wilson's work offers helpful insights into prophetic origins and development, and it provides convincing explanations for the different functions of some prophetic figures within the text and the contrasting ways in which they appear to be received by their audiences.

How prophetic books actually came into being is an entirely different question, however. It is very difficult to classify the prophetic books in terms of a common genre and equally hard to explain their historical development, how they came to be the kind of books they are now, and even how they came into existence. The series of essays collected by WATTS and HOUSE seeks to address such questions as these, regarding the nature and formation of prophecy in its literary form from a number of different methodological standpoints, including those of textual criticism, close synchronic reading of the text, tradition history, and redaction criticism. This diversity of approaches results in a wide variety of conclusions that highlight still further the very real problems that need to be tackled by any explanation of the origins of the prophetic books.

BRENNER's book, one of a series on the various subsets of the Hebrew canon, consists of a number of essays written by feminist or feminist-influenced biblical scholars. It is divided into three sections. The first considers the case of Hosea and his marriage to Gomer, which often has presented scholars with an ethical dilemma. Brenner's second section turns to the problem of "pornoprophets," the vivid and explicitly sexual imagery that appears in many prophetic texts, often seeming to glorify sexual and physical assault and the brutal humiliation of women for the pleasure and fantasy of men. A third section consists of a solitary essay by Nancy Bowen on the characterization of God in the prophetic books that questions his trustworthiness as a character, especially when he appears intent on deception.

Prophets, Twelve Minor

- Barton, John, Amos's Oracles against the Nations: A Study of Amos 1.3–2.5 (Society for Old Testament Study, vol. 6), Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1980
- Carroll R[odas], Mark Daniel, Contexts for Amos: Prophetic Poetics in Latin American Perspective (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, vol. 132), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1992
- Hasel, Gerhard F., Understanding the Book of Amos: Basic Issues in Current Interpretations, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1991
- House, Paul R., The Unity of the Twelve (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, vol. 97), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1990
- King, Philip, Amos, Hosea, Micah: An Archaeological Commentary, Philadelphia: Westminster, 1988
- Nogalski, James, Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve (Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, vol. 217), Berlin and New York: de Gruyter, 1993
- Nogalski, James, Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, vol. 218), Berlin and New York: de Gruyter, 1993
- Person, Raymond Franklin, In Conversation with Jonah: Conversation Analysis, Literary Criticism, and the Book of Jonah (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, vol. 220), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996
- Sherwood, Yvonne, The Prostitute and the Prophet: Hosea's Marriage in Literary-Theoretical Perspective (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, vol. 212), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996
- Smith, George Adam, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, Commonly Called the Minor, London: Hodder and Stoughton, and New York: Armstrong, 1896; revised edition, New York and London: Harper and Brothers, 1940

Much recent interest in the minor prophetic books has focused on their unity. Scholars have begun to question why the Book of the Twelve is considered a single entity in the canon of the Hebrew Bible, what binds it together, and what the individual books actually have in common. HOUSE bemoans the paucity of treatments of the Minor Prophets as a whole, pointing out that although they have long been designated one book they have hardly ever been treated as such. He is interested in how they came to be associated and what it means for their interpretation that they are now one book. House believes study of the final canonical form of the books offers some key interpretative insights, and he advocates the use of canonical criticism because he feels it “asks the right questions to discover unity,” although it is unable to answer them all. He also favors the application of literary criticism, North American formalism in particular, which has even more to offer because it “provides the actual means of uncovering unity.” He then proceeds to demonstrate the advantages his method offers students of the Minor Prophets, as he explores the various genres and subgenres of prophetic literature. His formalistic approach, in conjunction with an awareness of theological ideas such as sin, punishment, and restoration as major structural devices, is used to delineate the structure of the prophetic corpus. Further chapters consider the plot, which he identifies as the “natural outworking” of the structure, and the characterization of God, the prophets, Israel, and the nations in the Book of the Twelve.

NOGALSKI (1993a, 1993b) also considers the origin of the Book of the Twelve in his two books, which together represent the fruit of his doctoral studies. Not unlike House, his particular interest is in identifying “the techniques employed in the combination of the prophetic writings and their possible consequences for the individual books,” especially in determining “how this unification affected the shape and content of the original writings.” Nogalski suggests the books are unified by the use of catchwords, where “the end of one writing contains several words and phrases that reappear in the beginning units of the adjacent writing,” and he proceeds to demonstrate how this is true, before turning his attention to the origins of these catchwords—are they authorial, redactional, the work of the collector, or accidental? His work demonstrates very effectively the intertextual relationships that exist between the minor prophetic books.

The Book of Amos has been the subject of more critical analysis than most of the Minor Prophets, and a very substantial number of important monographs have been published in recent years. In the light of this glut of scholarship, HASEL provides an excellent orientation to Amos study, examining current scholarly opinion on some ten key interpretative issues within the book, including consideration both of the prophet's background (his profession, social context, and approach to prophecy) and of his literary and theological gifts (taking account of such concerns as his oracles against the nations, his social critique, and his eschatology). Under each chapter heading, Hasel considers the contributions of a number of leading commentators and scholars on the issues in question, comparing and contrasting their conclusions before siding with one view or another (sometimes rejecting them all and providing his own alternative). Perhaps the greatest asset of Hasel's work is its breadth of scholarship, as it takes into account material from all kinds of sources, some of which is unlikely to be readily available to English readers. His work therefore provides a useful source text for current opinion on the interpretation of one of the most extensively discussed minor prophets.

CARROLL's revision of his doctoral thesis is notable for its fascinating dual focus on two concerns. First, he is interested in reading the Bible from the perspective of his native Guatemala, seeking to identify and quantify the unique contribution Latin America has to offer to biblical studies and to understand how biblical and theological scholarship can relate to and interact with Latin American culture, especially given the current Western/Anglo bias typical of most academic dialogue. Second, Carroll seeks to formulate a context-based approach to the Bible that emphasizes the importance of the text itself but still seeks to relate that text to the world of the interpreter. After an introductory section that considers anthropological and sociological studies of prophecy and other attempts at reconstructing the ministry and message of Amos, this double emphasis is worked out fully on the basis of the presumption that “a poetic reading within a rich understanding of the [interpreter’s] cultural context” is the best way to proceed. Carroll stands in a tradition similar to that of Liberation Theology: he portrays the prophetic text as being in itself a call for believers to stand up against injustice and work toward the creation of a new kind of society. At the same time, however, he wishes to move beyond the simple call to social action and sees “prophetic” ministry as something much broader. He seeks to establish the foundations for a contemporary prophetic ministry in Latin America based on his reconstruction of the meaning of Amos for today.

BARTON’s short monograph treats two particular issues that concern Amos’s oracles against the nations. First he asks, “Why does the book of Amos begin with a series of oracles against Israel’s neighbours, and only then turn to denounce the prophet’s own people?” Barton sees three possible options here. Either these oracles are reminiscent of the very oldest, highly nationalistic type of prophecy evidenced in the story of Balaam and Egyptian execration texts; or Amos is among the first to offer the radically new insight that all nations are under the control and direction of one God; or, possibly, the oracles merely serve as a literary device to draw attention to the fate of Israel and Judah and thus carry little theological import. He then proceeds to ask himself, “Why does Amos think that these other nations are accountable for their atrocities?” and concludes that Amos “was appealing to a kind of conventional or customary law about international conduct which he at least believed to be self-evidently right.” Barton also observes that this conclusion has implications for current understanding of Amos’s ethics, noting that the fact that “he sees moral conduct as a matter of conformity to a human convention . . . rather than to the overt or explicit demands of God” implies that Amos’s ethical system is “not simply a question of theonomy, as it is quite widely thought to be.”

KING is noted as an archaeologist of great erudition and insight, as well as a biblical scholar of high sensitivity to the text, and his archaeological commentary demonstrates both qualities. King’s intention in this work is to demonstrate how archaeology can illuminate (not prove) the Bible, and he moves in this direction by highlighting some key discoveries that bear on the interpretation of Amos, Micah, and Hosea. He provides much information and many photographs and drawings. King makes use of all that is known of the historical and geographical setting of the books, such as the position, structure, and social organization of the cities and nations mentioned in the eighth-century prophets, as well as offering some significant insights into such topics as ancient warfare and defense, religious worship and practice, and agriculture and herdsmanhood. King shows very plainly how the archaeologists’ reconstruction of life in ancient Israel can then be used to elucidate the biblical text.

Perhaps one of the most important commentaries on the Minor Prophets in the history of their interpretation is the famous study by SMITH. This two-volume work deals with the books in chronological order, providing each book with an introduction dealing with critical issues such as authorship, date, and the like, and a couple of chapters of thorough exposition, based upon Smith’s own translation, supplemented with detailed critical and explanatory notes. Rather than verse-by-verse exegesis, Smith prefers to comment on the text in its larger individual units, which means he avoids the tendency to atomize and retains a good holistic view of the books.

Contemporary literary-critical approaches also have been applied recently to the prophetic books. An excellent illustration of this can be found in the work of PERSON, who views the Book of Jonah in the light of theories of narrative art and through the reading process developed with the aid of conversation analysis, the critical study of conversations. He argues that in Jonah, “the narrator satirically manipulates readers in the selection and arrangement of the characters’ speeches,” and he proceeds to justify his thesis in a verse-by-verse exposition of the book, which demonstrates effectively how the conversations “contribute to the development of the different narrative elements of plot, character, atmosphere and tone.” Person also includes a different reading of Jonah, written from the perspective of the reader-response theory of Wolfgang Iser, and this adds further to the value of his work.

Another interesting example of the application of radical literary criticism to the prophetic books is provided by SHERWOOD. Her book highlights the difficulties posed by the account of Hosea’s marriage (Hosea 1–3) and treats the story from four different literary perspectives, those of ideological criticism, semiotics, deconstruction, and feminist criticism. Sherwood provides a thorough and often entertaining introduction to each of these approaches in turn before applying them to her chosen text and drawing out their implications for biblical studies in general. She concludes that “Hosea 1–3 is a text that exists primarily to ‘contend’ with and provoke a ‘controversy’ with its implied audience,” and she suggests that literary study of the text is better able than many methods to highlight these “shocking strategies.” This is because her approach sees the difficulties in the text, its “disjunctive style and its capacity to subvert itself” not as problems, but as moments of opportunity, “a way of suggesting different meanings.” Sherwood also sees a number of correspondences between prophecy and postmodern styles of writing, noticing that the capacity and desire to shock readers, which directs much postmodern fiction, can certainly be identified in Hosea, too.

ANDREW DAVIES

Proselytizing see Conversion to Judaism; God-Fearers

Provence

Calmann, Marianne, The Carrière of Carpentras (The Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1983

- Golb, Norman, "New Light on the Persecution of French Jews at the Time of the First Crusade," Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, 34, 1966
- Grayzel, Solomon, "The Avignon Popes and the Jews," Historia Judaica, 2(1), 1940
- Grayzel, Solomon, "The Confession of a Medieval Jewish Convert," Historia Judaica, 17(2), 1955
- Herskowitz, William K., "Judeo-Christian Dialogue in Provence as Reflected in Milhemet Mitzva of R. Meir Hameili," D.H.L. diss., Yeshiva University, 1974
- Kober, Adolf, "Jewish Converts in Provence from the Sixteenth to the Eighteenth Century," Jewish Social Studies, 6(4), 1944
- Nirenberg, David, Communities of Violence: Persecution of Minorities in the Middle Ages, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1996
- Schatzmler, Joseph, "Contacts et échanges entre savants juifs et chrétiens à Montpellier vers 1300," in Juifs et judaïsme de Languedoc XIIIe siècle-début XIVE siècle, edited by Marie-Humbert Vicaire and Bernhard Blumenkranz, Toulouse: Privat, 1977
- Schatzmler, Joseph, "Tumultus et Rumor in Sinagoga: An Aspect of Social Life of Provençal Jews in the Middle Ages," AJS Review, 2, 1977
- Szajkowski, Zosa, "The Decline and Fall of Provençal Jewry," Jewish Social Studies, 6(1), 1944
- Szajkowski, Zosa, "Relations among Sephardim, Ashkenazim and Avignonese Jews in France from the 16th to the 20th Centuries," Yivo Annual of Jewish Social Science, 10, 1955
- Szajkowski, Zosa, "The Comtadin Jews and the Annexation of the Papal Provence," JQR, n.s. 46, 1955-1956
- Twersky, I., "Aspects of the Social and Cultural History of Provençal Jewry," in his Studies in Jewish Law and Philosophy, New York: Ktav, 1982

Academic research on the Jews of Provence started in the 19th century and was done mostly by French scholars. Some work has appeared in Israel in Hebrew. This essay covers only English-language works and emphasizes the most recent and the most informative ones.

CALMANN's state-of-the-art monograph is based largely on three archives in Carpentras (documents for the years 1277 to 1789) and two archives in Avignon. It aims "to discover the pattern of life within the carrière [Provençal for Jewish quarter; more precisely, street] of Carpentras, the relations of its inhabitants with one another and with the Christians, with the people of the Comtat and beyond, and with their ultimate rulers, the popes." The analysis is thematic, comprising ten chapters: the origins of the carrière; people and buildings; everyday life; a state within the state; the finances of the community; the economic history of the carrière; language, literature, and learning; the church and conversion; relations between Jews and Christians; and the revolution and after. Calmann's work, although academic in method and approach, is written in clear language avoiding technical jargon and can be recommended equally for scholars and general readers.

GOLB has reexamined and reedited a previously only partially published Cairo Genizah letter mentioning a pogrom in a French community during the Middle Ages. He emends the reading of a geographical name and determines that the event—in which many Jews were killed, their children captured to be raised as Christians, and their houses plundered—took place in the town of Monieux, in the Vaucluse near Carpentras. Basing his work on internal and external evidence, Golb has been able to determine that a wave of pogroms hit the Jews of Provence some time before October 1096, just as in northern France and Germany.

After examining a large amount of Vatican material, GRAYZEL (1940) states with certainty that the Avignon popes employed the services of Jews on a large scale. Grayzel also describes restrictions upon Jewish life such as the enforcement of the Jewish badge, the prohibition of the employment of Christian servants and nurses and certain measures of ghettoization. A considerable number of papal documents of the 13th and 14th centuries are examined that refer to converts and conversion, particularly to converts who relapsed into Judaism. Practicing Jews are depicted as repeatedly having been accused of influencing these reversions, while the popes of Avignon, particularly John XXII, emerge as quite zealous in converting the Jews.

GRAYZEL (1955) depicts the social conditions of Jews in Provence, particularly in the vicinity of Toulouse, but typical for all of Western Europe in the 14th century. Although the article focuses on a specific case, it gives a broad picture of forced conversion and the persecution of Jews by the Catholic Church at the beginning of the 14th century. As such, the importance of this article goes far beyond appearances, and it stands as a significant treatment of the whole phenomenon of forced conversion and relapse.

NIRENBERG deals with the problem of persecution of minorities in Christian Europe, mainly in 14th-century Aragon, but some parts of his book concern the Jews of France. Basing his work on medieval Jewish and Christian chronicles, he describes how the so-called Shepherds' Crusade originated in Normandy, reached Paris, and rapidly moved to Provence and Languedoc. Despite Pope John XXII's objections to massacres of the Jews, the local townsfolk and municipal officials supported the shepherds' atrocities. At places where the pope's orders were routinely obeyed, it was possible to stop the massacres and even to drive the perpetrators out of the area, as was the case in Carcassonne. The author tries to offer reasons why common folk supported the shepherds and their violent actions against the Jews. He argues that by attacking the Jews, the shepherds indirectly attacked the French crown, because "the Jews in France were considered fiscal agents of the monarchy, occasionally serfs of the king." Nirenberg shows a different kind of anti-Jewish attack following the so-called Lepers' Plot of 1321; these attacks were committed not by an ignorant mob but by the urban populace encouraged by the local officials. Also the alleged guilt of the Jews was different in nature; now they were accused of participating in a plot with the lepers and the Muslim king of Granada to poison Christendom. Nevertheless, the results were similar: in both cases hundreds of Jews were massacred, burned, or forced to commit group suicide. In the epilogue, Nirenberg treats cases of violence against the Jews during the Black Death (1348) in the south of France (Carcassonne, Narbonne, and in certain towns of Roussillon). This time most of the attacks against the Jews took place beyond the Pyrenees, in Aragon and Catalonia, where again hundreds of Jews were killed under suspicion of treason and poisoning the waters. It does not mean that similar events did not happen in Provence. As in many other cases, there are no historical sources for Provence in this respect.

HERSKOWITZ has edited the Hebrew text of the first section of Milhemet Mitsvah by Rabbi Meir ben Simeon HaMeili of Narbonne, a polemical anti-Christian work. This section is devoted to debates between the author and various clergy, including the archbishop of Narbonne, who later became Pope Gregory IX. In his introduction, Herskowitz collects historical, political, economic, and religious facts pertaining to conditions of the Jews in Provence in the 13th century from published Jewish and Christian sources.

KOBER notes that after the forced baptisms prevalent during the 15th century and the expulsion of Jews from Provence at the end of the 15th century, Provence faced the same problem with its Neophytes as Spain with its Marranos, or New Christians. King René (1431–1480), benevolent toward the Jews for financial reasons, at the same time did everything in his power to induce them to embrace Christianity. He accorded special privileges to Jews who consented to be baptized. After 1481, however, there were numerous incidents of forced baptism. The Jews expelled in 1500 fled to the neighboring Comtat Venaissin, and some made their way to Italy and Turkey. Their property was confiscated and incorporated into royal holdings.

Because of the grand scale of voluntary conversions in the 15th century, however, the Provençal parliament found it necessary to pass the law of 24 May 1542, forbidding under dire penalty any discrimination against Neophytes on account of their former affiliations. But particular incidents Kober describes show that this law was not strongly enforced, so that in 1611, for example, the advocate general, de Monier, laid before King Henri IV false charges against members of parliament of Jewish ancestry, drawing attention to this common feature. Only in 1778 was the distinction between the various leading families of Provence—between those who were originally Christian and those who descended from Jewish or Muslim ancestry—legally abolished.

Kober writes about papal policy toward the Jews of Comtat Venaissin from the 16th to the 18th century, when the Vatican introduced different measures to encourage the baptism of Jews. One of them was compulsory and frequent attendance at conversionist sermons. Despite all the measures attempted, there were very few converts until the later half of the 18th century. It was only at this time that the conditions of Jewish life in Provence approached the intolerable, with forced baptisms of Jewish children without parental consent becoming an almost daily occurrence. In the end many Jews left the region to save their offspring.

SHATZMILLER (1977b) describes the central role of the synagogue in medieval Provence, concentrating particularly on the town of Manosque. The preeminent historian of medieval Provençal Jewry, the author discusses several incidents of personal assault, strife, commotion, and dispute at the synagogue, which he traces in local court documents and finds paralleled in other locations. Shatzmiller shows how different Jewish communities dealt with dissent and disagreement between members. He also explains the relationship of the town authorities to the Jewish community and how they maintained public order.

SHATZMILLER (1977a) demonstrates that there was significant contact and even cooperation between medieval Jewish and gentile scholars in Provence, particularly in Montpellier. These contacts took different forms but most often it was that of translations of scholarly literature from Hebrew to Latin or from Latin to Hebrew. He cites a number of examples from the years 1299 to 1306.

SZAJKOWSKI (1944) stresses that the relationship of Christians to converts in the papal enclave was markedly different from that in the rest of Provence. The baptized Jews here became real Christians, and the hostility toward them ceased. But unconverted Jews, on the contrary, experienced a greater hostility and were in fact despised, so that in the 17th century the gentry of Comtat Venaissin demanded the expulsion of the Jews. In 1768 the Comtat Venaissin was united with France, and the Jews felt more comfortable, with fewer limitations and restrictions, but antisemitic accusations and occasional publications continued to harass them. Thus even in 1789, the year of the French Revolution, antisemitic charges were brought up for discussion in the National Assembly and espoused in the speech of the Provençal deputy Charles François Bouche.

SZAJKOWSKI (1955) describes the demography of the Jews in Provence after the French Revolution. He discusses patterns of emigration from the four older communities of Carpentras, Cavaillon, Avignon, and L'Isle-sur-la-Sorgue; economic and social status; trades and professions; religious and civic life; education; cultural life; and finally the disappearance of the communities from the midst of an often quite hostile environment.

SZAJKOWSKI (1955–1956) summarizes the political history of the annexation of the papal province by France during the last quarter of the 18th century and describes how the changes affected its Jewish residents beginning with the first printed request for annexation, which included a proposed review of the status of Jews bristling with antisemitic charges.

TWERSKY singles out the period from the middle of the 11th to the early 14th century as the most important in development of the intellectual activities of Provençal Jewry. He notices the “remarkable efflorescence” of Jewish culture in Provence in rabbinics, philosophy, mysticism, ethics, exegesis, polemics, apologetics, grammar and lexicography, poetry, and belles lettres in relatively favorable social, political, and economic circumstances. All this was achieved, on the one hand, by preserving and transmitting the accumulated philosophic and scientific learning of Arabic-speaking Jewry and, on the other hand, by interpreting and disseminating it and mixing it with elements that either appeared first in Provence or were absorbed from the culture of Ashkenazi Jewry.

HAYIM Y. SHEYNIN

See also France

Proverbs

- Alshekh, Moses, Rav Peninim be'ur Mishle Shelomoh, 1592; translated by E. Munk as The Book of Proverbs with Rav Peninim: Commentary, Brooklyn, New York: Spiegel, 1991
- Brenner, Athalya and F. Van Dijk-Hemmes, On Gendering Texts: Female and Male Voices in the Hebrew Bible (Biblical Interpretation Series, vol. 1), Leiden and New York: Brill, 1993
- Brown, William P., Character in Crisis: A Fresh Approach to the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1996
- Bryce, Glendon E., A Legacy of Wisdom: The Egyptian Contribution to the Wisdom of Israel, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, 1979
- Camp, Claudia, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs, Decatur, Georgia: Almond, 1985
- Camp, Claudia, "What's So Strange about the Strange Woman," in The Bible and the Politics of Exegesis: Essays in Honor of Norman K. Gottwald on His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, edited by David Jobling et al., Cleveland, Ohio: Pilgrim, 1991
- Clifford, Richard, Proverbs (Old Testament Library), Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster John Knox, 1998
- Cook, Johann, The Septuagint of Proverbs: Jewish and/or Hellenistic Proverbs?: Concerning the Hellenistic Colouring of LXX Proverbs (Supplements to Vetus Testamentum, vol. 69), New York: Brill, 1997
- Delitzsch, Franz, Biblical Commentary on the Proverbs of Solomon, Edinburgh: Clark, 1874; Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1950
- Fontaine, Carole, Traditional Sayings in the Old Testament: A Contextual Study (Bible and Literature Series, 5), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1982
- Fox, Michael V., Proverbs 1-9 (Anchor Bible), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1999
- Golka, Friedemann W., The Leopard's Spots: Biblical and African Wisdom in Proverbs, Edinburgh: Clark, 1993
- Harris, Scott L., Proverbs 1-9: A Study of Inner-Biblical Interpretation (Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series, no. 150), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press: 1995
- Malbim, Meir Loeb ben Jehiel Michael, Malbim on Mishley: The Commentary of Rabbi Meir Leibush Malbim on the Book of Proverbs, translated by Charles Wengrov, New York: Feldheim, 1982
- McKane, William, Proverbs: A New Approach (Old Testament Library), Philadelphia: Westminster, and London: SCM, 1970
- Murphy, Roland E., The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (Anchor Bible Reference Library), New York: Doubleday, 1990; 2nd edition, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1996
- Newsom, Carol A., "Woman and the Discourse of Patriarchal Wisdom: A Study of Proverbs 1-9," in Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel, edited by P.L. Day, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1989
- Perdue, Leo G., Wisdom and Creation: The Theology of Wisdom Literature, Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon, 1994
- Toy, Crawford H., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Proverbs (International Critical Commentary, vol. 16), New York: Scribner, and Edinburgh: Clark, 1899
- Van Leeuwen, Raymond, New Interpreter's Bible, vol. 5: Proverbs, Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon, 1997
- Visotzky, Burton L., The Midrash on Proverbs (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 27), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1992
- von Rad, Gerhard, Weisheit in Israel, 1970; translated by James D. Martin as Wisdom in Israel, London: SCM, and Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon, 1972
- Westermann, Claus, Roots of Wisdom: The Oldest Proverbs of Israel and Other Peoples, Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/Knox, and Edinburgh: Clark, 1995
- Whybray, R.N., The Composition of the Book of Proverbs (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 168), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1994
- Whybray, R.N., The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study (History of Biblical Interpretation Series, vol. 1), New York: Brill, 1995
- Williams, James G., Those Who Ponder Proverbs: Aphoristic Thinking and Biblical Literature (Bible and Literature Series, 2), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1981

The biblical Book of Proverbs (in Hebrew, Mishlei) belongs to wisdom literature, a genre cultivated throughout the ancient Near East. A number of important studies of wisdom literature include discussions of Proverbs. Most important is VON RAD's theological-philosophical reading of Israel's experiential wisdom (regrettably published in a contorted English translation). Another valuable synthesis of wisdom thought is PERDUE's, which describes wisdom as a dialectic between anthropology (with its focus on the practicalities of life and the secular world) and cosmology (the affirmation of a just and beautiful cosmic order created by God). MURPHY provides a helpful introduction to wisdom literature, giving considerable attention to Proverbs. He places unusual emphasis on the "faith experience" underlying wisdom.

WHYBRAY (1995), a topical history of Proverbs study in the modern period, is an excellent place to start for an orientation to the field. His survey also includes summaries of important works in French and German.

Premodern exegesis of Proverbs has not been properly studied or translated into English. Elements of Hellenistic Jewish exegesis can be inferred from the ancient Greek translation, the Septuagint, which COOK's detailed and technical study analyzes. Very little of the rich traditional Jewish exegesis is available in English. The translation of ALSHEKH's commentary is partial and paraphrastic, but it does give the gist of his literary and homiletic insights. VISOTZKY's translation, introduction, and annotations of a rich ninth-century compendium of exegesis, homilies, and legends grant a wide audience access to an important midrash. There is also an abridged translation of the commentary by MALBIM, a traditionalist 19th-century scholar with a keen sensitivity to the nuances of words and phrases.

DELITZSCH's dense commentary, while dated, religious, and moralizing, is still valuable. Delitzsch understands wisdom as drawn from the religion of Israel but cast in a universalistic, humanistic form intended to demonstrate that Israelite religion is fit to become a world religion. One of the few commentators to consider the implications of the Masoretic accentual system for exegesis, his comments are based on a deep knowledge of Hebrew but are limited by an obsolete philological method.

TOY's dry and academic exegesis is useful for its philological and textual notes as well as for its effort to restate precisely the surface meanings of the proverbs. Like Delitzsch's work, this analysis is dated in many ways, especially in its treatment of the ancient translations.

McKANE's commentary is somewhat difficult to read because of its nonsequential exegesis. It is also hindered by an idiosyncratic (but in some ways perceptive) historical schema that arranges the sayings of Proverbs in three hypothetical stages of development: an old, secular wisdom; a community-centered wisdom; and a Yahwistic-pietistic reinterpretation. Nevertheless, the work is characterized by sensible judgment and is based on a thorough knowledge of language and text.

For a number of decades, there were few good commentaries available in English. Some major commentaries, however, have recently appeared or are about to appear.

CLIFFORD's commentary aims at an educated lay readership but includes some technical notes. It gives special attention to rhetoric and forms of communication.

VAN LEEUWEN writes for a broader readership, and the presentation is nontechnical. The editor has a Christian orientation, but he does not impose it on the text, which includes two English translations, a literary commentary, and an exposition with "reflections" that uses Proverbs to explore contemporary realities. Van Leeuwen takes issue with the notion that Proverbs is somehow less "religious" than the rest of the Bible or divorced from biblical Yahwism.

FOX's commentary on chapters one through nine is designed for both a general and an academic audience. (A volume on chapters ten through 31 is in progress.) The extensive discussion of philological and textual issues will primarily interest scholars, but the body of the exposition and some topical essays are accessible to a broader audience. The commentary is a study in intellectual history, emphasizing comparisons between Proverbs and wisdom literature from elsewhere in the Near East, particularly Egypt. Proverbs' innovative claim, Fox argues, is that the human intellect, founded on fear of God and tutored in traditional teachings, is the prime virtue of character and as such is the necessary (and almost sufficient) means for creating a life of material, physical, social, and moral success.

BRYCE traces the Egyptian influences on Israelite wisdom, stressing the way in which Proverbs 22:17–23:11 draws upon the Instruction of Amenemope. The author examines the textual parallels in detail and distinguishes three stages of borrowing and development: adaptation, assimilation, and integration. He also discusses the Egyptian background of the royal and political wisdom of Proverbs 25–27. This book does not require knowledge of Hebrew or Egyptian and is a valuable introduction to the question of the foreign background of Israelite wisdom.

HARRIS's intertextual study seeks allusions to other biblical books in Proverbs 1:8–19, 1:20–33, and 6:1–19. He finds deliberate reuse of elements from the Joseph story and from Jeremiah's career (Jeremiah 7 and 20). Of the various parallels he suggests, the most convincing is the prophetic background of the figure of wisdom in Proverbs 1:8–19.

WHYBRAY (1994) investigates the development of Proverbs from its original short units to its present form—a very difficult task, given that the book is compiled from different sources. In chapters one through nine, he identifies ten originally independent instructions (as many scholars do), which, he contends, were elaborated in a couple of later redactions, one concerned with wisdom, the other with Yahwistic religion. (Separating these layers presupposes a rigorous, one-dimensional consistency on the original author's part, because otherwise the author could have introduced the wisdom and Yahwistic motifs himself.) Whybray notes that the rest of the Book of Proverbs is composed mostly of individual sayings, which, he argues, were progressively gathered and organized by associative principles. A number of scholars are currently looking for patterns in Proverbs, but significant patterns remain elusive in chapters ten through 29. Whybray's study is a feasible but rather strained approach to this issue.

WILLIAMS attends to the philosophical basis of aphoristic wisdom, which he describes as the attempt to find and construct meaning in "fragments of experience." He regards aphorisms not only as a literary type but also as a way of constructing and conveying a view of reality. For Williams, the key concept is order, and he examines how aphoristic wisdom serves to establish—and sometimes undermine—order through tradition and experience.

BROWN's readable and innovative study identifies character formation as the primary goal of wisdom literature. He argues that Proverbs, particularly chapters one through nine, seeks to inculcate character virtues in a family context, hoping that adults will then use these values to promote their community's welfare. While the thesis as stated is an overgeneralization for wisdom literature as a whole, it is a valuable corrective to the older view of Proverbs (e.g., that presented by Toy), which construed the book as aimed at individual success alone.

FONTAINE introduces a new consideration into the study of biblical proverbs: proverb performance. Sayings are first of all a form of speech, intended for use in everyday discourse, although they are also purposive and have functions in literary contexts (which can be explored by examination of proverb use in biblical narrative). It remains to be seen to what degree the sayings in the Book of Proverbs can be explained in performance terms. Whatever their origins, however, the collected sayings in their current form are purely literary and detached from actual use.

Both WESTERMANN and GOLKA also investigate the social functions of traditional sayings in oral transmission and use. They detach preexilic Israelite wisdom from the social locations to which it is usually assigned, the scribes of the royal court and a hypothetical wisdom school. Instead, they describe this older Israelite wisdom, found primarily in Proverbs ten through 29, as oral folk wisdom, whose purposes and social setting can be better elucidated by comparison with African proverbs than with ancient Near Eastern wisdom. Westermann in particular reconstructs a congenial picture of simple village life, which he believes is the context of the folk sayings. These arguments about the relevance of the African parallels are, however, not fully convincing, and the derivation of the mass of Proverbs from a village setting may seem an oversimplification. Still, the focus on the folk/oral origins of some of the sayings of Proverbs is a welcome correction of the earlier, overly scholastic and literary point of view.

CAMP's (1985) study of the feminine in Proverbs is the most important of the numerous feminist studies of the book. It seeks to explain the origin and meaning of feminine imagery in the book, examining in particular the personification of wisdom as a woman (Proverbs 8) who mediates between the divine and the human. This image is based on the various roles and values associated with women in ancient Israel, and Camp shows that wisdom's female qualities are as essential as its abstract symbolic significance to the ethos of Proverbs. She further considers the relevance of the feminine in the shaping of the book as a whole.

Several feminist studies have focused on images of women in Proverbs one through nine, especially the "strange woman," the seductress of chapter seven. In their ideologically charged study, BRENNER and VAN DIJK-HEMMES identify a female speaker in parts (perhaps all) of Proverbs one through nine. This speaker, Brenner contends, internalizes masculine values implicit in the patriarchal effort to control female sexuality. Van Dijk-Hemmes, however, claims that the female voice partially "deconstructs its own position" and thus reduces its subservience to patriarchy.

Less convoluted are CAMP (1991) and NEWSOM's essays, which describe the strange woman as a representative of the "other" and a symbol of all dangers, chaotic powers, and/or marginalized groups or discourses. One may wonder, however, whether these works are historical analyses or modern allegorizations of a portrayal of ordinary adultery, which was deemed a sufficient evil to warrant grim warnings.

MICHAEL V. FOX

Psalms

- Allen, Leslie C., Psalms 101–150 (Word Biblical Commentary, vol. 21), Waco, Texas: Word, 1983; Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire: Word, 1987
- Craigie, Peter C., Psalms 1–50 (Word Biblical Commentary, vol. 19), Waco, Texas: Word, 1983
- Gruber, Mayer I., Rashi's Commentary on Psalms (South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism, no. 161), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1998
- Keel, Othmar, Die Welt der altorientalischen Bildsymbolik und das Alte Testament: am Beispiel der Psalmen, 1972; translated by Timothy H. Hallett as The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms, New York: Seabury, and London: S.P.C.K., 1978
- Rendsburg, Gary A., Linguistic Evidence for the Northern Origin of Selected Psalms (Monograph Series/Society of Biblical Literature, no. 43), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1990

Sarna, Nahum M., Songs of the Heart: An Introduction to the Book of Psalms, New York: Schocken, 1993

Simon, Uriel, Arba' gishot le-Sefer Tehilim, 1982; translated by Lenn J. Schram as Four Approaches to the Book of Psalms: From Saadiah Gaon to Abraham Ibn Ezra (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991

Tate, Marvin E., Psalms 51–100 (Word Biblical Commentary, vol. 20), Dallas, Texas: Word, 1990

Among the larger books of the Hebrew Bible, Psalms is commonly divided into 150 distinct compositions distributed among five separate books, probably on the analogy of the five books of the Pentateuch. Superscriptions contained in the Book of Psalms attribute 73 of the compositions to King David, while 24 of the psalms are not assigned to any author.

In the Pentateuch and the Prophets, notes SARNA, God reaches out to human beings, whereas in the Psalms, by and large, it is human beings who reach out to God. In his 20-page introduction and in the essays discussing ten representative psalms (Psalms 1; 8; 15; 19; 24; 30; 48; 82; 93; and 94) that follow, Sarna regards the Book of Psalms as an anthology of prayers deemed eternally relevant. He summarizes the gamut of ancient, medieval, and modern exegesis, including his own discoveries amassed during a lifetime of researching and teaching Psalms. He shows how the details that occupy biblical scholars can add to the value of specific psalms as devotional literature for contemporary readers.

Christian scholars emanating from traditions in which a hymnal (with or without a prayerbook) is used at worship services have often suggested that the Book of Psalms was the hymnal of Second Temple Judaism. Unsurprisingly, some Protestant groups have insisted that no hymn that was not based on Psalms—the hymnbook provided, as it were, by God—should be sung in church. Such a notion was anticipated by some medieval Karaite Jews who, seeing the Book of Psalms as a book of prayers, concluded that it, rather than the rabbinic liturgy, was the divinely sanctioned order of public worship. SIMON shows that such an idea is spelled out in detail by the 10th-century Karaites Japheth ben Ali and Salmon ben Jeroham. Moreover, Simon demonstrates that it is by way of a heated response to this Karaite view that Saadia, a contemporary of Japheth and Salmon, insists that the Book of Psalms is not a book of prayers addressed to God but rather another form of Torah in which God speaks, this time not through Moses but through King David. Simon shows how Abraham ibn Ezra wends his way between the Scylla of Japheth ben Ali's and Salmon ben Jeroham's liturgical dogma and the Charybdis of Saadia's prophetic dogma, attempting to return exegesis of the Psalter to rationality by suggesting, as had Rashi and before him the rabbis of the Talmud, that the Book of Psalms is in fact an anthology of numerous poetic genres, most but not all of them forms of prayer composed over the period of time between the dawn of Israel's history and the Babylonian exile.

CRAIGIE, TATE, and ALLEN succeed in what some modern biblical scholars like to call "total interpretation," which is to say that they bring to bear upon each psalm every possible discipline that might shed light upon the words, phrases, and messages of these ancient poems: philology, archaeology, form criticism, and newer forms of literary criticism. Their truly comprehensive bibliography is a gold mine for scholars, students, clergy, and teachers, as well as for lay Bible readers of every persuasion.

If these three volumes give us a little of everything, RENDSBURG satisfies a different type of curiosity: the attempt to demonstrate that within the Psalter one can in fact find what ibn Ezra's teacher Moses ha-Cohen ibn Gikatilla sought in his own time, namely the identifying marks of psalms composed in a particular time and place. Rendsburg exemplifies the linguistic orientation of recent generations of American Jewish biblical scholars. He argues on the basis of phonological, orthographic, morphological, and syntactic features, as well as 41 lexical elements, a few word-pairs shared with Phoenician and Ugaritic, and references to Northern Israelite place names, that Psalms 9–10; 16; 29; 36; 42–50; 53; 58; 73–85; 87–88; 116; 132; 133; and 140–141 were composed in the Northern Kingdom during the two hundred years of its existence as a distinct political entity (922–722 B.C.E.). Rendsburg has absorbed well the teaching of his mentor Cyrus Gordon and of the latter's contemporaries, mostly now deceased, that it is the task of the exegete to clarify what the biblical text says and why and to leave what that text means to the heart and mind of the intelligent and sensitive reader.

KEEL is a biblical scholar who has attracted the admiration of archaeologists for bringing to bear the findings of archaeology on the understanding of the Bible. He demonstrates again and again that strange turns of phrase in various psalms refer to objects that can be identified in the artifactual legacy of the ancient Near East. He manages to make the metaphors and similes and references to ancient material culture found in the Book of Psalms regularly intelligible to the modern reader. Typical is his illustration of Psalm 105:18 ("His feet were bound in fetters, his neck was put in a collar of iron") with a detail from a bas relief from the palace of Sargon II of Assyria, depicting a prisoner bound with handcuffs and leg irons in use in the time of Isaiah. Another typical illustration pairs Psalm 57:1 ("In the shadow of his wings I will take refuge") with an ivory carving from eighth-century B.C.E. Arslan Tash, 40 kilometers east of Carchemish. The artwork here portrays an individual protected by the enormous wings of two anthropoid deities.

GRUBER presents a reliable Hebrew text of Rashi's commentary on Psalms 1–89 together with a translation into modern idiomatic English and a supercommentary on Rashi's commentary in the form of endnotes on each psalm. Making use of specialized studies of Rashi and Gruber's own discoveries, these notes pinpoint the interpretive problems that Rashi's exegesis and eisegesis confront, place Rashi's commentary in dialogue with other ancient, medieval, and modern commentators, identify Rashi's sources, and shed light on his language. Rashi's commentary reveals its author to have been the ideal teacher who struck the proper balance between providing what every educator wants students to know about Hebrew grammar and syntax and what the average student really wants to know about the meaning of the psalms now. Gruber's concise but informative introduction provides a decent funeral for the claim made by several scholars that Rashi neither noticed nor understood one of the characteristic features of ancient Hebrew poetry, synonymous parallelism. A forthcoming second volume will present the Commentary on Psalms 90–150 in both Hebrew and English together with English supercommentary and a new introduction.

MAYER IRWIN GRUBER

Pseudepigrapha see Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha

Punishment see Authority, Rabbinic and Communal; Sanhedrin, Semikhah, and Rabbinate

Purity see Holiness; Mikveh

This page intentionally left blank

R

Rabbinic Authority see Authority, Rabbinic and Communal

Rabbinic Biography: Talmudic

Bader, Gershom, Unzere gaystige riefen, 1934; translated by Solomon Katz as The Encyclopedia of Talmudic Sages, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1988

Finkelstein, Louis, Akiba: Scholar, Saint and Martyr, New York: Covici, Friede, 1936

Gilath, Itzhak, R. Eliezer Ben Hyrcanus: A Scholar Outcast, Ramat Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1984

Green, William Scott, "What's in a Name?: The Problematic of Rabbinic 'Biography'," in Approaches to Ancient Judaism: Theory and Practice (Brown Judaic Studies, vol. 1), Missoula, Montana: Scholars Press, 1978

Neusner, Jacob, A Life of Rabban Yohanan ben Zakkai, ca. 1-80 C.E., Leiden: Brill, 1962; 2nd edition, 1970; abridged as First Century Judaism in Crisis: Yohanan ben Zakkai and the Renaissance of Torah, Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon, 1975

Neusner, Jacob, Development of a Legend: Studies on the Traditions Concerning Yohanan ben Zakkai (Studies Post-Biblica, vol. 16), Leiden: Brill, 1970

Steinberg, Milton, As a Driven Leaf, New York: Behrman House, 1939

Rabbinic literature contains no complete biographies as found in classical literature but rather numerous brief traditions of the deeds and sayings of sages scattered among legal and exegetical compilations. The two dominant approaches to these biographical traditions can be designated "synthetic" and "analytic." Synthetic rabbinic biography proceeds by collecting disparate biographical traditions about a sage from all rabbinic sources and integrating them to fashion a coherent life. Similarly, all legal opinions and ethical teachings attributed to a sage are collected in order to determine his legal and moral visions. This method essentially accepts rabbinic traditions as reliable historical sources, although the biographer exercises critical judgment when faced with contradictions or blatantly supernatural features. Analytic rabbinic biography, a method pioneered by Neusner, is skeptical of the historical accuracy of rabbinic biographical traditions, for reasons detailed below by Green. The goal is to understand the function and meaning of biographical traditions within rabbinic compilations. Analytic biography seeks to discern the development of the image of a sage in rabbinic group memory rather than to reconstruct his life as actually lived. In recent years most critical scholars have abandoned the synthetic method because of severe methodological problems.

BADER synthesizes brief biographical sketches of about 90 of the leading sages of the first six centuries C.E. The length of his entries varies greatly. Bader assembles the main biographical traditions about each sage, strings them together into a loose narrative framework, and adds data about teachers and disciples together with a character sketch. He paraphrases important or unusual legal opinions and theological statements. The work is thoroughly "traditional"; it is based exclusively on rabbinic sources even when they contain obviously incorrect information, such as mistakes about the chronology and acts of Roman emperors. It makes no attempt to understand the sages within any larger economic, social, or cultural context. Talmudic accounts of the sages performing miracles are presented as fact. The book should not be read as a lesson in history. Rather, it provides convenient summaries of traditional images of the leading sages in line with those prevalent in the Middle Ages and among traditional religious circles today.

FINKELSTEIN constructs a synthetic life of Rabbi Akiba, probably the most influential sage of the second century C.E. Finkelstein devotes considerable attention to the economic situation, social structure, and cultural state of second-century Palestinian Jews. He quotes Akiba's sayings copiously, both in order to manifest his character and to reconstruct the events and contexts in which they were first uttered. The book contains a lengthy appendix assessing Akiba's legal opinions and arguing that they represent "plebeian" positions against the interests of aristocratic landowners. Finkelstein's attention to wider economic, social, and historical contexts constitutes a considerable advance over previous biographies (as exemplified by Bader), which did little more than place biographical traditions in a rough sequence and collect important sayings. Yet despite his attempts at a neutral perspective, Finkelstein's biography is thoroughly hagiographic, depicting Akiba as a hero in his lifetime and a model for generations to follow. His Marxist-oriented readings of Akiba's teachings in particular, and rabbinic conflicts in general, are not persuasive. Because of the dearth of information in the sources, Finkelstein engages in much more imaginative reconstruction than is ordinarily found in biographical writing.

STEINBERG relates the life of Elisha ben Abuya, known as Aher, “the Other,” a famous sage of the second century C.E. This extremely readable book is a historical novel that supplements rabbinic traditions with “free interpretation”—it is not a work of critical historical scholarship. While taking artistic license, Steinberg has “attempted throughout to be true in spirit to the ancient world both Hellenistic and Jewish.” He vividly depicts the intellectual conflicts between rabbinic ideas and Greek philosophical teachings that characterized Hellenistic-Roman times. He portrays Elisha as a sage struggling to make religious and intellectual sense of the world under the pressures of these two world views. The book is highly recommended for those interested in gaining a sense of the tensions probably experienced by many Jews in Hellenistic-Roman times.

GILATH presents an intellectual or halakic biography of Rabbi Eliezer ben Hyrkanos, a leading sage of the early second century C.E. Eliezer’s corpus of teachings expresses an idiosyncratic and generally strict system of law. The book collects Eliezer’s legal traditions, describes his modes of biblical exegesis, assesses the role of reasoning in his legal vision, and compares his views with the more widely accepted positions of his colleagues. Gilath offers a comprehensive analysis of Eliezer’s legal system and attempts to determine its provenance and place in the history of Jewish law. He also discusses important biographical traditions of Eliezer’s early life, relationships with other sages, and conflicts. This book provides a superb description of the distinctive legal system of one sage and its place in the historical development of law. It is also a challenge to the contentions of Green and Neusner that rabbinic traditions are unreliable and that attributions cannot be trusted, for Eliezer’s traditions in fact yield a consistent and coherent legal system.

GREEN discusses the methodological considerations regarding the use of rabbinic traditions for biographical writing. He notes that the “literature of rabbinic Judaism offers no systematic or coherent biographies of its important sages” and proceeds to explain why in “the strict sense of the term, rabbinic biography is an impossibility.” Biographical traditions appear in works redacted centuries after the events they describe and cannot be considered historically accurate. Moreover, the authors or redactors of rabbinic works shaped the material to a considerable extent. They selected traditions important to them and discarded other traditions, so there is no representative body of the teachings of a given sage. Rabbinic literature uses a limited number of rhetorical patterns or forms, which destroy the unique modes of expression of a sage and “thereby conceal distinctive elements of personality, character and intellect.” Different rabbinic works attribute the same tradition to different sages, and the names vary in different manuscripts of the same work. This makes it impossible to determine with certainty what a given sage did or said. Green argues that synthetic biography must be replaced by the study of how rabbinic traditions “change and develop across documents and through time.” He suggests that “the basic problematic of rabbinic ‘biography’ ought to be conceived in terms of understanding the dynamics of tradition rather than the recovery of an individual life or a particular period in the history of Judaism.”

NEUSNER (1975) is a popularized revision of his earliest work on rabbinic biography, first published in 1962, before he despaired of writing synthetic biography (see Neusner 1970). Here Neusner provides a synthetic reconstruction of the life of Rabban Johanan ben Zakkai, one of the leading architects of rabbinic Judaism who survived the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E. To create contexts for Johanan’s experiences, Neusner adopts historical and sociological models, including Max Weber’s theories concerning tensions between charisma and routine in religious life. He describes Johanan’s career in the context of the challenges and changes following the Roman conquest. Neusner also organizes and summarizes Johanan’s main teachings, including his political and religious views. The book offers a highly readable portrait of a leading sage during the founding era of rabbinic Judaism.

NEUSNER (1970) is the scholarly book in which he first carried out his analytic approach to rabbinic biography by studying the traditions of Rabban Johanan ben Zakkai, on the basis of which he had written a synthetic biography (see Neusner 1975). Neusner begins with a discussion of methodology that articulates the problems regarding the nature of rabbinic biographical traditions, the accuracy of attributions, and the degree of historical reliability. He then collects all traditions concerning Johanan ben Zakkai, analyzes each one on its own terms, and compares the different versions of the same saying or story. Neusner is particularly interested in the forms of the traditions and the “life-situations” that underlie them. He pays attention to the role played by later redactors or editors in changing earlier traditions for their own purposes. Systematic comparison of traditions from early and later rabbinic collections demonstrates that the later versions result from literary processes of reworking and embellishing and cannot be accepted as independent historical witnesses. In the final section Neusner assesses how the legend of Johanan’s life developed and changed over the course of time and in different rabbinic circles. He concludes that scholarship cannot say too much with certainty about a sage’s “real” life or opinions, but it can shed light on the “mind of the immediate disciples and those who followed in later schools and communities,” including their views of earlier heroes and their religious values. This is a book that is intended for scholars and those who wish to learn about methodological issues in great detail.

JEFFREY L. RUBENSTEIN

See also Rabbinic Biography: Early Modern; Rabbinic Biography: Medieval; Rabbinic Biography: Modern

Rabbinic Biography: Medieval

Agus, Irving, Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg: His Life and His Works as Sources for the Religious, Legal, and Social History of the Jews of Germany in the Thirteenth Century, 2 vols., Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1947; 2nd edition, New York: Ktav, 1970

- Bonfil, Roberto, Rabanut be-Italyah bi-tekfufat ha-Renesans, 1979; translated by Jonathan Chipman as Rabbis and Jewish Communities in Renaissance Italy (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
- Chavel, Charles B., Ramban: His Life and Teachings, New York: Feldheim, 1960
- Malter, Henry, Saadia Gaon: His Life and Works, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1921
- Netanyahu, Benzion, Don Isaac Abravanel: Statesman and Philosopher, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1953; 5th edition, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1998
- Septimus, Bernard, Hispano-Jewish Culture in Transition: The Career and Controversies of Ramah (Harvard Judaica Monographs, 4) Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982
- Steiman, Sidney, Custom and Survival: A Study of the Life and Work of Rabbi Jacob Molin (Moelln) Known as the Maharil (c.1360–1427), and His Influence in Establishing the Ashkenazic Minhag (Customs of German Jewry), New York: Bloch, 1963
- Talmage, Frank, David Kimhi: The Man and the Commentaries (Harvard Judaica Monographs, 1), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1975
- Twersky, Isadore, Rabad of Posquières: A Twelfth-Century Talmudist, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1962; revised edition, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1980

In the early Middle Ages, the title of rabbi designated a person of scholarly standing and perhaps social reputation, but did not of necessity indicate a position within the community hierarchy. For most of the Middle Ages, the position of rabbi was not that of a salaried or official public position. Scholars who filled the position of rabbi typically did so on a part-time basis and made their careers through their own professions, often as businessmen or physicians. As communal institutions began to deteriorate, the role of the rabbi, particularly the local rabbi, took on greater significance within the communities, although there often were power struggles between rabbis and influential lay leaders, as well as among the rabbinic leaders themselves. By the 14th century in both Sephardi and Ashkenazi lands, a procedure to measure talmudic and halakhic knowledge and to provide a diploma of semikhah, or rabbinic ordination, was introduced, though not without opposition. Beginning in the 14th century, the idea of the mara de-'atra, literally “master of the place,” gained ground, and local rabbinic figures attained greater authority and prestige. Rabbis might be appointed to a communal position by their teachers, especially if the teacher was powerful, or be invited by the ruling members of the community. Rabbis did exercise a certain amount of power within the community, even if that power often seemed more theoretical than real. Rabbinic authorities could, for example, impose the herem (ban of excommunication), restraining dissenting members of the community from communal functions and interaction with community members. In many places, the bulk of the extant internal records for the Jewish communities are rabbinic responsa—written answers to a variety of legal questions asked of a particular rabbi.

By the 16th century, rabbinic contracts become more common. A contract between the community in Friedberg and its rabbi is extant, which among other things stipulates that the rabbi would receive a yearly salary as well as fees for marriages and divorces; would not move for a certain number of years; and significantly, would not act against the authority of the community. For the biographies of rabbis of the early and high Middle Ages, numerous philosophical and theological sources have been thoroughly mined and at times supplemented from information gathered from the responsa literature.

Although old, MALTER's book on the great linguist, exegete, philosopher, and head (gaon) of the important Babylonian yeshivah of Pumbedita, Saadia ben Joseph al-Fayyumi (Saadia Gaon; 882–942), is nevertheless an excellent study that presents much detail about Saadia's early environment and education, his appointment as gaon (928), and his controversies with the exilarch as well as the Karaites. The book also offers a useful overview of Saadia's writings and his influence on later generations. Saadia's philosophical magnum opus, The Book of Beliefs and Opinions, is also available in an excellent English translation by Samuel Rosenblatt (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1948).

NETANYAHU's classic two-part study traces the career and movements of the great Spanish financial adviser and exegete Isaac Abravanel (1437–1508) from birth to his final years in Italy. Netanyahu explores Abravanel's central theological concepts—for example, his thinking on revelation, history, and messianism. According to Netanyahu, Abravanel is the last outstanding Jewish figure of the Middle Ages, a true statesman (as royal treasurer and an outspoken defender of the Jews), a philosopher who lived at a pivotal period of Jewish history—before, during, and after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain—and the author of a variety of theological works that exerted great influence during the 16th century and since.

Written by one of the most important 20th-century scholars of medieval Jewish intellectual history, TWERSKY follows the career of the important and prolific talmudist from 12th-century Provence, Rabbi Abraham ben David (Rabad) of Posquières (c.1120–1198). Particularly interesting are Twersky's comments on Rabad's criticism of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah and on Rabad's relationship to Kabbalah.

TALMAGE traces the life and career of the Provençal exegete and grammarian David Kimhi (Radak; c.1160–c.1235). Talmage focuses on Radak's childhood in Narbonne and his development as a mature scholar who emphasized the peshat, or plain sense of scripture, and relied heavily on the grammatical skills evident in his famous work Mikhlol. Talmage also includes a very useful bibliographic note.

CHAVEL, perhaps the most influential exponent of his subject in the 20th century, offers a brief but very readable biography of Rabbi Moses ben Nahman (Ramban; 1195–1270), one of the most illustrious of Jewish exegetes, proto-kabbalists, and apologists. Ramban spent the last few years of his life in Palestine after his disputation with the Jewish apostate Pablo Christiani in Barcelona. Part one of the book treats the life of Ramban, while part two explores his theological reflections upon such topics as creation, miracles, the land of Israel, and redemption.

SEPTIMUS studies the somewhat obscure figure of Rabbi Meir ha-Levi Abulafia (Ramah; c.1165–1244) in an effort to understand better the Hispano-Jewish culture that underwent rapid and profound transition in the 12th and 13th centuries as Spanish Jewry was being transferred from Muslim to Christian rule. Ramah himself was a formidable scholar—a leading talmudist and the initiator of European polemic over Maimonidean rationalism. He also was an accomplished poet and community leader.

AGUS offers a very informative overview of Meir of Rothenburg (Maharam; c.1215–1293), focusing on his early life, education, and intellectual and communal influence. The bulk of the two volumes consist of translations of Maharam's exceedingly rich responsa dealing with a variety of issues such as prayer and ritual; sabbath and holiday observance; dietary laws; mourning; marriage; divorce; inheritance; and legal procedure. Agus's work includes extensive indexes. Maharam was perhaps the foremost of medieval German rabbis, and his decisions were cited throughout the later Middle Ages.

STEIMAN details the historical background, life, and teachings of Rabbi Jacob ben Moses ha-Levi Molin of Mainz (Maharil; late 14th to mid-15th centuries). Steiman is particularly concerned with the evolution of Ashkenazi minhag (custom) within the school of Maharil and his disciples, such as Zalman of St. Goar and Jacob Weil. Steiman sees in Maharil an important link in the chain of Ashkenazi rabbinic development from the 12th to the 18th centuries. Relying heavily on Maharil's responsa, Steiman creates an especially rich portrait of late medieval German Jewish communal life.

BONFIL presents a detailed and significant study of the institution of the rabbinate, in particular its relationship to and position within the communities of Italy during the Renaissance. Bonfil explores the social and cultural background to the development of the rabbinate; the status, authority, and decline of the prestige of rabbinic ordination; the local conditions of the community-appointed rabbi; and the legal and cultural world of the rabbis themselves.

DEAN BELL

See also Rabbinic Biography: Early Modern; Rabbinic Biography: Modern; Rabbinic Biography: Talmudic

Rabbinic Biography: Early Modern

- Barzilay, Isaac E., Yoseph Shlomo Delmedigo, Yashar of Candia: His Life, Works and Times, Leiden: Brill, 1974
- Cohen, Mark (editor), The Autobiography of a Seventeenth-Century Venetian Rabbi: Leon Modena's "Life of Judah," Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988
- Cohen, Mortimer J., Jacob Emden: A Man of Controversy, Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1937
- Eidelberg, Shlomo, R. Juspa, Shamash of Warmaisa (Worms): Jewish Life in 17th Century Worms, Jerusalem: Magnes, 1991

Roth, Cecil, A Life of Menasseh ben Israel: Rabbi, Printer, and Diplomat, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1934

Ruderman, David, The World of a Renaissance Jew: The Life and Thought of Abraham ben Mordecai Farissol, Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1981

Sherwin, Byron, Mystical Theology and Social Dissent: The Life and Works of Judah Loew of Prague, London: Associated University Presses, and Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1982

Werblowsky, R.J.Z., Joseph Karo: Lawyer and Mystic, London: Oxford University Press, 1962; 2nd edition, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1977

Like many aspects of Jewish history, Jewish experience in what has come to be called the early modern period (though the term is used more frequently within Western, non-Jewish history) was a complex mixture of events and cultures that one might more appropriately term both medieval and modern. For present purposes, one may consider early modern that period extending from the massive forced expulsion of Jews from Spain and much of Germany (and the subsequent "eastward migration") to the legislation of the Napoleonic period. It is quite difficult to draw generalizations regarding the development of rabbinic institutions and personalities in this 300-year period, particularly given the geographic and cultural distance of the Jewish populations within the diaspora. The dispersion of Sephardi Jews, for example, forced the integration of earlier Iberian customs with local Jewish cultures encountered in other parts of Europe (in Amsterdam, Hamburg, and Venice, for example), in North Africa, and in the Ottoman Empire. In some places, communities and communal customs merged, taking on new accents; in other places, immigrant communities became dominant, eventually displacing or absorbing local communal customs and traditions; in still other places, rival communities developed, with their own unique customs and social structures, and often with their respective rabbinic leaders vying for authoritative control of the religious and communal practices of the area. This is also the period of the embryonic communities in North America (in New York and Philadelphia, for example). The selection of biographies offered here is of rabbis exclusively from Europe. Nevertheless, these biographies present a wide variety of personalities and indicate the scope and breadth of rabbinic activities and influences in the early modern period.

Religious practice, individual personality, and the larger environment (both Jewish and gentile) all combined to affect Jewish identity and communal structure. As the position of the rabbi became more professionalized and established in certain places, it also became more and more subject to restrictions imposed by local Jewish lay leaders and communal expectations. Detailed rabbinic contracts (in Germany in the 18th century, for example) stipulated the remuneration due to rabbis for their services, but also dictated the extent of rabbinic power and privilege.

In his classic account, WERBLOWSKY presents the life and thought of one of the most profound of Jewish thinkers and systematizers, Rabbi Joseph Karo (1488–1575), author of Beth Yosef and Shulhan Arukh, eventually considered the summa of rabbinic Judaism. Karo was also a kabbalist of great renown, both before and after his time in Safed, who authored Maggid Mesharim in which he described mystical revelations from a heavenly mentor (maggid). Maggid Mesharim is a mystical diary of kabbalistic doctrines and rules for ascetic life revealed in nightly visitations over the course of 50 years. After establishing Karo's authorship of Maggid Mesharim, Werblowsky offers a comprehensive assessment of Karo's kabbalistic theology, situating it within the context of 16th-century Safed and Karo's own life in Spain, the Balkans, and the land of Israel.

SHERWIN reconstructs the historical events of the life, thought, and social concerns of the enigmatic and mystical Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague (Maharal, born between 1512 and 1526 and died in 1609). Maharal was descended from prominent rabbis and was himself an esteemed talmudist, moralist, and mathematician. He served as Landesrabbiner of Moravia in Nikolsburg and later founded a yeshivah in Prague, a city to which he returned frequently throughout his career, eventually as chief rabbi. In this book, Sherwin offers a lucid analysis of the legends and historiographic depictions of Maharal, an investigation into questions of Maharal's date of birth and the order of his written works, and an extensive bibliography. The body of the book explores Maharal's broad but unsystematic writings in relation to the following topics: God, Torah, Israel (in particular Jewish-gentile relations), theological anthropology, messianism, and social concern.

With extensive notes, bibliography, and appendixes, RUDERMAN examines the life of Abraham ben Mordecai Farissol (c.1451–c.1525), covering his beginnings in Avignon, his time in Mantua, and finally his settlement in Ferrara, and offering along the way rich contextual information. In Ferrara, Farissol served as a cantor, mohel, scribe, and educator. In the true spirit of the Italian Renaissance, Farissol combined an aptitude for biblical commentary with polemical skills—as evidenced in disputations with Christians and in defense of Jewish moneylenders—and significant abilities in the physical and natural sciences. Farissol was a particularly important geographer, writing the first modern Hebrew work on the subject.

Mark COHEN offers a full treatment of the autobiography of Leone (Judah Aryeh) Modena (1571–1648), including a complete English translation of the text and extensive historical notes and introductory essays by a number of experts in the history of early modern Jewry as well as early modern cultural history. Modena was a major figure of his time, an established rabbinic authority in Venice and a prolific writer and learned scholar who wrote well in Italian and Latin as well as Hebrew. He published numerous works, including a bitter attack against the Marrano Uriel da Costa and a qualified defense of the oral tradition and talmudic writings. Modena wrote anti-Christian polemics but severely criticized Jewish kabbalists as well. His autobiography is a revealing entrance into the complex world of Renaissance Jewry; it demonstrates the variety of occupations in which the rabbi could be involved, from moneylending to writing and translating. It also reveals something of the intricate relations between Jews and Christians in Italy and offers glimpses of the multifaceted life within the Venetian ghetto.

BARZILAY offers a detailed look at the famous rabbi, philosopher, and mathematician Joseph Solomon Delmedigo (1591–1655). The son of the celebrated Rabbi Elijah Delmedigo, he frequently visited Leon Modena while studying medicine at Padua, and he traveled widely throughout Europe. He was accomplished in a variety of academic fields and languages, combining scholarship of the classics with Kabbalah, which he criticized sharply. Barzilay's book examines the life, career, and writings of Joseph Delmedigo. It first traces Delmedigo's background, upbringing, and travels throughout the Middle East, Poland, Germany, and the Low Countries; it next reviews his published works; then it investigates his secular, philosophical, and kabbalistic studies; and finally it assesses his relations to rabbinic and Karaite Judaism and to non-Jews. In the appendixes, Barzilay speculates on Delmedigo's date of departure from his birthplace of Candia (Crete) and offers details about his numerous unprinted works. The book ends with an extensive and very useful bibliography.

ROTH offers the standard biography of the great leader of Dutch Jewry in the 17th century, Menasseh ben Israel (1604–1657). He succeeds in depicting Menasseh as a complex figure; born a Marrano, he was very successful in the yeshivot of Amsterdam and eventually succeeded Rabbi Isaac Uzziel as the preacher of the Neveh Shalom congregation. He authored a number of important talmudic and linguistic works in Hebrew and Spanish and gained a reputation within both Jewish and Christian circles. His later works were particularly directed at non-Jews, among whom Menasseh had many important friends including Grotius and Rembrandt. Menasseh is also shown as a savvy politician who helped pave the way for the return of the Jews to England. Roth discusses various aspects of Menasseh's life, including his Marrano background; his rabbinic training and career; his accomplishments as a writer and as a printer (he printed what may have been "the first scientific issue" of the Mishnah, with his own brief marginal notes, in 1631–1632); his famous work The Hope of Israel, which described the purported discovery of the Ten Lost Tribes in South America; and his political work in England.

EIDELBERG offers a very brief introduction to, and the full texts of, three works written by Juspa Shammash (Joseph the Sexton, 1604–1678) of Worms. The three texts are Minhagim di-Kehillah Kedoshah Warmaisa (Custom Book of Worms); Ma'asei Nissim (Book of Wonder Stories); and Pinkas ha-Kehillah (Ledger of Commercial Contracts). Eidelberg offers full English translations, copies of the original manuscripts, and modern Hebrew editions of all three texts. Juspa was born in Fulda (Hesse) of a middle-class family and moved later to Worms to study in the yeshivah of the famous Rabbi Elijah Loanz. Juspa soon married into a reputable Worms family and was able to attain the position of shammash (sexton) and scribe of the community, a position he held for 40 years that required him to record important communal events, provide services for the rabbinic court, prepare a variety of documents such as marriage contracts and bills of divorce, and sign documents as a witness to their binding legality. Juspa's writings reveal the rich texture of Jewish life in Germany in the 17th century: internal business, religious and social relations and relations with non-Jews that fluctuated between peaceful coexistence and oppressive persecution.

Mortimer COHEN's book on Jacob Emden (1698–1776) is the classic account of a stormy figure in 18th-century Germany. Cohen divides the life of Emden into marked phases: childhood and youth; marriage and wandering; the brief service as rabbi in Emden; the stormy years in the "Three Communities" (Altona, Hamburg, and Wandsbeck), including Emden's well-known and inflammatory controversy with Jonathan Eybeschuetz, who was rabbi of the Three Communities between 1750 and 1764; and his final years. As Cohen notes, this study originated as an investigation into the great controversy between Emden and Eybeschuetz. Throughout Cohen is also concerned with the personality of Emden, emphasizing his strong anti-Sabbatian polemics, his antiphilosophical stance, and a number of unusual halakhic opinions and character traits.

DEAN BELL

See also Rabbinic Biography: Medieval; Rabbinic Biography: Modern; Rabbinic Biography: Talmudic

Rabbinic Biography: Modern

Ellenson, David, Rabbi Esriel Hildesheimer and the Creation of a Modern Jewish Orthodoxy (Judaic Studies Series), Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1990

Etkes, Immanuel, R. Yisra'el Salanter ve-r'eshitah shel tenu'at ha-musar, 1982; as Rabbi Israel Salanter and the Mussar Movement: Seeking the Torah of Truth, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1993

Green, Arthur, Tormented Master: A Life of Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav (Judaic Studies Series), University: University of Alabama Press, 1979

Klugman, Eliyahu Meir, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch: Architect of Torah Judaism for the Modern World (ArtScroll History Series), Brooklyn, New York: Mesorah, 1996

Shapiro, Marc B., Between the Yeshiva World and Modern Orthodoxy: The Life and Works of Rabbi Jehiel Jacob Weinberg, London and Portland, Oregon: Littman Library, 1999

Biographies of modern rabbinic personalities are nothing new, but English-language biographies of Orthodox rabbinic figures (the focus of this essay) are a relatively recent phenomenon. While books recounting the lives of these rabbinic figures abound, they are virtually all hagiographic and must be approached with great caution, both for what they include and for what they omit. These books are written to inspire piety and respect for the rabbi and have a specific ideological agenda. Although they deserve study in their own right, they cannot properly be considered biographical.

The chief distributor of hagiographic literature in contemporary Orthodoxy is the ArtScroll imprint, and KLUGMAN appears under these auspices. However, Klugman's book is of a completely different genre, and it is therefore regrettable that the work did not appear under the aegis of another press. Because of the publisher, it is likely that Klugman will be ignored by many scholars. However, once one gets past some minor pious trappings, one finds a comprehensive and authoritative biography of one of the most significant Orthodox rabbis in modern times. Samson Raphael Hirsch, as the creator of a new form of Orthodoxy that integrated the best of worldly culture, has been subject to a variety of interpretations as well as revisionism. Klugman avoids tendentious interpretation and portrays Hirsch's life and thought in a manner that both laypeople and scholars will find appealing. The major criticism of Klugman's work is that because he is not a trained historian, he is ill-equipped to deal with the larger historical issues taking place in Hirsch's time, not to mention the complicated question of Hirsch's indebtedness to contemporary German philosophy. That having been said, it is remarkable that a nonprofessional could produce what must be regarded as a first-class biography.

The life and work of Nahman of Bratslav have been popularized by Elie Wiesel and continue to fascinate readers of all religious backgrounds. GREEN offers a complete biography of this most enigmatic of hasidic leaders. His study must of necessity deal with issues of psychohistory, as Nahman's life virtually cries out for this type of examination. Green skillfully shows the guilt, inner struggle, and doubt found in this hasidic master. In an excursus, Green discusses how to make use of Nahman's tales, in many ways his most enduring achievement. Another excursus, devoted to the issues of faith, doubt, and reason in Nahman, is a fine exercise in how unsystematic teachings and reflections, such as were offered by Nahman, are to be used with profit by the intellectual historian.

ETKES provides a comprehensive biography and study of the contributions of Israel Salanter, founder of the 19th-century Musar movement, which was devoted to strengthening piety and ethical conduct through self-examination. Along the way Etkes illuminates a great deal about traditional Eastern European Orthodoxy and thus places Salanter's innovative movement in its proper context. In the course of his study, in which he shows the intellectual sources for Salanter's Musar thought, Etkes also disposes of some of the hagiography that has arisen around Salanter (e.g., that he preceded Freud in discovering the unconscious). Relevant to Salanter's life are the activities of the maskilim (in particular their involvement in the creation of a rabbinical seminary), the opening of the first kollel, and the founding of Tevunah, the first Torah periodical. Etkes discusses Salanter's involvement with all of these endeavors as well as his other communal activities.

ELLENSON offers a very readable study of Esriel Hildesheimer, the great halakhic scholar, devotee of Wissenschaft des Judentums, builder of institutions of learning, battler against Reform, and supporter of Jewish causes the world over. Ellenson examines in close detail Hildesheimer's life and work with emphasis on the institutions that Hildesheimer built in Hungary and Germany, which were the backbone of Neo-Orthodoxy. Ellenson is particularly strong in describing the various struggles and successes of Hildesheimer, perhaps the loneliest of the great rabbinic figures of the 19th century, who stood virtually alone against great opposition throughout his life and yet refused to waver. Although Ellenson's book is a great contribution to German Jewish history, as a biography it is somewhat lacking. For example, Ellenson provides an excellent portrait of Hildesheimer the builder, teacher, and shaper of events; however, one would also have liked to see more appreciation of Hildesheimer the scholar, both in the areas of Wissenschaft and halakhah. Ellenson is only interested in the latter when it has some relevance to the issue of Orthodox-Reform disputes.

SHAPIRO offers a complete study of the life and works of Jehiel Jacob Weinberg, one of the most important halakhists of 20th-century Orthodoxy. In addition to illuminating Weinberg's life, Shapiro also discusses a number of other aspects of Jewish history, such as the Lithuanian yeshivot, the Musar movement, Eastern European Jews in Weimar Germany, varying conceptions of Torah im derekh erets (the synthesis of religious and secular values), Orthodox attitudes toward Wissenschaft des Judentums, and the special problems of Orthodox Jews in Nazi Germany. Weinberg's major claim to fame is his halakhic writings, and Shapiro focuses on what he regards as the most significant facet of these writings, namely, how Weinberg integrated aspects of the modern world into the halakhic system. This approach was based on the notion that reform, within limits, is a crucial element to the success of Orthodoxy. Weinberg is shown to follow in the path of his predecessors in Germany who believed that when confronted with faltering religious observance, traditional Orthodox practices must be modified in a liberal direction in order to increase their appeal. This contradicts the approach of the influential Rabbi Moses Sofer who not only argued against any liberalization but also advocated increased stringencies as a means of countering spreading irreligiosity. One of the book's appendixes contains, in English translation, a lengthy and fascinating 1933 letter to Hitler written by several German Orthodox leaders.

MARC B. SHAPIRO

See also Rabbinic Biography: Early Modern; Rabbinic Biography: Medieval; Rabbinic Biography: Talmudic

Rabinovitch, Sholem see Sholem Aleichem

Race, Jews as

- Alcalay, Ammiel, After Jews and Arabs: Remaking Levantine Culture, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993
- Fishberg, Maurice, The Jews: A Study of Race and Environment, New York and London: Scott, 1911
- Gilman, Sander, The Jew's Body, New York: Routledge, 1991
- Kautsky, Karl, Are the Jews a Race?, London: Cape, and New York: International, 1926
- Patai, Raphael and Jennifer Patai, The Myth of the Jewish Race, New York: Scribner, 1974; revised edition, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1989
- Zollschan, Ignaz, Jewish Questions: Three Lectures, New York: Bloch, 1914

Race is not a static category but a historical discourse used to differentiate strategically one group from another. Indebted as much to anthropology as it is to biology, racial determination is always fraught with instability and is often bolstered by class, gender, linguistic, labor, or cultural differences. Jews, as a people living among (and tending to resemble) other peoples, are confronted with a troubling question of difference: how can Jews be considered a single people (generally a racial determination) while they appear to be so diverse? In other words, are Jews a race? More interesting than any simple yes or no answer are the ways in which this question has been framed and asked historically in order to discuss the issues at stake in the determination of Jewish identity according to race, rather than seeking to definitively establish its characteristics.

GILMAN's landmark work is an insightful and invaluable contribution to the study of Jews as a race. He examines representations of Jewish male bodies in Europe during the 18th and 19th centuries. Focusing on particular body parts and characteristics, Gilman masterfully examines racial stereotypes ranging from the Jewish nose to the Jewish genius. His analysis focuses on the determination and characterization of a Jewish race primarily by German scientists, anthropologists, and intellectuals. This book succeeds on two levels. First, it lays out clearly the historical circumstances of the racialization of Jews in Europe, including discussions of criminology, demography, and immigration. Second, it exposes the roots of the question and offers an incisive, well documented, and clearly explicated critique.

ZOLLSCHAN was a Jewish physician whose book is largely a response to the highly charged antisemitic climate of fin-de-siècle Vienna. Employing a scientific concept of race, Zollschan addresses Aryan claims of Jewish racial inferiority. His book is divided into three parts: the first is an evaluation of race science; the second explores historical (as opposed to "purely" genealogical) factors that influence the formation of a race, including immigration, miscegenation, and assimilation; and the third section is an argument for the contributions of the Jewish race to humanity. For Zollschan, the problem of race is a problem of antisemitism, and therefore the only cure lies in the establishment of a Jewish state. Zollschan denied any physical difference between Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews in the interests of racial (and national) unity and a future of national rebirth. Zollschan's application of race science in the name of Zionism is crucial to understanding the power of this discourse in the formation of Jewish identities.

Also extremely critical of race-based antisemitism, the German socialist KAUTSKY's study fails to discover a set of racial characteristics shared by Jews. In stark contrast to Zollschan, Kautsky is highly critical of Zionism, which he views as an offshoot of antisemitism: both seek separatism, both aspire to racial distinction, and both rely on the racialization of the Jews in order for their respective projects to succeed. Kautsky offers a broad critique of race as inherently "in flux and transition" and therefore qualitatively unhelpful. For Kautsky, the only solution for the race problem is proletarian rebellion. His critique of race science is interesting not so much for its hopeful prescription but for the way in which it illustrates the connections between race and nationalism and warns against its dangers.

Kautsky owed a great debt to FISHBERG's study of the Jews. For many years, Fishberg's work stood as the authoritative anthropological study of the Jews as a race. His goal was to solve the "problem" of assimilating a vast number of immigrants into the United States and England. Taking a primarily morphological approach, Fishberg compared numerous Jewish populations along a variety of axes, both genetic and social (from height and weight to criminality and "political condition"), in order to determine whether or not Jews constituted a distinct racial group. For Fishberg, the Jews do not constitute a distinct race, as they tend to adopt not only the behavior but the appearance of the larger community in which they live. Ironically, his claim that Jews alone possess this ability to adapt to their milieu is insufficient evidence to establish a Jewish race. Therefore, they can be safely assimilated into the "Anglo-Saxon body politic." Read as a historical document, this book is an invaluable resource as it succinctly and unselfconsciously situates the discourses of race and Jewish identity within the continually contested bounds of nationalism, immigration, science, and culture.

Taking a similar approach to that of Fishberg, PATAI and PATAI understand race as fundamentally a question of blood purity. Complete with 16 pages of head-shots of Jews from around the world, the Patais employ historical and genetic data to prove that Jews do not constitute a race, concluding that there is no morphological continuity between Jews of different lands. They do, however, establish that although Jews do not constitute a single race, there is evidence—in the form of seven polymorphic genes—indicating a common Mediterranean origin. They are careful to reiterate that this common origin does not establish racial continuity. The 1989 edition includes a chapter refuting the claim that "Zionism is racism" on the basis that there is no such thing as a Jewish race.

Finally, ALCALAY's analysis of Levantine literature approaches race in a dramatically different way. Through literary theory, Alcalay reads Jewish studies into a Middle Eastern context in order to interrogate the axiom of fundamental racial difference between Jew and Arab. Alcalay's cogent critique of European Zionist racism against Jews from Arab lands vigorously challenges claims of Jewish racial unity and offers a regional-cultural rather than racial framework for studying Jews, Arabs, and those for whom both categories apply. Alcalay's work does not address the topic of race explicitly, but it is significant here for its broad and flexible reworking of the boundaries of racial identity and its reevaluation of accepted notions of racial difference. Using literature as opposed to science or anthropology enables Alcalay to shed some much-needed critical light on the issue of race in the Middle East.

ARI KELMAN

See also Race, Views on

Race, Views on

- Aschheim, Steven, Brothers and Strangers: The East European Jew in German and German Jewish Consciousness, 1800–1923, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1982
- Efron, John, Defenders of the Race: Jewish Doctors and Race Science in Fin-de-Siècle Europe, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1994
- Gilman, Sander, Freud, Race, and Gender, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1993
- Kleeblatt, Norman L. (editor), Too Jewish?: Challenging Traditional Identities, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1996
- Pellegrini, Ann, Performance Anxieties: Staging Psychoanalysis, Staging Race, New York and London: Routledge, 1997

Since the Holocaust there has been a great reluctance to use race-based science in discussions of identity. Nevertheless, race remains one of the primary categories of personal and political identification and affiliation. There is no single, monolithic Jewish opinion of race, and it is important to remember that the question is not whether there is or is not such a thing as Jewish thinking about race, because it is clear that at various times in history there have been a range of ideas on the subject and at other times no consciousness of it. Due to the flexibility of the term, Jews have long held highly ambivalent attitudes toward the category of race and have both suffered and benefited from its use. The issue at stake here is how Jews have negotiated their own racialization and the racialization of others.

For ASCHHEIM, race lies at the center of Europe's Jewish question. He examines carefully the role of race in the immigration and absorption of Polish and Russian Jews into German-Jewish communities during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Whereas antisemites employed race to elide cultural differences between the immigrant and established Jewish communities (thus to condemn all Jews in one breath), German Jews adopted race to differentiate themselves from the Eastern Jews, whom they saw as uncultured, unenlightened, and otherwise backward. Yet, at the same time, generally they felt an affinity toward their coreligionists and organized extensive assistance programs for them. For these Jews, race was the vehicle for reaffirming their German identity while it also became the conduit for the expression of a quasi-national Jewish bond. This ambivalence is tied firmly to the German Jews' self-perception as enlightened, modern citizens of the state, which, for them, transcended (Jewish) race and reinscribed it along national (German) lines. Race was so tightly woven into their self-conception and political goals that their views on it were rarely expressed as such and took more subtle and at times contradictory forms, which Aschheim brings to light.

Examining much the same time and place, EFRON considers the lives of Jewish doctors and their work with respect to race science. Writing against the notion that postwar European decolonization was the first challenge to traditional anthropology, Efron's careful study provides an account of oppositional racial discourse during the late 19th and early 20th centuries as practiced by European Jewish doctors. For Jews generally and Jewish physicians in particular, to deploy race science was a strategic manipulation of current discourse rather than the wholesale purchase of a biased science. Efron asserts that none of his subjects employed race in a chauvinistic manner; instead, he argues that race science was an available means for raising ethnic pride and unity under the specter of European antisemitism. He adds that almost all the Jewish doctors whom he studied acknowledged the great significance of history and culture in the formation of the Jewish people, yet each still returned to race as the final determinant. Efron's study is an account of the salience of race science, insufficient as it was (and is) to prove conclusively the existence of a Jewish race.

Looking at race during the same period, GILMAN's work on Sigmund Freud makes an invaluable contribution to the Jewish discourse on race for its analysis of the intersection of race and gender. Gilman claims that Freud's Jewish identity was both defined and disturbed by European race science. Freud's anxiety regarding his race was aggravated by the popular cultural feminization of Jewish men, which he sought to ameliorate by projecting it onto women and other perceived inferiors. By providing a survey of the medical literature of the time, Gilman illustrates both the role of gender in establishing and fixing racial difference and also Freud's ambivalence about this (gendered) racial categorization. Gilman provides a detailed framework and solid evidence for a racial analysis that not only includes but relies on gender, based on the particular experience of Jews in Vienna.

PELLEGRINI picks up where Gilman leaves off. Rooted in psychoanalysis and performance theory, she offers a reading of race that is from the outset infused with gender. Fully aware of its social construction, her analysis of race explores its instability and ambivalence to determine how it works in contemporary society. Brilliantly, she details the interaction between "Jewishness," "Blackness," and "womanliness" as they have been constructed, performed, and maintained by Freud, Frantz Fanon, Albert Memmi, Sandra Bernhardt, and Anna Deveare Smith. Race, for Pellegrini, is not a biological fact but a social performance—one that is mediated by racial and gendered difference and one that is never complete. Like Gilman, she does not accept race as a static category but rather examines how it is always infused with performances of gender. As such, race and racial performance becomes, for Jews, a strategy of articulation, disavowal, resistance, and reinforcement. Pellegrini's poststructuralism is both a critique of race science as well as an investigation of the ongoing significance of race as a social category.

The themes of nation and gender that gird any discussion of race are provocatively engaged in the art and essays assembled by KLEEBLATT in a companion volume to the exhibition of the same name mounted by the Jewish Museum in New York in 1996. Insofar as stereotypes are racially motivated (under the assumption that cultural behavior is linked to certain biological traits), each of the authors and artists engages representations of Jewishness with a particular focus on bodily function and appearance. Some authors and artists trace this genealogy more conceptually, as in Margeret Olin's essay where biology becomes the common ancestor of racism and formalist criticism. Others, such as Riv-Ellen Prell and Maurice Berger, examine the ways in which gender behaves as the fulcrum for the perpetuation of Jewish racial stereotypes. The artists exhibited are equally incisive in their critical deployment of Jewish iconography from rhinoplasty to Barbara Streisand to sewing samplers. While not all are concerned with race per se, the attitude of each toward Jewish identity is undergirded by a sense of exploration, and they often deal with issues of the body, appearance, and racial "passing." Race is a key factor in the book, but its meaning is undetermined. The artists and authors of Kleeblatt's volume seek to undermine any sense of racial typology in favor of a fungible, unstable, and playful configuration of Jewish belonging.

ARI KELMAN

See also Race, Jews as

Rashi see Solomon ben Isaac

Reconstructionist Judaism

- Alpert, Rebecca T. and Jacob J. Staub, Exploring Judaism: A Reconstructionist Approach, New York: Reconstructionist Press, 1985
- Berkovits, Eliezer, "Reconstructionist Theology: A Critical Evaluation," in his Major Themes in Modern Philosophies of Judaism, New York: Ktav, 1974
- Eisenstein, Ira, Reconstructing Judaism: An Autobiography, New York: Reconstructionist Press, 1986
- Kaplan, Mordecai M., The Future of the American Jew, New York: Macmillan, 1948
- Liebman, Charles, "Reconstructionism in American Jewish Life," in his Aspects of the Religious Behavior of American Jews, New York: Ktav, 1974
- Raphael, Marc Lee, "Institutions and Organizations: 1922–1983" and "[Reconstructionism:] Origins and Ideology," in his Profiles in American Judaism, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1984
- Rosenthal, Gilbert S., "Reconstructionism: History" and "Reconstructionism: Ideology," in his Contemporary Judaism: Patterns of Survival, New York: Human Sciences Press, 1986
- Wertheimer, Jack, "The Reconstruction of Kaplanian Reconstructionism," in his A People Divided: Judaism in Contemporary America, New York: Basic Books, 1993

Reconstructionist Judaism is a 20th-century North American Jewish movement with an ideology and program rooted in humanism, naturalism, democratic theory, pragmatism, and the historical method of analysis. The movement has undergone two primary periods of development. The first is associated with the work of the movement's founder, Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan (1881–1993). Kaplan's philosophy and program are the basis of Reconstructionist Judaism, although Kaplan resisted efforts to define Reconstructionist Judaism as a fourth movement or denomination in North American Judaism. A leader of the left-wing of Conservative Judaism, he preferred to think of his program as a “school of thought,” despite his efforts to organize liturgy, publications, foundations, and other institutions normally associated with a movement. The second period of development includes the founding of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in 1968 and the consequent emergence of the movement as a fourth denomination.

KAPLAN’s exposition represents the most comprehensive statement of his program and thinking. Building on his earlier work, Judaism as a Civilization; Towards a Reconstruction of American-Jewish Life (New York: Macmillan, 1934), this book shows how Kaplan and others of his generation positioned the emerging movement. Kaplan regards Judaism not as a religion but as a civilization or culture. He views Judaism as the natural historical product and project of the Jewish people, rather than as a revealed religious system handed down by God at Mount Sinai, as the Bible presents it. According to Kaplan, God is not a supernatural being but a power or process that provides meaning and human fulfillment. Jewish law, especially as applied to ritual, must be seen as a pluralistic pattern of custom rather than a uniform expectation of law-fulfillment. Judaism is not an unchanging system of faith and law, Kaplan argues, for it has undergone change and development in every generation, and the religion must continue to evolve—now rationally and self-consciously—if it is to survive the challenges of modernity.

EISENSTEIN’s autobiography offers a historical-personal narrative about the development of Reconstructionist Judaism. A member of the generation that followed Kaplan’s, Eisenstein is recognized as the founder of Reconstructionism as a movement. He was the preeminent disciple, as well as son-in-law, of Kaplan, and he served as co-rabbi in Kaplan’s congregation. He was also editor of Reconstructionist magazine and the founding president of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College. Eisenstein’s book documents the inside story of the emergence of Reconstructionism as an independent movement, reflecting the author’s own valuable perspective on both the ideology and architecture of the movement.

BERKOVITS provides a dated but still valuable critique of Kaplan’s religious thinking, focusing specifically on his claims that God can be understood as process or power rather than as being. Berkovits’s Orthodox identification establishes him as an inevitable critic of Reconstructionism, but his criticisms stress weaknesses in Kaplan’s own thinking instead of simply using the Orthodox perspective to disavow Kaplan’s non-Orthodox thinking.

LIEBMAN published his study just as the Reconstructionist seminary was first opening its doors, the moment that defined the independence of the movement. While the author’s analysis of the state and strength of the movement is valuable and interesting, it is now completely out of date and should be interpreted as a historical snapshot of the movement at the critical juncture between the Kaplan incarnation and the stage that would soon follow. Liebman’s study is famous for its claim that most American Jews (at least in 1968) identified with positions that were clearly Reconstructionist but very few of those Jews called themselves Reconstructionists. Liebman suggests that the movement’s expression of popular views may be one of its weaknesses, indicating that Reconstructionism articulates the status quo rather than envisioning what Judaism should be. He also argues that Reconstructionism may represent what sociologists call “folk religion,” while traditional Judaism is an “elite religion.”

The strength of ROSENTHAL’s treatment is its succinct analysis and presentation of admittedly complex Kaplanian ideas. The concise study is weakened, however, when it subsumes or ignores valuable nuances and distinctions between Kaplan’s thinking and Rosenthal’s critique of that thinking. Rosenthal’s analysis of the movement itself is more contemporary than that of Liebman, although he presents only the beginnings of the developments of the 1970s and 1980s.

RAPHAEL investigates the new concerns of Reconstructionism that emerged in the early- to mid-1980s. He identifies such central trends of this period as the movement’s interest in mystical and hasidic thought, its attraction to spiritual disciplines and new rituals, and the rethinking of Kaplanian concepts. Organizational developments are also noted: the study covers the move of the seminary to a new campus and its adoption of a more stable and structured program; the development of a Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association (1974); and the consolidation, realignment, and expansion of the movement’s publications and congregational organization. Raphael’s treatment concludes with the beginnings of what would prove to be the movement’s major project, product, and statement of its second stage: the new prayer-book series titled Kol HaNeshamah.

Reconstructionism, as a small movement unencumbered by historical structure and precedent, found itself responding rapidly in the 1980s to challenging societal changes as refracted through the Jewish community. A Conservative Jewish thinker, WERTHEIMER critically discusses the Reconstructionist movement’s embrace of equality for gay and lesbian Jews; its sympathy toward spirituality; its liberal approach to the reality of intermarriage via outreach and welcome to interfaith families; and its position that rabbi and laity should democratically share decision-making power. Wertheimer suggests that in its rush to embrace progressive positions, Reconstructionism is open to the charge that it has abandoned Kaplan’s core concepts and program.

ALPERT and STAUB, two mid-1970s graduates of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, present both the Kaplanian background and contemporary formulations of Reconstructionism. The authors provide a valuable portrait of a movement that is rooted in one man’s thinking but has grown to meet the needs of Jews three and four generations removed from that of Kaplan—generations living in a different setting and tackling different questions.

RICHARD HIRSH

Reference Works

- Aharoni, Yohanan and Michael Avi-Yonah, The Macmillan Bible Atlas, New York: Macmillan, 1968; revised as The Modern Bible Atlas, London: Allen and Unwin, 1979; 3rd edition as The Macmillan Bible Atlas, New York: Macmillan, 1993

- Aumann, Moshe et al., Carta's Historical Atlas of Israel: A Survey of the Past and Review of the Present, Jerusalem: Carta, 1983
- Avi-Yonah, Michael, The Madaba Mosaic Map, Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1954
- Bacon, Josephine and Martin Gilbert, The Illustrated Atlas of Jewish Civilization, London: Deutsch, 1990
- Bahat, Dan, Atlas Karta le-toldot Yerushalayim, Jerusalem: Carta, 1983; as The Illustrated Atlas of Jerusalem, translated by Shlomo Ketko, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1990
- Brisman, Shimeon, Jewish Research Literature, vol. 1: A History and Guide to Judaic Bibliography Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1977
- Brisman, Shimeon, Jewish Research Literature, vol. 2: A History and Guide to Judaic Encyclopedias and Lexicons, Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1987
- Cutter, Charles and Micha Falk Oppenheim, Jewish Reference Sources: A Selective, Annotated Bibliographic Guide (Garland Reference Library of Social Science, vol. 126), New York: Garland, 1982; 2nd edition, as Judaica Reference Sources: A Selective, Annotated Bibliographic Guide, Juneau, Alaska: Denali, 1993
- De Lange, Nicholas Robert Michael, Atlas of the Jewish World, Oxford: Phaidon, and New York: Facts on File, 1984
- Friesel, Evyatar, Atlas of Modern Jewish History, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
- Gilbert, Martin, Jewish History Atlas, New York: Macmillan, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1969; 4th edition, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1992; as The Atlas of Jewish History, New York: Morrow, 1993
- Gilbert, Martin, Atlas of the Holocaust, London: Joseph, 1982; as The Macmillan Atlas of the Holocaust, New York: Macmillan, 1982; 2nd edition, as The Dent Atlas of the Holocaust, London: Dent, 1993; as Atlas of the Holocaust, New York: Morrow, 1993
- Hyman, Paula E. and Deborah Dash Moore (editors), Jewish Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia, 2 vols., New York: Routledge, 1997; London: Routledge, 1998
- Jacobs, Louis, The Jewish Religion: A Companion, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995
- Kaganoff, Nathan, Judaica Americana: An Annotated Bibliography of Publications from 1960-1990, 2 vols., Brooklyn, New York: Carlson, 1995
- Marcus, Jacob Rader (editor), The Concise Dictionary of American Jewish Biography, 2 vols., Brooklyn, New York: Carlson, 1994
- New York Times Company, Israel, the Historical Atlas: The Story of Israel from Ancient Times to the Modern Nation, New York: Macmillan, 1997
- Singerman, Robert, Judaica Americana: A Bibliography of Publications to 1900, 2 vols., New York: Greenwood, 1990
- Werblowsky, R.J. Zwi and Geoffrey Wigoder (editors), The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, New York: Oxford University Press, 1997

Vilnay, Zev, Atlas Tav Shin Kaf Het, 1968; translated by Moshe Aumann as The New Israel Atlas: Bible to Present Day, London: Humphrey, 1968; New York: McGraw-Hill, 1969

As a humanistic discipline (and a small one at that), Jewish studies was only modestly affected by new media in the late 20th century. The limited ability of computers to search non-Roman scripts proved an additional inhibiting factor. Certainly, the advent of electronic mail encouraged communication and a wide sharing of scholarly notes and queries, but the most significant developments were at an evolutionary rather than a revolutionary level, with the conversion of existing reference works or ongoing bibliographic projects to electronic formats. With the concurrent appearance at the very end of the 20th century of the two chief encyclopedic and bibliographic resources in Jewish studies—Encyclopaedia Judaica and the Jewish National and University Library's Index of Articles on Jewish Studies (RAMBI)—on CD-ROM and online via the website of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, respectively, the days of similar works (as opposed to monographic literature) on the inflexible medium of paper seem numbered. The following remarks, therefore, describe in some detail the range of atlases—as reference literature where traditional printed format continues for the moment to retain a certain appeal—but move briskly over the territory of bibliographies, encyclopedias, and dictionaries. The latter are understood not as language tools but as one-volume encyclopedias supplying summary definitions of concepts, people, and places significant to the study of Judaism.

If the particular state of flux in a kind of literature that is in any case especially susceptible to obsolescence is one reason for brevity, there are two further, equally compelling reasons. One is the sheer vastness of the literature, while the other is more comforting—the job has already been done to perfection in the two volumes by Shimeon Brisman and the volume by Charles Cutter and Micha Oppenheim. BRISMAN (1977, 1987) is primarily an important and pleasurable history of Jewish research literature, but his treatment of the major and minor monuments of reference publishing in Jewish studies, which proceeds by genre and then chronologically within each genre, is laid out in such a way as to function as a superb bibliography of bibliographies, in the case of volume one, and of encyclopedias and lexicons (again, lexicons of Judaism to the exclusion of lexicons of Jewish languages) in volume two. Brisman's discussion of a major work may run to several pages, and the author manifests quite exceptional sensitivity to the needs of researchers in the mass of illuminating information he assembles. In particular, his work makes visible the enduring potential in obscure and otherwise forgotten publications often from the 19th century.

Volume one covers general and subject-specific bibliographies of Hebraica and of European-language Judaica; published catalogs of major libraries' collections of Jewish literature; bio-bibliographical works; bibliographical periodicals; and indexes to periodicals and monographs. Brisman remarks in his preface that during the last two and a half centuries numerous efforts have been made—with ranging degrees of success—to bring the fast-growing Jewish literature under bibliographic control. During his years as a Jewish studies librarian and lecturer in Hebrew bibliography, the author has noticed with disappointment that the average Jewish scholar, student, or even librarian is totally unaware of the existence of such tools; but he has been pleasantly surprised as a lecturer to notice students' fascination with Jewish bibliography, a subject usually considered dry. It seems that Jewish bibliography, when presented in the realm of Jewish cultural and literary history, can become an exciting topic for scholars and students.

In view of the preeminence accorded to bibliographic intelligence by the "information age," perhaps Brisman need not have worried, but his books—anything but dry—certainly make his point and richly repay cover-to-cover reading.

CUTTER and OPPENHEIM offer a guide to the reference literature of Jewish studies that is quite different from Brisman and is equally invaluable. A straightforward bibliography by subject and by genre within subjects, it offers brisk, informed annotations that are typically descriptive rather than evaluative, never devoting more than a paragraph to a single work and occasionally not more than a couple of lines. The authors identify a staggering 888 reference books. The clarity and simplicity of the layout ensures that the reader can hardly fail to find immediate assistance and a dependably exhaustive set of pointers. This small book can be relied upon without fear of a daunting overload on the one hand or oversight of key resources on the other. The work is also notable for being more up-to-date: Cutter and Oppenheim's second edition (which renders entirely obsolete their more modest first edition of 1982) appeared some 15 years after Brisman's volume on bibliography, and much had appeared in the intervening years. Their book is also distinctive for the range of reference tools it distinguishes and describes, among them biographical dictionaries, calendars, filmographies, travel guides, and all manner of directories and yearbooks.

To indicate the frenetic pace of production during the 1990s of reference works in Jewish studies, it may suffice merely to mention half-a-dozen outstanding examples. SINGERMAN accomplishes an extraordinary feat of bibliography, identifying and indexing 5,892 American Jewish books and 479 serial titles published through 1900. This achievement is complemented by KAGANOFF, who devotes two further volumes that resemble Singerman's and bear the same title as his. Kaganoff lists American Jewish books and articles for the years 1960 through 1990—some 7,427 in total. Both compilations feature an invaluable subject index.

In terms of encyclopedias and dictionaries published during the 1900s, it is necessary to mention Marcus and also Hyman and Dash Moore. MARCUS provides the briefest of biographical entries for close to 24,000 prominent American Jews, supplying place and date of birth, education, profession, communal involvement, and field of distinction, before listing references to ampler treatments elsewhere. It is, therefore, a central clearinghouse for the published but scattered data of American Jewish biography—a cumulative index, inter alia, to any number of ephemeral directories and Who's Whos.

HYMAN and MOORE offer full encyclopedic treatment for 800 individual American Jewish women, with an additional 110 topical entries. These cover institutions such as the cantorate and organizations such as Hadassah, as well as broader treatments of the women's "club movement" or "fiction." Replete with excellent photographs and an exemplary bibliography, this magnificent review of the state of knowledge fills a grievous gap and is bound to be the point of departure for much further research.

Finally it should be said that while a good many of the numerous lexicons of Judaism are at best uninspired, two new publications, one appearing in 1995 and the other in 1997, tower over the field, offering intelligibility to guide the inexperienced and a discriminating combination of information and interpretation to assist, interest, and frequently to stimulate Jewish studies professionals, sometimes even in their own area of immediate expertise. Jacobs, on the one hand, and Werblowsky and Wigoder, on the other, might appear to be in competition with each other, a curious circumstance given that both books are published by the same press. The books cover much the same ground, limiting themselves to explicitly religious dimensions of the Jewish experience, but with one major difference. WERBLOWSKY and WIGODER have totally transformed an older work, their dated and less valuable Encyclopedia of the Jewish Religion (1965), by successfully galvanizing a large team of experts to produce the entries, which are usefully signed, their brevity notwithstanding. JACOBS has produced a tour de force, an alphabetized conspectus of Judaism as he compellingly sees it. Both this personal—but unfailingly unexceptional—statement of Jacobs and the collective wisdom of so many of his most distinguished contemporaries in Werblowsky and Wigoder are essential reference tools.

References to maps date back to biblical times. In Ezekiel 4:1, the prophet engraves the plan or map of the city of Jerusalem in preparation for a siege. Similar maps have been found on Babylonian monuments. The earliest real maps—the remarkably accurate Portolano maps—were designed for navigation of the coasts of the Mediterranean during the Second Crusade of Louis IX of France in 1270. The only pertinent ancient map that has been preserved in its original format is the Madaba mosaic, which depicts parts of Egypt, the Sinai peninsula, the land of Israel, and Southern Syria. It was originally part of the floor of a Byzantine church built in the 6th century C.E., located in present-day Jordan, and is available in facsimile with a meticulous commentary and introduction by AVI-YONAH.

AHARONI and AVI-YONAH trace the history of ancient Israel from the Canaanite period through the Bar-Kokhba revolt in more than 260 maps that are unfailingly clear, dependable, and useful, if graphically dreary from the perspective of subsequent advances in production values.

AUMANN is a short, concise, and comprehensive atlas of the land of Israel from ancient times to the 1980s that encompasses in texts and maps the entirety of Jewish history in the region. A section titled "Israel—Today" contains graphs and maps depicting the topography, vegetation, social structure, communities, and religious life of Israel. There are also statistics on youth activities, sports and physical fitness, and private enterprise.

Tracing the development of the Jewish people from biblical times to the establishment of the State of Israel, BACON and GILBERT's atlas is a pleasant popular account of Jewish communities worldwide. The chapters titled "The Jewish Enlightenment to the Eve of the Holocaust" and "The Dark Side: Anti-Semitism" are especially noteworthy. Numerous photographs and historical maps accompany this text, creating an impression reminiscent of a slide show.

DE LANGE's perspective is innovative and somewhat more original than those provided in the Aumann and the Bacon and Gilbert atlases. He investigates the evolution of the Jewish people, exploring "who they are, and how they have come to be where they are today." Because, writes De Lange, no precedents existed for this sort of publication, he constructs his own "perhaps idiosyncratic form of presentation," in which each of the atlas's three parts features a "different approach" to the Jewish world. Part one concentrates on migration and social conditions; part two contains a collection of general essays dealing with Jewish cultures; and part three depicts the Jewish world of today, highlighting both its dispersion and its centers around the globe. The volume concludes with a glossary, list of illustrations, bibliography, gazetteer, and a limited index.

Martin Gilbert has produced a number of successful historical atlases, for example on British history and Russian history, consistently emphasizing clarity above all else, which he achieves by opting for broad strokes discriminately chosen. This is true for GILBERT (1969), a lightly annotated atlas that "traces the world-wide migrations from ancient Mesopotamia to modern Israel," while attempting to "avoid undue emphasis" on the painful events in Jewish history, which sometimes seem to overshadow the many cultural achievements, bravery, and resistance of the Jewish people. Gilbert also portrays obscure episodes and communities in Jewish history, shedding light on the Jews of India, 175 B.C.E.–1795 C.E.; Jewish converts to Christianity, 45–300 C.E.; and the Karaites, 700–1960 C.E. Discussions of recent events such as the Jewish emigration from Russia and Operation Moses, in which thousands of Ethiopian Jews were brought to Israel, are also included in the atlas. A short bibliography provides sources for further study.

GILBERT (1982) manages to retain the uncluttered feel that characterizes all his atlases, but this time without any loss of detail. This is because the topic is relatively limited in time and space, with the anti-Jewish measures of 1933 to 1945 being illustrated in some 316 maps as against the 123 maps devoted to the entire Jewish experience in his general work. As a result, he is able to present, with his customary flair for succinct graphic eloquence, a great range of information, frequently of an illuminatingly microcosmic or local character, as in the typical full-page maps titled "Nine Deportations to Belzec, 7 September 1942" or "Jews, Greeks and Italians Drowned off Pologandros, 6 June 1944."

If Gilbert's productions are notably clean and make an excellent introduction, FRIESEL, again an atlas by a highly renowned modern historian, goes for richness of detail at the expense of soothing white space. Limited to the modern period, it does not offer significant coverage of events until the second half of the 19th century. For subsequent years, however, it is a treasure trove of demographic data: population growth, occupational distribution, exogamy, urbanization, migration, languages, and religious and intellectual differences are admirably presented. Names of institutions are occasionally rendered somewhat impressionistically, but caution is appropriate in approaching all these sweeping summaries of a world of history and does very little to diminish the value of an exceptionally suggestive and informative work of reference.

The NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY's historical atlas is a valuable, unique work that appropriately positions itself along "that often disputed border where history meets journalism." Nine reporters who have served as Times correspondents in Israel and the Middle East since 1948 each contribute a judicious and succinct essay on subjects from ancient times through the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin in 1995 and the establishment of a Likud government in 1996. If it is more journalism than history, it is also more history than atlas. Still, the volume does present many colorful photographs and more than 50 small but useful maps illustrating historical developments, including the Desert Storm military operation in Iraq, the Intifada, settlements in contention, and emerging Palestinian autonomy. The atlas ends with a section of biographical sketches titled "National Builders: Leaders Who Shaped Israel."

Although VILNAY's atlas purports to depict the "new Israel," it is now outdated and could be classified as a historical atlas because it only reflects events up to the Six-Day War of 1967. Nevertheless, it remains an exceptionally useful tool, largely for its unconventional and sometimes idiosyncratic choice of subject matter. The work is arranged in four sequences. "Modern Israel" covers the basics of the physical and political geography of the State of Israel before proceeding to illustrate cartographically such intriguing sidelines as settlements named after Christian friends of Israel, benefactors, and soldiers. Other maps identify holy places, and the various religious minorities are given due attention. Another map locates the yeshivot of Israel; sketchy and dated, it is of limited use today, but, typical of Vilnay, this is a neat idea. The second sequence, "The Struggle for Independence," covers developments during the British Mandate and the early years of statehood. The third section offers a brisk march through the history of the land of Israel from Joshua's conquest, by way of Romans, Crusaders, Ottomans, and Napoleon, to Allenby; the volume concludes with a useful fourth section devoted to the depiction of the assorted plans for creating a Jewish state that were drafted before and during the British Mandate. Although spelling, notably of the names of individuals, is not all that it might be, this is quite a useful publication.

A more modern, more academically sophisticated, and much more detailed historical treatment specifically of Jerusalem is offered by BAHAT. As comprehensive and informative as could be hoped for in its presentation of the earlier strata of the city's exceedingly complex past, it is relatively—disappointingly—brisk in its treatment of developments once Saladin succeeds in evicting the Crusaders.

DINA RIPSAN EYLON AND ARI SALKIN-WEISS

See also Bible: Reference Tools; Talmudic Literature: Reference Tools

Reform Judaism

- Borowitz, Eugene, Reform Judaism Today, 3 vols., New York: Behrman House, 1977
- Martin, Bernard (editor), Contemporary Reform Jewish Thought, Chicago: Quadrangle, 1968
- Meyer, Michael, Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism, New York: Oxford University Press, 1988
- Neusner, Jacob (editor), The Reformation of Reform Judaism (Judaism in Cold War America, 1945–1990, vol. 6), New York: Garland, 1993
- Showstack, Gerald, Suburban Communities: The Jewishness of American Reform Jews (Brown Studies on Jews and Their Societies, vol. 5), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988
- Silverstein, Alan, Alternatives to Assimilation: The Response of Reform Judaism to American Culture, 1840–1930 (Brandeis Series in American Jewish History, Culture, and Life), Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1994

Reform Judaism was a modernizing effort within Central and Western European Judaism in response to the Enlightenment and the abolition of the medieval ghettos in the late 18th century. By the 1830s it had taken on the form of an organized movement. It was brought to the New World by German Jewish immigrants arriving in the decades before the U.S. Civil War, and it became the dominant form of American Jewish life until the influx of traditional Eastern European Jews beginning in the 1880s. The Reform movement has continued to be a major presence in American Judaism, comprising some 30 to 40 percent of all affiliated Jews. Since World War II and the Holocaust, Reform Jews have been moving toward the incorporation of more traditional European Jewish customs.

BOROWITZ provides a three-volume series of small books designed to spell out “the state of the question” in Reform Judaism as it seemed in 1973 (a Leader’s Guide prepared by Joel Soffir constitutes a fourth volume). The occasion for this series was a broad-ranging self-evaluation within the American Reform movement undertaken on the centenary of the founding of the Reform seminary, Hebrew Union College, in 1873. The movement sought a reevaluation of the meaning of Reform in light of the Holocaust and the establishment of the State of Israel. In volume one (Reform in the Process of Change), Borowitz rehearses both the lessons that he felt Reform had taught modern Jews and the lessons that the Reform movement had learned over the century that had elapsed. Volume two (What We Believe) builds on these lessons to reflect on what affirmations a Reform Jew can or must make. Volume three (How We Live) looks at how Borowitz thinks Reform Jews should live in the world and especially their religious duties, their stance toward the State of Israel, and their relationship to other people. In the end, he concludes that the task facing Reform is to learn how to live with diversity.

MEYER has written the first comprehensive history of the Reform movement since the beginning of the 20th century. By the mid-1980s the turmoil of the 1970s had passed and the meaning of Israel and the Holocaust had been squarely faced by Reform Jews. Meyer’s history moves away from the essentials and the apologetics of earlier treatments of the history of Reform and draws attention instead to the dynamic tensions to which the creators of the movement were responding. The result is a thick history of the Reform movement that firmly embeds its development in the social and political realities out of which the movement grew and developed. The book ends with the convulsions of the mid-1970s, including the effects of the anti-Vietnam War movement, the Civil Rights struggle, and Jewish confrontation with Israel and the Holocaust.

NEUSNER has put together what could be an interesting companion to Meyer’s history. Neusner’s work is a collection of articles and essays by significant contemporary Reform thinkers on various aspects of Reform Jewish life. The collection is part of a ten-volume series that deals with the various manifestations of modern U.S. Judaism. The particular essays brought together here were written between 1951 and 1989 and were chosen because they represent a broad perspective on the Reform consideration of the situation of modern Jewish life.

MARTIN has brought together a collection of essays by Reform Jewish leaders and thinkers dealing with central issues of Reform Jewish belief. All were written by rabbis who were alumni of Hebrew Union College, the Reform seminary, and so represent the thinking of leaders of American Reform Judaism. Most of the essays were written for this volume, the remainder having been originally published elsewhere, usually in the official publications of the Reform rabbinate. The point was to begin the process of articulating a theology for American Reform Judaism. The collection opens with an essay on theological methodology by Eugene Borowitz, the major American Reform Jewish theologian. Other essays deal with Reform concepts of God, with Reform and traditional Jewish normative practice (halakhah), and the question of Jewish chosenness and destiny. The last essay, written by the editor, sums up the current state of Reform theology as he sees it.

SILVERSTEIN approaches the situation of contemporary Reform by asking how the movement got to where it is. His study looks at the various influences on Reform Jews in America from 1840 until the 1930s. He finds a community that was anxious to maintain its Jewish identity but was looking for a way of doing so compatible with the American context. The result was the creation of a particular style of American Reform synagogue that offered a place for Judaism to be celebrated, but in a voluntaristic institutional setting that mirrored American social and corporate values. For Silverstein, the structure of the American Reform synagogue movement, including its national organizations, has been the most complete example of the creation of an ethnic Jewish lifestyle within an American cultural framework.

SHOWSTACK discusses what has become the major concern within the Reform Jewish community of the 1980s and 1990s: how to hold onto Jewish identity in a community that is rapidly assimilating into American culture. Showstack’s book is an in-depth analysis of the sociological and demographic situation of American Reform Jews. What he documents is that Reform Jews (and American Jews in general) have to a large extent succeeded in “making it” in America, but have maintained, or developed, along the way a strong sense of having a distinct ethnic identity. The sense of the book is that the future of Reform will devolve more and more into serving this ethnic definition of Jewishness.

PETER HAAS

See also Liturgy, Reform

Renaissance

- Bonfil, Roberto, Gli Ebrei in Italia nell'epoca del Rinascimento, 1991; translated by Anthony Oldcorn as Jewish Life in Renaissance Italy, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994
- Cohen, Mark R. (editor and translator), The Autobiography of a Seventeenth-Century Venetian Rabbi: Leon Modena's Life of Judah, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988
- Fishman, Talya, Shaking the Pillars of Exile: 'Voice of a Fool,' an Early Modern Jewish Critique of Rabbinic Culture (Stanford Studies in Jewish History and Culture), Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1997
- Ravid, Benjamin and Robert Davis, The Jews of Venice, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999
- Ruderman, David B., Kabbalah, Magic, and Science: The Cultural Universe of a Sixteenth-Century Jewish Physician, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1988

Jews have lived in Italy without interruption since antiquity. Until the high Middle Ages, Italian Jewry was concentrated in the southern part of the peninsula. By the 13th and 14th centuries, however, with hostile papal policies in the south and favorable treatment in the north, the Jews began to flourish in many of the cities and small towns of northern Italy, primarily as loan bankers but also as merchants. As antagonism toward the Jews increased in France and the Germanic lands, many fled to take advantage of the opportunities in Italy. Spanish Jews began to migrate to Italy after the persecutions of 1391 and continued for several centuries, even after they, or their ancestors, had converted to Catholicism. Since the Jews provided valuable services, they often received generous charters allowing them to live comfortably. Prosperous, connected with all levels of Christian society, and living in relatively small Jewish communities, these Jews cultivated the tastes and culture of bourgeois Christians. These tendencies became particularly pronounced during the Renaissance, a time when cultural creativity also flourished among the Jews of Italy. At various times, despite intermittent expulsions, their protectors included the popes in Rome, Ancona, and Bologna, the Medici in Florence, the Gonzaga in Mantua, the Este in Ferrara, the Sforza in Milan, and the Republic of Venice.

BONFIL's contribution provides a fresh study of an often misunderstood period of Jewish history and offers a pioneering model of the application of the Annales or mentalité model of history writing to the study of Jewish history. Bonfil wrestles with two equally stimulating questions: (1) to what extent was the history of the Jews in Italy during the Renaissance different from that of the Middle Ages, and (2) how does the historian discover and describe the mentality of Jews living in different periods of history. For Bonfil, these questions are more significant than the conventional preoccupation with the extent to which the Italian culture of the Renaissance influenced the Jews; for him this conventional thinking assumes that there were two distinct cultures, an assumption he will not accept. He argues that the Jews of Italy shared many ideas, social relations, and even sexual intimacies with their Christian neighbors, without reducing the gap between the two religions or peoples. One of the contributions of this view is to show that a structure shared with other peoples, common in Jewish history, is not the same as assimilation. These shared structures produced a Jewish mentality different in Italy than in other parts of the world at the same time and different during the Renaissance from what preceded it in Italy. Regularly he singles out for strong criticism the writing of Cecil Roth, whose research on the Jews during the Renaissance is widely known. Readers may derive more benefit from Bonfil's stunning analysis by turning first to the second section of the book.

COHEN's collaborative work treats Leone Modena's Hebrew autobiography, Hayyei Yehudah, "The Life of Judah." Modena (1571–1648), the outstanding Venetian rabbi of the early modern period, wrote a great number of Hebrew works in many of the literary genres of Renaissance and Baroque Italy and personally engaged in polemics with Jews and Christians about the nature of rabbinic Judaism. Although he wrote many responsa, letters, and poems, central to an understanding of his thought are works that he never explicitly prepared for publication, which in addition to his autobiography include his attacks on Kabbalah—particularly his scholarly assault on the antiquity of the Zohar and Christian use of it for missionary activity—and his presentation of a powerful critique of rabbinic Judaism, Kol Sahal. In addition to translating and editing the autobiography, Cohen discovered that the interlinear interpolations are in a different ink from the rest of the text, indicating that the author later revised his work to modify or intensify his reactions to the events described. Cohen and Theodore Rabb place the work in the context of early modern Jewish and general history. Natalie Zemon Davis, drawing on the canons of autobiographical criticism, insightfully characterizes the work as "Fame and Secrecy," as part of a program, conscious or not, of posturing, confessing, bragging, and repenting. Her essay places the autobiography in the context of early modern life-writing. Benjamin Ravid provides archival materials in Italian from the Venetian State Archives relevant to Modena and Venetian Jewish history. Howard Adelman compares the autobiography with Modena's other writings, especially his letters. Adelman and Ravid's historical notes can be read sequentially after reading the entire autobiography.

FISHMAN has written a brilliant study of Kol Sahal that sheds much light on the enigmatic but well-documented personality of Leone Modena as well as on the nature of rabbinic Judaism itself. As Fishman correctly notes, reactions to Kol Sahal for the past century and a half have been based on the Jewish denominational preferences of the historian. Some have tried for various reasons either to identify Modena not only as the editor and copyist of the work, about which there can be no dispute, but also as its author, either vindicating their own desire to undermine rabbinic authority or else Modena's position as a rabbi. Fishman draws on a comparison between passages in Modena's oeuvre and in Kol Sabal to reach the conclusion that Modena was indeed the author of Kol Sabal. Fishman raises the possibility that Modena donned a mask when writing Kol Sabal, a work she characterizes as an "invention." This thesis becomes especially convincing when comparing Kol Sabal to Modena's autobiography, Hayyei Yehudah. This latter work can easily seduce the reader into thinking that he or she has access to the facts of its author's life and that the author may not have been a particularly happy, successful, or endearing personality. This creates what could be called a false positivism because, especially when compared to his other writings, the apparently straightforward factual nature of his autobiographical narrative proves to be falsified by other competing facts. A similar conclusion emerges when comparing Modena's autobiography with that of Abraham Yagel's contemporaneous Gei Hizzayon, a work that clearly mixes dream sequences with descriptions of what seem to have been actual events, heightening the question not of how to separate fact from fiction, but rather why autobiographical writers mix them so effortlessly in their constructions of their selves.

RAVID and DAVIS have gathered some of the most recent and interesting scholarship on the history of the Jews of Venice, which sheds much light on Renaissance Jewry. Ravid traces parliamentary discussions and legal development pertaining to the presence of Jews in Venice. Calabi offers a synchronic study of the ghetto as the "City of the Jews." Malkiel examines the legal relationship between the Jewish community and the Republic of Venice. Arbel extends the discussion to Jews living in Venetian territories abroad. Pullan presents the financial aspects of Jewish moneylending. Roberto Bonfil's presentation covers aspects of rabbinic authority—or lack of it—and mysticism. Ioly Zorattini draws on the records of the Venetian Inquisition to present a social and religious history of popular religious practices that came to the attention of the authorities. Harran's essay examines in depth the musical contribution of Leone Modena in its larger context. Adelman shows the relationship between matters of gender and family in the Jewish community and major moments in Venetian and world history. Horowitz offers a social history of the public aspects of the Jewish community. David Ruderman elucidates aspects of Jewish medicine and scientific thought.

RUDERMAN's study of the life and literary production of Abraham Yagel creates an insightful description of the intellectual currents among Italian Jewry in the late 16th and early 17th centuries. The title may suggest—especially in light of popular notions of Italian Jewish history as well as of Kabbalah, magic, and science—that the book is about marginal or exotic aspects of Jewish life. However, Ruderman establishes conclusively that the major Jewish figures of the period were influenced by trends in the general Renaissance to pursue these subjects, even though they did so as an expression of their attachment to traditional rabbinic values and practices. Ruderman asserts that Gei Hizzayon, a detailed account by Yagel of his misfortunes, which Ruderman also translated, edited, and published as Valley of Vision: The Heavenly Journey of Abraham ben Hananiah Yagel (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990), was an unprecedented attempt at Jewish autobiography in premodern Hebrew literature, and he argues that it reflected a growing awareness of the self. Many of the very features in Gei Hizzayon that might lead one to think that it is not an autobiography, such as descriptions of dreams, discussions with the dead, and adventures of the soul outside the body, are in fact also found in Modena's Hayyei Yehudah. Moreover, it is these inventive aspects that must be considered essential to an autobiography. Beyond each of their pioneering attempts at writing Hebrew autobiographies, Yagel's and Modena's lives are amazingly similar to each other in many areas, specifically those that have led scholars to place them at the periphery of Jewish life: Yagel was often dismissed as an apostate—for no valid reason according to Ruderman—and Modena has been dismissed as a heretic, also for no valid reason. Financial failures, unsuccessful business partnerships, and much anxiety marked both men's lives. Both were concerned with a wide range of illnesses, especially "melancholia," Yagel as a professional physician and Modena as a professional patient. Very few of either man's major works were published in his lifetime, and the works that were published were of limited scope and importance, although not without significance as regards their attempts to popularize Judaism. The unintended consequence of both men's work is that they continue to provide fascinating, detailed information about Jewish life during the Renaissance and the development of a sense of self among Jews during the early modern period.

HOWARD TZVI ADELMAN

Renewal

- Adler, Rachel, Engendering Judaism: An Inclusive Theology and Ethics, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1998
- Alpert, Rebecca, Like Bread on the Seder Plate: Jewish Lesbians and the Transformation of Tradition (Between Men—Between Women), New York: Columbia University Press, 1997
- Angel, Leonard, The Book of Miriam, Buffalo, New York: Mosaic, 1997
- Balka, Christie and Andy Rose, Twice Blessed: On Being Lesbian, Gay, and Jewish, Boston: Beacon, 1989
- Berman, Phyllis and Arthur Waskow, Tales of Tikkun: New Jewish Stories to Heal the Wounded World, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1996
- Berrin, Susan, A Heart of Wisdom: Making the Jewish Journey from Midlife through the Elder Years, Woodstock, Vermont: Jewish Lights, 1997
- Bloch, Chana and Ariel Bloch, The Song of Songs: A New Translation with an Introduction and Commentary, New York: Random House, 1995
- Brener, Anne, Mourning and Mitzvah: A Guided Journal for Walking the Mourner's Path through Grief to Healing, Woodstock, Vermont: Jewish Lights, 1993
- Cooper, David A., God Is a Verb: Kabbalah and the Practice of Mystical Judaism, New York: Riverhead, 1997

- Cowan, Paul and Rachel Cowan, Mixed Blessings, New York: Doubleday, 1987
- Dekro, Jeffrey and Lawrence Bush, Jews, Money, and Social Responsibility: Developing a "Torah of Money" for Contemporary Life, Philadelphia: Shefa Fund, 1993
- Eisenberg, Evan, The Ecology of Eden, New York: Knopf, 1998
- Elon, Ari, From Jerusalem to the Edge of Heaven: Meditations on the Soul of Israel, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1995
- Falk, Marcia, The Song of Songs: Love Poems from the Bible, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977; Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1982; revised as The Song of Songs: A New Translation and Interpretation, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990
- Falk, Marcia, The Book of Blessings, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996
- Feld, Merle, A Spiritual Life: A Jewish Feminist Journey (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish Literature and Culture), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998
- Fink, Nan, Stranger in the Midst: A Memoir of Spiritual Discovery, New York: Basic Books, 1997
- Firestone, Tirzah, With Roots in Heaven: One Woman's Passionate Journey into the Heart of Her Faith, New York: Dutton, 1998
- Fox, Everett, The Five Books of Moses (Schocken Bible, vol. 1), New York: Schocken, and London: Harvill, 1995
- Frankel, Ellen, The Five Books of Miriam: A Woman's Commentary on the Torah, New York: Putnam, 1996
- Green, Arthur (translator and editor), Upright Practices: The Light of the Eyes (Classics of Western Spirituality), New York: Paulist, 1982
- Green, Arthur, Seek My Face, Speak My Name: A Contemporary Jewish Theology, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1992
- Green, Arthur (editor), The Language of Truth: The Torah Commentary of the Sefat Emet, Rabbi Yehudah Leib Alter of Ger, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1998
- Heschel, Susannah (editor), Moral Grandeur and Spiritual Audacity: Essays, New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1996
- Hyman, Naomi, Biblical Women in the Midrash: A Sourcebook, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1997
- Kamenetz, Rodger, The Jew in the Lotus: A Poet's Rediscovery of Jewish Identity in Buddhist India, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994
- Kamenetz, Rodger, Stalking Elijah: Adventures with Today's Jewish Mystical Masters, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1997
- Kushner, Lawrence, God Was in This Place and I, I Did Not Know, Woodstock, Vermont: Jewish Lights, 1991
- Lerner, Michael, Jewish Renewal: A Path to Healing and Transformation, New York: Putnam, 1994
- Matt, Daniel, Zohar: The Book of Enlightenment (Classics of Western Spirituality), New York: Paulist, and London: SPCK, 1983
- Matt, Daniel, The Essential Kabbalah, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995
- Mirel, James L. and Karen Bonnell Werth, Stepping Stones to Jewish Spiritual Living: Walking the Path Morning, Noon, and Night, Woodstock, Vermont: Jewish Lights, 1998
- Mitchell, Stephen, Into the Whirlwind: A Translation of the Book of Job, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1979; as The Book of Job, San Francisco: North Point, 1987; London: Cathie, 1989
- Omer-Man, Jonathan, Worlds of Jewish Prayer: A Festschrift in Honor of Rabbi Zalman M. Schachter-Shalomi, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1993
- Orenstein, Debra, Lifecycles, Woodstock, Vermont: Jewish Lights, 1994
- Petsonk, Judy, Taking Judaism Personally: Creating a Meaningful Spiritual Life, New York: Free Press, 1996
- Piercy, Marge, He, She, and It, New York: Knopf, 1991
- Piercy, Marge, The Art of Blessing the Day: Poems with a Jewish Theme, New York: Knopf, 1999
- Pitzele, Peter, Our Fathers' Wells: A Personal Encounter with the Myths of Genesis, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995
- Plaskow, Judith, Standing Again at Sinai: Judaism from a Feminist Perspective, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1990
- P'nai Or Religious Fellowship, Or Chadash: A Guide to Shabbat Celebration, Philadelphia: ALEPH (Alliance for Jewish Renewal), 1987
- Prager, Marcia, The Path of Blessing: Experiencing the Energy and Abundance of the Divine, New York: Bell Tower, 1998
- Raphael, Simcha Paull, Jewish Views of the Afterlife, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1994
- Rapoport, Nessa, A Woman's Book of Grieving, New York: Morrow, 1994
- Schachter-Shalomi, Zalman, Paradigm Shift, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1993
- Schwartz, Richard H., Judaism and Vegetarianism, Smithtown, New York: Exposition, 1982; 2nd edition, Marblehead, Massachusetts: Micah, 1988
- Shapiro, Rami, Wisdom of the Jewish Sages: A Modern Reading of Pirke Avot, New York: Bell Tower, 1995
- Waskow, Arthur, Seasons of Our Joy, New York: Bantam, 1982
- Waskow, Arthur, These Holy Sparks: The Rebirth of the Jewish People, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1983
- Waskow, Arthur, Down-to-Earth Judaism: Food, Money, Sex, and the Rest of Life, New York: Morrow, 1995
- Waskow, Arthur, Godwrestling: Round 2: Ancient Wisdom, Future Paths, Woodstock, Vermont: Jewish Lights, 1996
- Weissler, Chava, Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women, Boston: Beacon, 1998
- Wiener, Shohama, The Fifty-Eighth Century: A Jewish Renewal Sourcebook, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1996
- Winkler, Gershon, Sacred Secrets: The Sanctity of Sex in Jewish Law and Lore, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1998

The movement called by its participants “Jewish renewal” is chiefly but not exclusively made up of North American Jews. It originated in the 1960s and 1970s and consists of the intertwining of three strands of Jewish rethinking: the neo-Hasidism of Martin Buber, Abraham Joshua Heschel, Shlomo Carlebach, and Zalman Schachter-Shalomi; the emergence of informal prayer groups (havurot) and similar forms of Jewish community that were participatory, intimate, and deeply engaged in the progressive political energies of the period from 1967 to 1975; and the emergence of a movement for equality of women and men in existing Jewish life and in shaping what Judaism is to become, including the insights of feminist Judaism. During the 1980s and 1990s, other strands became increasingly important parts of the weave of Jewish renewal: the knowledge and practice of forms of meditation used in Eastern spiritual traditions, the rediscovery of meditative traditions in Judaism, and a spiritually rooted concern for the endangered web of life on this planet, leading to a conscious eco-Judaism. Most Jewish-renewal people, though committed to nurturing exploratory institutions such as ALEPH: Alliance for Jewish Renewal, also see Jewish renewal as a process reaching beyond all denominational boundaries and institutional structures. This process is going on in Jewish music, liturgy, midrash, art, education, and politics. It takes place in synagogues of all denominations as well as in havurot, in “secular” and in communal settings, in ashrams and on Broadway. At the heart of Jewish renewal is an understanding of Jewish history as a series of encounters with God, the experiences of a community once again renewed in contemporary times after the crisis of the Holocaust and the seeming triumph of modernity in both its creative and destructive aspects.

Several books use biography and history to describe the movement. KAMENETZ (1994) is the story of a meeting in India between rabbis and the Dalai Lama, with an exploration of the encounter’s deeper meaning and results. KAMENETZ (1997) is the story of the more mystical and meditative aspects of Jewish renewal, especially focusing on several individual teachers and rabbis. PETSONK tells the story of her own life journey into Jewish renewal. She discusses key aspects and describes meetings with important teachers of the movement. WASKOW (1983) is an interpretive history that chronicles the movement from its origins in the late 1960s to 1982.

Several books describe the major theological and practical positions of the movement. SCHACHTER-SHALOMI offers a collection of crucial essays on crossing the river into a new form of Judaism for the 21st century and far beyond. The essays explore the nature of Jewish community and history, an experiential approach to prayer, or “davvenology,” and the possibilities of a new outlook on Jewish law (the “psycho-halakhic process”). WASKOW (1996) looks at the changing faces of the Torah as renewal communities wrestle and dance with it. It includes a theology of human and Jewish history and discusses why the movement for Jewish renewal has appeared at this historical moment. It also addresses the nature and future of the State of Israel and the meaning of the Holocaust. In addition, it discusses the biblical concept of jubilee applied to high-tech society, ways to understand and deal with the present environmental crisis, prayer forms that emerge from new ways of connecting with God, and other crucial concerns of tikkun ‘olam, which can be understood as the advancement of social justice. Despite its title, LERNER’s book is not a definitive or comprehensive statement on Jewish renewal. It takes one important stance within the movement, focusing on issues of public policy and psychological transformation. Beginning with a psychologically rooted analysis of the God of love and why the Bible sometimes portrays God as cruel, the book moves into a political analysis of modern malaise and discusses how to draw on religious and spiritual practice to heal society.

PLASKOW reexamines Judaism from a feminist perspective. Assuming the full inclusion of women and their life experience, she asks how Judaism might look in the three classic categories of God, Torah, and Israel. ADLER looks especially at how halakhah, prayer, and marriage might be addressed in a Judaism as inclusive of women as of men. Both OMER-MAN and WIENER are collections of Festschrift essays by students of Zalman Schachter-Shalomi that point toward emerging directions in the “new paradigm” of Judaism. PIERCY (1991) is a novel set in the mid-21st century; it concerns a Jewish-renewal community of free humans and a free android/golem who live in a world of corporate feudalism and global scorching. The plot is intertwined with a retelling, through a woman’s eyes, of the story of the Golem of Prague. GREEN (1992) is an exploration of many new metaphors for God and their implications for the practice of Judaism.

Much energy has been brought to the study of the Torah both through new translations of biblical, rabbinic, kabbalistic, and hasidic texts and through new midrashic approaches. The most important of the translations is FOX, which comes far closer to the meaning, poetry, wordplay, and cadences of the Hebrew than any previous English translation of the Pentateuch. The translations of the Song of Songs by FALK (1977) and by BLOCH and BLOCH are extraordinary openings to the sensuality of the Hebrew text. MITCHELL makes the intense drama of Job accessible to contemporary ears. SHAPIRO is a translation of Pirke Avot with a Jewish-renewal overtone to his understanding of the rabbi.

Several translations of kabbalistic and hasidic material have been of special importance to the Jewish-renewal community. GREEN (1982) brings Menahem Nahum of Chernobyl into English, and GREEN (1998) does the same—along with Green’s own comments—for the Gerer Rebbe, Judah Leib Alter. MATT (1983 and 1995) presents powerfully poetic translations of key kabbalistic texts.

One emerging form of Jewish-renewal midrash is a synthesis of the old midrashic method, which lived totally inside the text, and the old historical-analytical form, which treated the text as only an inert object to be dissected. The Jewish-renewal synthesis uses the historical method to understand the text more deeply as part of a spiritual search. Far from being treated as dead, the text becomes all the more alive because it is about the ways in which the seeker’s progenitors responded to the great historical and personal upheavals of their lives. One important example of this approach is EISENBERG, which draws on contemporary ecology and archaeology to see the Torah as, in part, a profound spiritual and political response to the agricultural revolution. Another is ANGEL, an intriguing quasi-factual report on how a group of women in Jerusalem are carrying forward the study of an ancient text that their female ancestors had studied for centuries, a text that presents itself as the Torah taught by Miriam. The text is feminist and eco-sensitive, seeing ancient Israel as a shepherd people deeply critical of ownership-agriculture. FRANKEL imaginatively weaves midrashic comments by real and archetypal women into biblical texts. HYMAN brings ancient rabbinic midrash about the women of the Bible face-to-face with midrash written by women of the renewal generation. KUSHNER weaves his own midrash together with a series of rabbinic and hasidic commentators, creating a rich tapestry of meaning through this juxtaposition.

During the mid-1990s the process of midrashic renewal moved into an unprecedented arena: midrash not only on biblical but also on talmudic stories. ELON intertwines his own understanding of a number of talmudic texts with his life experience in the Israeli army and the peace movement. BERMAN and WASKOW write new midrashic tales to heal wounded aspects of biblical and rabbinic tradition, addressing, in particular, the absence of women. The Jewish-renewal movement took the entire notion of midrash in a new direction, beyond words—creating midrash-in-action, as people played the various parts in biblical stories and filled in gaps in the tales through their own improvisational drama. This approach was called by some of its practitioners “drushodrama” and by others “Bibliodrama.” PITZELE raises the process to a high art, and in his book he tells some of the stories that emerged from Bibliodrama sessions.

Much of Jewish-renewal thought has focused on new approaches to prayer, meditation, and celebration of festivals and life-cycle events. WASKOW (1982) is a guide to walking the festivals as a spiritual path that evokes both nature and history, intertwined with an explanation of millennial change in the festivals as an index to the spiritual growth of the Jewish people as a whole. There have been two major efforts to reconceive the prayer book to address God in nonhierarchical terms: the compendium issued by the P'NAI OR RELIGIOUS FELLOWSHIP and FALK (1996). The P'nai Or publication also shows how to use dance, meditation, dialogue, and other nonverbal or interpersonal techniques as part of prayer. PRAGER explores the depths of meaning in just six words—the formula with which blessings in rabbinic Judaism begin. WEISSLER rescues from oblivion and translates from Yiddish the tkhine—a form of prayer of the heart that Ashkenazi women uttered and often wrote. She then brings the tkhine process into the current generation by including some contemporary women's prayers, and she ends with a brilliantly self-reflective look at her role as a feminist scholar researching the past and creating a new future in the process. COOPER has made publicly available new forms of meditation that are rooted in ancient but almost forgotten practices of the kabbalists and are now being used by the Jewish-renewal community. New approaches to life-cycle rhythms are exemplified in the books by ORENSTEIN and BERRIN. Each is an anthology of new writing on spiritual aspects of the life cycle that have previously been celebrated only rarely. MIREL and WERTH's book takes the reader through a weekday with the same celebratory care that has usually been devoted only to Shabbat. BRENER, RAPHAEL, and RAPOPORT all focus on the spiritual meaning of death and grief. Today, renewal Jews live in the most cross-communal atmosphere that has existed in about 2,000 years. As a result, the question of inter-religious households has been of great interest and is explored from a renewal standpoint in COWAN and COWAN. FINK explores conversion to Judaism from the convert's standpoint.

A number of books appeared in the late 1980s and 1990s that addressed Jewish-renewal approaches to infusing the practices of daily life with holiness. WASKOW (1995) draws on the past and imagines the future of Jewish ways of making holy daily practices regarding food, money, sex, and rest. For example, he offers suggestions for eco-kosher ways of consuming not only food but also energy resources. In addition, he presents ideas about new Jewish sexual ethics, the socially responsible use of money, and the crucial element of rest in healing a production-addicted society. DEKRO and BUSH focus on the creation of a Torah morality of money. BALKA and ROSE's work and ALPERT's book explore the implications of the full visibility of gay men and lesbians in Jewish life and religious practice. WINKLER not only translates a major treatise on Jewish sexual ethics by the 18th-century rabbinic authority Jacob Emden but he examines its origins and implications as well. SCHWARTZ develops a theme concerning food—vegetarianism—that has been of great interest to many renewal Jews. HESCHEL brings together the spiritual search and the political commitment of her father, Abraham Joshua Heschel, in a way that shows how deeply his work toward an everyday/holy Judaism both influenced and was influenced by the Jewish-renewal generation. FIRESTONE's brilliantly written memoir recounts the passionate and turbulent spiritual journey of her life. FELD weaves midrash, poetry, and family memoir together into a characteristically Jewish-renewal way of dancing with the Torah. PIERCY (1999) is a collection of the author's earthy Jewish poetry—some of it extremely funny, some of it awe inspiring, some of it warm and caressing, and much of it prayerful and explicitly intended for liturgical use.

ARTHUR WASKOW

Reproductive Technologies

- Bleich, J. David, “In Vitro Fertilization: Maternal Identity and Conversion,” in his Contemporary Halakhic Problems (Library of Jewish Law and Ethics), New York: Ktav, 1977
- Feldman, Emanuel and Joel B. Wolowelsky, Jewish Law and the New Reproductive Technologies, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1997
- Grazi, Richard V. (editor), Be Fruitful and Multiply: Fertility Therapy and the Jewish Tradition, Spring Valley, New York: Feldheim, 1994
- Jakobovits, Immanuel, “Artificial Insemination, Test Tube Babies and Host Mothers,” in his Jewish Medical Ethics: A Comparative and Historical Study of the Jewish Religious Attitude to Medicine and Its Practice, New York: Bloch, 1975
- Rosner, Fred, “Artificial Insemination, In Vitro Fertilization, Surrogate Motherhood, and Sex Organ Transplants,” in his Modern Medicine and Jewish Ethics, New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1986, 2nd edition, 1991

Artificial insemination, in vitro fertilization, surrogate motherhood, and cryopreservation of sperm, eggs, or fertilized zygotes for later use are all strongly opposed by some rabbis on moral and halakhic grounds, and just as strongly justified by others.

According to JAKOBOVITS, human procreation should not be converted into the "manufacture" of progeny. The intimacy of husband and wife should not be broken by the "biologization" of family life. He further posits that:

. . . artificial insemination utilizing an outside donor (AID) is considered to pose grave moral problems. Such operations, even if they may not technically constitute adultery, would completely disrupt the family relationship. Moreover, a child so conceived would be denied its birth-right to have a father and other relations who can be identified. Altogether, to reduce human generation to "stud-farming" methods would be a debasement of human life, utterly repugnant to Jewish ideals and traditions.

Jakovovits concludes that a balanced judgment on these moral issues cannot rest only on medical evidence or opinion, nor can he agree to leave the decision as to who will sire a child simply to the discretion of doctors or laboratory technicians. This would erode the sanctity of the marriage bond and violate the Jewish concept of an intimate personal partnership with God in the generation of life. To abort a mother's naturally fertilized egg and to re-implant it into a "host-mother" as a convenience for women who seek the gift of a child without the encumbrance and disfigurement of pregnancy is, he maintains, offensive. Likewise, to use another person as an incubator and then take from her the child she has carried and delivered for a fee is a revolting degradation of maternity and an affront to human dignity.

Far less critical of assisted reproduction is GRAZI, whose book is the first English work of its kind to deal exclusively with issues of fertility therapy in the Jewish tradition. The book provides an extensive survey of the relevant medical data and halakhic sources based on professional expertise and the verdicts of many rabbinic authorities. The sources and thought processes that lead to the diverse conclusions are as interesting as the rulings themselves. Several contributors to Grazi's book provide sensitive and scholarly insight into the medical and psychological as well as halakhic aspects of infertility and new assisted reproductive technologies.

ROSNER's analysis of Jewish views on artificial insemination, in vitro fertilization, surrogate motherhood, and sex organ transplants points out that in Judaism infertility is considered to be an illness—physiological, emotional, or both—and the physician's duty and mandate is to heal illness and to overcome, if possible, the somatic and emotional strains related to the illness. To help a couple to have their own child through the modern technologies of artificial insemination or in vitro fertilization seems to him to be within the physician's purview and, he argues, may even strengthen the bonds of the marriage and the family structure. While the use of host or surrogate mothers for the convenience of couples able to conceive by normal coitus cannot be condoned, an infertile Jewish couple may, he contends, have recourse to the new reproductive technologies. This includes the use of a surrogate mother in the absence of alternatives, in order to effect pregnancy and by so doing preserve their marriage and bring themselves happiness.

Most rabbinic authorities rule that parturition serves to establish the maternal relationship so than in situations of surrogate motherhood, the birth mother is legally considered the mother. BLEICH, however, raises the possibility that Jewish law may recognize a second maternal relationship based upon donation of an ovum. He adds that it is also possible that an additional nongenetic and nonparturitional relationship, or even multiple relationships of that nature, may be established on the basis of gestation. Bleich further rules that a child born of an in vitro procedure in which the ovum was donated by a non-Jewish woman requires conversion. Although their grounds are not entirely clear, some authorities maintain that, in such cases, immersion for purposes of conversion must be performed after birth and cannot be accomplished on behalf of the child by immersion of the mother during pregnancy. Whether or not there exists a maternal relationship between the Jewish birth mother and the child converted after birth is a matter of some dispute, and Bleich concludes that these issues represent matters of grave halakhic and moral significance requiring informed rabbinic guidance.

FELDMAN and WOLOWELSKY have published a compilation of eight articles by Bleich and others on Jewish law and the new reproductive technologies. These appeared originally in the journal Tradition. They underscore the perception that until recently it was man, woman, and God who joined to create a new human child. Now the doctor-scientist has joined the team so that humans are not only controlling nature, but creating it as well.

FRED ROSNER

See also Bioethics; Birth Control and Abortion

Revelation see Oral Tradition

Rosenzweig, Franz 1886–1929

German philosopher and theologian

Berkovits, Eliezer, Major Themes in Modern Philosophies of Judaism, New York: Ktav, 1974

Buber, Martin and Franz Rosenzweig, Scripture and Translation (Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994

Gibbs, Robert, Correlations in Rosenzweig and Levinas, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1992

Mendes-Flohr, Paul (editor), The Philosophy of Franz Rosenzweig (Tauber Institute for the Study of European Jewry Series, 8), Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1988

Mendes-Flohr, Paul, Divided Passions: Jewish Intellectuals and the Experience of Modernity (Culture of Jewish

- Modernity), Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1991
- Miller, Ronald Henry, Dialogue and Disagreement: Franz Rosenzweig's Relevance to Contemporary Jewish-Christian Understanding, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1989
- Mosès, Stéphane, System and Revelation: The Philosophy of Franz Rosenzweig (Culture of Jewish Modernity), Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1992
- Novak, David, Jewish-Christian Dialogue: A Jewish Justification, New York: Oxford University Press, 1989
- Rosenzweig, Franz, Franz Rosenzweig: His Life and Thought, edited by Nahum Glatzer, New York: Farrar, Straus and Young, 1953; 3rd edition, Indianapolis, Indiana: Hackett, 1998
- Rosenzweig, Franz, On Jewish Learning, edited by Nahum Glatzer, New York: Schocken, 1965

Franz Rosenzweig, who died in 1929 at age 43, could easily have been lost to Jewish tradition; an assimilated German Jew, he managed, however, to find his way back to a committed, observant, and unorthodox Jewish identity. Rosenzweig's philosophical magnum opus, The Star of Redemption, drafted on German army postcards during World War I, is a notoriously difficult work. His poetical and liturgical translations from Hebrew to German, especially his collaboration with Martin Buber on the translation of the Hebrew Bible, seemingly had their fate tied to the community for which he wrote and struggled, and that was either murdered or dispersed by the Nazis. His institutional legacies, most notably the Free Jewish Lehrhaus, an innovative program in Jewish adult education, achieved some success but were also shut down with the Nazi takeover. How then, does one account for the fact that among committed liberal Jews, especially within the rabbinate, Rosenzweig is fairly well known and extremely influential? The answer is simple: Rosenzweig's recognized greatness as a Jewish thinker owes much to the devotion of his immediate disciples.

ROSENZWEIG (1953) and ROSENZWEIG (1965) offer accessible and moving writings as well as a good starting point. Although editor Nahum Glatzer has attempted to gloss over Rosenzweig's indifference to Zionism and to downplay his mystical tendencies (which Rosenzweig both displays and derides), it is less an interpretation than a presentation designed to render Rosenzweig accessible to an English-speaking audience.

MOSÈS offers the best guide to Rosenzweig's The Star of Redemption, which has been translated into English by William Hallo, a scion of the Rosenzweig circle. Influenced throughout by Emmanuel Levinas, a philosopher who also helped promote Rosenzweig's importance, Mosès explicates the central categories of Rosenzweig's Star: world, man, God, creation, revelation, and redemption. Translated ably from the French, Mosès implicitly makes a case for treating Rosenzweig as a systematic theologian rather than as a mystic, although it is clear that both tendencies are found in The Star.

GIBBS makes a case for Levinas as a Jewish thinker and Rosenzweig as a philosopher of the first rank. Countering the prevailing tendency of ignoring Rosenzweig the thinker for Rosenzweig the educator, activist, and "returned Jew" (ba'al teshuvah), Gibbs tries to show how the two categories inter-penetrate and inform each other. Gibbs also takes issue with the common presentation of Rosenzweig as a religious existentialist.

BERKOVITS contends that Rosenzweig, imprisoned by the racist and Christologically triumphalist culture of modern Germany, imposes essentially foreign categories on Judaism and imagines a theological cosmic collaboration between the two religions where none exists. The Rosenzweigian portrayal of Judaism as beyond the ordinary operations of time and history appears to Berkovits untrue to Judaism's this-worldly stance.

MILLER vigorously champions Rosenzweig's views on the interrelationship between Judaism and Christianity, seeing in Rosenzweig a Jewish voice opposing religious exclusivism and the doctrine of biblical inerrancy. His book is a good representative of what several Christian thinkers have found attractive in Rosenzweig.

NOVAK steers a midway course between Berkovits and Miller, employing Rosenzweig's thought as a platform for his own justification. Noting Rosenzweig's own acceptance of the eternal enmity between Jews and Christians, Novak terms Rosenzweig's discussion "an important ground-clearing operation" but not itself a Jewish justification for interreligious dialogue.

MENDES-FLOHR (1988) is a critically judicious balance of articles on Rosenzweig, most of which the average reader may find too academic. More accessible are the essays on Rosenzweig in MENDES-FLOHR (1991). One essay details Rosenzweig's rejection of the historicism adumbrated by Hegel (the subject of Rosenzweig's doctoral dissertation and first book) and developed further by many others, including Friedrich Meinecke, a professor of Rosenzweig's who urged him (unsuccessfully) to pursue an academic career. Another essay, "Rosenzweig and Kant: Two Views of Ritual and Religion," analyzes Rosenzweig's unique view of halakhah. Spurred by Buber's essay "Herut," Rosenzweig gave mature expression to his philosophy of mitsvah observance in "The Builders." Mendes-Flohr explicates Kant, Buber, and Rosenzweig on the mitsvot and gives a strong defense of Rosenzweig's final position, which may be categorized as expressing an experiential imperative. Rosenzweig's attempt to blend the objective and subjective dimensions of mitsvah observance gets rougher treatment in Berkovits.

BUBER and ROSENZWEIG cast light on Rosenzweig's importance as a translator of the Bible and prayer book. The introductory essays by Everett Fox and Lawrence Rosenwald are very helpful in explaining Rosenzweig's pathbreaking views on language, his collaboration with Martin Buber, and the incredible care that went into their monumental Bible translation. Along with Fox's introduction, the translated essays, previously unavailable in English, call attention to Buber and Rosenzweig's emphasis on the oral nature of Scripture, the use of theme words (Leitwoerter) as links in the unfolding of the biblical story, and the narrative importance of the Hebrew etymologies, especially of personal and place names.

ALAN LEVENSON

Rosh Hashanah see Festivals and Fasts

Rossi, Azariah dei c.1511–c.1578

Italian historian and humanist

- Baron, Salo Wittmayer, History and Jewish Historians: Essays and Addresses, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1964
- Bonfil, Robert, "Some Reflections on the Place of Azariah de Rossi's Meor Enayim in the Cultural Milieu of the Italian Renaissance Jewry," in Jewish Thought in the Sixteenth Century, edited by Bernard Dov Cooperman (Harvard Judaica Texts and Studies, 2), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Center for Jewish Studies, 1983
- Morais, Sabato, Italian Hebrew Literature, edited by Julius H. Greenstone, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1926
- Roth, Cecil, The History of the Jews of Italy, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1946; Westmead: Gregg, 1969
- Segal, Lester A., Historical Consciousness and Religious Tradition in Azariah de' Rossi's Me'or 'Einayim, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1989
- Veltri, Giuseppe, "The Humanist Sense of History and the Jewish Idea of Tradition: Azaria de' Rossi's Critique of Philo Alexandrinus," Jewish Studies Quarterly 2, 1995
- Weinberg, Joanna, "'The Voice of God': Jewish and Christian Responses to the Ferrara Earthquake of November 1570," Italian Studies 46, 1991

Studies on the Italian rabbinical scholar and humanist Azariah dei Rossi are of two kinds: the general-biographical and those that treat a specific issue. Any book on Jewish history in Italy during the Renaissance must dedicate some space to the figure of dei Rossi, and such is the case with Morais and Roth. The other titles discussed here are specific essays on dei Rossi, describing his conception of history, his religious thought, and his account of the Ferrara earthquake as compared with that of other witnesses.

MORAIS's book is a general biographical study of several leading Italian Jewish figures. It provides the background to and the contents of dei Rossi's famous book Meor Enayim, which takes its inspiration from the earthquake of Ferrara and discusses first the philosophical aspect of this event, debating whether it is best seen as the result of natural causes or of the invisible hand of God. The second part of dei Rossi's work is a translation of the Letter of Aristeas on the origin of the Septuagint, and the third section contains an encyclopedic survey of Jewish history.

ROTH, in his general book, surveys a whole list of Jewish authors and scholars in very few words. Roth gives a brief description of dei Rossi's writings and their origin in the Ferrara earthquake. According to Roth, Meor Enayim, which revisits traditional Hebrew historiographic sources in the light of late antique Greek literature, represents the first application of the new, critical methodology of the Renaissance to Jewish history. The main advantage of Roth's account is its brevity, which may be suited to nonspecialist readers.

SEGAL analyzes the historiographic views of dei Rossi, his approach to secular knowledge, and his critical attitude to aggalah. Segal's opinion is that the work of dei Rossi is different from other Jewish historical literature of the 16th century, for his thinking is conditioned by the authoritative continuity of classical Jewish teaching in some respects but is also historically oriented with respect to other traditional components of Judaism. Segal describes the opposition to secular learning in certain quarters of Italian Jewry, and he surveys the intellectual milieu of dei Rossi's historiographic work. His purpose is to understand dei Rossi's pioneering inquiry into rabbinic tradition and the distinction he draws between the halakhic and the nonjuristic material. Segal's brief book offers a summary of dei Rossi's thought as well of the literature about him.

BARON's study is one of the first and most basic introductions to dei Rossi's historiographic work. Baron dedicates only three chapters to dei Rossi: the first offers an intellectual biography and surveys his writings; the second analyzes dei Rossi's conception of life and his thinking on such issues as religion, philosophy, and science as it emerges from his works; and the third chapter is an important essay on dei Rossi's historical method. In this chapter Baron reconstructs the Jewish historiographical tradition as well as Italian historical conceptions that influenced dei Rossi. In Baron's opinion, dei Rossi laid the foundations for a major revolution in Jewish historical consciousness.

VELTRI's study is a further exploration of dei Rossi's concept of history. Veltri briskly surveys the biography of dei Rossi as well as the scholarly literature about him. But the main point of this brief article is the investigation of dei Rossi's attitude toward Philo of Alexandria. Veltri analyzes the Renaissance scholarly understanding of the figure of Philo and dei Rossi's emphasis on Philo's faults, such as his lack of knowledge of Hebrew.

WEINBERG's brief essay deals with the different accounts of the earthquake that occurred in Ferrara in 1570 and to which dei Rossi devoted the first section of Meor Enayim. There are in fact many descriptions of the scene of the city of Ferrara in ruins that try to determine the earthquake's cause and the extent of the damage. Weinberg stresses that dei Rossi adds many Jewish sources to the general discussion, lending a new dimension to these reflections on the earthquake, particularly regarding the interpretation of its cause. In spite of the fact that writings of contemporary non-Jewish scholars in response to the earthquake frequently cite Aristotle, the conclusion of all of them was the same as dei Rossi's—that the earthquake was one of God's ways of admonishing the wicked and an exhortation to repentance.

BONFIL argues that the strong opposition to Meor Enayim was connected to its opponents' perception of the book as deeply radical. He tries to analyze both sides of this famous controversy and thus come to a conclusion about dei Rossi's intellectual milieu. Bonfil surveys the many reactions of the Establishment against the book, and he concludes that dei Rossi remained unique in his time. The article contributes much to an understanding of the intellectual climate in which Meor Enayim was published.

Russia

- Baron, Salo W., The Russian Jew under Tsars and Soviets, New York: Macmillan, 1964, 2nd edition, 1976
- Dubnow, Simon M., History of the Jews in Russia and Poland from the Earliest Times until the Present Day, translated by I. Friedlaender, 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1916–1920
- Greenberg, Louis, The Jews in Russia: The Struggle for Emancipation, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1966
- Hundert, Gershon David and Gershon C. Bacon, The Jews in Poland and Russia: Bibliographical Essays (The Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984
- Levin, Nora, The Jews in the Soviet Union since 1917: Paradox of Survival, 2 vols., New York: New York University Press, 1988; London: Tauris, 1990
- Levitats, Isaac, The Jewish Community in Russia, 1844–1917, Jerusalem: Posner, 1981
- Luckert, Yelena, Soviet Jewish History, 1917–1991: An Annotated Bibliography (Garland Reference Library of Social Science, vol. 611), New York: Garland, 1992
- Pinkus, Benjamin, The Jews of the Soviet Union: The History of a National Minority (Soviet and East European Studies), Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988
- Ro'i, Yaacov, Jews and Jewish Life in Russia and the Soviet Union (Cummings Center Series), Ilford, Essex, and Portland, Oregon: Cass, 1995

Jews first began migrating to the territories of Russia around the sixth century C.E. They moved northward from the Crimea to Kievan Rus', where a pogrom took place in the 12th century. Throughout the Middle Ages, Jews typically endured great intolerance and torments from Russian rulers based in Moscow, and they were more inclined to settle in Poland or Lithuania. In the early 18th century, Peter I and Elizabeth demonstrated particular intolerance toward Jews and expelled them from Russia, but Catherine II later acquired large areas of Polish territory where many Jews had settled. In the 1790s Catherine set the first Pale of Settlement, legislating the specific regions of the Russian Empire in which Jews were permitted to live (except for those who had a special permit to live elsewhere in the empire). These regions were largely those of Poland, Ukraine, Bessarabia, White Russia, and Lithuania; with variations from time to time, this policy remained in effect until 1915.

Jews played a prominent role in the Russian Revolution of 1917 and most czarist policies against Jews were abolished at that time. Nevertheless, the Soviet regime's antireligious policy took hold in the 1920s, and Jewish traditions were almost completely discouraged after 1930. The Stalinist period was characterized by numerous episodes of antisemitism, including purges of prominent Jewish intellectuals, involvement in the atrocities of the Holocaust in Soviet territories, and the trials of prominent Jewish doctors who were accused falsely of plotting against the Soviet state in 1953. In the latter part of the 20th century before the breakup of the Soviet Union, many Jews emigrated from Russia to other countries outside the Soviet Union, but those who were detained became the focus of world attention on account of human rights issues. After 1985, Gorbachev's new policy of glasnost allowed the expansion of religious life once again, and a partial revival of Jewish culture has taken place since the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991 and 1992.

DUBNOW's three-volume history of the Jews in Russia and Poland was one of the groundbreaking works of the 20th century on the topic, and it still retains much relevance for today's readers who are interested in the Jews of the Russian Empire before the Soviet era. The history offers separate chapters and divisions on Russia and Poland. Beginning with the Crimean diaspora in the sixth century C.E., he traces the Jews' movements northward and eastward. He then focuses primarily on the periods between the Middle Ages and World War I. In his analysis of the Jews in czarist Russia, Dubnow stresses the "conflict between [Russia's] anti-Jewish traditions and the necessity of harboring in her dominions the greatest center of the Jewish Diaspora," namely, the lands of Poland and Lithuania that became part of Russian czarist territories in the late 18th century. He also covers the most important aspects of antisemitism in czarist Russia, such as ritual murder trials and pogroms. This history deserves much merit for its range and scope, but more recently it has been criticized for the fact that it completely separates its analysis of the inner life of the Jewish community from the study of Jews in the face of Russian czarist law or the outside world. Later histories analyze interaction between the two dimensions in much greater detail.

BARON presents one of the few surveys that cover both Russian and Soviet Jewish history. This book gives a shorter survey of Jews in Russia before the 18th century than Dubnow but then devotes significant space to handling the different policies of each Russian ruler toward the Jews. Between the chapters on the status of the Jews in imperial Russia and Soviet Russia, Baron provides several chapters dealing with specific customs and ways of life in the Russian Jewish communities. The chapters on the Soviet era cover everything from government policies to Soviet Jewish cultural and artistic accomplishments. Throughout the book, Baron deals especially well with demographic and migration issues and gives precise figures on the Jewish population of different regions of Russia at significant periods of transition throughout history. He also offers a unique description of Jewish socioeconomic issues in the 20th century before World War I as well as significant discussion of the Soviet-era Jewish agricultural communities and the project of the autonomous Jewish republic of Birobidzhan in the Far East. The book contains detailed endnotes and a generally comprehensive index as well.

HUNDERT and BACON present a set of bibliographical essays that are potentially useful for readers studying Jewish life in territories ruled by the Russian Empire, such as Poland, as well as imperial and Soviet Russia. The book is divided into two long essays with bibliographies at the end of each essay. The book examines reference works, surveys, journals devoted specifically to individual countries, cultural history, and political history by periods. For czarist Russia, the second essay highlights topics such as education, Jewish political parties, antisemitism, and World War I. The Soviet period is covered by sections on religion, culture, the Soviet territories intended for Jews, and late 20th-century Soviet Jewry. The only real difficulty of this book is that it does not contain a comprehensive index of minor or individual topics.

LEVITATS presents an interesting view of Jewish life in imperial Russia through his survey of a vast corpus of documentary records as well as other histories. Rather than giving a general account through the eyes of the chief leaders, he presents a history of the interactions between the Jewish community and the czarist government through specific court cases, Jewish council records, manuscripts, and legal resolutions. Issues covered in this book include marriage law, property, taxation, military service, the use of specific languages in education, and Jewish autonomy. For readers interested in such things, this book offers more answers about the workings of Russian czarist law and Jewish councils than most general histories can provide. Levitats also supplies an extensive bibliography of the primary and secondary sources that he used for his work.

GREENBERG focuses on Russian Jewish legal and political history from the 19th century to the beginning of the Russian Revolution. His work analyzes how Jews in the intelligentsia interacted both with the Russian ruling class and with the Russian Jewish community as a whole. He interweaves issues such as assimilation, nationalism, and the revolutionary movements to develop a complex picture of the general status and problems of the Jewish population in Russia through the early 20th century. Unlike Simon Dubnow, Greenberg also offers an unusually detailed study of the ways that the Jewish minority was viewed in the Russian Duma, or parliament, between the first revolts in 1905 and the Russian Revolution. In addition, Greenberg deals with the increasing emigration of Russian Jews from 1881 onward and British and American responses to the issue of human rights in Russia at that time. His work includes a comprehensive index and a good selected bibliography on topics ranging from agriculture and the economy to culture and education.

LUCKERT offers an excellent bibliography on Soviet Jewish life, history, and culture that is a must for those who are dealing with Russian Jews in the Soviet period. This bibliography is divided into extremely helpful groupings both by theme and by period. Sections of special importance include those on human rights; Soviet-Israeli relations; emigration and Jewish dissidents and refuseniks; and Jews in the cultural life of Russia and the Soviet Union. The bibliography includes books, articles, testimonies, political propaganda, government documentation, and even relevant works of literature and music by Soviet Jewish authors. The works cited in the bibliography are in ten languages, including English, with English translations for some of the titles of works in Russian and other languages.

PINKUS provides a particularly systematic history of the minority status of Jews in the Soviet Union from 1917 to 1983. The introductory section of his book gives a useful description of previous research on Soviet and Russian Jewry and a brief sketch of the legal position of the Jewish minority in Russia before the 1917 Russian Revolution. Throughout the book, Pinkus divides Soviet Jewish history into three clear periods: the period of construction (1917–1939), the period of destruction (World War II to the death of Stalin in 1953), and the period after Stalin (from 1953 to the 1980s). For each period, Pinkus details Soviet theory on national minorities and compares the case of the Jewish minority to others in the Soviet Union. Then he analyzes how specific regulations and elements of legislation during these successive periods affected Jews' education, culture, and sense of identity as Soviet citizens. Finally, each section includes an analysis of interactions between Soviet Jews and the international Jewish community. Pinkus gives particularly detailed treatment to questions of antisemitism in the Soviet Union from 1947 to 1953, including an analysis of the portrayal of Jews in the media during that period and careful discussion of the 1948 attacks on "cosmopolitans" and the 1953 Doctors' Plot. He also gives a detailed analysis of the changes in the attitudes of leaders toward the Jewish minority, from Khrushchev to Andropov. This book includes detailed notes and a select bibliography as well.

LEVIN offers a comprehensive study of the experience of Jews in the Soviet Union on both a general and specific level. In her preface, she notes that she aimed to study elements of Soviet Jewish history that had previously been neglected, such as Lenin's low regard for Jewish nationalism and the resettlement of Jews to rural areas in the 1920s. Nevertheless, her work blends the newly researched information with an overarching history of the Jewish population in the Soviet Union. Key topics emphasized in this book include the Jewish Section of the Communist Party, Jewish farm colonies in Ukraine and other areas, Jews in heavy industry under the five-year plans, Yiddish culture, the Holocaust in the Soviet lands, and Soviet Jewish emigration. Levin includes information on relatively recently discovered atrocities of the Holocaust on Soviet soil, such as the massacres of Baby Iar' in Ukraine and Ponary in Lithuania. She also pays much attention to the difficulties experienced by dissidents such as Anatolii Shcharanskii, Ida Nudel, and Vladimir and Maria Slepak. Levin's work includes detailed maps and tables as well as numerous documentary photographs, an extensive section of endnotes, and a full bibliography.

RO'I offers a collection of essays by historians who use new data to supplement and update what can be learned in other histories. This collection deals primarily with Soviet Jewry, but it also has some essays that reanalyze important issues regarding the status of Jews in the Russian Empire. The essays are divided into categories that include: the czarist legacy in the treatment of Jews, the Bolshevik approach to the minority question, World War II, the status of religion in the Soviet Union, demography and emigration, and the Soviet and international Jewish communities. Eli Lederhendler's article titled "Did Russian Jewry Exist Prior to 1917?" explores the cultural and political differences that sometimes divided the Polish, Ukrainian, Belarussian, and Lithuanian Jews in the territories of the Russian Empire. Naomi Blank's article titled "Redefining the Jewish Question from Lenin to Gorbachev: Terminology or Ideology?" explores the depictions of Jews as a minority in Soviet politics and media and the effects of political decisions on everyday life for Soviet Jews. The articles by Iakov Etinger and Alexander Lokshin provide an unusual analysis of the Doctors' Plot of 1953 from two points of view: that of an eyewitness who was arrested in connection with this case and that of an outside historian. Mordechai Altshuler and John Garrard explore the issues of Soviet Jewish resistance to the Holocaust and Soviet journalism on the Holocaust, while Ro'i and Lili Baazova provide updated analyses of religious activity and the suppression of Judaism in Russia and Georgia. Other essays explore the correlation of Jewish emigration with Soviet-Israeli diplomatic relations and with U.S. policy from Richard Nixon to George Bush.

ALISA GAYLE MAYOR

Ruth, Book of

- Brenner, Athalya (editor), A Feminist Companion to Ruth (Feminist Companion to the Bible, 3), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993
- Fewell, Danna Nolan and David Miller Gunn, Compromising Redemption: Relating Characters in the Book of Ruth (Literary Currents in Biblical Interpretation), Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/Knox, 1990
- Hals, Ronald M., The Theology of the Book of Ruth (Facet Books Biblical Series, 23), Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969
- Kates, Judith A. and Gail Twersky Reimer (editors), Reading Ruth: Contemporary Women Reclaim a Sacred Story, New York: Ballantine, 1994
- Larkin, Katrina J.A., Ruth and Esther (Old Testament Guides), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996
- Sasson, Jack M., Ruth: A New Translation with a Philological Commentary and a Formalist-Folklorist Interpretation (Johns Hopkins Near Eastern Studies), Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1979; 2nd edition, Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1989

The Book of Ruth is frequently referred to as one of the greatest literary masterpieces in the Hebrew Bible. With only four chapters, the book leads its readers through a complex interweaving of themes and character relations. The variety of interpretations of this short work is a testament to its artistry. The Book of Ruth provides a commentary, for example, on the importance of hesed (loving-kindness), on the tenuous position of the outsider, on relationships between women, on the Davidic genealogy, and on God's hiddenness. The various Christian canons place Ruth next to Judges, reflecting the period in which this tale is set; however, the Hebrew Bible positions Ruth in the Writings, as one of the Five Scrolls.

HALS devotes his short monograph to the theology of the Book of Ruth. The absence of explicit reference to God in this biblical book has led many scholars to regard it as secular literature, but Hals, along with a handful of other scholars, maintains that the author of Ruth is making a theological statement about the hiddenness of God. Hals places Ruth in the same genre as the court history of David and the Joseph story—all narratives in which God does not appear—and argues that these texts provide a model of a deity who leads characters in subtle, nonmiraculous ways. Hals further argues that the Book of Ruth should be dated to the period of the Solomonic Enlightenment, a time marked by a fascination with God's role in the lives of ordinary people and banal events. This claim about the theological milieu of the Solomonic era and the date of Ruth is disputed; nevertheless, Hals is one of only a handful of modern scholars who submit the text to careful theological inquiry.

Conversely, SASSON regards the Book of Ruth as secular literature, whose primary theme is how Ruth secures Boaz as Naomi's redeemer. On the basis of the categories fashioned by the Russian folklorist Vladimir Propp (Morphology of the Folktale, 2nd edition, 1968), Sasson shows how the Book of Ruth follows the folktale genre. He contends that the story's primary purpose is to legitimize the Davidic dynasty. Among Sasson's most intriguing claims is his rejection of levirate marriage as the legal background for the book. Additionally, he argues that the genealogy of chapter 4:18–22 is original and not a later editorial addition. The first section of Sasson's commentary contains a fresh translation with extensive philological notes. Noteworthy is his expertise in northwest Semitic languages. In his 1989 edition, Sasson acknowledges the limitations of Propp's Russian folktale categories for ancient Semitic literature.

FEWELL and GUNN are the editors of the series Literary Currents in Biblical Interpretation, to which this study belongs. This book, as the series title suggests, reflects literary trends shaped by the postmodern milieu. Fewell and Gunn claim that their reading of Ruth "subverts" conventional character and genre types. The first section of the book takes a radical turn from conventional biblical studies. They present a creative retelling (midrash) of the Book of Ruth committed to filling in gaps in the text and exploring the psychological motivations and perspectives of each character. The second section offers a literary analysis of Ruth. Within debates concerning the primacy of text or reader, Fewell and Gunn come down unambiguously on the side of the reader. Readers sympathetic to the general perspectives of postmodernism are likely to respond to this book favorably.

BRENNER's volume is from a series the purpose of which is to amass both previously published and new critical articles on the books of the Bible from feminist-critical perspectives. The Ruth collection is divided into four sections that represent the various directions of Ruth studies among feminist scholars. The presupposition of the first section, subtitled "Gendered Reading Perspectives," is that "filling in the gaps is not simply a matter of interpretative discretion. It constitutes a necessity for understanding the story and its plot." The second section explores the possibility of female authorship, a question that has also arisen regarding the Song of Songs. The final two sections touch upon postbiblical interpretation and Ruth in the arts. Efforts at bringing feminist criticism into mainstream biblical scholarship have been finding growing success and Brenner's series is quickly becoming an indispensable resource.

KATES and REIMER have assembled a collection of brief commentaries, interpretive essays, short stories, poetry, and meditations on the Book of Ruth from feminist perspectives. The contributors are noted Jewish feminists from a variety of vocational backgrounds and Jewish affiliations. The articles range in orientation from academic to personal, from critical to creative. The basic premise of this collection is that “it is interpretive traditions more than biblical texts that leave women feeling excluded,” and the aim of the book is that “Jewish women will redefine a space initially created by other hands, creating a space in which other women can feel they belong.” Each section of the book is inspired by a specific verse in Ruth, although many of the essays deal with broader themes. Overall, the contributions offer insights and perspectives that have been overlooked by both traditional and critical commentators. The collection is geared to a popular audience, but any serious reader of Ruth will find useful insights in these pages.

LARKIN’s work provides clear and concise introductions to the essential critical questions regarding the Book of Ruth. She presents the positions of key scholars in an accurate and fair manner. Larkin addresses the book’s date, the debate regarding the legal background of the story, issues of text and canon, literary topics such as genre, and the theological dimensions of the book. Unfortunately, the growing body of critical feminist literature on Ruth receives only minimal attention. Still, nonspecialists looking for a brief introduction to the state of scholarship on Ruth will find this book informative and highly readable.

S. TAMAR KAMIONKOWSKI

S

Saadia ben Joseph Gaon 882–942

Egyptian-born Babylonian rabbinic authority, Bible translator and commentator, liturgist, and controversialist

- Baron, S.W., "Saadia's Communal Activities," in Saadia Anniversary Volume (American Academy for Jewish Research, Texts and Studies, vol. 2), edited by Boaz Cohen, New York: Jewish Publication Society, 1943
- Brody, Robert, The Geonim of Babylonia and the Shaping of Medieval Jewish Culture, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1998
- Davidson, Israel (editor and translator), Saadia's Polemic against Hiwi al-Balkhi: A Fragment (Texts and Studies of the Jewish Theological Seminary, vol. 5), New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1915
- Goodman, Lenn Evan (translator), The Book of Theodicy: Translation and Commentary on the Book of Job (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 25), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1988
- Malter, Henry, Saadia Gaon: His Life and Works, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1921
- Rosenblatt, Samuel (translator), The Book of Beliefs and Opinions (Yale Judaica Series, vol. 1), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1948
- Skoss, S.L., "Saadia Gaon, the Earliest Hebrew Grammarian," Proceedings of the Academy for Jewish Research, 21–23, 1952–1954

Saadia ben Joseph, Gaon of Sura, was a pioneering scholar who ranks as the outstanding Jewish spiritual and intellectual leader of the early Middle Ages. He fused Greco-Arabic philosophy with the accepted manner of studying scripture and rabbinic law, and he broadened the horizons of medieval secular arts and sciences within the Jewish milieu. He was a master of Hebrew philology and also had a profound grasp of Aramaic and Arabic, as demonstrated by his multifaceted literary activity. The Book of Beliefs and Opinions can be considered the most comprehensive and coherent representation of Saadia's thinking on the relationship between ratio and religio; it is the first great philosophical summa in Judaism.

BARON's essay emphasizes the commitment to communal leadership that runs through every aspect of Saadia's career, permeating even his most abstruse philosophical writings. Above all else, however, Baron stresses the importance of two public controversies in properly assessing Saadia's life: his conflict over the computation of the Jewish calendar with Aaron ben Meir and his dispute with the exilarch David ben Zakkai. In dealing with these episodes, Baron repeatedly goes beyond the internal workings of the Jewish community in order to stress the importance of the surrounding Muslim context. Thus, as a backdrop to Saadia's efforts to reunify the Jewish community in the East, Baron repeatedly highlights the contemporary political disintegration of the Abbasid Empire, under which much of the Jewish community in the East lived. In a similar vein, he explains various developments in the Jewish community in light of factors affecting the Muslim government bureaucracy.

BRODY's book is a masterful survey of the geonic period to the 11th century. The final third of the book is devoted to an examination of the ways in which Saadia, who functioned as Gaon of the Sura yeshivah from 928 until his death in 942, revolutionized the cultural world of the Babylonian academies. One of Saadia's achievements in this regard was to expand Babylonian intellectual pursuits to include such Palestinian disciplines as linguistics, liturgical poetry, and theology. Similarly, Saadia was responsible for bringing the Palestinian Talmud into the intellectual horizon of the Babylonian geonim and for cultivating such new disciplines as biblical and talmudic exegesis. Above all, however, Saadia's impact on the cultural world of the geonic academies was felt in his far-reaching literary contributions to the field of talmudic law. In this area Saadia and his successors are credited with the formulation of systematic halakhic monographs that seem to be modeled upon scientific writings from the surrounding Arabic culture.

DAVIDSON translates a large section of Saadia's polemical response to the heretical "questions" raised by Hiwi of Balkh against the authority of the Hebrew Bible. Saadia's text, written in verse, is today the main source for Hiwi's views, the intellectual roots of which remain obscure and a matter of disagreement. Among other things, Hiwi objected to the biblical idea that God commands man to offer sacrifices, the Bible's frequent use of anthropomorphic language, and the biblical notion of reward and punishment. Saadia's response to Hiwi relates most directly to his tireless efforts at stamping out heresy, a campaign that also led him to attack Karaism. But it reveals other sides of his creative spirit as well, among them his aesthetic appreciation of poetry and his strong commitment to the study and elucidation of the Hebrew Bible.

GOODMAN presents a fine example of Saadia's activities as translator into Arabic and commentator on the books of the Hebrew Bible, in this case the Book of Job. Saadia's intention was to provide the eastern Jewish communities with standardized Judeo-Arabic versions of Hebrew Scripture; the swift and widespread adoption of his Tafsir, an Arabic translation of the Pentateuch, attests to the achievement of this purpose. The commentaries accompanying the translations were clearly meant to present a biblical text that could withstand the test of logic and could come to the defense of the traditional rabbinic faith, whose precepts were being undermined at the time by the growing power of the Karaites and other heterodox groups. The polemical interests that stimulated Saadia's textual studies are transcended by his search for thematic coherence in Scripture by way of logic, grammar, philosophy, science, and, of course, rabbinic tradition. His Arabic translation of Job, together with his systematic commentary, is central in this regard. Goodman shows in this edition how Saadia's creative and reconstructive work as a philosopher and a grammarian sustained and guided his reading and understanding of Job.

MALTER's book, though somewhat dated, is still the most comprehensive introduction to Saadia's multifaceted career. Fortunately, a relatively large amount of biographical information on Saadia is available, and Malter uses this data in the first part of his book to sketch a compelling narrative of the Gaon's life. In this section Malter deals with Saadia's education in Palestine, his emigration to Babylonia, his clashes with other communal leaders (e.g., Aaron Ben Meir and David Ben Zakkai), and his tireless struggle against Karaism and heresy. In the second part of the book Malter surveys Saadia's literary output, which he justly regards as Saadia's most significant contribution to Jewish history.

ROSENBLATT's scholarly translation of Saadia's Kitab al-amanat wa'l-i'tiqadat (The Book of Beliefs and Opinions) introduces the reader to Saadia's philosophical magnum opus. This work constitutes the first comprehensive presentation of Judaism as a system of beliefs consistent with the dictates of reason and logic. In terms of both its composition and apologetic style of argumentation, The Book of Beliefs and Opinions reflects the influence of the contemporary Muslim school of thought known as Mu'tazilism. The work is composed of ten treatises that deal with the following topics: (1) the creation of the world, (2) God's unity and divine attributes, (3) the commandments, (4) human free will, (5) virtue and vice, (6) the human soul, (7) resurrection, (8) the messianic age, (9) reward and punishment, and (10) the golden mean.

SKOSS offers an overview of Saadia's major grammatical work, Kitab fasih lughat al-'ibraniyyin (The Book of the Eloquence of the Language of the Hebrews). Saadia's linguistic studies, which bear the unmistakable influence of methods developed by Arabic grammarians, represent a marked advance over the work of his predecessors, the Masoretes, who were primarily concerned with the proper vocalization of the biblical text. While later medieval Hebrew grammarians often criticized his views, Saadia is to be credited with inaugurating the scientific study of the Hebrew language. Although Saadia composed a number of works specifically dealing with linguistic questions, matters of language also played an important role in his biblical commentaries, his theological studies, and even his polemical writings.

ARNOLD FRANKLIN AND WOUT JACQUES VAN BEKKUM

Sabbath

Eskenazi, Tamara C., Daniel J. Harrington, and William H. Shea, The Sabbath in Jewish and Christian Traditions, New York: Crossroad, 1991

Greenberg, Irving, "The Dream and How to Live It: Shabbat," in his The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays, New York: Summit, 1988

Heschel, Abraham Joshua, The Sabbath: Its Meaning for Modern Man, New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1951, expanded edition, 1952

Katz, Jacob, Goi Shel Shabat, 1983; translated by Yoel Lerner as The "Shabbes Goy": A Study in Halakhic Flexibility, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1989

Klein, Isaac, "The Sabbath (I): Liturgy," and "The Sabbath (II): Prohibition against Work," in his A Guide to Jewish Religious Practice (Moreshet Series, vol. 6), New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1979

KLEIN provides an excellent overview of the observance of the sabbath as a day of rest according to Jewish law. He gives a detailed description of the liturgy of the home and synagogue as well as explaining the theological underpinnings of the prohibition of work. In place of an extensive discussion of the 39 categories of forbidden work as defined in classical rabbinic sources, he emphasizes areas of sabbath rest most probably relevant to the largely urbanized circumstances of English-speaking Jewry in the late 20th century: carrying, traveling, the use of electrical appliances, the rabbinic interdiction of handling any objects not intended for sabbath use, the requirement of withdrawal from activities that are not congenial to the spirit of the sabbath, the question of sports, and the case of a non-Jew working for a Jew.

KATZ, one of the most distinguished Jewish historians of the 20th century, provides an instance of how economic and technological change has forced Jewish practice to accept what had heretofore been forbidden. Jewish law did not permit non-Jews to work for Jews on the sabbath. Indeed, the rationale for the commandment to rest on the sabbath in the Decalogue in Deuteronomy 5 is to secure rest for household servants. The only leniency permitted is the hiring of a non-Jew to perform work for a Jew where the non-Jew has the option of doing the work on a day of the week of his choosing; if perchance the work is done on the sabbath, the Jew is not liable for violating the sabbath since the timing was the choice of the person hired. Katz shows how this stringency became impractical in the mid-to late Middle Ages because of changes in living conditions. For example, Jews who needed to travel had to board barges that sailed on the major rivers of Europe. The barge might stop at a certain destination only on the sabbath, forcing Jewish travelers to avail themselves of the work of the barge's crew in helping passengers and their baggage disembark.

The volume by ESKENAZI, HARRINGTON, and SHEA consists of papers and responses delivered at a symposium about the sabbath at the University of Denver. The papers offer a variety of analyses of the development of the sabbath in the biblical and rabbinic eras as well as offering theological and liturgical perspectives on the sabbath. The volume concludes with papers on the legal problems encountered by those who celebrate the sabbath on Saturdays, both Jews and Seventh-day Adventists.

GREENBERG, a modern Jewish theologian, argues that the sabbath is an expression of dialectic living, accepting and embracing the world as it is while setting up a weekly return to perfection. "[The sabbath] is the temporary anti-reality of perfection. For approximately twenty-five hours, all things are seen through the eyes of love, as if all of nature were perfect, in harmony with itself and with humanity, respecting creation." Greenberg explores how the sabbath undermines the pathologies of power in which profit possesses the highest status. He concludes his discussion with a pluralistic approach to the sabbath, one that can be shared across a wide spectrum of observance regardless of denominational affiliation. He bases this approach on the recognition of the sabbath as a shift in the mode of being. Each individual experiences this transformation in different ways.

HESCHEL's book has been called the most significant writing about the sabbath since the Enlightenment. Heschel focuses on the emotive aspects of Jewish religious experience rather than on the reasonability of the sabbath or on its law and history. For him, the essence of spiritual living is to face sacred moments. He identifies the sabbath as a sanctuary in time, the coronation of a day in the spiritual wonderland of time. "The meaning of the Sabbath is to celebrate time rather than space. Six days a week we live under the tyranny of things of space; on the Sabbath, we become attuned to holiness in time. It is a day on which we are called upon to share what is eternal in time, to turn from the results of creation to the mystery of creation." The sabbath comes of its own accord into human lives and, unlike a geographic sanctuary, cannot be conquered or lost. The sabbath is universal because all human beings encounter time as intrinsic to all experience and transcending all experience. Unlike space, time belongs to no one. The sabbath possesses a profoundly ethical dimension in that it is a day shared with all humanity. The sabbath embodies the belief that all human beings are equal and that the equality of human beings entails the nobility of human beings. The sabbath, to Heschel, is "a day of armistice in the economic struggle with our fellow men and the forces of nature—is there any institution that holds out a greater hope for man's progress than the Sabbath?" The sabbath is not primarily a symbol of creation but a memorial of redemption, a time to remember the day of the Exodus from Egypt, the day when Israel stood at Sinai, and the day of the messiah. Heschel also draws attention to the fact that comfort and pleasure are an integral part of sabbath observance. The sabbath is a day for the body as well as for the soul.

PAMELA BARMASH

Sabbatical Year and Jubilee see Agricultural Laws

Sacrificial Cult see Priesthood: Biblical

Sadducees

- Daube, David, "On Acts 23: Sadducees and Angels," Journal of Biblical Literature, 109, 1990
- Goodman, Martin, "Sadducees and Essenes after 70 C.E.," in Crossing the Boundaries: Essays in Biblical Interpretation in Honour of Michael D. Goulder, edited by Stanley E. Porter, Paul Joyce, and David E. Orton, Leiden and New York: Brill, 1994
- Grabbe, Lester, Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian, 2 vols., Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1992; London: SCM, 1994
- Lightstone, Jack, "Sadducees versus Pharisees," in Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults, edited by Jacob Neusner, Leiden: Brill, 1975
- Saldarini, Anthony J., Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach, Wilmington, Delaware: Glazier, 1988

The Sadducees were one of many Jewish sects that existed in Palestine during the late Second Temple period; they may also have survived into early rabbinic times. It is difficult to reconstruct the Sadducees' social status and distinct religious beliefs, in part because the treatment of the sect in the works of Josephus, the Gospels, and rabbinic literature is consistently hostile and polemical. Furthermore, none of the sect's own writings have survived to the present day. Modern secondary literature on the Sadducees, particularly in the English language, is relatively scarce in comparison to recent scholarly treatments of some of the other Jewish sects of the period, such as the Pharisees and Essenes. Jean Le Moyne's Les sadducéens (1972) is the only major study on the Sadducees. There are, however, some very useful articles and essays that critically investigate the meager references to the Sadducees in ancient sources.

For an up-to-date overview of modern scholarship on issues concerning the Sadducees (including German and French works) and a brief evaluation of the ancient sources, one should consult GRABBE's handbook. He tentatively theorizes that the Sadducees first appeared as more of a political than a religious entity, and he hypothesizes that there may have been some sort of connection between the Sadducees and the priestly establishment. As depicted in ancient sources, the sect's biblical interpretation and beliefs also suggest the Sadducees' connection to priestly concerns. Grabbe follows Josephus in suggesting that the Sadducees were identified with the upper socioeconomic class, although the author does not conclude that all Sadducees were priests, and he does not contend that they were all wealthy.

SALDARINI draws from the methods of social science to place the Sadducees in the context of Palestinian Jews living in the Roman Empire. He challenges the description of the Sadducees by Josephus and many modern scholars as a sectlike group. If the Sadducees were from the governing class, as stated by Josephus, then they were probably not a protest group in a proper sense; rather, Saldarini speculates, they were likely a small group of Jews with particular ideas on how to live the Jewish life. Saldarini is rightly cautious about depending too much on the veracity of the ancient sources in the reconstruction of Sadducean beliefs and practices. The New Testament and Josephus agree that, unlike the Pharisees, the Sadducees did not believe in the resurrection. Beyond this observation, the sparse references to the Sadducees in these sources reveal very little. Indeed, Saldarini criticizes the standard treatments of the Sadducees that differentiate them from the Pharisees on the basis of the Sadducees' insistence on literal interpretation of Scripture and their rejection of Oral Torah, arguing that these accounts are either misleading, or they are not explicitly supported by the ancient evidence. The author contends that all Jews had, in a sense, their own Oral Torah and their own laws and customs that developed over many years. The Sadducees' disputes with the Pharisees only reveal that the Sadducees observed biblical laws as they interpreted them and that they rejected some of the Pharisaic interpretations.

DAUBE proposes a new interpretation of a particular passage in the Acts of the Apostles that has, in the past, been used by scholars to support the notion that the Sadducean denial of angels and resurrection was the basis of the contention between the Sadducees and Pharisees noted in that passage. Daube argues that, in light of the angelology found in parts of the Hebrew Scriptures, it is unlikely that the Sadducees could have denied outright the existence of angels. Drawing on other New Testament passages, 1 Enoch, and rabbinic literature, Daube postulates that the reference to angels in the passage in question concerns the interim state of the deceased person between death and resurrection and is not an example of angelology as such. Daube also finds allusions to the disputed angelic existence of the deceased in the interim period in Josephus's depiction of the contention between Sadducees and Pharisees where, according to the former sect, the soul perishes with the body, while the latter group maintains that the soul survives, and reward or punishment is meted out according to previous conduct on earth, with the virtuous eventually receiving a new body at the resurrection.

GOODMAN's article looks into the question of the fate of the Sadducees (and Essenes) after the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E. He challenges the standard assumption that these Jewish groups disappeared soon after this time by citing patristic and rabbinic sources that give faint hints that the groups may have survived. Indeed, Goodman hypothesizes that Jewish groups and philosophies known before 70 C.E., possibly including the Sadducees, continued for years, perhaps centuries, after the Temple's destruction. To support this claim, Goodman suggests that the Sadducees seem to have based their group's identity on particular ideas—whether theological or halakhic—rather than organizational structures or buildings, and therefore the sect need not have been rendered moribund after the destruction of the Temple. He posits that the relative silence that we find in rabbinic and patristic sources concerning the Sadducees can be attributed to the rabbis' disinterest in non-rabbinic Jews (a similar observation can be made to explain the rabbis' inattention to Christianity). He attributes the scarcity of information about the Sadducees in Christian texts to the fact that the Christian writers were interested in Jews only in the context of biblical Israel, the life of Jesus, or the problem of Jewish practices in the church.

LIGHTSTONE investigates salient tannaitic sources for insights into the controversies between the Sadducees and Pharisees. After analyzing seven pericopes in which the sources juxtapose both parties, Lightstone notes that most of these references rhetorically vilify the Sadducees. He concludes that there is no evidence that any theological or halakhic rubric formed the basis of the supposed conflict between Sadducees and Pharisees. Indeed, according to Lightstone, it is quite possible that the tannaim projected some of their laws on the Pharisees when they suggested that those laws were the basis for the inter-party conflict. Like Goodman, Lightstone suggests that there is evidence that the Sadducees survived and may even have remained a prestigious group for some time after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 C.E.

D.P. O'BRIEN

Saints see Veneration of Saints, Pilgrimages, and Holy Places

Samaritans

- Bowman, John, Samaritan Documents: Relating to Their History, Religion, and Life (Pittsburgh Original Texts and Translation Series, 2), Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: Pickwick, 1977
- Coggins, R.J., Samaritans and Jews: The Origins of Samaritanism Reconsidered (Growing Points in Theology), Atlanta, Georgia: Knox, and Oxford: Blackwell, 1975
- Crown, Alan D. (editor), The Samaritans, Tübingen: Mohr (Siebeck), 1989
- Crown, Alan D., Reinhard Pummer, and Abraham Tal (editors), A Companion to Samaritan Studies, Tübingen: Mohr (Siebeck), 1993
- Garber, Zev, "The Samaritan Passover," in Experiencing the Exodus from Egypt, edited by Duane L. Christensen, Berkeley, California: BIBAL, 1988
- Gaster, Moses, The Samaritans: Their History, Doctrines and Literature (Schweich Lectures, 1923), London: Oxford University Press for the British Academy, 1925
- Gaster, Moses, Samaritan Eschatology (Samaritan Oral Law and Ancient Traditions, vol. 1), London: Search, 1932
- Montgomery, James A., The Samaritans, the Earliest Jewish Sect: Their History, Theology and Literature (Bohlen Lectures, 1906), Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1907; with introduction by A.S. Halkin, New York: Ktav, 1968

Purvis, James D., The Samaritan Pentateuch and the Origin of the Samaritan Sect (Harvard Semitic Monographs, vol. 2), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1968

Tsedaka, Benyamin, "Samaritan Holidays and Festivals," in Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 14, Jerusalem: Keter, 1978

The Samaritans, who call themselves Shamerim or Shomerim al ha'emet (keepers of the truth) and who are called Kutim in rabbinic literature, believe that they are the true guardians of the Torah of Moses and the true descendants of the people of the biblical kingdom of Israel. In the first century C.E. the Samaritans may have numbered more than a million people dwelling throughout the land of Israel. However, centuries of conflict, intermittent war, and coercive religious decrees, including forced conversion to Christianity and Islam, decimated their numbers to 146 at the end of Ottoman rule (1917). Soon after, Samaritan births increased (marriages to female "converts" from Judaism is said to be a factor contributing to the rise in population), and by 1948, the population had doubled. Today the Samaritans number more than 600 persons, living primarily in Kiryat Luza on Mt. Gerizim, Nablus, and Holon. Recent discussion in Samaritan studies have increased knowledge in areas of archaeology, epigraphy, paleography, linguistics, history, literature, religion, and theology.

CROWN presents a major tome on the state of Samaritan studies today. Chapters by leading Samaritanologists include essays on Samaritan history (Persian to modern periods); material remains (archaeology, numismatics, inscriptions); chronicles (historical literature); eschatology, sects and movements; literature (pentateuchal, halakhic, liturgical); languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, Arabic); calendar; ritual and customs; music; manuscripts; and select bibliography. The anthology lacks essays on Samaritan folklore and theology, but anyone interested in obtaining information on Samaritan civilization in general and on current research in particular should begin with this collection of lengthy, encyclopedia-style articles. The companion volume, an encyclopedic dictionary edited by CROWN, PUMMER, and TAL, provides summaries and evaluations of key words, ideas, and concepts, as well as biographical data related to the growing field of Samaritanology.

MONTGOMERY's book seeks to answer the question, who are the Samaritans? He surveys three centuries of Western discovery and interest in the Samaritans, and he presents his views on the history of the Samaritans to his own day (the early 20th century). This volume is the first attempt to assess critically their languages and literature, liturgy, and theology in a single study. Also included are Jewish, Christian, and Muslim references and an annotated translation of Massekhet Kutim, a noncanonical rabbinic tractate on Jewish dealings with the Samaritans. Montgomery's chapters are comprehensive and suggestive, and his work is rightly referred to by Alan Crown as "a classic text-book that has never been superseded."

GASTER (1925) was originally presented as the Schweich Lectures for 1923 at the British Academy. The first lecture evaluates the importance of Samaritans for biblical history and reviews biblical history in light of the Samaritan tradition. Dis-putations and hostility between Jews and Samaritans and the legal status of both groups under Roman rule are chronicled. In the second lecture, Gaster argues that Samaritan doctrines and religious practices represent a stage in Israelite tradition that developed before the formation of sects or political parties. Their strict adherence to the Torah of Moses, their rites of passage, and their views of sacred place and time reveal commonality as well as differences with the practices and beliefs of the Sadducees, Pharisees, and Essenes. Additionally, there is no trace of paganism or syncretism in Samaritan religion, a fact that Gaster uses to portray the Samaritans as a distinctively Jewish sect. The third lecture introduces a wide spectrum of Samaritan texts, manuscripts, commentaries, midrashic interpolations, liturgy, poetry, and mystical and eschatological writings. Especially noteworthy are the discussion of the Scroll of Abisha', Gaster's consideration of the relation of the Samaritan Pentateuch to the Masoretic Text and Septuagint, and his analysis of the poems of the foremost hymnologist, Markah (third or fourth century C.E.).

GASTER (1932) probes the Samaritan beliefs in immortality and resurrection, reward and punishment, the Taheb (a Samaritan Messiah), and the Second Kingdom. Citing previously unedited manuscripts, he shows that Samaritan eschatology is intimately bound up with the commandments, ordinances, and rules of the Torah. Gaster argues that Jews and Samaritans are "rivals in claims [that they possess the authority of Moses], but linked in spirit." His pioneer research has helped pave the road for later academic studies of the Samaritans.

PURVIS's monograph links the origin of the Samaritan sect to the redaction of the Samaritan Pentateuch contemporaneous to the destruction of the Samaritan Temple by John Hyrcanus (128 B.C.E.). He advances this thesis by noting differences in the orthographic traditions of the Samaritan Pentateuch and Jewish writings of the Hasmonean period. Historically, religious disputes (over issues such as the rival claims to sanctity of Mt. Moriah and Mt. Gerizim, and their respective priesthods) divided the two groups, and political strife in the late Hasmonean period prevented any steps toward reconciliation. The proclamation of the Samaritan Pentateuch registered Samaritan opposition to both the Hasmonean conquest and the Judaization of Judea, and it signaled the emergence of the Samaritans as a separate monotheistic community.

COGGINS rejects the traditional stance of Jews and Samaritans with regard to the origins of Samaritanism. The author proposes that Samaritan origins date back to the fall of Samaria to Assyria (722–721 B.C.E.) and that the Samaritans are a mixture of the remnant native population and foreigners who accompanied the Assyrian conquerors. This theory contradicts the Samaritans' contention that the separation began when Eli led many Israelites astray by moving from Shechem to Shiloh, thereby contaminating the purity of the Northern cult, of which the Samaritans are sole guardians. Coggins also rejects the views of schismatic theorists (i.e., those who trace Samaritan origins to a dispute with other Jews), whose data is founded more on anti-Samaritan polemic than on hard evidence. Indeed, "schism" is only possible if an "orthodoxy" exists, and until the rabbinic era, no such norm existed in Judaism. The Hebrew Bible contains no explicit negative allusion to the Samaritans, but, beginning with the Book of Ben Sira, which refers to “the foolish people [Samaritans] that live in Shechem,” (Sir. 50:26), one can find numerous disparaging references. The different eschatological, religious, and theological assertions in such references resemble charges made in the conflict between Pharisees and Sadducees. Demonstrating that continual, heated disputes over the priesthood and the true sanctuary helped augment Judeo-Samaritan hostility and their ultimate parting of the ways, Coggins concludes that the formative period for the rise of Samaritanism was the last three centuries before Christianity.

BOWMAN examines passages of Samaritan literature relating to their understanding of themselves as a religion and a people. There are six sections with selections: Torah (creation and Decalogue), chronicles (Tolida or Genealogy, Book of Joshua, “Chronicle Adler,” and Kitab al-Ta’rih by Abu al-Fath), biblical commentaries in Arabic illustrating halakhic and aggadic matter, aggadic midrash (examples from Abu I-Hasan al-Suri on angels and from Memar Markah on the “Day of Vengeance” [Deuteronomy 32:33; Masoretic reading “vengeance is Mine”]), Samaritan Hillukh (code of laws) on marriage and divorce, and four short public prayers (weekday, festival, sabbath). This study explores Samaritan religious beliefs, practices, apologetics, and polemics, demonstrating how the life of the Samaritans diverges from standards authorized by Jewish orthodoxy. For example, the expansion of the Samaritan Tenth Commandment with reference to Mt. Gerizim (e.g., Deuteronomy 11:29b; 27:2b-3a, 4–7, etc., in the Samaritan Pentateuch, is viewed by Bowman as a response to the destruction of the Samaritan Temple in the late Hasmonean period.

TSEDAKA is a leader of the Holon Samaritan community, director of the Samaritan Research Institute there, and editor of Aleph Beth Hadashot Ha-Shomronim (A.B.: The Samaritan News), which publishes Samaritan texts, news items, and statistical data, as well as selections from scholarly articles about the Samaritans, with sections in English and Arabic as well as modern Hebrew and Samaritan (Paleo-Hebrew) scripts. His essay provides a clear, concise account of the Samaritan year cycle and religious ceremonies. His tradition-historical view, which presents more community-focused information than critical evaluation, proposes that holy time and rites of passage are the matrix around which Samaritan ideology, identity, and memories are spun. For example, he posits that communal participation in the Passover sacrifice on Mt. Gerizim is a major sign that Samaritan corporate identity extends back to the exodus from Egypt and forward to settlement within the land of Israel.

GARBER’s eyewitness account of the Samaritan Passover explains the holiday’s significance. He identifies Samaritan readings of biblical texts, as well as creeds and practices, that conflict with normative rabbinic traditions, and he argues that Samaritans celebrate Israel’s ongoing freedom story on Mount Gerizim as a way of affirming that the Samaritan identity is not merely a vestige of a generally forgotten past but a dynamic force in the minds of people today.

Samuel, Book of

- Berlin, Adele, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative, Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1983
- Fokkelman, J.P., Narrative Art and Poetry in the Books of Samuel: A Full Interpretation Based on Stylistic and Structural Analyses, 4 vols., Assen: Van Gorcum, 1981–1993
- Garsiel, Moshe, The First Book of Samuel: A Literary Study of Comparative Structures, Analogies, and Parallels, Ramat-Gan: Revivim, 1983; Winona Lake, Indiana: Eisenbrauns, 1990
- Goldman, S., Samuel: Hebrew Text and English Translation with an Introduction and Commentary, London and New York: Soncino, 1949
- McCarter, P. Kyle, I Samuel: A New Translation (Anchor Bible, vol. 8), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1980
- McCarter, P. Kyle, II Samuel: A New Translation with Introduction, Notes, and Commentary (Anchor Bible, vol. 9), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1984
- Rosenberg, A.J., Samuel I: A New English Translation of the Text and Rashi, with a Commentary Digest (Judaica Books of the Prophets), New York: Judaica, 1976
- Rosenberg, A.J. and Moshe Ch. Sosevsky, Samuel II: A New English Translation of the Text and Rashi, with a Commentary Digest (Judaica Books of the Prophets), New York: Judaica, 1978

Eighth of the 24 books of the Hebrew Bible, according to the traditional Jewish count, third book of the Prophets and of the Nevi'im Rishonim (Historical Prophets), the Book of Samuel was divided into First and Second Samuel as early as the Septuagint. The book recounts the political history of Israel from the beginning of the monarchy to the end of David’s reign, as well as the personal histories of Samuel, Saul, and David. National and personal histories are mixed together throughout the book. Samuel is considered the zenith of biblical narrative, due to its artful and intricate storytelling and its use of a wealth of narrative techniques.

FOKKELMAN’s four-volume commentary, which is published without a translation of the Hebrew text, is one of the most voluminous biblical commentaries ever written. The length of the work is all the more remarkable because Fokkelman deals only with literary issues, ignoring the historical questions surrounding the book. Volume one is entitled “King David” and examines 2 Samuel 9–20; volume two, “The Crossing Fates,” considers 1 Samuel 13–31 and 2 Samuel 1; volume three, “Throne and City,” focuses on 2 Samuel 2–8 and 21–24; and volume four, “Vow and Desire,” deals with 1 Samuel 1–12. Almost every detail of the text is analyzed in terms of its contribution to the literary whole. This commentary is intended for the serious student, but it is surprisingly readable for a work of this scope.

MCCARTER (1980, 1984) is an omnibus commentary, using all the tools of modern biblical research and exploring issues of source criticism, text criticism, and historical geography, as well as lexical, syntactic, and exegetical concerns. A translation is presented for each section of the book, followed by notes and commentary on that section. McCarter’s work is aimed at readers with some knowledge of biblical scholarship. The commentary does not emphasize literary issues as fully as might be desirable.

GOLDMAN's work is the best short introduction to the Book of Samuel for the reader with limited or no knowledge of Hebrew. The brief commentary is attuned to the needs of modern readers, focusing primarily on points in the text or in the plot that the layperson is likely to find troubling or difficult to understand. Little attention is paid to those issues of source criticism, comparative studies, or historical geography that are likely to be of more interest to the specialist than the general reader. The commentary draws on both Jewish and non-Jewish expositors but is designed to give a Jewish perspective on the text. A useful index to names, subjects, and themes in the Book of Samuel concludes the work.

ROSENBERG's edition of 1 Samuel and ROSENBERG and SOSEVSKY's edition of 2 Samuel present the Hebrew text of the Bible together with the commentaries of Rashi, David Kimhi, Gersonides, Joseph Kara, David Altschuler, and the Targum on one page, with an English translation of the biblical text and of selections from the various commentaries on the facing page. This format allows the English reader access to the traditional commentaries. The editors have taken care to select from the commentaries only those passages that help the modern reader to understand the text, omitting long midrashic expositions.

GARSIEL deals only with the first five chapters of Samuel in his brief book, which cites many verses but does not provide the entire text in Hebrew or English. He presents a literary study that focuses on comparisons between these chapters and other biblical narratives, and he emphasizes that such comparisons are built into the narratives, as the Samuel stories often refer to other biblical stories. He further explains that character opposition is a central facet of Samuel's narrative, with Samuel and his parents contrasted with Eli and his sons, for example. This volume is highly readable and valuable to anyone interested in the Bible or in literature, although knowledge of Hebrew is necessary for the fullest understanding of this book.

BERLIN's work discusses the literary techniques of biblical narrative in general, but most of the author's examples are drawn from Samuel, a fact that is unsurprising as that book is widely regarded as the outstanding example of narrative art in the Bible. Her sections on "Character and Characterization" and "Point of View" are particularly rich in discussions of Samuel. This work will prove especially rewarding for readers with some familiarity with the Bible, as well as some background in narratology.

SHAWN ZELIG ASTER

Sanhedrin, Semikha, and Rabbinat

Ehrlich, Avrum M., Sanhedrin Studies, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000

Elazar, Daniel J. (editor), Authority, Power, and Leadership in the Jewish Polity, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1991

Gitelman, Zvi (editor), The Quest for Utopia: Jewish Political Ideas and Institutions through the Ages, Armonk, New York, and London: Sharpe, 1992

Mantel, Hugo, Studies in the History of the Sanhedrin, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1961

Newman, Jacob, Semikha: A Study of Its Origins, History and Function in Rabbinic Literature, Manchester, Greater Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1950

Schwarzfuchs, Simon, A Concise History of the Rabbinat, Oxford and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1993

Sicker, Martin, The Judaic State: A Study in Rabbinic Political Theory, New York: Praeger, 1988

The study of rabbinical office and its juridical function has many aspects, among them the history of the ancient Sanhedrin, the evolution of the rabbinat as an institution, and the study of present-day Jewish religious life involving sociological, theological, and political dimensions. The studies discussed in this essay are selected more for the political philosopher than for the historian, for these works struggle with the history of Jewish institutions primarily as a way to understand present debates about the idea of Jewish authority.

EHRlich translates, discusses, and annotates a Hebrew discourse by Yehudah Leib Maimon entitled "Renewal of the Sanhedrin in our Restored State," published in 1951. This work is particularly important because it integrates the subject of Sanhedrin and authoritative religious leadership into a discussion of the State of Israel, halakhic reform, and modernization. Included in this work is a review of the debate between two 16th-century rabbis, Jacob Berab, who sought to renew the antique semikha (ordination) and reconvene the Sanhedrin, and Levi ibn Habib, who opposed Berab's proposals. The introduction and footnotes to this work are instructive to those interested in the emerging discipline of Jewish political philosophy.

ELAZAR's collection of essays on Jewish authority presents a survey of views from the ancient period to the present. Elazar outlines the disciplines that encompass the study of Jewish authority as both political science and Jewish studies, and he argues that the basic assumptions upon which this concept rests are the Torah, the priesthood, and kingship. The editor selects essays on leadership in late antiquity and the Middle Ages, as well as studies of the views of authority held by French, British, and American Jews. He also includes essays on the subjects of ethics and national power, revolution, and education.

GITELMAN has compiled philosophical essays about the nature of authority in Jewish politics. The essayists express differing viewpoints, but Gitelman contends that the Jewish political tradition is united in a search for utopian standards. Views of the Jewish polity have ranged from a desire to be a holy community to the rule of halakhic law and order. Historically, Jewish authority often depended entirely on the goodwill of civil governments in regions where the Jews resided, and obedience to the rabbis was often fueled by the Jewish community's sense of self-preservation. West European Jewish communities separated their religious identities from their national ones, but their utopias resembled Western models. The ways in which these discussions on the Jewish polity represent authority are interesting and subtle.

MANTEL's work deals with the history of the Sanhedrin in Israel from the Second Temple period through the decline of its authority in the fourth century C.E. The author summarizes various views on the nature of the Sanhedrin, and he explores such issues as the number of sanhedrins, the number of their judges, the scope of their jurisdictions, and their functions. He also discusses the nature of Sanhedrin politics and tensions between the Sanhedrin as parliament and various kings, tyrants, high priests, and ruling bodies. Mantel describes how the Sanhedrin interacted with scholars and its relationships with Jewish communities in Israel and the diaspora. He also explains the duties and authority of the Sanhedrin's president in economic, social, and moral matters, as well as the president's travel habits, religious jurisdiction, and administrative work. The bibliography thoroughly covers the range of works written on the subject.

NEWMAN remains one of the few studies that focus entirely on the subject of the ultimate form of Jewish authority, semikhah, or ordination. The author surveys the biblical origins of semikhah, the qualifications demanded of candidates, the debate over the precise jurisdiction of an ordained rabbi, and the various rituals and ceremonies of ordination. He also discusses how and when the semikhah ceased and describes various historical attempts to renew it. Newman tries to identify a continuity in the semikhah process from biblical times to the period of the Sanhedrin and the Second Temple. He argues that although the honorific titles and job descriptions of Jewish leadership often changed, the semikhah always existed during the period under discussion. Newman's description of the 16th-century debate between Jacob Berab and Levi ibn Habib over the renewal of semikhah is especially interesting. More generally, the volume provides the groundwork for further studies of semikhah and Sanhedrin, particularly as they relate to the State of Israel.

SCHWARZFUCHS's book is the first significant history of the rabbinate from its beginnings until the present. In concise chapters, the author discusses such topics as the reasons for the emergence of the rabbinic model of leadership and the causes of its changing functions. Schwarzfuchs views the rabbinate as a continually evolving institution of judicial and religious authority that uses anachronistic titles but adapts to address the ever-emerging needs of the community. The author shows that although the use of the title rav or rabbi began in the late Second Temple period, it was only in the Middle Ages that this title referred to a particular community function and institutionalized authority. Schwarzfuchs discusses the interaction of the rabbinate with Christian rulers and investigates the role of the chief rabbis in the collection of taxes, the legislation of ordinances, and the official representation of the needs of the Jewish community. He quotes contracts for rabbinic employment to demonstrate what communities expected from their rabbis, and he explains revolutions in rabbinic leadership and variations in Ashkenazi, Sephardi, and hasidic concepts of rabbinic authority. He also discusses the emergence of a modern model of rabbinic leadership, the founding of seminaries for rabbinic training and ordination, selected contemporary problems, and the future of the rabbinate.

SICKER offers a thorough study of ancient Jewish political institutions: the priesthood, prophecy, the monarchy, and the judiciary. While some of these roles are biblical in origin, Sicker studies them from the perspective of rabbinic commentary dating from the Talmud to the 19th century. He scours hundreds of rabbinic commentaries and Jewish philosophical works, presenting the political thinking of different communities and rabbis throughout the diaspora. He portrays rabbinic thinking as possessing a wealth of experience on such questions of government as the separation of powers, checks and balances, and civil duties. His endnotes and references are extensive and very useful.

AVRUM EHRLICH

See also Authority, Rabbinic and Communal

Satmar

- Eisenberg, Robert, Boychiks in the Hood: Travels in the Hasidic Underground, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995; new edition, London: Quartet, 1996
- Finkel, Avraham Yaakov, Contemporary Sages: The Great Chasidic Masters of the Twentieth Century, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1994
- Kranzler, George, Hasidic Williamsburg: A Contemporary American Hasidic Community, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1995
- Poll, Solomon, The Hasidic Community of Williamsburg, New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1962
- Rubin, Israel, Satmar: Two Generations of an Urban Island, New York: Lang, 1997

Satmar is a hasidic group with tens of thousands of adherents that was founded by Rabbi Yoel Teitelbaum and, since his death in 1979, has been led by his nephew Rabbi Moshe Teitelbaum. Based in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, with other major centers in the hasidic village of Kiryas Yoel in Orange County, New York, as well as in London, Antwerp, and Jerusalem, the movement aspires to recreate the pre-World War II lifestyle of the pious Jews of Transylvania and Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia. Within the variegated hasidic movement, it is the largest and most influential grouping. It has not, however, sought to gain either publicity or influence in the world at large, and as a result it is little known and often stereotyped. These books by sympathetic outsiders go beyond the stereotypes.

The widespread impression of Satmar as a hermetically sealed, embattled community is undermined by the ease with which EISENBERG was able to write his book. His physical appearance and minimal Jewish identity are radically unhasidic, but Eisenberg is fluent in Yiddish and has some hasidic relatives, and he found no difficulty gaining access to opinions and information. His first chapter describes a visit to the Satmar community in Williamsburg, interspersing brief but vivid pictures of various individuals, including rebels, with analyses that tend to emphasize the controversial but also show admiration. Satmarers appear repeatedly throughout the remainder of this entertaining book, which serves to provide some context for the distinctive elements of their way of life. While various authors have given differing accounts of the transition from the late, intensely beloved rebbe to his successor, Eisenberg contrasts the existence of an organized movement of dissidents opposed to the new rebbe with the emerging sense of others within the community that “there can be Satmar without the Satmar Rebbe.”

POLL's work, written in the early 1960s, is a highly readable account of hasidic life in Williamsburg that remains a largely accurate description. Poll mentions Satmar (and other groups) by name only in passing, but most of his general statements apply to Satmar in particular. Poll focuses on the facets of hasidic life most likely to strike an outsider as strange, providing useful insights into underlying values and historical background. He gives little sense of the lives or characters of specific individuals, but he paints striking pictures of social types, especially in chapter seven, “The Social Stratification of the Hasidic Community.” He also conveys a sense of hasidic voices through translations of newspaper advertisements, fundraising letters from impoverished rabbis, and similar documents of daily life. The mingling of religious principle with ordinary routine is described engagingly, especially in the references to the effects of particularly stringent observance of the dietary laws. Only the historical background (in the first five chapters) is a little too narrowly focused, and as a result, the book could convey the false impression that all hasidim are from Hungary and live in Williamsburg.

KRANZLER's book is a sequel to his Williamsburg: A Jewish Community in Transition (1961), which traced developments in Jewish Williamsburg that began before the postwar hasidic immigration. In the sequel, he studies hasidic Williamsburg as a whole, but he emphasizes the leading role of Satmar and its rebbes. Based on written surveys and interviews, the book includes many quotations from and descriptions of ordinary hasidim as well as leaders of the community. Relatively long and concisely written, this study includes much information on various aspects of the Satmar community, from the family (chapter four) to the broader social structure (chapter five) and interactions with the outside world through political and economic activity (chapters two and eight). A hagiographic account of the late rebbe is also included (Appendix B). Kranzler writes with unreserved admiration for Satmar; he dismisses as unimportant the tensions around the succession of the new rebbe and other potentially controversial issues.

RUBIN's book, devoted specifically to Satmar, revises his Satmar: An Island in the City (1972): each of the original chapters is followed by a supplement assessing changes in the intervening years. Based on interviews and the author's personal observations of the community, this book offers pictures painted in broad strokes rather than detailed analysis. The organization by topic is similar to Kranzler's arrangement, although Rubin treats historical background and religion more thoroughly. Rubin evinces admiration for Satmar, but he has a more critical eye than Kranzler; in particular, Rubin gives greater weight to internal struggles in the community following the succession of the new rebbe and to the changes that may result (such as greater independence from the rebbe in individual decision-making). Rubin also discerns evidence of slow and subtle Americanization, which he sees as exemplifying the “ubiquity and inevitably of sociocultural change” in even the most conservative communities.

FINKEL presents biographical summaries, selected teachings, and photographs of 37 hasidic rebbes of the 20th century. The brief chapter on “Rabbi Yoel Teitelbaum of Satmar—Reb Yoilish, the Satmarer Rebbe” includes a photograph of the late rebbe's soulful face, information on his lineage and early years, and a summary of the growth of Satmar Hasidism in New York and its many educational and charitable institutions. Most importantly, it presents the only selection of Satmar teachings available in English, giving some sense of the forcefulness of the rebbe's words and of the theological underpinnings of Satmar's controversial opposition to Zionism (“Don't Leave Prematurely” and “Unexpected Redemption”).

JUSTIN JARON LEWIS

Schechter, Solomon 1847?–1915

Romanian-born Anglo-American Wissenschaft scholar, essayist, and theologian

Bentwich, Norman De Mattos, Solomon Schechter:

A Biography, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, and Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1938

Ginzberg, Eli, Keeper of the Law: Louis Ginzberg, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1966

Ginzberg, Louis, “Solomon Schechter,” in his Students, Scholars and Saints, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1928

Karp, Abraham J., “American Rabbis for America: Solomon Schechter Comes to the Seminary,” in his Jewish Continuity in America: Creative Survival in a Free Society, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1998

Kripke, Myer S., “Solomon Schechter's Philosophy of Judaism,” The Reconstructionist, 3(12–13), 22 October and 5 November 1937

Marx, Alexander, “Solomon Schechter,” in his Essays in Jewish Biography, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1947; London: University Press of America/Eurospan, 1986

Schechter was a rabbi, textual scholar of rabbinic literature, leader of Conservative Judaism, and discoverer of an invaluable treasure trove of Hebrew manuscripts, which he rescued from the storage room of a Cairo synagogue and brought to Cambridge University, where he served as “Reader in Talmudic.” In 1902 he became president of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York, a post he held until his death in 1915.

MARX's essay serves as a good introduction to Schechter's life and his contribution to Jewish scholarship. Marx recounts how impressed he was by Schechter's generosity of spirit and impulsive nature. The two first met in Cambridge in 1898, when Marx came to collate the manuscripts of a book. After welcoming Marx, Schechter revealed that he had intended to edit the work himself and had already made copies of some important manuscripts and had begun to write notes on the text. Since he had abandoned the project, Schechter presented all this material, the results of considerable effort, to Marx, a total stranger. Marx asserts that this remarkable act of generosity expressed Schechter's personality.

BENTWICH offers the only full-length biography of Schechter. Bentwich had known and revered Schechter when he lived in England. Schechter's widow and his son, Frank, made letters, documents, and papers available to Bentwich, and Frank Schechter reviewed the manuscript shortly before he died. The resulting biography displays the merits and shortcomings of such an arrangement. Although the volume lacks critical analysis, Bentwich successfully captures Schechter's personality, sparkling wit, and charisma. Bentwich is thoroughly at home and reliable when describing the period in which Schechter resided in England. He is not on such safe ground when he describes Schechter's arrival in the United States and activities at the seminary. Bentwich's biography should thus be read in conjunction with more recent studies covering the last part of Schechter's life.

KARP studies the protracted negotiations leading to Schechter's departure for the United States. Schechter's reasons for wanting to immigrate to the United States included his desire to live and raise his children in a Jewish environment; his wish to provide them with a good education, which was not possible given his salary at Cambridge; and his embarrassment that a major part of that salary was subsidized by Claude G. Montefiore, a radical reformer who favored Sunday services. In the United States, messianic expectations were aroused by Schechter's imminent arrival. Karp addresses the question of why Jacob Schiff, the financier, and a group of wealthy German Jews who belonged to the leading Reform temple in the United States, Temple Emanu-El, decided to support the reorganization of the traditionally oriented Jewish Theological Seminary and underwrite Schechter's coming to the United States. Bentwich argues that the group was concerned that Reform had gone too far and saw the urgency of erecting a bulwark for traditional Judaism, but this is patently absurd. Karp contends that the real concern was a fear of political radicalism. Schiff, Louis Marshall, the Lewisohns, the Guggenheims, and their group were anxious lest the newly arrived East European immigrants turn to socialism and anarchy. The wealthy German, uptown Jews saw signs of a decline in the Jewish character—a loosening of family ties and a rise in offenses against the law of the land, such as increasing involvement in gambling and prostitution. According to Karp, it was this that spurred them to support Schechter's coming to the United States.

In his memorial address honoring Schechter, Louis GINZBERG, master teacher of Talmud at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America for more than half a century, expresses the opinion that the key to Schechter the scholar was Schechter the man. Schechter's inclusive notion of "Catholic Israel" reflected his soul, and nothing Jewish was alien to him. Ginzberg notes that Schechter contributed to an extraordinary range of Jewish learning, including studies of pre-talmudic literature and sects, Talmud and midrash, law and legend, and Karaite polemics and geonic apologetics. He also reviews Schechter's ideas concerning the intellectual and spiritual activity of Jews in Palestine during the 16th century and points out that there is hardly a branch of Jewish literature that Schechter did not enrich.

Eli GINZBERG states that in later years his father (Louis Ginzberg) completely changed his view of Schechter—not Schechter the man, but Schechter the scholar. The younger Ginzberg observes that time alters a man's views. Perhaps the senior Ginzberg felt that the writer of a memorial address, like the writer of an epitaph, is not "on oath." Louis Ginzberg's final judgment is that Schechter was incompetent as a scholar and temperamentally incapable of serious scholarship. In the last years of his life, he dictated his reminiscences to his daughter-in-law, Ruth Szold Ginzberg, on one occasion remarking:

Schechter was a Rumanian who had never had a proper modern education. . . . He didn't have the patience necessary for a scholar. He had intuition but not the essential knowledge. . . . At one time intuition was sufficient for scholars. A century ago knowledge was very limited, but in our times one must be a philologist as well; one must have a sense of economics, of archaeology, etc.

KRIPKE, in his critique of Schechter's theology, notes that nowhere did Schechter make a complete and finished statement of his philosophy of Judaism. It is therefore difficult, if not impossible, to determine Schechter's stand on many problems of primary importance. One of his favorite words was aspects, and his major synthetic work was called Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology. Aspects is a comfortable word, permitting the writer to dwell upon what is congenial to him and to omit what is not—for example, a coherent discussion of the place of revelation in Jewish theology. The impression Kripke gives is that Schechter did not take the doctrine of revelation literally. Instead of revelation, the ultimate source of authority for Schechter was the conscience of "Catholic Israel," a term he used to indicate the spirit of the Jewish people as a whole. He maintained that Judaism "has distinct precepts and usages and customs, consecrated by the consent of Catholic Israel through thousands of years." The will of Catholic Israel is the final authority. Kripke argues that Schechter's acceptance of Judaism as a revealed religion is inconsistent with his acceptance of Catholic Israel as the criterion of authenticity of a belief or practice; for if a matter is divinely revealed, it is clearly unchangeable for all time. It cannot be changed, even with the consent of the entire people; after all, the worship of the golden calf was the result of the common consent of the people. Moreover, it is exceedingly difficult to see how any change may take place if Catholic Israel is the authority. No one can be the first to change anything since the weight of Catholic Israel is against the individual. With the best will in the world one cannot probe too deeply what Schechter means by viewing Judaism as a living organism developing from age to age.

JACOB HABERMAN

Schoenberg, Arnold 1874–1951

Austrian-born American composer

Cooper-White, Pamela, Schoenberg and the God-Idea: The Opera Moses und Aron (Studies in Musicology, no. 83), Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research, 1985

- MacDonald, Malcolm, Schoenberg (Master Musicians Series), London: Dent, 1976
- Ringer, Alexander, Arnold Schoenberg: The Composer as Jew, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1990
- Smith, Joan Allen, Schoenberg and His Circle: A Viennese Portrait, New York: Schirmer, and London: Collier Macmillan, 1986
- Sterne, Colin C., Arnold Schoenberg: The Composer as Numerologist, Lewiston, New York: Mellen, 1993
- Stuckenschmidt, H.H., Arnold Schoenberg, Zurich: Atlantis, 1957; London: Calder, 1959; New York: Grove, 1960
- Stuckenschmidt, H.H., Schoenberg: His Life, World, and Work, New York: Schirmer, 1974; London: Calder, 1977

Most of the literature on Arnold Schoenberg focuses more on his music and his 12-tone system than on the man himself. The books surveyed here, however, deal primarily with Schoenberg the man, even though they have much to say about his music theories as well. The latest research on all aspects of Schoenberg's life and work can be monitored by consulting the Arnold Schoenberg Institute Journal, published by the University of Southern California. Few of the books listed here are straight biographies; most of them approach Schoenberg from a particular angle. Of the chronological biographies, MacDONALD's is straightforward and easy to read. It distances itself from most of the more personal aspects of Schoenberg's life and instead focuses on the development of his musical style, the public reception of his work, and some explanation of his musical theories.

STUCKENSCHMIDT (1957) is similar to MacDonald. It offers interpretations of Schoenberg's major works and analyzes his compositions. It also discusses his life as a young musician and some of his early influences. However, for a truly comprehensive Schoenberg biography, readers must turn to STUCKENSCHMIDT (1974). Stuckenschmidt opens this volume with an apologetic note about how much material was absent from the first biography. That problem does not plague him again, though; this biography includes absolutely every detail of Schoenberg's life, from his deepest thoughts to the dates of every performance and composition to word-for-word documentation of important conversations. The scope of the work is remarkable.

Although Stuckenschmidt's treatment is comprehensive and exemplary, several other books develop certain specific areas of Schoenberg's life. Schoenberg's later influences are interestingly documented by SMITH, who explores the cultural environment in which he lived and the people with whom he kept company. She also includes information on Schoenberg as a teacher and performer. Smith's book has some transcriptions of conversations between Schoenberg and his contemporaries and a very thorough appendix with brief biographies of the central figures in Schoenberg's life.

Of the books with particular arguments and angles, STERNE's is one of the most interesting. With a forward by composer John Cage, the book asserts that Schoenberg composed his music based on numerology. Schoenberg was concerned with numbers from early childhood, and Sterne includes many charts plotting the way Schoenberg put music together. Sterne proves his point with examples from a variety of compositions and shows Schoenberg's pervasive interest in numerology through the numerological games he played with names and dates as well as with music. Although at times the charts and numbers in this book are overwhelming and somewhat cryptic, they do provide new insights into the workings of Schoenberg's mind. Studied in conjunction with Ringer's or Cooper-White's book about Schoenberg as a Jew, this book is liable to prompt questions about the extent to which this preoccupation with numerology derives from or parallels Jewish mysticism.

Two studies address Schoenberg as Jew directly. RINGER views Schoenberg as a highly influential figure not only in the music of the 20th century but more generally in its aesthetics. His book explores the values of a man who felt himself culturally bound to Germany yet forced out because of his Jewishness. The volume is actually composed of essays written over a period of 15 years and therefore shows a developing conception of Schoenberg as Jew. Some of the essays consider his interactions with other Jewish composers, while others deal with his place in the history of Nazi Germany and his struggle to escape persecution. Two particularly notable segments are the chapter that examines Schoenberg's relationship with Rabbi Stephen Wise and the essay about the idea of "Jewish music," both of which raise interesting philosophical points. Ringer also includes several fascinating appendixes, including Schoenberg's own "Four Point Program for Jewry," which sheds much light on Schoenberg's sense of a Jewish identity.

COOPER-WHITE approaches Schoenberg's Judaism by analyzing the composition most obviously influenced by the Bible. In addition to documenting the creation of the opera, its musical composition, and how Schoenberg came up with the idea, Cooper-White also explores the environment in which a biblical opera could be written and the significance of its being composed by a Jew. She includes sections on Schoenberg's religious growth, possible kabbalistic influences on his work, and his relationship with Judaism in light of the rise of Nazism. Separate sections also focus on the libretto, the music, and the leitmotiv. Overall, this is a remarkable and detailed study of one work from a variety of angles.

GILLIAN D. STEINBERG

Scholem, Gershom 1897–1982

German-born Israeli pioneer of the academic study of Kabbalah

Biale, David, Gershom Scholem: Kabbalah and Counter History, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and London: Harvard University Press, 1987

Bloom, Harold (editor), Gershom Scholem, New York: Chelsea House, 1987

Dan, Joseph, Gershom Scholem and the Mystical Dimension of Jewish History, New York: New York University Press, 1987

Mendes-Flohr, Paul (editor), Gershom Scholem: The Man and His Work, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994

Schweid, Eliezer, Mysticism and Judaism According to Gershom G. Scholem, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1983; as Judaism and Mysticism According to Gershom Scholem, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1985

Gershom Scholem is generally regarded as the founder of the modern academic study of Jewish mysticism. His research touches upon all areas of Jewish mysticism and is rooted in detailed philological analysis of the enormous array of manuscripts and texts related to the field. His work has made a lasting impression not only within the field of Jewish mysticism but also in other areas of research in Judaic studies, including history, philosophy, and literature.

BIALE analyzes the assumptions and influences that lie behind Scholem's historiography and his conception of Judaism. The author points out that Scholem was a Zionist who immigrated to Palestine as early as 1923 and who rejected, both politically and culturally, the German Jewish world that created the Wissenschaft des Judentums. Biale also explains that when Scholem returned to an identification with Judaism he did not adopt a traditional framework; instead he was inspired to create his own response to the rationalist theology that dominated German Jewish thought of the 19th century. Many scholars from the Wissenschaft school saw mysticism as an impediment to the progress of Jewish history. They regarded mysticism, with its nonrational way of thinking and its mythical symbolism, as a corruption of proper religious experience, which was best exemplified in Judaism by the Aristotelian philosophy of the Middle Ages. Rejecting this position, Scholem designated the esoteric mystical dimension of Judaism as the key to its future. Scholem took up the task of writing a "counter history" of Judaism as a protest against both the Orthodox and Enlightenment traditions, and Biale compares Scholem's work to the similar projects of Martin Buber and Micha Josef Berdyczewski. The author posits that, unlike Buber and Berdyczewski, who were heavily influenced by Nietzsche, Scholem advocated a return to the sources of Jewish mysticism in an effort to set a course for a future Judaism based on the spirit of the Jewish mystical past.

SCHWEID evaluates Scholem's views on mysticism and Jewish history. Critically examining the larger picture of Judaism and Jewish history that emerges from Scholem's works, Schweid argues that Scholem's analysis of Judaism is guided by his preference for the mystical and gnostic elements of the Jewish tradition and his rejection of both halakhic Judaism and liberalism. In his theoretical discussions of the history of religious evolution, Scholem designates mysticism as the third and final stage in the progression of the religious consciousness within a given religious tradition. Schweid contends that by privileging the mystical dimension of religion, Scholem sets out to marginalize other forms of religious experience, such as legal praxis, that have played a crucial role within Judaism. In chapter seven, the author further criticizes Scholem's sympathetic treatment of Shabbetai Tsevi, which depicts his failed messianic movement in the 17th century as a significant development of the mainstream of Jewish mystical consciousness. Schweid argues that the Sabbatian heresy was a dangerous perversion of Jewish thinking and cannot be placed within the history of legitimate Jewish religious experience.

DAN stresses that the main thrust of Scholem's work as the scholar himself envisioned it was to clarify the history of Jewish mysticism. Dan summarizes Scholem's elaborate presentation of this history from the origins of Jewish mysticism in the Hekhalot and Merkabah literature through the development of kabbalistic schools in Safed in the 15th and 16th centuries and on to the Sabbatian and hasidic movements of early modernity.

BLOOM's volume brings together an eclectic assortment of studies dedicated to the analysis of not only Scholem's scholarly work but his personality and religious thought as well. Scholem's views on Sabbatianism and Hasidism and his reconstruction of the early stages of the Kabbalah are discussed. Additional essays reflect on Scholem's views on Judaism, Gnosticism, history, language, Zionism, and theology. Also included in this volume are discussions of Scholem's lasting influence on the academic study of Judaism.

MENDES-FLOHR's book is a collection of eight essays that touch upon various themes in Scholem's life, thought, and scholarship. Mendes-Flohr assesses Scholem's spiritual and philosophical orientation toward Judaism and religion. E.E. Urbach analyzes Scholem's understanding of Jewish studies and its role in history. I. Tishby discusses Scholem's contribution to the study of the Zohar. J. Dan describes Scholem's understanding of Hasidism and argues that it reflects the scholar's own idealism. N. Rotenstreich addresses Scholem's conception of Jewish nationalism. Finally, M. Beit-Arié describes Scholem's love of bibliographic research.

HARTLEY LACHTER

Science and Religion

Carmell, Aryeh and Cyril Domb, Challenge: Torah Views on Science and Its Problems, London: Association of Orthodox Jewish Scientists, and New York: Feldheim, 1976; new edition, New York: Feldheim, 1988

Feldman, W.M., Rabbinical Mathematics and Astronomy, London: Cailingold, 1931; New York: Hermon, 1965, 4th edition, 1991

Ruderman, David B., Jewish Thought and Scientific Discovery in Early Modern Europe, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1995

Samuelson, Norbert M., Judaism and the Doctrine of Creation, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994

Schroeder, Gerald L., Genesis and the Big Bang: The Discovery of Harmony between Modern Science and the Bible, New York: Bantam, 1990

The Bible is in no way a textbook of science, but many of its chapters demonstrate a sophisticated knowledge of the environment: for instance, Leviticus 18 presupposes a careful classification of living creatures; Job 28 reveals a knowledge of mining; and Isaiah 41 hints at ancient Israelite agriculture and arboriculture. Several rabbis of the Talmud are said to have excelled in science or medicine, and the Jews of the Middle Ages played a significant role in mediating the scientific knowledge of the Muslim world to the West, thus stimulating the Renaissance. Yet the rise of science in early modern times shattered the assumption that all knowledge, including scientific knowledge, was to be found in revealed texts. The new knowledge did not appear to be in Scripture; similarly, information previously gleaned from Scripture did not seem to accord with the findings of the scientists. The radical transformation of science in the 20th century, particularly through relativity and quantum mechanics, has encouraged some authors to seek a new conformity between religion and science, but this endeavor may well prove illusory.

CARMELL and DOMB are respectively an Orthodox realtor and rabbi and an Orthodox physicist; both are pioneers in the Association of Orthodox Scientists. In this collection of essays, they assert that religious truth is in conformity with contemporary science; thus, the authors self-consciously follow in the footsteps of German Orthodoxy, whose symbiosis of Torah and culture ("Torah im derekh erets") was exemplified in the Bund jüdischer Akademiker (Association of Jewish Academics) of the pre-Nazi era. The first section of the book, "Areas of Interaction," is devoted to the broad relationship between religion and science. Part two focuses on creation and evolution, and it opens with a fascinating selection of traditional sources (from the early rabbinic onward) that appear to interpret the Genesis stories of creation along evolutionary, or at least developmental, lines. The section concludes with a summary of opinions on evolution voiced at sessions of a panel convened by the Association of Orthodox Scientists in 1971 and 1972 to respond to students' questions. Part three, "The Secular Bias," attempts both to discredit historical criticism of the Bible and to establish the rationality of belief in God. Several contributors argue that sciences such as quantum mechanics lend themselves to interpretations of nature that are congruent with a belief in the divine. Part four, "Ethical Problems," is concerned with practical matters such as the ethics of population control, medical experimentation on humans, and organ transplants. Carmell's own final essay, "Judaism and the Quality of the Environment," is notable as one of the earliest attempts by a modern writer to articulate a distinctly Jewish religious viewpoint on human responsibility for the environment.

FELDMAN's volume owes much to the research of a previous generation of German scholars, such as Mahler and Baneth. It is perhaps the first work of significance in this field to be published in English, and it deservedly has been reissued, but unfortunately not revised, in recent years. Feldman, who was senior physician at a London hospital, focuses on mathematical and astronomical passages in the Talmud and later rabbinic literature, relating these texts both to the Ptolemaic astronomy of the rabbinic period and to the more modern astronomy of Johannes Kepler and Sir Isaac Newton. Much of the book is devoted to expounding Jewish calendrical calculations, which depend on a complex relationship between the apparent motions of the sun and the moon; Feldman gives one of the few clear accounts available in English of Maimonides' perplexing treatise on the subject.

RUDERMAN's volume is much more than the historical investigation of a previously neglected topic. By analyzing the way that Jews responded to, or even participated in, the European scientific revolution of the 17th century, he is able to articulate the problems and dilemmas that challenged the worldview shared by Jews and Christians in the Middle Ages and ultimately shaped modernity. How, for instance, did Jews react to Copernicus's refutation of Ptolemy's geocentric universe? Did the Jewish establishment, like the Catholic hierarchy, censure those who upheld the new theories? The range of attitudes is encapsulated in the debates of 17th-century Italian Jews. Leone Modena, for instance, is portrayed as "an intellectual fully committed to integrating rabbinic culture with the secular world and to explaining it . . . in terms comprehensible to human reason and experience." Like his contemporary Joseph Delmedigo, Modena was ready to welcome the new scientific achievements. On the other hand, men such as Moses Hayyim Luzzatto and Moses Zacuto emphasized the study of Kabbalah, and while they were not necessarily hostile to the scientific study of nature, they rejected the historical critique of traditional rabbinic and kabbalistic sources. Ruderman's fascinating book contains an essay on the 16th-century community of converso physicians, including the noted physiologist Zacutus Lusitanus, and a chapter on "science and skepticism" in the work of Simone Luzzatto. The concluding bibliographical essay on the study of nature in ancient Judaism is particularly helpful.

SAMUELSON argues that there is congruence, or at least compatibility, between modern cosmology and biblical and later Jewish accounts of creation. He contends that the "creation myth" of Genesis has frequently been interpreted in traditional Jewish philosophy in terms deriving from Plato's Timaeus, the best and most influential premodern creation story. Now, however, it is the task of theologians to interpret Genesis in terms of the story told by contemporary science, and the "myth" offered by science expresses the Genesis concept even better than Plato's myth did. Samuelson devotes the opening chapter of his book to an exposition of the doctrine of creation in Franz Rosenzweig's Star of Redemption. Samuelson himself reads Genesis as "a narrative of creation . . . divided into seven atemporal units"; in other words, a single act of God, performed upon a single, undifferentiated space, is separated into distinct domains. Furthermore, the universe exists not for the sake of its creatures, but for the service of God, while creation and revelation point forward to redemption in an "asymptotic" process—that is, a process that has direction but no beginning or end. Four aspects of the Jewish concept of creation interface with contemporary scientific cosmology: the nature and origin of the universe in relation to time; the role of space in the story of creation; the relation of the actual physical universe to other possible universes; and the relationship between the domains of science and ethics from a religious perspective. Samuelson articulates this interface by reference to theories of parallel universes, inflationary universes, quantum mechanics, and the reversibility of time. The book opens avenues for exploration, and it provides a useful introduction to some of the classical Jewish sources on creation, particularly Gersonides, as well as to Plato's Timaeus and Rosenzweig's Star of Redemption.

SCHROEDER, a nuclear physicist and oceanographer and an aspiring theologian who resides in Jerusalem, wrote this book in response to probing questions from his children. The question that apparently worried him most was how to reconcile the opening pages of Genesis that describe the creation of the earth in six days less than 6,000 years ago with the scientific theories that the universe is roughly 15 billion years old; the earth is five billion years old; and hominid history stretches back a few million years. He argues that the billions of years that have followed the Big Bang, according to cosmologists, and the events of the first six days of Genesis are "identical realities that have been described in vastly different terms." The key lies in the relativity of time: six days as seen by God, who was the only observer of pre-Adam creation, are equivalent to five billion years viewed from a human perspective. This thesis might seem naïve if Schroeder did not cloak it in learned quotations from Maimonides and the Talmud and in a great deal of superfluous physics liable to impress the non-scientist. The book will not satisfy the serious theologian, but it is well worth reading as an example of a current trend in Jewish fundamentalist writing.

NORMAN SOLOMON

Scribes

- McCarthy, Carmel, The Tikkunei Soferim and Other Theological Corrections in the Masoretic Text of the Old Testament (Orbis Biblicus et Orientalis, 36), Freiburg: Universitätsverlag, 1981
- Mulder, Martin Jan, Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading, and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity (Compendia rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum, section 2, vol. 1), Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1988
- Tov, Emanuel, Bikoret Nusah ha-Mikra: Pirke Mavo, 1989; translated as Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1992
- Weingreen, Jacob, Introduction to the Critical Study of the Text of the Hebrew Bible, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1982
- Würthwein, Ernst, The Text of the Old Testament: An Introduction to the Biblia Hebraica, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979; London: SCM, 1980; 2nd edition, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1995
- Yeivin, Israel, Mavo la-Masorah ha-Tavranit, 1971; translated as Introduction to the Tiberian Masorah (Masoretic Studies, no. 5), Missoula, Montana: Scholars Press, 1980

The scribes (Hebrew: soferim) referred to in this essay are the disciples, and their successors, of the biblical scribe Ezra, who were active in the periods of the Second Temple and the Talmud. In the Babylonian Talmud (Kiddushin 30a), it is written that "the early scholars were called 'Soferim' because they used to count all the words of the Torah" (the statement is a play on the two meanings of the Hebrew root spr, "to count" and "to copy"). As McCarthy has noted, later scholars have sought to discover the exact role of these scribes in the transmission of the Hebrew Bible. Talmudic and medieval texts allude to or imply earlier versions of certain scriptural passages, and scholars seek to determine what the scribes may have added to or subtracted from these previous versions; to establish when the scribes intervened; and to understand their motives.

McCARTHY discusses in great detail the Tikkunei Soferim, an authoritative listing of 18 scribal emendations to the biblical text, summarizes the history of their study, and provides abundant references to earlier literature on the topic and on related subjects, such as the use of euphemism in the Hebrew Bible and the nature of the amended texts in the older versions, such as the Greek Septuagint. This work, originally published as a dissertation, pays full attention to technical, textual details, but it does not really provide the historical framework needed by novices in the subject.

WEINGREEN, by contrast, does address the general reader, as he aims "to present an acceptable scheme and a practical apparatus for the critical study of the text of the Hebrew Bible." He claims that the "miscopying" of the biblical text should ultimately be "attributed to human fallibility and misunderstanding." His work's main merit is that it puts the conscious and unconscious interventions of the scribes in their proper historical perspective. The book also presents a fair judgment of the activities of the scribes, based on modern conceptions of textual criticism, concluding that "axioms recorded in the Talmud relating to the serious study of the Hebrew Bible represent a sensible approach, expressing basic postulates which are highly acceptable to the textual critic today."

YEIVIN's classic on the Tiberian Masorah, "the collected body of instructions used to preserve the traditional layout and text of the Bible unchanged," deserves special mention here, even though it centers on the Masoretes (the natural successors of the scribes), rather than the scribes themselves. Especially in part two of the work, titled simply "The Masorah," the reader will find numerous direct and indirect references to the work of the scribes, which illustrate the meticulous care with which the scribes performed their duty.

In addition to Yeivin, two other introductions to the Masoretic Text of the Hebrew Bible also provide information about the work of the scribes. WÜRTHWEIN considers the role of the soferim in his discussion of the canonization of the consonantal text and the conscious interventions in passages in the original text that were motivated by those passages' supposedly problematic content. He also explains in some detail the notation of textual changes by the soferim in the critical apparatus of the Masoretic Bible.

TOV's work is an impressive and comprehensive study covering the state of research in textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible. Especially in chapter one and in his discussion of "Hebrew Witnesses" in chapter two, "Textual Witnesses of the Bible," Tov evaluates the work of the scribes and provides up-to-date bibliographical references.

MULDER's huge volume includes an article by Meir Bar-Ilan titled "Scribes and Books in the Late Second Commonwealth and Rabbinic Period." This essay is the only source discussed here in which the soferim's identities, employers, methods, and social status, as well as the practicalities of their work, are addressed in detail. This encyclopedic volume contains numerous other articles that touch upon the work of the scribes and a wealth of additional bibliographical information; it should be consulted by any serious student of the textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible.

EMILE G.L. SCHRIJVER

See also Masorah; Script and Scribal Practices

Script and Scribal Practices

Beit-Arié, Malachi, Hebrew Codicology: Tentative Typology of Technical Practices Employed in Hebrew Dated Medieval Manuscripts (Etudes de paléographie hébraïque), Paris: Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1976

Beit-Arié, Malachi, Hebrew Manuscripts of East and West: Towards a Comparative Codicology (Panizzi Lectures, 1992), London: British Library, 1993

Beit-Arié, Malachi, The Makings of the Medieval Hebrew Book: Studies in Palaeography and Codicology, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1993

Beit-Arié, Malachi et al., Specimens of Mediaeval Hebrew Scripts, vol. 1: Oriental and Yemenite Scripts, Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 1987

Birnbaum, Solomon, The Hebrew Scripts, 4 vols., London: Palaeographia, 1954–1957

Richler, Binyamin, Hebrew Manuscripts: A Treasured Legacy, Cleveland, Ohio: Ofeq Institute, 1990

Yardeni, Ada, Sefer ha-ketav ha-'Ivri: Toladot, yesodot, signonot, 'itsuv, 1991; translated as The Book of Hebrew Script: History, Palaeography, Script Styles, Calligraphy and Design, Jerusalem: Carta, 1997

RICHLER's publication is an introduction to the study of Hebrew manuscripts intended to serve both scholar and layperson. It provides basic and easily accessible information on practically every aspect of the modern study of the handwritten Hebrew book: the existence of autograph manuscripts of great scholars, ancient Hebrew writings, the Dead Sea Scrolls, colophons, codicology, paleography, scribes, the subject matter of the manuscripts, illuminated manuscripts, manuscript collections, the Cairo Genizah, some famous Hebrew manuscripts, catalogs, the importance of manuscripts, and the future of manuscript research. The work is supplemented by a chapter on the Cairo Genizah by Robert Brody, a glossary, a selected bibliography, and an invaluable selection of sample transcriptions of various Hebrew scripts.

BIRNBAUM's study is considered a classic. It divides the Hebrew scripts into 26 geographically distinguished "types," for which Birnbaum has coined several designations based on Hebrew terms, including: Italkian, from the word Italki (Italian); Temanic, from Temani (Yemenite); and Yevanic, from Yevani (Greek). For the different modes of script he uses the terms "square," "scroll square" (a variant form used for Torah and Esther scrolls), "cursive," and the intermediate "mashait." (Birnbaum resented the common application of the term "rabbinic" to semicursive hands, since "the 'rabbis' had, of course, no closer connection with this style than with square and cursive"). Birnbaum's is the first comprehensive work on the subject, and it is still of great value, partly because it includes postmedieval scripts. His peculiar terminology, however, has never really been accepted, especially because his introductory remarks—in which one might seek a thorough explanation of his method—are rather brief.

YARDENI's work is as comprehensive in its coverage of different historical periods as Birnbaum's study, but her approach is entirely different from his. A renowned expert on Hebrew paleography, especially of the earlier, premedieval periods, Yardeni is also an acclaimed designer of modern typefaces. Her book reflects both her scholarly knowledge and her design expertise as it directs the reader's attention to the various shapes of the individual letters and to the intricacies, both historical and technical, of the letters' development. The work has much to offer both the layperson and the specialist. The uninitiated reader will be especially interested in part one, which discusses historical and palaeographical background, and part four, on calligraphy, script-composition, and the designing of typefaces. The expert will appreciate Yardeni's specialized knowledge of Hebrew paleography, demonstrated in part two, and the treatment of script styles and the script charts in part three. The book offers hundreds of illustrations, many of which Yardeni drew herself. Although the reproductions are relatively poor, especially when compared to the quality of the illustrations in the 1991 Hebrew edition, they are a delight for any lover of the Hebrew script.

The first volume of a new series investigating medieval Hebrew scripts, prepared under the supervision of BEIT-ARIÉ (1987), fills a noticeable gap in the literature on Hebrew scripts. The book contains charts with Hebrew alphabets from the Orient and Yemen meticulously copied from selected dated manuscripts, including a number from the Cairo Genizah. Each alphabet is accompanied by a photograph of a page from the source manuscript. In addition to recording the lettre moyenne of the specific manuscripts, the charts also depict the variant forms of the letters that inevitably occur in a handwritten text. This single volume will primarily interest paleographers and scholars specializing in this region. As the series develops to include additional volumes covering other regions, it should become an indispensable tool for a far larger audience of historians and philologists of the Middle Ages who seek to localize and decipher Hebrew scripts.

In addition to the volume discussed above, Beit-Arié has made a number of other important contributions to the field of Hebrew manuscript research. Among these works, the one that has had the strongest impact on the development of the field is without doubt BEIT-ARIÉ (1976). It is based on limited data retrieved from the Hebrew Palaeography Project (HPP), initiated by Beit-Arié and the French scholar Colette Sirat in 1965 and sponsored by the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities and France's Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique (Institut de Recherche et d'Histoire des Textes). HPP's main goal was, and still is, "to collect all information available on dated Medieval Hebrew Mss., to classify the data and establish standards for dating and locating undated Mss.” Beit-Arié’s volume provides detailed information on writing materials (parchment and paper); the structure of quires; means of preserving the order of quires, sheets, and leaves; ruling and pricking techniques; and devices employed to produce straight left-hand margins. There is a separate chapter on the adoption of local codicological practices by immigrant scribes. Although Beit-Arié has stressed on a number of occasions that the book is out of date, based as it is on only limited data, the volume can still serve as an excellent introduction to the field of medieval Hebrew codicology for the novice, and it is an indispensable handbook for the specialist.

BEIT-ARIÉ (1993b) collects numerous important articles by the author on Hebrew manuscripts of the Middle Ages. The volume, which also contains addenda and corrigenda to the articles, is subdivided into four sections: part one discusses methodology, offering information about identifying and cataloging manuscripts that will greatly interest specialists in the field. The second section, titled “Medieval Scribes: Personal Manifestations and Common Practices,” contains a detailed study of the itinerant 15th-century scribe Joel ben Simeon Fayvesh Ashkenazi and a very illuminating essay titled “Stereotype and Individuality in the Handwriting of Medieval Scribes.” In this article, Beit-Arié points out that paleographical identification on the sole basis of the shape of the Hebrew letters is seriously hampered by the medieval scribes’ aspiration to copy the hand of their masters (the ideal of stereotype). At the same time, however, other so-called parascriptural elements, such as the shape of the grapheme used for the Divine Name, the ligature of the letters alef and lamed, and the shape of so-called graphic fillers (signs commonly written against the left-hand margin and used to fill the line that would otherwise be left empty) offer ample opportunity to identify scribal individuality. Part three consists of codicological descriptions and paleographic analyses of five important medieval Hebrew manuscripts, most of which have appeared in facsimile reproductions. They are the Damascus Pentateuch, the Valmadonna Pentateuch, the Worms Mahzor, the Rothschild Miscellany, and the Washington Haggadah. The final section, titled “The Beginning of Printing and Scribal Tradition,” contains only one article, which deals with the relationship between early Hebrew printing and handwritten books, an area of incunable research that has moved more to the center of scholarly attention since Beit-Arié first published his findings in the original Hebrew version of this article in 1975. (The English translation in this collection has been revised.)

Beit-Arié’s impressive work in Hebrew manuscript research includes comparative studies that situate those manuscripts in the context of surrounding book cultures. BEIT-ARIÉ (1993a), comprising his Panizzi Lectures at the British Library, is devoted entirely to exploring the significance of such comparisons. The volume’s three chapters deal with “Medieval Hebrew Manuscripts as Cross-Cultural Agents”; “The Art of Writing and the Craft of Bookmaking”; and “Scribal Re-Making: Transmitting and Shaping Texts.” The first two chapters are important updates and re-statements of Beit-Arié’s favorite research themes: the idiosyncrasies of medieval Hebrew manuscripts and their correspondences with other book cultures; the need for a statistical approach when localizing and dating Hebrew manuscripts; and the process of redefining the different types and modes of medieval Hebrew scripts. The third chapter brings to the fore the internal development in Beit-Arié’s oeuvre. It discusses the effect that the dynamics of handwriting had on the transmission of medieval text in general and medieval Hebrew texts in particular. The author posits that “the fundamental difference between Hebrew and Latin, Greek and to some extent Arabic book production” can be traced to “two cardinal factors of medieval Jewish life in the East and West—general literacy and the lack of political organization,” and he discusses the demand for Hebrew manuscripts, the varying degrees of professionalism found among Hebrew scribes, and the process of copying manuscripts, which introduced both intentional and unintentional changes in the texts. He concludes that “What medieval Hebrew copyists did while copying was indeed to deconstruct the text and then reconstruct it.” This third chapter provides a particularly powerful example of Beit-Arié’s work.

EMILE G.L. SCHRIJVER

See also Masorah; Scribes

Secularism

- Birnbaum, Pierre and Ira Katznelson (editors), Paths of Emancipation: Jews, States, and Citizenship, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995
- Cohen, Steven, American Modernity and Jewish Identity, New York: Tavistock, 1983
- Eisen, Arnold, Rethinking Modern Judaism: Ritual, Commandment, Community (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism), Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998
- Endelman, Todd, Radical Assimilation in English Jewish History, 1656–1945 (Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Goldscheider, Calvin, Jewish Continuity and Change: Emerging Patterns in America (Jewish Political and Social Studies), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986
- Goldstein, Joseph, Jewish History in Modern Times, Brighton, East Sussex: Sussex Academic Press, 1995
- Goodman, Saul (editor), The Faith of Secular Jews (Library of Judaic Learning), New York: Ktav, 1976
- Katz, Jacob, Out of the Ghetto: The Social Background of Jewish Emancipation, 1770–1870, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1973
- Sharot, Stephen, Judaism: A Sociology, Newton Abbot, Devon: David and Charles, and New York: Holmes and Meier, 1976

Secularization refers to the process by which the cultural values of societies become increasingly oriented toward the material while emphasis on the spiritual declines. Secularism is often regarded as a hallmark of modern societies, accompanying the spread of science, the political changes of the French Revolution, and its theoretical precursor, the Enlightenment.

For European Jews, the Haskalah brought in its wake various forms of secularism.

The doyen of late 20th-century Israeli historians, KATZ, has traced the journey of some European Jews from the fringes of European society to its mainstream, describing with insight and detachment the upheaval and disintegration of much of traditional Jewish society and the concurrent transformations in religious belief and practice during the century from 1770 to 1870. Katz documents changes in communities, education, and occupations; traces the decline of traditional religious forms and the birth of Reform Judaism; and examines the reactions of non-Jews to Jewish emancipation.

In a work that is too brief to do full justice to the author's ambitious aims, SHAROT attempts to develop a sociology of modern Judaism. Using a chronological framework, he briefly, but competently, surveys Judaism across a wide range of times and places. He deals with the subjects of secularism and secularization throughout the book, devoting the final chapter in particular to these topics.

In his remarkably lucid exposition of modern Jewish history, GOLDSTEIN identifies five trends and developments—what he terms “historical processes”—that characterized the 19th and 20th centuries: migration, emancipation, cultural revolution, antisemitism, and Zionism and the State of Israel. Goldstein sees the impact of secularism on the Jews as nothing less than a revolution in their culture, the origins of which he traces to the Enlightenment.

ENDELMAN's book on the assimilation of Jews in England represents an important historical case study of Jews in a single nation and their “careers” out of Judaism. Such studies of the experience of individual societies are instructive, for the experience of Jewish life in one society is frequently quite different from that in others. England was a nation in which the forces of secularism were at work from early in the modern period, given great impetus by, for example, Henry VIII's secularization of church lands through the Act of Dissolution of 1536. English Jews were affected by the secularist trajectory of the society around them, and, as Endelman notes, they were the first Jewish community in history whose circumstances dictated that its identity was established on a purely voluntary basis.

BIRNBAUM and KATZNELSON's anthology analyzes the distinctive histories of different Jewish societies. The wide-ranging collection of studies examines the experience of Jewish emancipation in Europe (including Russia and Turkey) and the United States. The primary focus is on the impact of liberal, republican, and Enlightenment ideas on the development of nation-states and notions of citizenship, and the consequences of these innovations for the Jews in each nation. The essays demonstrate that Jewish experiences not only varied from nation to nation, they also varied among different communities and classes within individual nations.

Both Cohen and Goldscheider base their studies of contemporary U.S. Jewry on the important statistical studies of Boston Jews undertaken by the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston in 1975. COHEN's brief study tackles the evolving sense of identity of late 20th-century U.S. Jews, most of whom were several generations removed from direct contact with the immigrant experience and integrated thoroughly into mainstream U.S. society. GOLDSCHIEDER, an expert demographer, meticulously details the socioeconomic profile of contemporary U.S. Jews. As economic and social status increased, traditional religious observance declined, and expressions of religion became more secular, but both studies contend that the United States' complex and often unconventional Jewish population has a secularized but still strong sense of Jewish identity.

GOODMAN's collection of essays on the paradoxical topic of the faith of secular Jews is diverse and challenging. The anthology is framed by the question, what does it mean to be both a Jew, maintaining a distinctive and separate identity, and a member of secular society, accepting claims of universal rationality and the uniform character of human nature? In the 19 selections, which date from the late 19th and 20th centuries, the secular Jew appears as a product of the modern world, whose identity is thoroughly at odds with the Jewish tradition of the premodern world. Many strands of Jewish thought and secularist impulse are represented in these writings, and as a result, no singular, definitive vision of the interplay between secularization and Judaism emerges.

EISEN's analysis of contemporary Judaism and his critical review of important modern and postmodern thought are impressive. The study is an erudite and objective anthropological account of Judaism, exploring patterns of religious observance and secularization with greater depth than most studies of its type.

ROBERT ASH

Semikhah see Sanhedrin, Semikhah, and Rabbinate

Sephardim

- Angel, Marc D., Voices in Exile: A Study in Sephardic Intellectual History (Library of Sephardic History and Thought), Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1991
- Ashtor, Eliyahu, Korot ha-Yehudim bi-Sefarad ha-Muslemit, 1960; as The Jews of Moslem Spain, 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973
- Baer, Yitzhak, Toldot ha-Yehudim bi-Sefarad ha-Notsrit, 1959; as A History of the Jews in Christian Spain, 2 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1961
- Brann, Ross, The Compunctious Poet: Cultural Ambiguity and Hebrew Poetry in Muslim Spain (Johns Hopkins Jewish Studies), Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1991
- Dobrinsky, Herbert C., A Treasury of Sephardic Laws and Customs: The Ritual Practices of Syrian, Moroccan, Judeo-Spanish and Spanish and Portuguese Jews of North America, New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1986, revised edition, 1988
- Elazar, Daniel J., The Other Jews: The Sephardim Today, New York: Basic Books, 1989

- Gerber, Jane, The Jews of Spain: A History of the Sephardic Experience, New York: Free Press, 1992
- Goodblatt, Morris, Jewish Life in Turkey in the Sixteenth Century, as Reflected in the Legal Writings of Samuel de Medina, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1952
- Kaplan, Yosef, Mi-Natsrut le-yahadut: hayav u-pe'ulav shel ha-anus Yitshak Orobiyo de Castro, 1982; as From Christianity to Judaism: The Story of Isaac Orobio de Castro (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989
- Netanyahu, B., The Marranos of Spain: From the Late 14th to the Early 16th Century, According to Contemporary Hebrew Sources, New York: American Academy for Jewish Research, 1966; 3rd edition: Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1999
- Samuel ha-Nagid, Jewish Prince in Moslem Spain: Selected Poems of Samuel Ibn Nagrela (Judaic Studies, 3), translated by Leon Weinberger, University: University of Alabama Press, 1973
- Scheindlin, Raymond, Wine, Women, and Death: Medieval Hebrew Poems on the Good Life, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1986
- Scheindlin, Raymond, The Gazelle: Medieval Hebrew Poems on God, Israel, and the Soul, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1991
- Yerushalmi, Yosef, From Spanish Court to Italian Ghetto: Isaac Cardoso, a Study in Seventeenth-Century Marranism and Jewish Apologetics (Columbia University Studies in Jewish History, Culture, and Institutions), New York: Columbia University Press, 1971
- Zimmels, H.J., Ashkenazim and Sephardim: Their Relations, Differences, and Problems as Reflected in Rabbinical Responsa (Jews' College Publications, new series, no. 2), London: Oxford University Press, 1958; revised edition, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1996

Sephardim (from Sepharad, the biblical place-name that came to be associated with Spain in the Middle Ages) form one of the two major divisions of the Jewish people. Spanish Jews liked to view themselves as descendants of the Jerusalem elite of priests and aristocrats exiled by King Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C.E. During their long residence in Iberia, the Jews experienced periods of intense persecution as well as eras of creativity and tranquility. Living primarily under Islamic rule from 711 to 1147, Iberian Jews explored new areas of knowledge in science, philosophy, and above all, Hebrew poetry and linguistics. Drawing inspiration from Muslim poets and courtiers, Jews forged a sophisticated and urbane civilization in the Umayyad court of Cordoba (especially in the tenth-century reign of Abd-el-Rahman III) and the subsequent petty Berber kingdoms. Sephardi identity is intimately connected with this period of cultural efflorescence. By the mid-13th century, the majority of the Sephardim lived under Christian rule, where they suffered a steady decline, ultimately ending in forced conversion and expulsion.

GERBER provides a handy single-volume synthesis of the Sephardi experience from antiquity to the present time. Her textbook chronicles the life of Sephardi Jewry and the development of Sephardi civilization prior to 1492 and in the post-1492 Sephardi dispersion. It also analyzes the intimate connections between Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jews.

The classic study of Islamic Spain is the three-volume work by ASHTOR, whose extensive use of Arabic documents enlivens his occasionally fanciful account. His book ends with the Christian reconquest of Toledo in 1085, although Jewish life in Islamic Spain continued to flourish under the stability maintained by the Almoravides until the middle of the 12th century. The 1992 reprint of Ashtor's dated but still essential work features a critical introduction by David Wasserstein.

Islamic Spain is best remembered in Jewish history for the remarkable Hebrew secular and religious poetry that it fostered. The best anthology of texts and translations from the secular repertoire of the Sephardim is SCHEINDLIN (1986), while the liturgical poetry produced during the Golden Age is treated in SCHEINDLIN (1991). The judiciously selected and elegantly translated poems in these two volumes are supplemented with helpful commentaries that offer the reader a window into the cultural world of the Andalusian courtier class.

A critical analysis of some of the tensions that the courtier class of Jewish poets and leaders experienced is provided by BRANN. He examines the ambivalent attitudes of Spanish Jewish poets toward their secular poetry, interpreting the common typology of "the compunctious poet" as "an emblem of the conflicts inherent in Andalusian Jewish culture and society."

SAMUEL HA-NAGID is an English translation of a wide range of the poetry written by the courtier-poet-statesman Samuel ibn Nagrela. In an introductory chapter, the translator, Leon Weinberger, describes the Andalusian world of ibn Nagrela for the reader, paying special attention to developments in Hebrew poetry that were a product of that culture.

The Christian reconquest of Spain began with the capture of Toledo in 1085 and concluded with the fall of Granada in 1492. During the centuries of reconquest, Jews experienced major changes, and BAER is unrivalled as the classic survey of evolving Jewish life in Christian Spain.

By the 13th century, developments in the Catholic Church, especially the growing influence of the mendicant orders, began to have a deleterious effect upon the well-being of Iberian Jews. After the disputation of Barcelona in 1263, Christian missions among the Jews led to a steady erosion of Jewish self-confidence. The crises of the 14th century, particularly the devastation wrought by the Black Death and the perception that the Jews had caused the plague by poisoning wells, led to a drastic decline in the status of Spanish Jews. That decline accelerated in the aftermath of the great pogroms of 1391. In the course of the year-long violence, Jews were offered the choice of conversion or death. Many chose conversion, and one of the most controversial issues in Sephardi historiography is the question of the residual Jewish identity of the forced converts, known as conversos. The classic study of the conversos is NETANYAHU. Netanyahu makes a powerful case that crypto-Judaism had actually died out among the conversos within a single generation. Subsequent charges of Judaizing behavior, Netanyahu argues, were fabricated in order to destroy the converso class in Spanish society.

The “problem” of the conversos and their alleged Judaizing activities ultimately led to the establishment of a national Inquisition in 15th-century Spain and the cataclysmic expulsion of the Jews in 1492. Following their departure, Sephardi refugees scattered throughout the Mediterranean and the New World, flocking to the expanding Ottoman Empire by the thousands. Smaller numbers of refugees found asylum in North Africa and Italy, establishing Sephardi communities among the indigenous Jewish populations. The 16th century witnessed a renaissance of Jewish life in many of the centers of Islamic civilization in North Africa and the Near East. Everywhere that the Sephardim settled, they introduced a great deal of ferment. Their distinctive customs and great pride were frequent sources of dissension.

In the 16th and 17th centuries, many New Christians sought to return to Judaism after the trauma of conversion in Spain and Portugal. The fascinating life of one such seeker, Isaac Cardoso, is reconstructed in YERUSHALMI. By tracing Cardoso’s career and transformation of consciousness, Yerushalmi makes an eloquent attempt to refute the contention of Netanyahu that the conversos of Spain were thoroughly Christian by the middle of the 15th century.

GOODBLATT is a good introduction to Sephardi life in 16th-century Turkey. His account, which is based on the legal writings of the Salonican rabbi Samuel de Medina (1506–1589) and two of his colleagues, is a fine example of the effective use to which responsa literature can be put in writing social and economic history. From this material, Goodblatt successfully teases out information on the economic, political, and religious life of Turkish Jewry. As an appendix the author offers translations of 18 illustrative responsa.

For discussions of the Sephardi diaspora in the Netherlands and the intellectual climate among the Portuguese Jews in 17th-century Amsterdam, see KAPLAN. His book focuses on the life of a Portuguese converso who, in 1662, in the middle of his career as a physician, came to Amsterdam and returned to Judaism. Isaac Orobio de Castro’s dramatic change of identity was part of a general trend throughout the 17th century that witnessed the migration of Spanish and Portuguese New Christians to the religiously tolerant atmosphere of the Netherlands. Kaplan examines the forces that motivated Orobio and others like him to make the move back to Judaism and evaluates the unique sense of Jewish heritage that was forged by these Jews in the process of reconciling their dual identities.

ANGEL offers a general introduction to the neglected field of the intellectual history of the Sephardi diaspora. In a series of studies, the author surveys various aspects of the creativity of Sephardim since the expulsion of 1492. Among the themes he examines are the spiritual and theological reactions of Sephardim to the expulsion, the decline of rationalism and the rise of mysticism, and various attempts by Sephardi leaders to accommodate to modernity.

An overview of contemporary Sephardi communities and a personal analysis of differences between Ashkenazim and Sephardim can be found in ELAZAR.

ZIMMELS’s erudite and elegant study illuminates numerous major and minor differences between Ashkenazi and Sephardi practice. The author begins by identifying seven historical periods in the relationship between the legal traditions of Ashkenazim and Sephardim, distinguishing these periods according to the direction of influence from one group to the other. The second part of the book examines specific areas in which Ashkenazi and Sephardi practice diverge, while the third part offers translations of six rabbinic responsa that directly address matters related to these differences.

DOBRINKSY presents a manual on the differences in ritual practice among various Sephardi traditions, represented by the Moroccan, Syrian, Judeo-Spanish (i.e., Balkan), and Spanish and Portuguese Jewish communities in contemporary North America. He examines the customs of these four communities in three spheres: matters concerning life-cycle events and family life, daily worship, and sabbath and holiday observance.

JANE GERBER
AND ARNOLD FRANKLIN

Sex

- Biale, David, Eros and the Jews: From Biblical Israel to Contemporary America, New York: Basic Books, 1992; Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997
- Boyarin, Daniel, Carnal Israel: Reading Sex in Talmudic Culture (The New Historicism, 25), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993
- Brenner, Athalya, The Intercourse of Knowledge: On Gendering Desire and “Sexuality” in the Hebrew Bible (Biblical Interpretation Series, vol. 26), New York: Brill, 1997
- Cohen, Jeremy, “Be Fertile and Increase, Fill the Earth and Master It”: The Ancient and Medieval Career of a Biblical Text, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1989
- Eilberg-Schwartz, Howard (editor), People of the Body: Jews and Judaism from an Embodied Perspective, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992
- Epstein, Louis M., Sex Laws and Customs in Judaism, New York: Bloch, 1948
- Feldman, David M., Birth Control in Jewish Law: Marital Relations, Contraception, and Abortion as Set Forth in the Classic Texts of Jewish Law, New York: New York University Press, 1968; as Marital Relations, Birth Control, and Abortion in Jewish Law, New York: Schocken, 1974
- Satlow, Michael L., Tasting the Dish: Rabbinic Rhetorics of Sexuality, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1995

The concept of sexuality emerged in Europe around the beginning of the 20th century as a means of identification as well as an object of intense discussion and scrutiny. In this era, some sexual behaviors—and the individuals who practiced them—were deemed “deficient” or “unhealthy,” while other behaviors and persons were sanctioned. Many European scholars, including a number of Jews, created the concept of “Jewish sexuality,” which described certain “Jewish” sexual practices that were categorized among the unhealthy types of sexuality. Not surprisingly, many Jewish scholars fought this categorization by producing a voluminous body of apologetic literature, which argues that rabbinic legislation (halakhah) on sexuality actually reflects the high moral character of “Jewish sexuality.”

Most of this apologetic literature is only available in German, but its flavor can be sampled in EPSTEIN. Written for both a scholarly and general audience, this work is among the first texts in English to present a history of rabbinic legislation on sexuality. Epstein’s topics are somewhat eclectic, and his tone can at times be annoyingly apologetic (as it responds to polemics with which most readers will not be familiar), but the book remains useful for its summary of the historical development of many halakhic issues dealing with sexuality.

Although FELDMAN’s history of halakhah similarly has an apologetic tone, his work is more sophisticated than Epstein’s. Feldman emphasizes the development of one particular aspect of rabbinic legislation, that related to birth control and non-procreative sex, but this topic is so broad that he ultimately discusses much of the halakhah on sexuality. The book focuses on finding the “correct” halakhic solutions to problems, rather than explaining the historical reasons why the halakhah developed as it did. The last chapter analyzes some of the issues raised by advances in bioresearch, but treatment of these issues is still rather superficial, even though an appendix has been added to the second edition.

COHEN also engages in a historical survey, but his concern is the history of the exegesis of Genesis 1:28—God’s command to the first humans. Examining interpretations of this text from the ancient and medieval periods, Cohen demonstrates that both Jews and Christians saw in Genesis 1:28 the divine blessing for human procreation. Although these two communities used different idioms to express the nature of that blessing and its relationship to the divine covenant, both faiths were also confronting the human dilemma of standing between the beasts and the angels (to use a rabbinic phrase).

The remaining books employ a different approach than the texts reviewed above. Rather than analyzing halakhah or exegesis from the classical period to the present, they attempt to explain how Jews within particular historical and cultural contexts constructed, or understood, their sexuality. The earliest fruits of this approach are Biale and Eilberg-Schwartz. BIALE presents “snapshots” of Jewish approaches to sexuality from the Bible to Portnoy’s Complaint. He emphasizes the profound ambivalence that many Jewish communities have shown toward sexuality. His chapters on Hasidism and Zionism are particularly enlightening. EILBERG-SCHWARTZ’s superb collection of essays displays a similar range, touching on aspects of Jewish views of the body and sexuality from the Bible to modernity. Gary Anderson’s essay, for example, studies early Jewish answers to the question of whether Adam and Eve had sex in the Garden of Eden, and in the process he explores how their answers relate to much wider theological concerns.

BOYARIN stresses the extent to which classical rabbinic culture insisted on an embodied perspective of human nature that consciously rejected the Hellenistic body/soul dualistic anthropology. Boyarin explores, among other topics, the transmission of sexual knowledge among the rabbis; the “sexualization” of Torah study; and the role of women in rabbinic society. Most chapters provide close extended readings of particular talmudic stories. Like Biale, Boyarin is sensitive to points of disjuncture where the rabbis express ambivalence about sexuality. Boyarin correctly links rabbinic understandings of sexuality to their stances on gender, and he concludes that, as misogynistic as the rabbis sometimes appear to have been, they never elevated misogyny to a core value.

SATLOW also concentrates on the rabbinic period. His book analyzes the rhetoric that the rabbis used to convince people to follow sanctioned sexual mores in such areas as incest, non-procreative sex, homoeroticism, and marriage. He concludes that Palestinian and Babylonian rabbis had radically divergent understandings of sexuality, as each group’s views had more in common with their ambient cultures than with each other.

BRENNER interprets some of the ways in which the Hebrew Bible constitutes gender and sexuality. More precisely, these provocative essays ask how the Hebrew Bible “genders” sexual desire and behaviors. The Hebrew Bible, Brenner argues, does not have a category equivalent to the modern notion of sexuality. “Sexuality in the ancient world is subsumed under other, more important social requirements such as survival, procreation, internal and external boundaries,” writes Brenner, and in these “more important” matters, men are understood as the primary actors and initiators.

Brenner maintains that sexuality is not a discrete cultural construct that can simply be divorced from other societal issues. Jewish understandings of sexuality throughout the ages have been related to material conditions, power, and issues of gender and identity. If one conclusion emerges clearly from all of the works reviewed here, it is that there is not (and never was) a single “Jewish” view of sexuality.

MICHAEL L. SATLOW

Shabbetai Tsevi 1626–1676

Izmir-born messianic pretender and catalyst of the antinomian Sabbatian movement

Carlebach, Elisheva, The Pursuit of Heresy: Rabbi Moses Hagiz and the Sabbatian Controversies, New York: Columbia University Press, 1990

Idel, Moshe, “‘One from a Town, Two from a Clan’: The Diffusion of Lurianic Kabbala and Sabbateanism: A Re-Examination,” Jewish History, 7, 1993

Liebes, Yehuda, Studies in Jewish Myth and Jewish Messianism, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993

Scholem, Gershom Gerhard, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism, New York: Schocken, 1941; 3rd revised edition, 1954

Scholem, Gershom Gerhard, Shabbatai Sevi v'eha-tenu'ah ha-shabbeta'it bi-yemei hayyau, 1957; revised and augmented as Sabbatai Sevi: The Mystical Messiah (Bollingen Series, 93), Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973

Scholem, Gershom Gerhard, The Messianic Idea in Judaism and Other Essays on Jewish Spirituality, New York: Schocken, and London: Allen and Unwin, 1971

Shabbetai Tsevi was the central figure of “Sabbatianism,” the most important messianic movement of the diaspora phase of Jewish history. In 1648 he proclaimed himself Messiah, and he attracted great numbers of followers across Europe, North Africa, and the Middle East before his imprisonment in Istanbul in 1666 and conversion to Islam. The most comprehensive studies on this subject, those of Gerhard Scholem, together describe every aspect of the Sabbatian movement and provide a profound analysis of its ideological and theological background. Other scholars’ works have been more specific, probing particular aspects of this movement.

SCHOLEM (1957) is without doubt the most important and complete work on the subject. He explains, first of all, in great depth, the historical, sociological, and cultural background both of the Sabbatian movement and of the conception of messianism in rabbinic Judaism and Kabbalah. The book examines both the personal history of Shabbetai Tsevi, his sickness and his mystical manifestations, and also the development of the Sabbatian movement and its influence on the Jewish world until the time of Shabbetai’s death. Scholem’s intention was to continue the study of the movement after this point, but he did not succeed. This monumental tome is based on a vast array of documents otherwise unpublished.

SCHOLEM (1941) surveys the different movements in Jewish mysticism in each of the various periods of the past 2,000 years. The first chapter addresses the general characteristics of Jewish mysticism, and it is therefore a good introduction to Sabbatianism. Subsequent chapters, although not describing the movement, also present necessary background to the topic. The seventh chapter, “Sabbatianism and Mystical Heresy,” describes the development of the movement and analyzes Sabbatian ideology and its connections with the Kabbalah.

SCHOLEM (1971) is the perfect introduction to this theme. This book deals with many aspects of the concept of messianism in Judaism, including the conflict between Jewish and Christian messianism, the idea of redemption through sin, and the messianic idea in Kabbalah. A great part of the book is dedicated to the Sabbatian conception of Messiah, before and after Shabbetai’s conversion to Islam, and to the legacy of his life in the various religious trends that perpetuated Sabbatian innovations. Scholem analyzes the development of the idea of messianism in Jewish sources and gives the reader a vivid understanding of this element in Jewish culture.

CARLEBACH studies in particular the development of Sabbatian heresy after Shabbetai’s death. She describes the messianic atmosphere in Jerusalem in the 17th century, which influenced Moses Hagiz, one of the seminal figures in the post-Sabbatian controversies. Shabbetai’s heresies produced a great many ideological rifts among Jewish communities around the world, and this book describes those consequences of the Sabbatian movement in diverse places. It analyzes the many books published in this period in connection with these controversies, as well as the various rabbinical figures who took part in these disputes. It is, thus, in a real sense, a continuation of Scholem’s work.

LIEBES’S book on the development of Jewish myth has two chapters that deal with Sabbatian Kabbalah and its messianic and theoretical foundations. In the first chapter Liebes analyzes the roots of Jewish messianism as well as the mystical conceptions of the main figures of this movement: Shabbetai himself, Nathan of Gaza, and Miguel Cardozo. In the second chapter, Liebes studies various theological issues in Sabbatianism and problems concerning the religious faith of Shabbetai himself, such as his apostasy, which was interpreted as a form of punishment for Israel.

IDEL’S article examines some theses adduced by Scholem relating to the linkage between Sabbatianism and Lurianic Kabbalah. Scholem thought that Lurianic teaching was widely diffused in the generation before the appearance of Shabbetai, and thus its doctrine influenced the Sabbatian movement. Idel examines the spread of Lurianic mysticism in the 17th century and concludes that Scholem overemphasized its role. Therefore, this work is, on one hand, a revision of Scholem’s explication of Shabbetai’s movement, and, on the other hand, an independent study of the history of the influence of the Kabbalah on the Jewish world.

YAAKOV A. LATTES

Shavuot see Festivals and Fasts

Shoah see Holocaust

Sholem Aleichem 1859–1916

Ukrainian-born Russian Yiddish author and humorist

Frieden, Ken, Classic Yiddish Fiction: Abramovitsh, Sholem Aleichem, and Peretz (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish Literature and Culture), Albany, New York: State University of New York Press, 1995

Miron, Dan, “Shalom Aleichem,” in Encyclopaedia Judaica, Jerusalem: Keter, 1971

Miron, Dan, Sholem Aleykhem: Person, Persona, Presence (Uriel Weinreich Memorial Lecture, 1), New York: Yivo Institute for Jewish Research, 1972

Ozick, Cynthia, “Sholem Aleichem’s Revolution,” New Yorker, 64, 28 March 1988

Roskies, David (editor), “Sholem Aleichem: The Critical Tradition,” Prooftexts special issue, 6(3), 1986

Along with Mendele Moykher Sforim and Isaac Leib Peretz, Sholem Aleichem is one of the three so-called “classic” writers of modern Yiddish literature. Sholem Aleichem began his writing career in Hebrew, as did many Eastern European Yiddish writers of the 19th century. Two Stones, his first Yiddish work, was published in 1883 under his given name, Sholem Rabinovitch. Later that year he adopted the salutation “Sholem Aleichem” (“peace upon you”) as a nom de plume, using it for the first time in the feuilleton “The Elections.” Sholem Aleichem went on to write poetry, journalism, novels, plays, short stories, and monologues. It is in these last two genres that the writer exhibited his greatest talents. His major works include Tevey the Dairyman, Menakhem Mendl, Motl the Cantor’s Son, and From the Fair.

Using parody as the starting point for his introduction to modern Yiddish literature, FRIEDEN devotes the largest section of his book to a study of Sholem Aleichem and his place in the modern Yiddish canon. He builds upon the work of previous critics of Yiddish literature, such as Shmuel Niger, Y.Y. Trunk, and Dan Miron, and applies to Yiddish writings the ideas of literary theorists such as M.M. Bakhtin and Wayne Booth. Frieden's solid introduction is strengthened by a thorough bibliography of both primary and secondary sources for Sholem Aleichem in several languages as well as a comprehensive chronology of events in the life of the author. This is a valuable complement to Frieden's insightful readings of the primary sources and of the extensive body of criticism on Sholem Aleichem in English, Hebrew, and Yiddish. Frieden also examines the interesting personal and professional relationships between the three authors of classic Yiddish fiction.

ROSKIES has edited an issue of the journal Prooftexts devoted to the critical tradition on Sholem Aleichem's work. These essays, most of them translated from the Yiddish, were (with the exception of the essay by Michael Stern) originally intended for a book collecting and comparing criticism of Sholem Aleichem written through the course of the 20th century. The issue features such classic studies of Sholem Aleichem as the 1908 article by the Yiddishist critic Bal Makhshoves, regarded as having launched the field of literary criticism of Sholem Aleichem. This volume also includes works by two of the most talented Soviet Yiddish critics of the interwar period, Meyer Viner and Max Erik, as well as a more recent article by Roskies himself, who takes a new and fresh approach to Sholem Aleichem's semi-autobiographical novel From the Fair.

MIRON (1972a) is composed of two sections. The first part of the article, titled "Life and Works," provides a succinct yet comprehensive account of Sholem Aleichem's biography. In the second section, "Development of His Works," Miron divides the author's writing into four chronological periods. During the first period, 1883–1890, Sholem Aleichem began his Yiddish literary career in two main genres, the novel and feuilleton; it was in the latter genre, Miron argues, that the young Sholem Aleichem excelled and created works of significant and lasting influence. In the second period, 1892–1898, Miron writes that Sholem Aleichem "began to consolidate his position as the most important comic author in Jewish literature." This was the period in which the author wrote the first installments of his great works Teveye the Dairyman and Menakhem Mendl. According to Miron, the third period, 1899–1905, brought about the refinement of the central genres in the oeuvre of Sholem Aleichem, the monologues, the "fantastic" tales, the stories for Jewish holidays, the children's stories, and the stories of his archetypal shtetl, Kasrilevke. The fourth and last period, 1906–1916, was spent writing novels, a return to an earlier, neglected genre, as well as the continued development of major works such as Teveye and Menakhem Mendl, and the beginning of new and large projects that would remain unfinished at the time of the author's death, such as Motl the Cantor's Son and the semi-autobiographical From the Fair.

MIRON (1972b) is a pivotal study explaining not only the significance of the author's chosen name but also its effect and influence on popular readings of his work. Miron shows how this was not merely a pen name but rather a presence that transcended historical boundaries and enabled Sholem Rabinovitch to create through his creation, Sholem Aleichem. Miron demonstrates how this invented presence almost swallowed the historical man, so that eventually the author signed his own last will and testament with both his given name and the name by which he had come to be known.

OZICK's well-crafted and jargon-free article shows how Sholem Aleichem almost single-handedly transformed the status of Yiddish from a medieval language, seen as inferior by Jews as much as gentiles, into a modern language capable of sustaining and nurturing a literature comparable to the modern literatures of Europe. The second half of this essay is a glowing review of the first volume to appear in Schocken's Library of Yiddish Classics, an English translation of Sholem Aleichem's Teveye the Dairyman and Railroad Stories. The article also contains Ozick's own interesting and erudite interpretation of these works.

MARC MILLER

Shtetl

- Beller, Ilex, La Vie du Shtetl: La Bourgade juive de Pologne en 80 tableaux, 1986; translated by Alastair Douglas Pannell as Life in the Shtetl: Scenes and Recollections, New York: Holmes and Meier, 1986
- Cohen, Chester G., Shtetl Finder: Jewish Communities in the 19th and 20th Centuries in the Pale of Settlement of Russian and Poland, and in Lithuania, Latvia, Galicia, and Bukovina, and with the Names of Residents, Los Angeles: Periday, 1980
- Hoffman, Eva, Shtetl: The Life and Death of a Small Town and the World of Polish Jews, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1997; London: Secker and Warburg, 1998
- Neugroschel, Joachim (editor and translator), The Shtetl, New York: Marek, 1979
- Pinchuk, Ben-Cion, Shtetl Jews under Soviet Rule: Eastern Poland on the Eve of the Holocaust (Jewish Society and Culture), Oxford and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1991
- Roskies, Diane K. and David G. Roskies, The Shtetl Book, New York: Ktav, 1975, 2nd revised edition, 1979
- Schoenfeld, Joachim, Shtetl Memoirs: Jewish Life in Galicia under the Austro-Hungarian Empire and in the Reborn Poland, 1898–1939, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1985
- Sternberg, Ghitta, Stefanesti: Portrait of a Romanian Shtetl, Oxford and New York: Pergamon, 1984
- Zborowski, Mark and Elizabeth Herzog, Life Is with People: The Culture of the Shtetl, New York: Schocken, 1962

The Yiddish term shtetl (pl. shtetlekh) is a diminutive of the word "Stadt" (German for "city") and describes a small and mainly Jewish town, frequently of less than 10,000 inhabitants. The very mention of the word shtetl evokes deep emotion and memories for those who grew up in such villages.

Each shtetl had its own unique history, culture, values, and traditions, and so commanded considerable loyalty from its inhabitants and former inhabitants. Even language could vary from one shtetl to the next. Shtetlekh were located for the most part in Eastern Europe—Russia, Ukraine, Poland, Slovakia, Romania—and no two were quite alike. Herein lies the difficulty in describing a “typical” shtetl, for no such entity existed. Nevertheless, most shtetlekh did consist of ramshackle houses lined up along very narrow dirt, or sometimes cobbled, streets. There was a central marketplace that was the hub of trade and social activity. A world of its own, the inhabitants were forced to lead lives separate from an outside world that frequently took out its frustrations on the defenseless shtetl dwellers. That outside world was changing and the shtetl was in constant fear of being invaded and destroyed by (among others) those who could not accept people who refused to change with the times. The government became more hostile after the assassination of Czar Alexander II on 7 March 1881. Along with great political unrest came a dramatic increase in pogroms against Jews. The remaining shtetlekh were eradicated under Nazi occupation. Most of the villagers met their end in concentration camps or migrated to distant lands. What remains of the shtetl, then, is a culture that lives in a literature of vivid characters and lively wit. It is the literature of and about the shtetl that nourishes the spirit of Yiddishkeit in a world that has changed drastically since World War II.

BELLER's collection of images reflects the memories of his own shtetl, which he left when he was 14 years old. His paintings serve as a chronicle of life in the Polish community of Grodzisko. With colorful, sometimes dramatic, sometimes peaceful depictions of shtetl life, the artist recreates from memory the sweet and simple everyday activity of a vanished past. This profoundly considered documentation provides a precious glimpse of customs, costumes, and tradition. In the preface, Charles Dobzynski states, “There will always be those who shy away from the simplicity of the pictures, pointing out how naïve and crude they are, but in fact, their most important feature is that they are accurate representations.” Each painting is accompanied by narrative, a caption, or a poem. Beller yearns to capture not only the visual shtetl but the emotional shtetl as well. His paintings represent births, weddings, deaths, holidays, and the demise of shtetl life. Of particular note is the artist's personal essay, “At My Grandfather's Grave-side in Poland,” in which he recounts his first visit to his shtetl in 54 years. The only remaining sign of Jewish life is his grandfather's gravestone, too heavy for the Nazis to remove.

COHEN's compilation provides the names of Jewish communities in Eastern Europe around the year 1900. A map is included, facilitating location of these towns. With more than 2,000 entries, the scope is fairly comprehensive. Shtetlekh that only came into existence in the 20th century, however, are not mentioned. Cohen maintains that memorial books for destroyed communities are often very vague about the date of establishment of a shtetl. His sources were 19th-century Hebrew and Yiddish newspapers and books and especially rabbinical directories. His main list of shtetlekh is arranged alphabetically, with location information and the names of prominent residents. A supplemental list is appended at the end of the work. The compilation is helpful in locating former settlements because it includes the names of existing towns nearby. It is also of value for family historians. Cohen furnishes a list of obituaries from the Hebrew newspaper Hatsefirah.

HOFFMAN states that her work “is a book of memory and about memory—or rather, of and about multiple layers of memory.” The book is primarily about the quest for information on the vanished Jews of the Polish shtetl of Bransk. Basing her text on the views expressed in a documentary film by Marian Marzynski, Hoffman confronts many villagers still living in Bransk and encounters a wide array of townspeople, from avowed antisemites to individuals who are brought to tears as they tell the stories of their murdered neighbors and friends. Hoffman describes one independent local activist, Zbigniew Romaniuk, who is attempting to revive consciousness of the town's Jewish past and who has created a makeshift Jewish cemetery using stones from the original graveyard destroyed by the Nazis. The work traces the history of Bransk's Jews from the time of their arrival. Through the skillful use of diplomatically conducted interviews, a startling vision of the earlier village unfolds. Hoffman seeks to understand the Polish hostility toward Jews and to make sense of seemingly normal people turning suddenly against one another, to the point when, as Hoffman puts it, “I can see such a man, in such a time, slipping into the kind of darkness in which a fatal betrayal might be perpetuated, or a murder committed, quite casually, in the light of day.”

NEUGROSCHEL's anthology is an attempt to show the diversity of Jewish life in Eastern Europe. The book begins with tales from medieval times and ends with the demise of the shtetl in World War II. All the stories reflect some aspect of shtetl life and are meant variously to entertain, teach, remind, chide, or poke fun. The stories open up the world of the shtetl in effectively realistic fashion. Part one contains stories that describe the religious culture. Part two deals with the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah) and points out the “backwardness” of shtetl life. Yisroel Aksenfeld's “The Headband” is a good example of the pessimistic treatment of the shtetl. Stories in part three concern tradition and modernization, from tales of traditional marriage to those that reflect encroachment of the new and disintegration of the old through intermarriage and conversion. The stories in part four illustrate Jewish fears of military conscription and the agony of being separated from the religious life of the shtetl, as illustrated by Fischel Bimko's “The Draft.” Especially representative of the end of shtetl life is Avrom Reyzen's “Acquiring a Graveyard,” in which shtetl residents plan the establishment of a town cemetery, only to have their shtetl become its own burial ground with the arrival of Russian soldiers.

PINCHUK's work chronicles the history of shtetl life in eastern Poland between September 1939 and June 1941. He analyzes the relations between Jews and the Red Army on the brink of the Soviet takeover of Eastern Europe, admitting to holes in his research due to the inaccessibility of Soviet archives and the wartime destruction (or simple non-existence) of statistics. By way of background, Pinchuk discusses the multi-ethnic atmosphere in this area of Poland. Chapter two, titled “Shtetl Jews,” provides a valuable outline of the history of small-town life in eastern Poland. Pinchuk links the depressed economic status of the Jews to their subjugation under independent Poland. He further discusses what followed the Soviet conquest: the transformation of Jewish life through assimilation to the structure of the Soviet state and through acceptance of loyalty not to the Old World but to the New Order.

ROSKIES and ROSKIES select a model shtetl called Tishevits in Lublin Province, Poland, in order to provide the reader with an in-depth description of life in such a town. As American-born scholars, the Roskies have no direct experience of the shtetl, but they are “determined not to make do with generalizations and sentimentalism.” Because of the vast amount of written material concerning their chosen shtetl, the Roskies are able to give the reader a comprehensive view of Jewish life in this market town. As the work concerns itself with Yiddish-speaking Jews, a basic Yiddish vocabulary is provided, phonetically transliterated. The introductory chapter, “How the Jews Came to Poland,” provides three different stories relating to the arrival of Jews in the area. The Roskies have also included several maps with detailed keys, as well as many black-and-white photographs of Jewish life in Tishevits. Their overview also includes documents, folk songs, proverbs, and many short stories, which not only add details of everyday life, but also are arranged in an attractive order that leaves the reader with a strong sense of the vivacity of shtetl life. Many other facets are covered, such as growing up as a shtetl Jew, relations with non-Jews, and dialects of Yiddish.

SCHOENFELD’s work is a recollection of his own youth and a world destroyed by the Holocaust. He focuses mainly on Hapsburg Galicia, part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Schoenfeld provides firsthand testimony of the poor treatment of shtetl Jews by Poles and Ukrainians alike. With remarkable detail, he paints a portrait of the brutality inflicted upon Jews by townspeople and points a finger at the church for its encouragement as well. In strong contrast to Hoffman’s work, which tries to comprehend the cruel behavior of villagers, Schoenfeld’s account does not seek excuses for evil. His work recounts bitter confrontations with non-Jews and details the brutal acts committed against himself and his neighbors. Descriptions of occupations, superstitions, education, family life, holidays, and social occasions brighten the work considerably and at times are presented with humor.

STERNBERG has recreated the Romanian shtetl of Stefanesti through the use of personal recollection, interviews, photographs, and archival documentation. Located at the periphery of the Yiddish-speaking heartland, Romanian was the primary language, seen as the vehicle of upward mobility. Sternberg maintains that life in the Romanian shtetl was not as economically depressed as in the shtetlakh of Poland and the Russian Pale of Settlement. The author also makes clear that a shtetl is not a ghetto, “for it was voluntary rather than forced segregation.” The geographic, historical, social, and economic background of Stefanesti is described in minute detail. Differences in family life in the shtetlakh of Romania and the shtetlakh of the Pale of Settlement are explained along with differences in religious traditions. This explanation is perhaps the most important section of the work for a comparative study of shtetl life. An entire chapter is devoted to songs (in Romanian or Yiddish with English translations) for many different occasions. Sternberg also relates many interesting superstitions and proverbs of Stefanesti. A glossary, a list of Yiddish and Romanian terminology, and an extensive appendix further complement this appealing work.

ZBOROWSKI and HERZOG’s book is disputed territory. Critics claim that this work, which is dependent on personal memoirs of former shtetl dwellers, represents a overly romanticized version of shtetl life. Others decry the patchwork method that authors used to create a “model shtetl,” a composite that never existed. The work relies on novels, memoirs, histories, films, and previous studies in order to create the feeling and the atmosphere of a shtetl. The hypothetical shtetl duly emerges, a kaleidoscope of various genres interwoven with memory, both accurate and fading. Zborowski and Herzog readily admit the limitations of their study: “the culture portrayed is that of the shtetl and not that of all Jews,” and “the effort is to portray the living culture rather than to trace the origin of its manifestations.” This disavowal of historicism, however, means that the shtetl takes on a life of its own—there is no right or wrong when describing a typical shtetl. The authors are nothing if not aware of the controversial character of their project, conceding that “The problem of whether Life Is with People offers an accurate portrait of the shtetl notwithstanding, there remains a larger issue. Is the shtetl, a highly-charged literary and historiographic construction with a life of its own, the most productive point of departure for an anthropology or a history of East European Jewish life?” Zborowski and Herzog have attempted valiantly to use various means to capture the spirit and the heart of the shtetl, however, and it is not without some justification that this work remains a definitive publication in the minds of many.

CYNTHIA A. KLÍMA

Siddur see Liturgy, History of; Liturgy, Reform

Sin and Atonement

Cohen, Hermann, Die Religion der Vernunft aus den Quellen des Judentums, 1919; translated by Simon Kaplan as Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism, New York: Ungar, 1972

Milgrom, Jacob, Leviticus 1–16: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (Anchor Bible, vol. 3), New York: Doubleday, 1991

Miller, Patrick D., Sin and Judgment in the Prophets: A Stylistic and Theological Analysis (Society of Biblical Literature Monograph Series, no. 27), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1982

Schechter, Solomon, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, New York: Macmillan, and London: Black, 1909

Steinsaltz, Adin, The Thirteen Petalled Rose, translated by Yehuda Hanegbi, New York: Basic Books, 1980

The biblical basis for contemporary categories of sin and atonement may be found in two originally quite divergent groups of texts. One thread of tradition is based in the legislation governing the operation of the sacrificial cult. Read chronologically, these materials exhibit a growing willingness to transpose the categories of holiness and defilement from the temple sanctuary to the sphere of social relations. In tandem with this development, the prophetic writings are increasingly able to link particular indictments of antisocial behavior to a broader system of values and to an explicit concept of sin. After the destruction of the Second Temple, the rabbis expanded these two strands into a rich ethical anthropology. The commandments of the Torah and general expectations of propriety in human activity were alike construed as mitsvot. On the other hand, the human urge to transgress and be self-ish was understood to derive from a fundamental inclination toward error, called the yetser. Atonement was effected in one of two ways. First, it could be achieved through the careful and attentive cultivation of the moral self through adherence to the mitsvot and relentless attention to transgressions against others. More broadly, however, it could be achieved through participation in the evolving rituals of the “Days of Awe” or “High Holidays.” The atonement liturgy was the product of active rabbinic adaptation of temple rituals of expiation to provide an ongoing mechanism for forgiveness for unintentional transgressions against divine commandments.

The monumental commentary by MILGROM on the first 16 chapters of Leviticus contains a wealth of information on the priestly writings. Its detail and elaboration may strike the non-specialist as daunting, but its discussion of sin and repentance and expiation/atonement are an excellent introduction to the priestly theology and its development. Careful consideration must be given to Milgrom’s willingness to read textual ambiguities through the lens of later rabbinic theology. Still, his citation of ancient Near Eastern ritual and conceptual parallels is exhaustive and invaluable.

MILLER surveys the pre-exile prophetic literature to create a typology of transgression and punishment. He finds links of correspondence, consequence, and retributive justice to proliferate as conceptual bonds that tie sin and subsequent judgment together. The persistence of such links, he suggests, provides one with a basis for comprehending the prophetic understanding of reciprocity between human action and effect. As such, it allows readers to perceive the minimum conditions for a developing theology of judgment and repentance in these writings. His study is valuable not only for its analysis and arrangement of a diverse body of material but also for its careful and nuanced presentation of a variety of exemplar texts that relate to prophetic indictments of sin.

In rabbinic Judaism, the prophetic doctrine of sin and retribution and the priestly ideas of transgression and atonement find their synthesis in the theology of the yetser and atonement. The presentation by SCHECHTER of the rabbinic sources is succinct but satisfying. Some may be put off by his synthesis of diverse strands of tradition into a deceptively unanimous theological system or by a certain bias against his midrashic sources. Still, the depth of detail and the perceptiveness of his interpretations make this book a valuable resource, and his felicitous style is legendary. Schechter notes a growing tendency toward conceptualization of the yetser as a personalized and autonomous force with which each individual must contend.

Although this is a development away from the biblical concept of the yetser as an internal faculty, he is careful to stress that the reader should understand this development as conceptual rather than substantive. He continues by outlining the varieties of rabbinic understandings of sacrificial atonement. Blood sacrifice comes to be not unique but to stand alongside fasting, suffering, charity, and Torah study as means of expiating guilt, and none of these is effective without repentance. In Schechter’s discussion, repentance comes to stand alongside the mitsvot as a formative principle in the cosmos, acknowledging the gap between human will and divine command and providing a means of bridging the two.

COHEN develops a subtle theology that places atonement and redemption at the center of humanity’s relations with God. Reclaiming much of the conceptual ground from standard Christian theologies of sin and atonement, he develops his own theological position through a careful reading of the prophets and the Psalms. The apex of biblical ethics, in his estimation, is found in Ezekiel, who was most able to elevate the prophetic critique of collective sin to a specific indictment for personal transgression. With this development, a theological position is facilitated wherein individuals stand accountable for personal activity and must interrogate the basis of their transgressions, confess their sins before their fellows, and take an active role in their own redemption. Cohen’s book stands as a masterpiece of synthetic theology, and his particular formulation of the problem of sin and the necessity of atonement is indispensable.

STEINSALTZ develops a theology of repentance that is grounded in kabbalistic cosmology. He suggests that human behavior cannot be understood as relevant only in an interpersonal or an ethical sense. Instead, actions taken have a metaphysical significance, and the mitsvot are treated as fundamental ordering principles of the cosmos. Transgression is not merely personally relevant, it has a powerful effect on the world in which one lives. Individual human souls are interconnected and woven in with the fabric of the divine creation, and sin damages the integrity of that fabric. Thus, Steinsaltz suggests that repentance has an import that exceeds the personal. Its highest form is as an act of tikkun, or reparation. It is rooted in personal choice, but it extends outward to strengthen the cosmos in the face of the damage done to it by sin. Steinsaltz is an eloquent advocate of kabbalistic theology and writes with careful awareness of the need to make its theological subtleties meaningful for the contemporary reader.

EDWARD SILVER

Singer, Isaac Bashevis 1904–1991

Polish-born American Yiddish novelist and journalist

Hadda, Janet, Isaac Bashevis Singer: A Life (Studies in Jewish History), Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1997

- Landis, Joseph C. (editor), Aspects of I.B. Singer, New York: Queens College Press, 1986
- Miller, David Neal, Fear of Fiction: Narrative Strategies in the Works of Isaac Bashevis Singer (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish Literature and Culture), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1985
- Miller, David Neal (editor), Recovering the Canon: Essays on Isaac Bashevis Singer (Studies in Judaism in Modern Times, vol. 8), Leiden: Brill, 1986
- Sanders, Ronald, The Americanization of Isaac Bashevis Singer (B.G. Rudolph Lectures in Judaic Studies), Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1989
- Zamir, Israel, Avi, Yitshak Bashevis-Zinger, 1994; translated by Barbara Harshav as Journey to My Father, Isaac Bashevis Singer, New York: Arcade, 1995

Yiddish author of short stories, novels, journalism, and literary criticism, and younger brother of Yiddish novelist Israel Joshua Singer, Isaac Bashevis Singer was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1978, the only Yiddish writer ever to receive this honor. His first literary efforts were poems and short stories written in Hebrew at a very young age. His debut in Yiddish came in 1925 with the story "In Old Age," published in the Warsaw literary journal for which he was a proofreader. He signed this story with the name "Tse." Later that same year he wrote the story "Wives" and, for the first time, employed the name "Isaac Bashevis," which he would use for his Yiddish belletristic works until his death. This name was based on his mother's name, Bas-sheva (Bathsheba), "Bashevis" meaning "Bathsheba's." Singer's first novel, Satan in Goray, was published serially in 1934 and in book form the following year. Among Singer's most famous works are the stories "Gimpel the Fool" and "Yentl the Yeshiva Boy," as well as the novels The Family Moskat and Enemies, a Love Story.

HADDA's comprehensive study demonstrates great familiarity with the large corpus of Singer's writings both in the original Yiddish and in the numerous English translations. Moreover, she presents her interesting and insightful findings based upon many hours of interviews with friends and family members of Singer. This is all done within the framework of a literary biography that often turns to psychoanalysis as a methodological model.

The essays in the volume edited by LANDIS deal with various phases in the life and work of Singer and are culled from issues of the literary journal Yiddish, which Landis edited. In addition to an article by Landis, there are essays by the Yiddish writer and critic Aaron Zeitlin and the Yiddish literary critic Shmuel Niger. This collection is complemented by a selection of writings by Singer himself.

Responding to the fact that more attention has been paid to English translations of Singer's works than to the Yiddish originals, MILLER (1985) concentrates his monograph on those works that remain untranslated. This volume is informed by the author's knowledge of the wider Yiddish canon, but it makes reference to works by other authors only when absolutely necessary. The focus here is almost exclusively on Singer and his narrative strategies.

MILLER (1986) aims to make a contribution to the discussion of canon formation in literary studies, with particular focus on a somewhat neglected aspect of this field, namely "the role of the author in shaping the perception of his or her oeuvre, on the one hand, or in championing the candidacy of that oeuvre for acceptance into the broader canon." The essays in this volume all focus on Singer and are written by an international team including Miller and fellow American Seth Wolitz; Israeli scholars Hana Wirth-Nesher, Leonard Prager, and Khone Shmeruk; and the Yiddish poet and critic Yankev Glatshsteyn.

SANDERS's lecture discusses issues of categorization, considering why Singer has traditionally been considered an American writer. Sanders pinpoints several factors that led to the "Americanization" of this writer of Polish-Jewish origin. For example, the short story "Gimpel the Fool" was translated by Irving Howe and inspired a large English reading audience for Singer in the United States. Singer then became increasingly involved in the translation of his own works into English. The film version of his novel Enemies, A Love Story earned him even wider acclaim and popularity in the United States. Sanders agrees that Singer is properly designated an American writer, ending his lecture with the judgment: "I think that, by this time, we can call the only Yiddish winner of the Nobel Prize an American national treasure."

Israeli journalist ZAMIR offers an honest and unpretentious look at his relationship with his world-famous father. In the author's own words: "This is neither a biography of my father nor an evaluation of his literary work. That has been done by others more qualified than me. This is, rather, a personal account of what started as a failed father-son relationship and ended in a mature friendship." Zamir writes that Singer left Warsaw for New York in 1935, when Zamir was six years old, and the two did not meet again until 20 years later. This book provides an intriguing glimpse of the writer from the uniquely personal perspective of his son.

MARC MILLER

Slavery

- Chirichigno, Gregory C., Debt-Slavery in Israel and the Ancient Near East (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 141), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1993
- Flesher, Paul Virgil McCracken, Oxen, Women or Citizens?: Slaves in the System of the Mishnah (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 143), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988
- Mendelsohn, Isaac, Slavery in the Ancient Near East: A Comparative Study of Slavery in Babylonia, Assyria, Syria, and Palestine, from the Middle of the Third Millennium to the End of the First Millennium, New York: Oxford University Press, 1949
- Urbach, E.E., "The Laws Regarding Slavery as a Source for Social History of the Period of the Second Temple, the Mishnah and Talmud," in Papers of the Institute of Jewish Studies, London, vol. 1, edited by J.G. Weiss, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1964; Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1989

Zucrow, Solomon, Women, Slaves, and the Ignorant in Rabbinic Literature, and Also the Dignity of Man, Boston: Stratford, 1932

An unusual feature of Jewish slavery law is the distinction made between the Hebrew slave, who serves for a limited term, and the non-Hebrew (often called “Canaanite”) slave, who is more like a permanent chattel. The regulations regarding such slaves are far from consistent. Among the more complex issues are the divergences among the biblical slave laws, including three apparently conflicting manumission laws in Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy, and the further differences between these biblical slave laws and the later rabbinic rules. Scholars debate the extent to which such textual differences reflect changes in the nature and function of slavery as actually practiced in the ancient Near East.

ZUCROW, in the second part of his work, provides an overview of both biblical and rabbinic slave law. His approach is ethical rather than historical, with the aim of revealing attitudes toward slaves. Dividing the relevant texts into four broad types—patriarchal (the biblical Genesis narratives), post-patriarchal (other biblical books), talmudic (tannaitic and amoraic texts), and post-talmudic (the works of Maimonides and other codifiers)—he reviews the key features of slave law in each. Zucrow argues that the biblical passages give a sense that the master’s power over the slave, both Hebrew and non-Hebrew, was to be restrained. In talmudic law, however, the attitude toward the non-Hebrew slave has deteriorated, whether due to foreign influence or misguided exegetical activity on the part of the sages; such slaves were considered “mere asses,” among other degradations. Though selective, Zucrow’s work is a lucid introduction to the intricacies of slave law.

Certain of the biblical slave rules are remarkably similar to the slave laws of other ancient Near Eastern cultures, particularly Mesopotamia. Such parallels are drawn by some scholars to suggest the existence of a common law or school tradition from which these regulations developed. Two studies on biblical slavery adopt such a comparative approach.

MENDELSON attempts a historical outline of slavery—its sources, legal status, and economic role—among the Israelites and other ancient Near Eastern cultures. The Israelite case is derived from a philological analysis of relevant biblical passages, supplemented in some cases with archeological evidence; gaps in the biblical record are filled in with evidence from Mesopotamia and Ugarit. The author concludes that most slaves in Israelite society were Hebrews forced into service to pay off debts; it is to these that the laws of Exodus and Deuteronomy are addressed, while the later Leviticus law covers those who sold themselves into slavery. Though some of the research used by the author has now been superseded or at least challenged, the study remains broadly useful as an introduction to the main issues of ancient slavery and to the cultural milieu within which the biblical rules operated.

CHIRICHIGNO focuses on the three biblical manumission laws, with the aim of explaining their purpose within the socioeconomic circumstances of Israelite society. First, the author summarizes prior scholarly opinion on the development of social stratification and the nature of debt-slavery in Mesopotamia and then relates these conclusions to the Israelite situation through an analysis of relevant biblical terminology. The remainder of the book provides a detailed structural and philological analysis of the three manumission laws. In contrast to the thesis that these laws stem from different textual traditions, Chirichigno posits that they all were part of a comprehensive social welfare scheme designed to restrict the permanent enslavement of Israelites and their dependents for debt as well as the permanent alienation of patrimonial land. He further suggests that these rules could all have been operative at a very early period. The book is directed at the specialist reader well versed in biblical Hebrew but is also valuable as a general reference tool, with its summaries of prior research and its comprehensive bibliography covering the economies of the ancient Near East and aspects of biblical law and interpretation.

Within the great mass of rabbinic literature (particularly Mishnah, Tosefta, and the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds), the numerous inconsistencies in slave law pose a challenge to scholars and incite a degree of controversy regarding the most appropriate approach. URBACH contends that one may detect in these contradictions a development and reinterpretation of the law that can be directly related to changing historical conditions. Selecting from among the many rabbinic discussions on slaves and hypothesizing the historical context surrounding them, he posits an outline of the course of slavery among Jews from the Second Temple period onward. He argues that in the period following Nehemiah, Hebrew slaves constituted the main source of slavery, while non-Hebrew slaves increased with the Maccabean wars and Hasmonaean conquests. Earlier postbiblical laws focused on integrating such non-Hebrew slaves into the community, while following the destruction of the Second Temple rules were designed both to prevent the assimilation of those of dubious status as well as to favor an increase in slave trading. Though Urbach’s methodology has been challenged, this detailed article is useful as a source for rabbinic citations on slavery and offers insight into the many layers of which rabbinic slave law is composed.

FLESHER examines the slave rules found in one particular rabbinic work, the Mishnah. He argues that this text must be approached as a system unto itself, and, contrary to Urbach, that its rules are purely “utopian” and cannot be taken as direct evidence of historical reality. Fleisher posits that in contrast to the biblical slave system, which distinguishes between Hebrews and non-Hebrews, the Mishnah’s primary slave system ignores the slave’s genealogy and defines his slave status in terms of the control exercised over him by a male Israelite householder. The nature of this control is then explored and used to illustrate the slave’s similarity to both inanimate property and other humans as well as the slave’s place in the cult. Fleisher contrasts the status of the “freedman” and concludes with a detailed definition of the Mishnah’s concept of “freedom.” Highly theoretical, the book is an interesting and methodical application of the systemic approach favoured by Jacob Neusner. It is complemented by a list of Mishnah passages dealing with slaves and a bibliography covering aspects of the study of ancient slavery and rabbinic Judaism.

Social Ethics

- Breslau, S. Daniel, Contemporary Jewish Ethics: A Bibliographical Survey (Bibliographies and Indexes in Religious Studies, no. 6), Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1985
- Dorff, Elliot and Louis Newman (editors), Contemporary Jewish Ethics and Morality: A Reader, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995
- Herford, R. Travers (editor), Pirke Aboth: The Tractate "Fathers," from the Mishnah, Commonly Called "Sayings of the Fathers," New York: Jewish Institute of Religion Press, 1925; as The Ethics of the Talmud: Sayings of the Fathers, New York: Schocken, 1962
- Isbell, Charles David, Malachi: A Study Guide Commentary, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1980
- Kroloff, Charles A., When Elijah Knocks: A Religious Response to Homelessness, West Orange, New Jersey: Behrman House, 1992
- Novak, David, Jewish Social Ethics, New York: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Plaut, W. Gunther and Mark Washofsky, Teshuvot for the Nineties: Reform Judaism's Answers to Today's Dilemmas, New York: Central Conference of American Rabbis, 1997
- Vorspan, Albert and David Saperstein, Jewish Dimensions of Social Justice: Tough Moral Choices of Our Time, New York: UAHC, 1998

Social ethics is viewed by all branches of Judaism as a critical area of life and study. The earliest biblical texts include injunctions against harming other human beings both within and outside the boundaries of Israelite society proper. Biblical and all subsequent Jewish legislation emphasizes the importance of individual and societal protection for the weak and powerless, stressing the fact that even kings and other high-ranking members of society are accountable to God for proper personal ethics as well as for ethically sound public policies. The classical prophets, especially Amos, Micah, and Isaiah, interpreted the true essence of Mosaic ("traditional") religion to be a type of socially responsible conduct that promised justice and equality across a wide spectrum of early Israelite society.

ISELL examines the ethical message of a lesser-known prophet, Malachi, who preached to the community of Jews newly returned to Jerusalem from Babylonian captivity. The author shows how the prophet interprets such issues as marriage and divorce, acceptable contributions to charitable causes, and proper relationships between parents and children. Isbell demonstrates that Malachi uses these common social themes as the key to understanding the nature of God, the definition of the people Israel, and the basis for a covenantal relationship between God and Israel.

HERFORD provides both a readable English translation of and a running commentary on the mishnaic tractate Avot, which is generally considered to be the first specifically ethical compilation in postbiblical Judaism. Classical ethical thought in Judaism is deemed by the author to deal with practical deeds rather than with speculative systems of philosophy.

Throughout the book, Herford offers excellent insight into these ordinary, daily concerns of the early rabbis—such as hospitality to strangers, respect between student and teacher, and relations with evil people.

The studies by BRESLAUER and by DORFF and NEWMAN consider the significance of basic biblical and mishnaic concepts in the modern era. The modern examples these authors choose serve to underscore the genius of the classical texts, which isolated for examination the core issues of all societal groups in all eras.

By contrast, NOVAK expands the list of ethical issues facing contemporary Jews to include topics that could not have been anticipated in earlier times. Among his ten seminal essays are discussions of subjects such as the ethical treatment of AIDS patients, proper consideration for social minorities, ecology for a shrinking planet, and war and peace in the nuclear age. The strength of Novak's work is that he approaches these new issues by constant reference to the old sources, seeking to discern in classical Jewish literature the principles that have abiding value even after the specificity of their own era has been lost. Successfully combining theoretical analysis with practical modern concerns, Novak makes a significant contribution to Jewish theology. His work is also important because it engages certain Christian ethical thinkers in dialogue. Without minimizing the theological differences that divide the two traditions, Novak places the field of Jewish ethics in a broader social and religious matrix.

VORSPAN and SAPERSTEIN center their discussion around issues that divide persons of good will and reason. There is virtually no debate, for example, about the postulate that one ought to deal kindly and fairly with others. But when specific issues, such as abortion, capital punishment, criminal justice, or homosexuality, become the focus, differences abound regarding how to apply this general ethical rule. Vorspan and Saperstein attempt, with varying degrees of success, to show how Judaism informs the current debates about these "tough moral choices." Two things become clear when reading their work. First, Judaism has a long history of facing thorny ethical issues and debating them openly and honestly. Second, there is seldom the luxury of a consensus among Jewish thinkers about difficult moral and ethical issues. The authors conclude that a specifically Jewish approach to ethical questions must encourage Jews to tackle hard choices, allowing the possibility of more than one morally acceptable position and understanding that such debates must be continual and situational rather than dogmatic and definitive.

PLAUT and WASHOFSKY consider a wide variety of ethical issues from the perspective of Reform Judaism. Some parts of the book address ritual and synagogue politics, but the majority of the 75 questions that the authors investigate concern ethical issues of wide public interest, such as HIV testing, abortion, gossip, and customs of marriage and divorce. In fact, although their final chapter is specifically titled "Social Issues," all of the preceding chapters of the book also deal more with social issues than with any other subject, a focus that underscores the significance of social ethics in Jewish life.

KROLOFF offers a fine example of the way in which Judaism can focus upon a single issue of social ethics. The author aims to demonstrate that homelessness is not merely a political or economic problem; it also involves profoundly religious and ethical challenges. By examining the problem of homelessness within a framework of religious obligation, Kroloff provides a distinctively Jewish perspective on a modern issue. He also shows how Jewish theology passes the ultimate test of its classical system of social ethics, the ability to move from theory to practical application in a socially responsible fashion.

CHARLES DAVID ISBELL

Sociology of Religion

- Levine, Hillel and Lawrence Harmon, The Death of an American Jewish Community: A Tragedy of Good Intentions, New York: Free Press, 1992
- Neusner, Jacob, The Social Study of Judaism: Essays and Reflections (Brown Judaic Studies Series, 162), vol. 2, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1988
- Novak, David, Jewish Social Ethics, New York: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Sharot, Stephen, Judaism: A Sociology, New York: Holmes and Meier, and Newton Abbot, Devon, England: David and Charles, 1976
- Sklare, Marshall (editor), The Jewish Community in America (Library of Jewish Studies), New York: Behrman House, 1974

The sociology of religion has its historical moorings fairly well anchored in the work of three major figures who flourished in the late 19th century: Emile Durkheim, Karl Marx, and Max Weber. Each of them, though for differing reasons and with differing results and for good or ill, believed that religious phenomena play a wide-ranging, formative, and authoritative role in the production of individual and collective identities, ideas, norms, values, and feelings. The sociology of religion brings to bear upon religious collectivities the questions, methods, and theories developed within sociology. What are the dynamics of social change? How do societies move from one form of organization to another? How do forms of religion contribute to individual, collective, and institutional identity? With rapid advances in technological sophistication, secularization, and globalization, does religion fall by the wayside or is it a continuing force for revolutionary change?

Until recently the sociology of religion has tended to focus on the processes of secularization and the increasing insignificance of religion, a focus that has made the continuing worth of the sociology of religion itself questionable. This is changing, however, as the sociology of religion becomes comparative rather than insular, opening itself to, rather than avoiding, the contributions of other religious studies disciplines.

SHAROT's introduction acknowledges the unique way in which a sociology whose target is Jewish life and history is simultaneously and foremost a sociology of religion. Again a consequence of the diaspora, says Sharot, it is also a comparative analysis "of a single religiously distinctive ethnic group in a number of societies." This peculiar sociological admixture, the thesis of a singular difference that traverses multiple national, cultural, and temporal boundaries, perhaps could only be ventured when directed toward Judaism. Though it is debatable whether modern Jewish life is either identical with Jewish religion or identifiable as a cohesive, transnational ethnic culture, at the same time an affirmation of both suppositions seems equally necessary in order that there be the possibility of a sociology of Judaism. Since it appears to be a modern fact that it is possible to be socially and culturally quite imperceptibly Jewish, the sociology of Jewish religion in certain respects remains an analysis of the coercive pressures, both subtle and extreme, brought to bear by a wider or "host" culture against Jewish religio-culture, pressures that ensure a continuing identity of varying states of integrity. The social study of Jewish religion is therefore a study of marginality, separation, and adaptation. It is thus not surprising that Sharot's main concerns are the variables associated with acculturation, assimilation, and secularization, as these, according to their times and places, have historically informed the pragmatics of Jewish affiliation. Considering the necessarily circumstantial particularity of these variables, Sharot's work recommends itself as one of the few sociologies of Judaism that attempts a cross-cultural historical and comparative analysis that begins with premodern Judaism and ends with 20th-century Judaism in England and the United States. In line with certain Weberian claims advanced and modified by Peter Berger (see, for example, his Social Construction of Reality, The Sacred Canopy, and A Rumor of Angels), Sharot finds a complicity between Jewish religion and practice and the process of secularization.

NEUSNER addresses, perhaps uniquely, the social order of Judaism in terms of its classical literature, in particular the Mishnah, as it expresses a programmatic "social system, politics, economics and philosophy." This contextual, historical approach is in line with Neusner's all but innumerable other works in the systematic study of religion as exemplified by Judaism. In this volume, however, the questions directed at the text differ in that they derive from the larger questions brought to bear upon a religious community by the social sciences, questions such as Weber's hypothesis of a link between Western systems of religious belief and "rational" economic action—i.e., capitalism. Neusner claims that the Mishnah sets forth the terms and structure of a political economy that has been definitive for that social entity which constitutes Judaism. "I see," he says, "the politics as a concrete and material statement of the social entity of the system; the economics as the equally practical expression of its way of life; and the philosophy, of course, as the agenda through which the prevailing world-view addresses concrete and urgent questions of mind." The book is structured around a series of essays that address the political economy of Judaism in general and the Mishnah in particular; the politics and theological anthropology of Judaism; the philosophy of Judaism given principle by the Mishnah; and the situation of Jews and Judaism in the global social order.

LEVINE and HARMON's book is an ethnographic study of a particular case of urban ethnic relations—those between blacks and Jews in the Boston, Massachusetts, suburbs of Dorchester, Mattapan, and Roxbury from the early 1950s to the early years of the 1970s, a period during which these communities witnessed a complex transformation from predominately Jewish to African-American neighborhoods. While this is not a novel phenomenon, it had previously been understood according to a "succession" theory that held that Jews, fleeing an inner-city ethnic neighborhood, would sell to blacks. The remaining Jews would be composed of shopkeepers and slumlords. Levine and Harmon instead focus on the forces brought to bear against the Jewish community by bankers and real estate agents who conspired—by the use of specious financial incentives to minorities and by intimidation and threats to "loosen up" properties—to redline those districts. The book challenges the thesis that the breakdown of the historic alliance between blacks and Jews is wholly attributable to forces internal to these communities. "There is growing evidence," they say, "that elusive forces external to the black and Jewish communities also played a role in undermining their relationship, and that opportunities were lost for positive contact between blacks and Jews at the neighborhood level." The authors focus on the ways bankers used federal loan programs for low-income residents, and they look in particular at the Boston Banks Urban Renewal Group, composed of the heads of 22 savings banks, which created an inner-city district within which "and only within which" blacks could obtain these attractive terms.

The ethical basis for normative Judaism, so often construed in terms of a system of inexorable laws, does not, according to NOVAK's important reading of Jewish social ethics, illuminate itself. "The Law is, rather, a divinely grounded and historically developing system that subjects the most cogently argued theory to the collective precedents of the centuries-old community." With such an understanding of Jewish law as principle rather than rule, a Jewish social ethics is the ongoing result of a hard-won, responsibly engaged communitarian dialogue and the expression of a "historical continuity between the development of Jewish life" and Jewish law. Because Jewish social ethics is the expression of such covenantal, other-obligated responsibilities, it is, according to Novak, "essentially a theological ethics." It must evidence responsibility to Torah as revelation, as a historically mediated, people tradition, and as a response to present concerns such as the actual political and social liberation of the Jewish people and the protection of the interests and rights of every other. The book affirms some fairly startling approaches, such as the Christian theologian Paul Tillich's theonomous ethical theory grounded in desire for the good and the Catholic thinker John Courtney Murray's Thomistic natural law theory, then adjusts these theories by an appraisal of distinctively Jewish ethical dilemmas.

SKLARE's edited volume of essays, a companion to The Jew in American Society, which focused upon the individual American Jew, here considers the communal aspects of American Jewry according to five categories: the informal community, the formal community, religious movements, Jewish education, and the Jewish community and general society. The authors, for the most part, present their findings in terms of a narrative analysis of historical and statistical data, and most follow a stage-model format to display, arrange, and understand the social structure of a community according to certain standard organizational-developmental models. The need for the attention to Jewish communal life reflected in this volume is critical, according to Sklare, since "the American Jewish community . . . has become crucial to the future of the Jewish people." There is a profound urgency subtending the articles to spell out anomic and separatist forces that work to threaten the survival of Jewish life. Charles Liebman's essay on "Orthodoxy in American Jewish Life," for instance, differentiates Orthodoxy from Reform and Conservative forms by its weak coordination in associations and groups and by its European origins, both of which contribute to its sectarian insularity. On the other hand, he also highlights forces for stabilization, growth, and cohesion.

ERIC C. HELMER

Solomon ben Isaac 1030 or 1040–1105

French pioneer Bible and Talmud commentator

- Banitt, Menahem, Rashi: Interpreter of the Biblical Letter, Tel Aviv: Chaim Rosenberg School of Jewish Studies, Tel Aviv University, 1985
- Catane, Mochè, Recueil des Gloses: Les Gloses françaises dans les commentaires talmudiques de Rachi d'après l'ouvrage d'Arsène Darmesteter et D.S. Blondheim (1929), Tel Aviv: Gitler, 1984, revised edition, 1988
- Doron, Pinhas, The Mystery of Creation According to Rashi: A New Translation and Interpretation of Rashi on Genesis I–VI, New York: Maznaim, 1982
- Hailperin, Herman, Rashi and the Christian Scholars, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1963
- Saltman, Avrom and Sarah Kamin, Secundum Salomonem: A Thirteenth Century Latin Commentary on the Song of Solomon, Ramat Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1989

Solomon ben Isaac, commonly known by the acronym Rashi (Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac), was born in Troyes, the capital of the Champagne region of northern France. Founder of an illustrious family of rabbis, several of whom contributed commentaries of enduring value on both the Hebrew Bible and the Babylonian Talmud, Rashi himself penned the most famous and influential Hebrew commentaries on both of those corpora. Part of the standard curriculum of Jewish schools to this day, Rashi's biblical commentaries exercised an enormous influence on Christian exegetes such as Hugh of St. Victor, Nicholas de Lyre, and Martin Luther. Rashi also authored liturgical poems and numerous legal responsa. Unfortunately, much of the literature about Rashi is highly sentimental, reflecting the view in many quarters that his commentaries are virtually holy writ, from which Jewish literature is forbidden to dissent. At the same time, the modern Jewish scholars of the Wissenschaft des Judentums seem to have found in Rashi—with his use of French, his anti-Christian diatribes, and his way of being quoted extensively by Christian exegetes—a considerable cultural hero who, no less than the poets and exegetes of Spanish Jewry's Golden Age, provided a model for modern Judaism's search to live comfortably both with the totality of Jewish spiritual-literary baggage and with Western culture. It is no accident, therefore, that academic scholarship on Rashi in English and French places disproportionate emphasis on points of contact between Rashi and Western Christendom, just as the literature prepared for the yeshivot tends to treat Rashi's commentaries exclusively as an outgrowth of his familiarity with talmudic literature. The stature of Rashi as a commentator on both Bible and Talmud lies in his careful synthesis of what the reader ought to know of philology and grammar and what the reader would like to know of the eternal verities that transcend the exegesis of a text.

Rashi's commentaries on the Bible contain 4,382 glosses written in various European languages, mostly in Old Northern French, while his commentaries on the Babylonian Talmud contain 2,475 such glosses. Among the most important surviving testimonies written in Old Northern French, these precious glosses were largely overlooked by readers of Rashi's commentaries after the beginning of the 14th century, when the Jews were expelled from France, and French ceased to be a language spoken by Jews for many centuries. Early in the 20th century, Arsène Darmesteter and David Blondheim published comprehensive lists of these glosses, establishing—with the assistance of medieval manuscripts and early printed editions of the commentaries—the correct spelling of each gloss in both Hebrew and Latin characters. BANITT argues convincingly that most of the glosses in Rashi's biblical commentaries serve to correct what Rashi believed to have been errors in the then-conventional Jewish translation of the Scriptures into spoken Old Northern French, which had been passed down from parents to children and from teachers to pupils over several generations. (An analogous traditional Jewish translation of the Scriptures—in this case into an antiquated form of Italian—was studied in the schools that the great Bible scholar Umberto Cassuto attended as a child just over a century ago. Similar oral transmissions of Talmud and Scripture in Yiddish continue to survive in some Jewish primary and secondary schools.) Banitt argues further that many characteristic Hebrew expressions that make their first appearance in Rashi's commentaries are best understood as Gallicisms, which is to say Rashi's rendering in written Hebrew of thoughts formed in the language of everyday speech, namely Old Northern French.

In the milieu of the yeshivah and elsewhere in modern Jewry, the study of Rashi's Talmud commentary is both a liturgical act (analogous to Christian "Bible study") and an academic exercise (analogous to obtaining a bachelor's degree) requisite to becoming a master of the cultural canon. CATANE has rendered yeoman service to people who study Rashi's commentary on the Talmud. He provides, on the basis of the findings of Darmsteter, Blondheim, and other luminaries, a comprehensive list of the French and other European-language glosses in Rashi's Talmud commentaries, together with the correct spelling in both Hebrew and Latin script and, where warranted, a concise explanation of what precisely the gloss is meant to add to Rashi's analysis of the talmudic passage in question. The numbered list, arranged according to the order of the Babylonian Talmud, is supplemented by alphabetic indexes in both Hebrew and Latin script and by concise, user-friendly introductions to the volume in English, French, and Hebrew.

To this day, students in Jewish day schools learn Rashi's methodology by osmosis, plowing through all his commentaries on the Pentateuch and much of the Prophets until the words and methods have been thoroughly absorbed by the student. For a more systematic approach to understanding Rashi, contemporary students will do well to make use of DORON's handy volume. The author applies his thorough grounding both in rabbinic lore and in the modern philological-historical study of the Hebrew Bible to Rashi's text. Doron's work contains the Hebrew text of Rashi, a lucid English translation, and a brilliant English supercommentary on Rashi's commentary, albeit only on the first six chapters of Genesis.

HAILPERIN's work is the most sophisticated and complete discussion yet produced both of Rashi and of Rashi's commentaries in their historical context. Doron and Catane's manuals are meant primarily for students, and the works by Saltman and Kamin and by Banitt are suited especially to scholars, but Hailperin's monumental volume has abiding interest for students, scholars, and laity. Hailperin presents in one handy volume: i) the most valuable biography of Rashi and his family; ii) flawless English translations of passages from Rashi's commentaries on the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Psalms, selected for their bearing on the major theme of the book, namely, the ongoing argument between Judaism and Christianity as to which of these two communities of faith reflects the authentic continuation of the religion of ancient Israel; and iii) lucid footnotes and appendixes, shedding light on a great array of people and issues. Hailperin set a new standard for the treatment of a Jewish culture-hero, who both before and since has been treated unremittingly much as George Washington was in the famous biography by Parson Weems. Unquestionably, the few scholars who have contributed books and articles of abiding worth on Rashi in English stand firmly on the shoulders of Hailperin.

Kamin was one a small handful of people who have demonstrated the necessary profundity to advance the study of Rashi very significantly beyond Hailperin. Tragically, Kamin's career was just getting off the ground when it was cut short by cancer. Her swan song, SALTMAN and KAMIN, demonstrates most lucidly what can be seen less clearly from Hailperin's book and from the well-known work of Beryl Smalley: the tremendous (quite immediate) impact that Rashi had on Christian exegesis of Scripture. Rashi, as Kamin expounded on several occasions, sought to show that Jewish allegorical interpretation of the Song of Songs (like Judaism itself) constituted a truth deeper than that found in Christian allegorical interpretation because the Jewish allegorical reading, as presented by Rashi, stood on the firm foundation of scientific lexicography, morphology, and syntax. The anonymous 13th-century Christian exegete who produced the Latin commentary published and analyzed by Saltman and Kamin accepted Rashi's argument and set out to produce a Christian allegorical commentary on the Song of Songs that copies much from Rashi but tries also to create a new Christian allegory based on scientific philology. The book contains a brilliant introduction presented in both Hebrew and English, a critical edition of the Latin text of the Christian commentary, and a rendering of that text in Hebrew and English. In addition, Saltman and Kamin make available here a reliable text of Rashi's commentary on the Song of Songs that avoids the mass of human errors that mark previous editions.

MAYER IRWIN GRUBER

Soloveitchik, Joseph Baer 1903–1993

Polish-born American theologian and rabbinic authority

- Agus, Jacob, Guideposts in Modern Judaism: An Analysis of Current Trends in Jewish Thought, New York: Bloch, 1954
- Angel, Marc D., Exploring the Thought of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1997
- Borowitz, Eugene, Choices in Modern Jewish Thought: A Partisan Guide, New York: Behrman House, 1983; 2nd edition, West Orange, New Jersey: Behrman House, 1995
- Goldberg, Hillel, Between Berlin and Slobodka: Jewish Transition Figures from Eastern Europe, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1989
- Goldy, Robert G., The Emergence of Jewish Theology in America (Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Hartman, David, A Living Covenant: The Innovative Spirit in Traditional Judaism, New York: Free Press, and London: Collier Macmillan, 1985
- Kaplan, Lawrence, "The Religious Philosophy of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik," Tradition, 14, Fall 1973
- Lichtenstein, Aharon, "Joseph Soloveitchik," in Great Jewish Thinkers of the Twentieth Century (B'nai B'rith Great Books Series, vol. 3), edited by Simon Noveck, Washington, D.C.: B'nai B'rith, Department of Adult Jewish Education, 1963
- Munk, Reinier, The Rationale of Halakhic Man: Joseph B. Soloveitchik's Conception of Jewish Thought (Amsterdam Studies in Jewish Thought, vol. 3), Amsterdam: Gieben, 1996
- Ziegler, Aharon, Halakhic Positions of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1998

The scion of an illustrious rabbinical family, Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik was the acknowledged leader of centrist Orthodoxy in the second half of the 20th century and was recognized both as a preeminent talmudic scholar and as a highly original interpreter of Jewish thought and theology. Beginning in 1941, Soloveitchik served as the master teacher of Talmud at Yeshiva University's affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary and chairman of the halakhah commission of the Rabbinical Council of America for more than 40 years. He was affiliated with Agudat Israel in the 1930s and addressed its national conventions during those years; in the 1940s, he identified with religious Zionism, and, until his death, he was honorary president of Mizrahi.

LICHTENSTEIN has drawn a very appealing portrait of Soloveitchik in the first systematic English-language presentation of his ideas. This essay helps the reader appreciate why Soloveitchik was revered by thousands of students and followers as "the Rav," the rabbi's rabbi, a role model among interpreters of Jewish law and theology. According to Lichtenstein, Soloveitchik's personal demeanor demonstrated that "Halakhic Man" (Soloveitchik's term) can be creative, open-minded, and compassionate, profoundly committed to the Torah and at the same time a sophisticated modern thinker.

BOROWITZ, a leading Reform Jewish theologian, provides a clear, nontechnical study of Soloveitchik in what may be the most satisfactory introduction to this seminal thinker who tried to build bridges between Orthodox Judaism and the modern world. According to Borowitz, Soloveitchik expresses greater confidence in human reason than does Martin Buber; he is in closer communication with the thoughtful but uncommitted inquirer than is A.J. Heschel; and he is more intellectually sophisticated than Mordecai Kaplan. One possible misconception that may arise from this analysis should be clarified. Borowitz worries that there is a certain ambiguity in Soloveitchik's concept of the Halakhic Man. Sometimes he implies that Halakhic Man is a pure type that is not intrinsically linked to Judaism, which leads Borowitz to ask if a learned Jesuit can be a halakhic personality, given that the Society of Jesus puts an emphasis on intellectualism and observance that appears to be akin to halakhic piety. On other occasions, Soloveitchik seems to believe that Halakhic Man is a category limited to Jews of a particular type. In that case, Borowitz contends, Soloveitchik reveals a certain elitism, dividing this small coterie of men from ordinary Jews and the rest of humanity. In fact, the ambiguity may not be quite so pronounced or so problematic as Borowitz suggests: Halakhic Man par excellence is the rabbinical scholar, but in a wider sense Soloveitchik uses the term at least to embrace any Jew who guides his life by the principles of the halakhah. Borowitz's general criticism of the use of pure types in Soloveitchik's writings is more significant. Soloveitchik structures his thoughts around an entire galaxy of ideal types (including Halakhic Man, Scientific Man, Religious Man, Mystic Man, and Lonely Man of Faith, among others), and Borowitz indicates how difficult it is to apply such typologies to real situations: "Typologies may illuminate, but it is never clear whence the types arise; why these and not others are selected; how the types used for various situations relate to one another; and what gives the total universe of types its integrity."

KAPLAN, a rabbi and a professor of Jewish studies at McGill University, has translated Soloveitchik's Halakhic Man into English and written about him repeatedly. His essay presents a rounded picture of Soloveitchik's religious philosophy and is particularly valuable for its extensive quotations from works only available in Hebrew. Kaplan maintains that while Soloveitchik's understanding of Halakhic Man is essentially valid, it sometimes needs to be qualified. For example, Soloveitchik contends that his protagonist does not view the regulations of the Torah as an alien law, imposed on him from the outside, but treats it as an internalized creation performed in perfect freedom. We must distinguish, says Kaplan, between the study and observance of halakhah, however: the halakhic personality experiences the Torah as his own creation and possession when he studies it, but when he has to put the halakhah into practice, he does feel the "yoke of the commandments."

ANGEL, rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in New York, has edited a collection of 14 valuable essays previously published in Tradition, a journal of Orthodox Jewish thought, to which he has added a general introduction and an overview of the individual contributions. The essays are well written and discuss many aspects of Soloveitchik's wide-ranging thought. Marvin Fox and Moshe Sokol come to opposite conclusions as to whether or not there is a unity to Soloveitchik's philosophy. Sokol contends that the existentialism of The Lonely Man of Faith is altogether different from the rationalist, neo-Kantian structure of Halakhic Man, while Fox finds a unifying principle in Soloveitchik's thesis that halakhah is the only legitimate source of Jewish doctrine. Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of the Commonwealth and a former teacher of philosophy, discusses Soloveitchik's early epistemology, identifying parallels between his thought and the works of the philosophers Hans-Georg Gadamer and Richard Rorty.

GOLDBERG offers a sensitive and penetrating analysis of the unresolved inner tensions in Soloveitchik's thought and the effects of those tensions on his students and disciples. According to Goldberg, "The upshot of Rabbi Soloveitchik's life and thought is the impossibility of harmony in life or thought, neither the living harmony of oscillation between struggle and tranquility, nor even the intellectual harmony of dialectic balance between polar concepts."

Just as the successors of G.W.F. Hegel can be divided into Right and Left Hegelians, so the followers of Soloveitchik can be separated into right-wing and left-wing factions. The right-wing followers include the rebbeim (Talmud teachers) at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Rabbinical Seminary affiliated with Yeshiva University, while those of the left-wing include Irving Greenberg, Emanuel Rackman, Avi Weiss, Walter Wurzbarger, and HARTMAN. Hartman is the founder and director of the Shalom Hartman Institute for Advanced Jewish Studies, a senior lecturer in the Department of Jewish Thought and Philosophy at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and an accomplished talmudist, who for many years attended the talmudic discourses of Soloveitchik. Hartman asserts that the writings of Soloveitchik demonstrate a shift in attitudes. Hartman argues that in the earlier works, Soloveitchik advocates the synthesis of Jewish thought and modern culture, while in his later writings, he expresses an ambivalence and hesitation, which Hartman finds regrettable. Hartman concludes that Soloveitchik became concerned "that if there were a total translation of the halakhic experience into Western rational categories, commitment to the halakha would be weakened."

A leading Conservative rabbi, who for many years had studied the Talmud and the philosophy of Maimonides under Soloveitchik, AGUS raises two objections to his teacher's position as espoused in Halakhic Man (the only work by Soloveitchik that had been published at the time Agus's criticism first appeared). First, Agus posits that Soloveitchik has failed to establish the independence and self-sufficiency of the halakhah, and he is therefore forced to bring in philosophical and kabbalistic concepts to explicate his philosophy of the halakhah. Second, Agus disputes Soloveitchik's contention that halakhic concepts are a priori in nature, charging that Soloveitchik improperly uses the term a priori in a dogmatic, Pickwickian sense. If one employs the term accurately to designate knowledge that is independent of experience and therefore held to be indubitable, then, Agus argues, halakhic principles in all their minutiae and particularity could never be regarded as a priori constructions. This argument, if sustained, undermines both Soloveitchik's apologia for Orthodox Judaism and his implied critique of the poisonous subjectivism of non-Orthodox varieties of Judaism.

GOLDY traces the influence of Protestant theologians on the thought of Soloveitchik, beginning with Søren Kierkegaard and Rudolf Otto, and particularly such neo-Orthodox exponents of crisis theology as Karl Barth and Paul Tillich. Goldy detects an inconsistency in Soloveitchik's openness to continuing dialogue between traditional Judaism and modern culture and thought, on the one hand, and his anti-ecumenical stance and unswerving opposition to interfaith theological dialogue, on the other. There is indeed this inconsistency in Soloveitchik's philosophy, but that fact does not necessarily constitute a genuine problem, for Soloveitchik is a self-avowed dialectical thinker who has pointed out that the Judaic dialectic, unlike the Hegelian, lacks the third stage of reconciliation (aufhebung). His anti-ecumenical views may therefore flow dialectically from his clear vision of the station and duties of Halakhic Man and actually reinforce his conception.

MUNK has written a very scholarly study of Soloveitchik's thought, which includes the only detailed critical examination of his doctoral dissertation on Hermann Cohen's epistemology and ontology. Munk concludes that Soloveitchik's critique demonstrates a fundamental and unbridgeable difference between his philosophy and that of Cohen regarding the character and methodology of thought and the correlation of thought and actuality. The dissertation also reveals the influence of Nicolai Hartmann and Max Scheler, among others, on Soloveitchik, while his later writings show that the impact of these phenomenologists grew more pronounced as his thinking developed. Successive chapters expound and analyze Soloveitchik's major philosophical works. Munk is reluctant to draw overall conclusions about Soloveitchik's thought because only a small fraction of his extensive, fragmentary, and sometimes incoherent oeuvre has been published. Munk does contend, however, that Soloveitchik's fine delineation and characterization of the lamdan (talmudic scholar), a type not exactly found in any other social group or religious community, is a significant contribution of lasting value.

ZIEGLER has formulated some of Soloveitchik's halakhic decisions in a manner suitable for the lay reader. In general, the rulings do not differ from those of the traditionalist rabbinic authorities, although there are two possible exceptions: first, Soloveitchik declares that it is mandatory, not merely permissible, for men who do not wear beards to shave on the intermediate days of Passover and Sukkot so as not to appear unkempt on the holidays. Second, he views Thanksgiving as a civil, and not a religious, holiday and permits its celebration. Unfortunately, Ziegler's work lacks a discussion of Soloveitchik's "modern" positions relating to the significance of the State of Israel, his advocacy of intensive Talmud study by women, and his endorsement of secular studies and philosophy.

Song of Songs

Bloch, Ariel and Chana Bloch, The Song of Songs: A New Translation with an Introduction and Commentary, New York: Random House, 1995

Brenner, Athalya (editor), A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs (Feminist Companion to the Bible, 1), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993

Falk, Marcia, Love Lyrics from the Bible: A Translation and Literary Study of the Song of Songs (Bible and Literature Series, 4), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Almond, 1982; revised as The Song of Songs: A New Translation and Interpretation, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990

Fox, Michael V., The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985

Pope, Marvin H., Song of Songs (Anchor Bible, 7C), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1977

Perhaps no other book of the Bible has elicited as much comment as the Song of Songs. The variety of interpretation is not merely the product of recent times, for diverse interpretive strategies were present already in antiquity, as the debate over whether the poem should enter the canon of Scripture demonstrates. The discovery of ancient Near Eastern texts since the mid-19th century has opened new corridors of interpretation. Yet, despite the wealth of comparative material, no consensus has been reached with regard to the Song's overall meaning, purpose, history, or original context.

As the entries below will attest, scholars have studied the eight-chapter poem from a variety of perspectives and have brought a variety of theoretical frameworks to bear upon the Song. Most of the important analyses and discussions of the Song remain largely inaccessible to a lay public, scattered as they are in scholarly journals and technically erudite monographs. Even some of the entries below, which are exceptionally accessible to general readers, contain some technical linguistic and philological data. Nevertheless, these works are representative of the most important advances in current understanding of the Song of Songs.

The recent translation of the Song by BLOCH and BLOCH benefits from the expertise of a world-renowned Semitist and a first-class poet. The result is a sensuous account of sexual awakening. The Hebrew text accompanies both the English translation and the commentary at book's end, and the frequent use of transliterations helps make the Song completely accessible to nonscholars. No conjectures are offered as to authorship, although linguistic evidence is used to place the date of the Song in the third century B.C.E. The commentary discusses the Song's place in the canon of Scripture and the history of its interpretation. This translation uniquely represents the passionate love described in the poem not as unrequited, but as consummated. The sexual delights in the Song are presented as reciprocal, tender, and erotic. Eros fills the Israelite landscape, and the lovers celebrate it. Although not portrayed as a drama, the poem carries dramatic effect, and Bloch and Bloch treat it not as an anthology of poetic snippets, but as a unity.

BRENNER's inaugural volume of the Feminist Companion to the Bible series is a collection of essays that investigate the Song from a variety of feminist critical perspectives. Written by a diverse array of scholars, the selections are generally cohesive and accessible to nonscholars. The articles are grouped into six units: the history of feminist readings of the Song; female authorship and culture; intertextual connections and the critique of patriarchy; structure and discourse; genre interpretation; and a scholarly retrospective. Each of the 20 essays offers a unique and insightful contribution to current understanding of the poem. Topics addressed in the essays run the complete gamut of historical inquiry on the Song, including the poem's female voice, audience, sexual imagery, and eventual canonization. The essays represent the most recent advances in feminist scholarship on the Song and demonstrate a fruitful union between feminist approaches to text and other interpretive strategies.

FALK offers an English translation along with a discussion of the Song's context, genre, themes, and motifs. Her translation, while at times straying from the Hebrew original, nonetheless captures the rapturous beauty of the poem. Her approach is primarily literary, paying special attention to the poem's structure. Falk sees no reason to treat the poem as a single text, opting instead to view the book as a collection of 31 lyric poems. In the analytic section of the book, Falk challenges the notion that the Song contains "bizarre, comical, and puzzling" imagery in those units of the Song commonly called wasfs, poetic sections that elaborately describe the human body. Falk contends that "sexist interpretation of the wasf . . . and of the Song in general is a striking example of how the text can be distorted by culturally biased reading." She also argues, for a variety of reasons, that the composition was penned by a woman and concludes that the Song itself speaks to mutuality and balance between the sexes.

FOX offers the only major study of the poem's relationship to Egyptian love poetry. Based on his comparisons, Fox argues that the Song of Songs "though often considered a loose collection of short songs, is in fact an artistic unity." He replaces the popular allegorical interpretation of the text with one that understands the poem as simply exploring the subject of sexual love between human beings. In addition to an in-depth commentary, examination of the Song's social setting, and compositional analysis, Fox provides a comprehensive discussion of the Egyptian materials and appends hieroglyphic transcriptions of the Egyptian texts themselves. These features make Fox's study valuable to scholar and nonscholar alike.

POPE's hefty volume remains the most comprehensive study of the poem to date. Virtually every aspect of the poem is discussed, from the ancient translations and the date of the book, to prosody, generic classification, and the medieval commentaries. One of Pope's most important contributions is his discussion of the history of interpretation of the Song, which covers a great deal of territory, from the early allegorization of the poem and later dramatic and mystical interpretations, to more recent feminist and psychoanalytical approaches. Based on a wealth of comparative data, especially from Mesopotamia and Ugarit, Pope concludes that the Song originally served as a cultic hymn for use in non-Israelite fertility worship. While some of this work, especially the commentary section, is philologically and linguistically oriented, the great majority is accessible to a general audience. It also provides a wealth of bibliographic information on the Song.

SCOTT B. NOEGEL

South Africa

- Abrahams, Israel, The Birth of a Community, Cape Town: Cape Town Hebrew Congregation, 1955
- Hellig, Jocelyn, "The Jewish Community in South Africa," in Living Faiths in South Africa, edited by Martin Prozesky and John de Gruchy, New York: St. Martin's Press, and London: Hurst, 1995
- Hoffmann, N.D., Seyfer ha-zikhroynes, 1916; translated as Book of Memoirs: Reminiscences of South African Jewry, Cape Town: Kaplan Centre for Jewish Studies and Research, University of Cape Town, 1996
- Shain, Milton, The Roots of Antisemitism in South Africa, Charlottesville and London: University Press of Virginia, 1994
- Shimoni, Gideon, Jews and Zionism: The South African Experience (1910–1967), Cape Town: Oxford University Press, 1980
- Suttner, Immanuel (editor), Cutting through the Mountain: Interviews with South African Jewish Activists, Johannesburg: Viking, 1997

The study of the Jews of English-speaking countries has achieved a new prominence in the aftermath of the destruction of European Jewry in the Holocaust. Although the Jewish community in the United States is clearly the most studied English-speaking community, Jews in Canada, New Zealand, Australia, Great Britain, Zimbabwe, and South Africa have also merited the attention of historians and sociologists. The number of Jews in South Africa peaked at 118,000; since the 1970s, many South African Jews have immigrated to Australia, the United States, and Israel, and the Jewish population in that nation is currently around 85,000. Because of the historical context of apartheid, the history of the Jews of South Africa has a character that is unique in modern Jewish history. In order to understand the full picture of how Jews have interacted with modernity in different social and political contexts, it is critical for the scholar to take into account the South African Jewish experience.

One of the classic books on the Jewish experience in South Africa is SHIMONI, a detailed account of the Jewish community in South Africa up to 1967 that places that community's history in the context of Zionism. The author covers most of the important political issues and particularly emphasizes the relationship between the Jews and the ruling groups in the country.

One of the best overviews for those seeking information about the Jewish community in South Africa in the 1990s is HELDIG, which was published as part of a collection of articles on all of the major religions in the country. Hellig adeptly gives a brief outline of the historical background of South African Jewry and presents a vivid picture of the different aspects of Jewish life in contemporary South Africa. Particularly interesting is her account of the unobservant Orthodox Jews who constitute the majority of the South African Jewish community. Nevertheless, Hellig correctly points out that there has been a tremendous revival of Torah study, worship, and observance, particularly in Johannesburg. She describes the development of small, informal prayer groups evoking the Eastern European shtiebl that have gained popularity at the expense of large institutionalized synagogues.

One of the most interesting historical documents of South African Jewry is a memoir by HOFFMANN that was written in Yiddish and originally published in 1916. The author describes the origins of the community and evaluates relations between Jews and Afrikaners. He also presents a great deal of information about the lives of South African blacks, although he displays a prejudiced perspective characteristic of his time. This document can be read in conjunction with ABRAHAM'S history of the Jews in the Western Cape Province until the end of the Anglo-Boer War in 1902. Other classics of South African Jewish history include Louis Herrman's A History of the Jews in South Africa (1930), and Gustav Saron and Louis Hotz's The Jews in South Africa: A History (1955).

SHAIN is a masterpiece describing the history of anti-semitism in South Africa up to 1930. His work is particularly important because, although the history of racism in South Africa has long been recognized, historians before Shain typically suggested that antisemitism was a foreign phenomenon that was introduced into South Africa in the 1930s through Nazi propaganda. Shain shows, however, that antisemitism had deep roots in South African society that dated back to the late 19th century. Using not only the expected political sources but also plays, novels, caricatures, and jokes, Shain's book serves as a central source for the history of Jewish-Christian relations in South Africa.

Since the end of apartheid, there has been an increasing interest in the role that Jews did or did not play in the struggle to end institutionalized racism. SUTTNER presents a collection of interviews with South African Jewish activists; the book is named for a statement in the Talmud that insists "let justice cut through the mountain." The collection includes interviews with many of the most important antiapartheid activists, including Joe Slovo and Ronnie Kasrils, both of whom were important figures in the armed struggle of the African National Congress against the apartheid government. Also included are interviews with the Nobel Prize-winning author Nadine Gordimer, musician Johnny Clegg, politician Helen Suzman, and Rabbi Ben Isaacson. The book is a very rich source of material on Jewish activists and can form the basis for a great deal of future analysis.

DANA EVAN KAPLAN

Spain

- Aronsfeld, C.C., The Ghosts of 1492: Jewish Aspects of the Struggle for Religious Freedom in Spain, 1848–1976 (Jewish Social Studies Monograph Series, no. 1), New York: Conference on Jewish Social Studies, 1979

- Ashtor, Eiyahu, Korot ha-Yehudim bi-Sefarad ha-Muslemit, 1960; as The Jews of Moslem Spain, 3 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973
- Avni, Haim, Spain, the Jews, and Franco, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1982
- Bachrach, Bernard S., Early Medieval Jewish Policy in Western Europe, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1977
- Baer, Yitzhak, Toldot ha-Yehudim bi-Sefarad ha-Notsrit, 1959; as A History of the Jews in Christian Spain, 2 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1961
- Carpenter, Dwayne E., Alfonso X and the Jews: An Edition of and Commentary on Siete Partidas 7:24 "De los Judíos" (University of California Publications in Modern Philology, vol. 115), Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986
- Chazan, Robert, Daggers of Faith: Thirteenth-Century Christian Missionizing and Jewish Response, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989
- Cohen, Jeremy, The Friars and the Jews: The Evolution of Medieval Anti-Judaism, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1982
- Kamen, Henry, The Spanish Inquisition, New York: New American Library, 1956; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1965; as The Spanish Inquisition: A Historical Revision, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1997; New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1998
- Katz, Solomon, The Jews in the Visigothic and Frankish Kingdoms of Spain and Gaul (Monographs of the Mediaeval Academy of America, no. 12), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Mediaeval Academy of America, 1937
- Lea, Henry Charles, A History of the Inquisition of Spain, 4 vols., New York and London: Macmillan, 1906–1907
- Netanyahu, B., The Origins of the Inquisition in Fifteenth Century Spain, New York: Random House, 1995
- Roth, Cecil, The Spanish Inquisition, London: Hale, 1937; New York: Norton, 1964
- Septimus, Bernard, Hispano-Jewish Culture in Transition: The Career and Controversies of Ramah (Harvard Judaic Monographs, 4), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982
- Wasserstein, David, The Rise and Fall of the Party-Kings: Politics and Society in Islamic Spain, 1002–1086, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1985

The sojourn of the Jews in Spain lasted at least 1,500 years, producing a vibrant and sophisticated culture inherited to a greater or lesser extent by Jews the world over. Their history is generally divided into periods according to the regnant religion of the peninsula: Visigothic Christians ruled from the fourth through seventh century; Ummayyad Muslims reigned from the eighth through the tenth century and were followed by division into several Berber Islamic kingdoms; and medieval Christian kingdoms ultimately joined forces and secured control of all of Spain in 1492. After the expulsion of the Jews in that year, organized Jewish life ceased to exist in Spain until the 20th century.

During the period of Visigothic rule in Spain, the Iberian peninsula gradually moved from an attitude of tolerance toward the Jews to one of repeated and virulent persecution. Anti-Jewish laws punctuate many of the seventh-century reigns, which succeeded one another in rapid succession. Useful discussions of Visigothic anti-Jewish policies are found in the studies by Bachrach and by Katz. KATZ's treatment, while informative, manifests all the signs of what Salo Baron referred to as the "lachrymose conception of Jewish history." Katz summarizes the period as follows: "The persecution of the Jews was due to the union between Church and State . . . for a century and a quarter kings and bishops united in an effort to convert the Jews of Spain or to drive them from the kingdom."

BACHRACH attempts to move away from the historiographical model represented by Katz and others in this field by offering a general survey of the early medieval policy of Western European governments toward Jews "from the perspective and aims of its formulators." Bachrach's sober assessment of Visigothic anti-Jewish policy leads him to challenge the received wisdom that Jews living in the Visigothic realm were subjected to an unrelenting series of anti-Jewish laws promulgated by a united church and monarchy. Insofar as such legislation was enacted, Bachrach argues that the noteworthy role played by the Jewish population in assisting the Arab conquerors indicates the utter failure of the Visigothic reign to break the political power of the Jewish community.

The Jews of Islamic Spain prior to the fall of Toledo in 1085 are the subject of ASHTOR's three-volume study. The author occasionally indulges in imaginative speculation in order to piece together a coherent narrative, but he nevertheless provides a good introduction to the dominant personalities and themes of the period.

Spanish history between the fall of Cordoba and the fall of Toledo, known as the period of the "party kings," is the subject of the close study by WASSERSTEIN. In a chapter on the Jews, Wasserstein describes Jewish life under these Berber rulers. In particular, he notes the increased political activity of the Jews and their assimilation of Islamic cultural patterns during this period. Wasserstein investigates the career of Samuel ibn Nagrela, who served as the vizier for the Zirid dynasty that ruled Granada.

The two-volume history by BAER is the standard work on the Jewish experience in Christian Spain. Baer punctuates his work with generous quotations from a wide variety of primary sources that provide the reader with a good sampling of the many areas of literary expression cultivated by Spanish Jewry.

SEPTIMUS analyzes the transition from Islamic to Christian rule through the career of a rabbinic leader who bridged the two civilizations, Rabbi Meir ha-Levi Abulafia (Ramah). Septimus focuses on Ramah's involvement in the controversy over Maimonidean rationalism, which, in many ways, exemplified the cultural clash between "Spanish intellectuals saturated with Greco-Arabic philosophy" and "northern French talmudists totally innocent of philosophical thought" that characterized this period of change.

As the Christian kingdoms gained control over the Iberian peninsula in the 13th century, they promulgated new laws to regulate the position of the Jews. CARPENTER presents a useful English translation of the laws of Alfonso the Wise.

For two significant and contrasting interpretations of the origins and scope of the missionary efforts aimed at the Jews and Muslims in the 13th century, see the books by Cohen and Chazan. COHEN argues that in the 13th and early 14th centuries, Franciscan and Dominican friars developed a "new Christian ideology with regard to the Jews, one that allotted [the Jews] no legitimate right to exist in European society" and constituted a radical break with patristic theology. Cohen attributes this new attitude to a sense of outrage that accompanied the Christian discovery of the Talmud's existence, a discovery that in the minds of the friars forfeited the Jews' right to legal protection in Christendom as the bearers of the Old Testament. CHAZAN, on the other hand, dismisses the notion that the mid-13th century saw the emergence of an altogether new ideology. The necessary ideological ammunition to justify the repudiation of the Jews, he argues, could be found in the venerable Augustinian doctrine. Chazan locates the intensification of Christian missionary efforts among the Spanish Jews within "a broader campaign to engage the non-Christian world in spiritual encounter," made possible by a new material and spiritual vigor and driven by a sense of theological anxiety and insecurity.

The operations of the Inquisition loom large in the destruction of the Jews of Spain. The classic study of the history, methods, and chief actors of the Spanish Inquisition is LEA's four-volume work. NETANYAHU's monumental study of the Inquisition and the Jewish question traces antisemitism in Spain from antiquity through the Middle Ages, examining the Inquisition as a racist, antisemitic institution. This volume supplements the author's earlier work in which he examined the Hebrew sources relating to the expulsion. ROTH's work, although somewhat dated, is still useful. He examines the events leading up to the establishment of the Inquisition in the 15th century and follows its evolution through to its demise in the 19th century. KAMEN offers a broader view of the interaction of the Inquisition with Spanish politics, literature, and religion. He stresses that Spain's decision to expel its Jews was neither surprising nor extraordinary. In describing the historical context for the expulsion, Kamen argues that "the expulsion was, in its widest interpretation, an attempt by the feudalistic nobility to eliminate that section of the middle class—the Jews—which was threatening its predominance in the state."

The lingering echoes of the expulsion in the Spanish historical consciousness are examined by ARONSFELD, who traces the vicissitudes of the debate over abrogation of the expulsion decree and the continuing anti-Jewish forces in the Spanish parliament. Aronsfeld recounts how liberal-minded Spanish politicians who joined forces with Jewish leaders from other countries to seek the readmission of Jews repeatedly encountered strong resistance due to the enduring legacy of the racist doctrines of the expulsion.

AVNI offers a reassessment of Spain's role in rescuing Jews during World War II. While acknowledging that "the Spanish authorities did not discriminate against Jews when they were among large numbers of French, Polish, Dutch, and other refugees illegally crossing the Spanish border," Avni argues that when the fate of Jews alone was at stake Franco's regime reduced its rescue efforts to the barest minimum, with the tacit approval of the Allies.

JANE GERBER
AND ARNOLD FRANKLIN

Spinoza, Baruch de 1632–1677

Dutch philosopher

- Allison, Henry E., Benedict de Spinoza, Boston: Twayne, 1975; as Benedict de Spinoza: An Introduction, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1987
- Curley, Edwin, Behind the Geometrical Method: A Reading of Spinoza's Ethics, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988
- Garrett, Don (editor), The Cambridge Companion to Spinoza, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996
- Hampshire, Stuart, Spinoza (Pelican Philosophy Series, 1), Harmondsworth, Middlesex: Penguin, 1951; New York: Barnes and Noble, 1956; revised edition, Harmondsworth, Middlesex, and New York: Penguin, 1987
- Harris, Errol E., Spinoza's Philosophy: An Outline, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities, 1992
- Harris, Errol E., The Substance of Spinoza, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities, 1995
- Lloyd, Genevieve, Routledge Philosophy Guidebook to Spinoza and the Ethics, London and New York: Routledge, 1996
- Mason, Richard, The God of Spinoza: A Philosophical Study, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997
- Norris, Christopher, Spinoza and the Origins of Modern Critical Theory (Bucknell Lectures in Literary Theory, 5), Oxford and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1991
- Silverman, R.M., Baruch Spinoza: Outcast Jew, Universal Sage (Jews in Modern Culture), Northwood, Middlesex: Symposium, 1995
- Smith, Steven B., Spinoza, Liberalism, and the Question of Jewish Identity, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1997
- Strauss, Leo, Spinoza's Critique of Religion, New York: Schocken, 1965
- Wolfson, Harry A., The Philosophy of Spinoza: Unfolding the Latent Processes of His Reasoning, 2 vols., Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1934
- Yovel, Yirmiyahu, Spinoza and Other Heretics, vol. 1: The Marrano of Reason, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Yovel, Yirmiyahu, Spinoza and Other Heretics, vol. 2: The Adventures of Immanence, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992

Countless studies testify to the worldwide importance and influence of Baruch (Benedictus) de Spinoza, who has remained nevertheless a figure of disputed significance within Jewish thought. He has been ostracized as a bitter critic of religion and celebrated as a pioneer of secular Judaism, hailed as a “God-intoxicated man” and excoriated as an atheist. This small selection from a vast secondary literature attempts to bring together classic studies and recent publications relating to Spinoza’s Ethics and to both his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (TTP) and his Tractatus Politicus (TP). Some of these studies adopt a broad perspective, while others are in-depth treatments of particular themes, especially his controversial position within, or rather at the margin of, Jewish thought.

HAMPSHIRE’s original edition has gone through many reprints and a few revisions since 1951. His clearly articulated study of Spinoza’s thought aims “to give such a critical exposition of his most important doctrines as will be intelligible and interesting even to the non-specialist without any sacrifice of accuracy or completeness: so far as possible to abstain from technical jargon, but also to avoid undue simplification.” After elucidating Spinoza’s philosophical background, the study follows Spinoza’s own order of exposition in The Ethics and expounds his metaphysical doctrine of the one substance, God or Nature, as the central feature of his all-embracing framework. Hampshire then describes and assesses Spinoza’s ideas on the nature of knowledge and freedom, the existence of God, ethics and politics, and mind and matter, in an attempt “to keep the balance between the theoretical and the metaphysical interests of . . . The Ethics and the practical and political reasoning in the TTP and in the TP.” The appendix provides a brief account of Spinoza’s life.

Another excellent general introduction to the life and work of Spinoza is ALLISON’s study, “intended primarily for the general reader or student with some background in philosophy,” but, at the same time, also addressing “the more advanced student and perhaps even the specialist.” His lucid presentation of “an exacting overview of Spinoza’s entire philosophy” aims both at breadth and at depth. A brief account of Spinoza’s life is followed by a presentation of the main features of 17th-century thought that are relevant to an understanding of Spinoza’s ideas today. Allison examines critically the chief doctrines of The Ethics, closely following “the actual course of [the] arguments” in the primary text in order to assist “the reader who is struggling to follow the often tortuous course of Spinoza’s thought.” Discussion of the notion of freedom leads to an exposition of Spinoza’s political philosophy, and the final chapter considers his views on religion, together with his revolutionary biblical criticism.

HARRIS (1992) is a serious yet “simplified introductory presentation of the major branches of Spinoza’s philosophy” that will help beginning students gain access, in plain language, to the main ideas and line of reasoning Spinoza expounded, without being overburdened with a scholarly apparatus. The introduction considers the current appeal of Spinoza’s thought and advances the view that his system resulted from the exertions of a man of great integrity and moral sincerity, and that it can still provide practical guidance for contemporary problems of human existence. Separate chapters explore Spinoza’s deductive reasoning, his idea of God, and his “reconciliation” of mind and body, time and eternity, teleology and freedom, and good and evil. Finally Harris addresses Spinoza’s views on politics and religion, whereby the latter is transformed into a form of consciousness that “embraces all time and all existence in an eternal concept of the whole.”

LLOYD’s accessibly written introductory manual will appeal to any beginning student who seeks to be led through the complex text of Spinoza’s Ethics. This brief but thorough guide deals with the key issues of Spinoza’s thought, evaluating his arguments in their historical context before assessing them for their continuing relevance to contemporary philosophy. It also introduces the uninitiated reader to the many angles from which The Ethics can be approached by providing an overview of other scholars’ critical interpretations. In a clearly structured and concise way, Lloyd examines Spinoza’s ideas on God, minds and bodies, freedom, knowledge, and love of God. The final chapters pay special attention to Spinoza’s ideas on the eternity of the mind and address the question, “What makes The Ethics an ethical work?”

CURLEY provides the advanced student with a substantial introduction to The Ethics. Reworked from his Jerusalem Spinoza lectures of 1984, it is the fruit of 25 years of study of Spinoza. This volume by the renowned editor and translator of Spinoza’s collected works is addressed both to the professional Spinoza scholar and to anyone who is prepared to read carefully and who has some knowledge of the thought of Descartes and Hobbes. Curley’s masterly reading of The Ethics falls into two sections: the first part follows Spinoza’s own arguments and shows how they originated from his study of Descartes and Hobbes; the scholarly notes constituting the second part attempt to support some of the more controversial conclusions advanced in the first part, with abundant references to recent commentators on Spinoza.

WOLFSON’s two magisterial volumes on Spinoza’s philosophy have remained a standard work in spite of some recent criticism (from Curley among others) for relating Spinoza more to scholastic thought than to the thought of his immediate predecessors. Primarily based upon The Ethics, Wolfson’s study aims to relate the explicit Benedictus to the implicit Baruch, “the first of the moderns” to “the last of the medievals.” Following Spinoza’s own method, he traces the philosopher’s building blocks backward, analyzing them both for their detailed meaning and for their wider connotations for his whole system. Wolfson’s work can therefore be read as a running commentary on The Ethics or as a rich source book of ideas and their development in the history of philosophy, including discussions of the thought of Maimonides, Crescas, and Spinoza’s other Jewish sources. Spinoza’s definitions of substance, mode, attributes, and other terms and concepts are all given a thorough analysis, and the last chapter assesses the innovations and radicalism of Spinoza’s thought.

Spinoza’s concept of “substance” lies at the heart of the collection of essays by HARRIS (1995), which aims at clarifying some of the more vexing problems in Spinoza’s thought. Harris addresses the relationship between Spinoza’s methodology and the metaphysical content of his philosophy, present in notions such as the finite and infinite. He examines the meaning of the infinity of the divine attributes and the doctrine of the mind-body relationship, the order of ideas and things, the human mind, and God’s mind. The second part deals with Spinoza’s politics and religion and his ideas of natural law and contract, before taking issue with Strauss's suggestion of an esoteric doctrine in the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. The final part looks at Spinoza's spiritual relationship with Leibniz and assesses his influence on Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, and their criticisms of him. The emphasis in Harris's study is on "Spinoza's holism and its implications both within and beyond Spinoza's own writings," and the work is addressed to the more advanced student.

The collection of essays written by an international team of scholars and edited by GARRETT is one in a series of Cambridge companions to major philosophers, aimed at the non-specialist as well as the advanced student. Each of the essays provides a clear and systematic approach to a different aspect of Spinoza's thought, covering his metaphysics, epistemology, psychology, and political theory and his revolutionary ideas on religion and biblical criticism. His controversial image is discussed along with his achievements, the reception of his thought and influence, and some more recent perspectives on his life and works. Other contributions throw new light on Spinoza as a keen scientist and consider his influence on psychology and also on political thought (Henry Kissinger claimed to have been influenced by some of Spinoza's "Machiavellian" ideas). This up-to-date study, to which has been added a substantial bibliography, will serve as a useful reference work on recent developments in the interpretation of Spinoza's thought.

NORRIS emphasizes the lasting influence of Spinoza's thought for poets and literary theorists, after considering his invigorating influence on the Enlightenment. His study has three aims: to establish "that nearly all the great debates in present-day literary theory have their origin in one or another aspect of Spinoza's work," to trace Spinoza's influence on French movements of thought over the past three decades (from Althusserian Marxism to hermeneutics, deconstruction, narrative poetics, new historicism, and thinkers such as G. Deleuze), and most importantly, to demonstrate that Spinoza's work "may help us to perceive some of the fallacies . . . of foreshortened historical perspective that have characterized the discourse of literary theory in its latest post-modern phase." Norris's book is therefore addressed primarily to the student of French poststructuralism and its offshoots, rather than to Spinoza specialists.

STRAUSS's thorough and scholarly study of Spinoza's religious philosophy draws conclusions that remain controversial and challenging (see, for example, Harris [1995] and Donagan in Garrett). Its central theme is the critical presentation of Spinoza's Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. Strauss maintains that Spinoza was inconsistent and contradicted himself on numerous occasions, charging him with deliberately discrediting traditional Judaism and with undermining the authority of Scripture. He addresses Spinoza's critique of Maimonides' and Calvin's thought, then examines Spinoza's political doctrines such as his theory of natural right and the social function of religion. He considers both Spinoza's interest in and his indifference to the Bible as well as his philological and historical criticism of it. The thoughts of Spinoza's forerunners, Uriel da Costa and Isaac de la Peyrère, and their critique of religion are also expounded, together with aspects of Hobbes's attitude toward religion.

A liberal Jewish approach to Spinoza is undertaken in SILVERMAN's study, which portrays Spinoza's thought as representative of "both a radical break with traditional norms and a dependence upon them." An introductory sketch looks at "how Spinoza has been received by Jews and non-Jews of various outlooks." Addressing the magnitude of Spinoza's legacy in the 20th century, its relation to Judaism, and the current challenge offered by his thought, Silverman demonstrates how Spinoza can be shown to reflect traditional Jewish values and takes a fresh approach with regard to his reputed "heresies." Silverman gives credit to Spinoza's Bible criticism and its impact on the Reform movement, and he outlines Spinoza's political theory in terms of its influence on current secularist thinking in Israel. Spinoza studies aside, this lively book should appeal to anyone interested in an unprejudiced critical analysis of many of the conceptual building blocks that make up Judaism.

YOVEL's (1989a, 1989b) erudite and richly informative volumes present Spinoza "as the most outstanding and influential thinker of modernity." The first volume examines the world of the Marranos and is indispensable for an understanding of Spinoza's background and his break with the Amsterdam Jewish community. Yovel clarifies how the crypto-Jewish life of generations of Marranos undermined both Judaism and Christianity, leading to skepticism and secularism. Providing fascinating insight into the patterns of the Marrano mind and experience, Yovel portrays Spinoza in a newly secularized context before examining his significance for contemporary Jewish thought. Surveying the thought of Kant, Hegel, Heine, Marx, Nietzsche, Freud, and Einstein for their indebtedness to Spinoza, Yovel demonstrates in his second volume how all these thinkers shared the essentials of Spinoza's notion of immanence and reveals the extent to which this idea has left its mark on modern culture as a major liberating force.

SMITH's lucid, comprehensive, and scholarly book is the first study to connect two strands of Spinoza's thought: first, he portrays Spinoza as a politically engaged thinker who "advocated and embodied a new conception of the emancipated individual" and who influenced political movements as diverse as the Enlightenment, liberalism, and political Zionism. Second, and more importantly for Judaism, Smith considers how the liberal solution has affected the Jewish question. He argues with regard to the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus that Spinoza was the first Jewish thinker who made the civil status of Jews essential to modern political thought by recasting Judaism "to include the liberal values of autonomy and emancipation from tradition." Spinoza's powerful statements for freedom of thought and expression and his theories of right and contract earn him "a rightful place in the history of political thought as one of the leading philosophical founders of modern liberalism." This book probes deeply into the relationship between Judaism and liberalism and successfully demonstrates that it was Spinoza who "made the Jewish question an essential ingredient of modern political thought."

The concept of God is central to the thought of Spinoza to such extent that he has been celebrated as a "God-intoxicated man," while he has also been accused of atheism for choosing to live outside any religious community. Bringing together the philosopher's fundamental conclusions about God and religion, MASON's clear and carefully reasoned book "is the fullest study in English for many years on the role of God in Spinoza's philosophy." While the first part of this study examines God's existence, nature, and relationship to the world in terms of causality and is, "of necessity, more philosophically technical, the conclusions should be of interest to theologians and philosophers of religion as well as to philosophers." The second part deals with Spinoza's judgment of religion in general, its origins, history, and practices, while the third part addresses Spinoza's ideas on religious freedom. Some of Mason's conclusions challenge the stereotype of Spinoza as a rationalist and emphasize his commitment to consistency in an overall immanent worldview, so apparent in Spinoza's identification of the study of nature with the study of God: only if the world's phenomena can be understood scientifically, he maintains, can a proper, God-like view of the universe be achieved.

ESTHER I. SEIDEL

Steinberg, Milton 1903–1950

American theologian

- Cohen, Arthur A., "Introduction," in Steinberg's Anatomy of Faith, New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1960
- Cohen, Arthur A., "Judaism in Transition," in his The Natural and the Supernatural Jew: An Historical and Theological Introduction, New York: Pantheon, 1962; London: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1967; 2nd edition, New York: Behrman House, 1979
- Goldy, Robert G., The Emergence of Jewish Theology in America (The Modern Jewish Experience), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Noveck, Simon, Milton Steinberg: Portrait of a Rabbi, New York: Ktav, 1978
- Noveck, Simon, "Kaplan and Milton Steinberg: A Disciple's Agreements and Disagreements," in The American Judaism of Mordecai M. Kaplan (Reappraisals in Jewish Social and Intellectual History), edited by Emanuel S. Goldsmith et al., New York: New York University Press, 1990

Milton Steinberg was a noted Conservative rabbi with Reconstructionist leanings, an author and theological writer. His little book Basic Judaism was justly praised as one of the best presentations of the Jewish religion, and his novel As a Driven Leaf had a certain vogue and still remains in print.

NOVECK (1978) was a former student of Steinberg at the Jewish Theological Seminary, and he then served as Steinberg's assistant at the Park Avenue Synagogue in New York. In 1950, after Steinberg's death at the early age of 46, Noveck became his successor, serving in that capacity until the fall of 1956. This perceptive and meticulously researched biography concentrates on three areas in which Steinberg distinguished himself, and in which he was regarded as a paradigm of what a rabbi should be: the congregational rabbinate, writing, and teaching. Noveck describes a Steinberg who grew up in Syracuse, New York, and excelled early in his academic studies. His parents had largely given up Jewish observances, but the family lived with his maternal grandparents, and Steinberg fondly remembered the religious atmosphere of the home. When he was a teenager, Steinberg's family moved to New York City, where they joined a Conservative synagogue. There Steinberg came under the influence of its rabbi, Jacob Kohn, who discussed religious philosophy with him and encouraged him to practice traditional Judaism.

At City College in New York, Steinberg was intellectually stimulated by the courses in philosophy that he pursued under Morris Raphael Cohen, a naturalist, who was highly critical of theism and organized religion. Noveck clearly portrays the battle going on in Steinberg's mind between Cohen and Kohn: the secularist arguments of the one and the religious counterarguments of the other. Steinberg studied for the rabbinate at the Jewish Theological Seminary but was disappointed in his hope that his studies would help him resolve his theological doubts. He was on the verge of withdrawing from the seminary on half a dozen occasions, and he would have done so were it not for Mordecai Kaplan, the Morris Cohen of the seminary faculty. Kaplan was a disabuser and a cleanser of inherited prejudices and unexamined assumptions, but, unlike Cohen, he was not merely critical and negative. Kaplan wanted to refashion and revitalize Judaism for the modern world, and toward that end he founded the Reconstructionist movement, which Steinberg joined and in which he was active. Steinberg was renowned for his thought-provoking sermons, which were a model of clarity, relevance, and beauty. He realized that many of his listeners did not have the philosophical background to follow all his ideas, but he felt that the pulpit was a place from which one should draw not only stimulus and courage, but also knowledge and guidance. Steinberg's sermons dealt with three major topics: problems of Zionism and Jewish survival, doctrines and beliefs, and social problems in the light of Jewish tradition. Some representative sermons are titled: "Intermarriage: Is It Wise? Is It Right?" "Lessons from Germany," "Can We Be Orthodox?" "What Value Has Prayer?" "Mercy Killings," and "The Dilemma of the Pacifist." Steinberg loved the congregational ministry, and people from all walks of life perceived him to be a charismatic and extraordinarily sensitive leader.

Steinberg's first book, The Making of the Modern Jew, published in 1934, attracted wide attention as a discussion of the factors of Jewish survival in the face of persecution. Its sequel, A Partisan Guide to the Jewish Problem (1945), which had a great impact, makes it clear that to Steinberg the most tenable theory of Jewish life in America is that of living in two civilizations, being at home in both American and Jewish culture. In a particularly eloquent epilogue, Steinberg replies to the question, "Why be Jews?" with a ringing affirmation that, despite misery and persecution, Jewish life is infinitely worthwhile. Steinberg's semiautobiographical historical novel, As a Driven Leaf (1939), dealt with the conflict in the soul of a first-century talmudic sage, Elisha ben Abuyah, who was drawn to both Hellenism and Hebraism, and whose struggle to live in two worlds destroyed his ability to live in either. Elisha is emblematic of Steinberg himself and his family in many ways.

Steinberg somewhat complacently took it for granted that the deep, demonstrated roots of his own faith would be transmitted automatically to his two sons, Jonathan and David. They were given only a spotty, sporadic Jewish education and were not required to observe Jewish law. In the year before his death, Steinberg began to work very closely on Latin with his older son Jonathan, and during his father's funeral, Jonathan suddenly stepped forth and read one of his father's favorite passages from the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. When interviewed by Noveck, Steinberg's son, by then a professor of history at Cambridge University and completely alienated from Jewish life, remarked ruefully that his father was too permissive and that if he had been stricter things might have turned out differently. Perhaps Rabbi Steinberg himself was somewhat ambivalent and uncertain about the synthesis he tried to achieve between Jewish values and American ideals. Like his fictional hero, Elisha, Steinberg came to appreciate the centrality of faith in human life. Noveck ends his study with a touching story. Just before he finished his book, Noveck visited Steinberg's grave in Westchester County, north of New York City. His tombstone contains the words "Faith and Reason," which his wife had chosen, but the word "Reason" is covered with foliage, and now, from a distance, nothing remains but "Faith."

Cohen was a student and admirer of Steinberg during the last five years of Steinberg's life. His two essays supplement each other and can be considered together: COHEN (1960) is expository and summarizes Steinberg's views, while COHEN (1962) is a critical evaluation of those views. In Cohen's judgment, Steinberg was not a theological pathbreaker and made no significant contribution to American Jewish thought in the 1930s and 1940s. Steinberg's novel, As a Driven Leaf, marks a turning point in his thinking. Toward the end of his life, he criticized Reconstructionism as being unyielding to theological speculation and closed to the requirements of poetry. In particular, Steinberg became highly critical of Kaplan's conception of God as the sum total of those forces that enhance life and make for salvation. He raised the following objections and reservations to this view: it is not clear whether God is the Supreme Being, an entity that really exists, an aspect of reality, an abstract metaphysical principle, or merely a useful fiction. Steinberg pointedly asked: "Who adds up 'the sum' in 'the sum total of forces that make for salvation?' Is the sum added up 'out there' or in the human imagination?" Further, this conception comes close to tribalism in religion because of its relativism and parochialism in time and space.

NOVECK (1990) examines the different approaches to the problem of God as conceived by Steinberg and Kaplan. Kaplan prefers to speak of God as a process or force rather than an entity or being. He rejects the latter idea because he sees in it a remnant of anthropomorphism and mythology. For Kaplan "God" is not a substantive noun, such as "gold" or "silver," but a functional noun, such as "president" or "ruler." God is, therefore, a correlative noun, with salvation or human fulfillment as the correlate. The term "God" for Kaplan denotes the power or process both in the cosmos and in man that makes for human fulfillment (or salvation) in the pursuit of the ideals of truth, goodness, and beauty, interwoven in a pattern of holiness. Steinberg's theology is more traditional in its approach to belief in God. For him God is a personal being, a supreme existential reality; a God who is merely an aspect of reality, the sum of those forces that make for the enhancement of life, is not enough of a God. For Steinberg, belief in God is a hypothesis to be tested, like any other hypothesis. The theistic explanation of the world and the human situation fits the facts better than any rival theory. Noveck minimizes the differences between Kaplan and Steinberg, seeing the areas of agreement between them as far greater than the areas of disagreement. Noveck denies that Steinberg was distancing himself from Kaplan, and that if he had lived, he would have disassociated himself entirely from Kaplan and from the Reconstructionist movement. He tried to reconcile a more traditional metaphysics with the reconstruction of Jewish life in the modern world. It is not entirely clear, however, how Steinberg, for example, can speak of "God as a lawgiver" and yet accept Kaplan's approach to Jewish ritual as religious folkways.

GOLDY examines the relationship between Steinberg and Will Herberg. When Herberg became disillusioned with Marxism and turned instead to Jewish theology for guidance, Steinberg helped him gain a forum and respectability in rabbinic circles. Herberg, for his part, influenced Steinberg to question the religious liberalism that he espoused and to study the work of Jewish existentialists, especially Martin Buber and Franz Rosenzweig. While Steinberg was undeniably rethinking his position and turning in a new direction, it may be wondered whether this move was really in the direction of religious existentialism or rather toward the process theology of Whitehead and Hartshorne. Steinberg's untimely death pre-empted articulation of his mature standpoint.

JACOB HABERMAN

Sudan see Egypt and Sudan

Suicide

- Droge, Arthur J. and James D. Tabor, A Noble Death: Suicide and Martyrdom among Christians and Jews in Antiquity, San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992
- Goldstein, Sidney, Suicide in Rabbinic Literature, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1989
- Hankoff, Leon D., "Judaic Origins of the Suicide Prohibition," in Suicide: Theory and Clinical Aspects, edited by Leon D. Hankoff and Bernice Einsidler, Littleton, Massachusetts: PSG, 1979
- Reines, Ch. W., "The Jewish Attitude toward Suicide," Judaism, 10(2), 1961
- Rosner, Fred, "Suicide in Biblical, Talmudic and Rabbinic Writings," Tradition: A Journal of Orthodox Thought, 11(2), 1970-1971
- Shapiro, Marc B., "Suicide and the World-to-Come," AJS Review, 18(2), 1993
- Siegel, Seymour, "Religion: A Jewish View," in Suicide: Theory and Clinical Aspects, edited by Leon D. Hankoff and Bernice Einsidler, Littleton, Massachusetts: PSG, 1979

Halakhic Judaism generally distinguishes between two forms of intentional death. One who agrees to be killed in order to avoid idolatry, incest (to include adultery), and bloodshed is described as mekaddesh ha-Shem (sanctifying God's name); one who intentionally kills himself for personal reasons may be viewed as me'abbed 'atmo beda'at (destroying himself wittingly). While the former is praised and venerated as a holy devotee, the latter is condemned and scorned as a selfish transgressor. According to the post-talmudic tractate Semahot, unsanctioned acts of voluntary death deny the dead ordinary burial rites. Subsequent popular perceptions deprived self-destroyers of a place in the world to come.

HANKOFF argues that the prohibition against suicide originated in the Bible. In his view, the generic prohibition against spilling blood in Genesis 9:4–6 includes self-killing. God's rejections of Jonah's, Elijah's, and Job's wishes to end their lives prematurely connote, in Hankoff's opinion, such a ban. Hankoff associates the prohibition against voluntary death with the Semites' belief that blood carries the soul and bonds the tribe's sacred relationships. Blood, as a sacred property, could be shed only with communal consent. Individuals who shed their own blood were acting alone, thus jeopardizing the social structure and violating the tribe's covenant with the divine. Hankoff therefore considers the Gileadites' burning of Saul's body a form of communal undoing of the king's illegal spilling of his blood. He views cases of self-destruction that did not involve actual bloodshed as "less heinous." Hankoff reaches these conclusions at the same time that he acknowledges that the Bible does not explicitly condemn or ban self-destruction.

According to DROGE and TABOR, the Bible neither condemns nor bans suicide at all. Samson's honorable burial by his family and Ahitophel's burial in his fathers' tomb do not indicate that an unusual treatment of suicides was practiced. According to the authors, the Bible presents Samson's (Judges 16:23–31) and King Saul's (1 Samuel 31:13; 2 Samuel 21:12–14) deaths as noble. What determines the biblical attitude toward self-killing is the circumstances that lead to the act rather than the act itself. In the Hellenistic and Roman periods, the perception of self-killing as a noble act further increased. The authors discuss extensively Josephus Flavius's descriptions of self-inflicted deaths during military and political events. They downplay Josephus's view of self-killing as an act of madness, which leads suicides to the "darker regions of the nether world." Josephus's remarks that self-killers are not to be buried until sunset (like criminals) and that children suffer for their parents' self-destructive acts (Jewish War) are ignored. Despite Genesis Rabbah's (34:13) and Rabbi Eleazar's prohibition against injuring oneself (Baba Kamma 91b) and the caveat not to see the grave as a place of refuge (Abot 4:22), the authors argue that the Talmud does not oppose taking one's own life. Moreover, they suggest that the desire to enter the world to come served as a motivation for self-killing. The Talmud, however, does not present entry to the world to come as the motivation for deliberate deaths even in cases of martyrdom, and some tragic stories (Berakhot 23a; Hullin 94a) are mentioned in order to prevent circumstances that might lead to self-killing. While one may occasionally disagree with the authors' interpretations, this stimulating book is nonetheless an essential contribution. Through their fresh methodology, the authors have done much to clarify the role and scope of this puzzling phenomenon in antiquity.

SIEGEL relies on the assumption that the value of human life has always been a central motif in Judaism. Using the term suicide in a pejorative sense, the article views self-killing as a denial of divine providence. King Saul constitutes an exception, for his death was decreed by God and foretold by Samuel. Hanina ben Teradyon's story (Avodah Zarah 18a–b) serves the author as a paradigm of religious devotion. Despite the cases of Saul and the 400 youths who chose self-drowning (Gittin 57b), Siegel holds that normative Judaism rarely permits self-killing even when religious and moral danger is imminent. Such acts would display a denial of hope in the Omnipotent. For this reason, he argues, rabbis did not approve self-killing in Nazi ghettos. In line with current rabbinic consensus, Siegel concludes that normative Judaism today views most suicides as individuals who destroyed themselves "unwillfully." Thus, as tractate Semahot instructs, they cannot be held culpable, and the usual rites of burial abide. Only suicides that "consciously" challenge the boon of life and the existence of their Creator do not merit the rites for the dead.

REINES introduces discussion of sociological, psychological, and philosophical aspects of suicide. He views suicide as an offense against the protagonist and humanity. From a social viewpoint, individuals lack the right to self-destruct. In his view, the Jewish unequivocal condemnation of suicide as a sinful act against God inspired Christianity and Islam. Based on the biblical stories of voluntary death that were committed under political and military duress, Reines argues that rabbis made exceptional decisions in similar situations. Yet he infers that suicide was unknown to the Israelites. Reines concludes with a useful observation: the treatment of suicides in rabbinic literature may seem rigid and dogmatic, but in actual practice the rabbis understood suicide's psychology and thus "exercised realistic flexibility."

ROSNER begins with the biblical stories of suicide, leaving out the case of Abimelech. Short rabbinic commentaries follow Saul's and Zimri's stories. Next Rosner skims through the Apocrypha and also adds brief descriptions of Job's near suicide and Josephus Flavius's reports on Jotapata and Masada. He continues with examples of suicide in talmudic, midrashic, and late rabbinic material. The article concludes with the section "Martyrdom in Judaism." Rosner could have avoided many of his inaccurate statements if he had set for himself definitions of suicide and martyrdom. He mentions the stories of Hanina ben Teradyon, the archetype of martyrdom in Judaism, and the 400 youths (Gittin 57b) in his section "Suicide in the Talmud," instead of in his section on martyrdom. Yet he determines that "Judaism regards suicide as a crime and strictly forbidden by Jewish law." His talmudic illustrations do not justify such a strict assertion. He inappropriately analogizes the suicide with "one who burns a Sefer Torah," and unfoundedly concludes in the name of the rabbis that "he who willfully destroys himself has no share in the world to come." Another erroneous statement is that "martyrdom includes the ending of one's own life." Nowhere in the Talmud is taking one's life as an act of martyrdom explicitly approved. Rosner's example of Hanina ben Teradyon contradicts his own conclusion.

GOLDSTEIN thoroughly covers suicidal incidents from biblical through recent times and reviews the diverse commentaries they have triggered. His attempt to arrive at a halakhic definition of suicide is useful in understanding various rabbinic decisions. Goldstein's classifications of suicides clarify why talmudic rabbis exonerated numerous cases. When self-destruction resulted from poverty, humiliation, mental illness, or personal stress, rabbis exercised leniency and often found the suicides inculpable. Such suicides thus are not denied burial rites. But no unanimous ruling exists. Chapter six, "Suicide as an Act of Martyrdom," views the acts of suicide it describes as praiseworthy and meritorious. Although technically correct, from the halakhic viewpoint, the Hebrew terms for suicide and martyrdom constitute a contradiction. Excursus 1, "Mourning Procedures for an Intentional Suicide," sheds more light on suicides' burial rites. The many quotations in the appendix reinforce Goldstein's exhaustive study.

SHAPIRO convincingly demonstrates that the rabbinic maxim "those who commit suicide have no share in the world to come" has no halakhic foundation. He traces the earliest mention of this notion to a 14th-century Bible commentary by the Yemenite Rabbi Nethanel ben Isaiah. Shapiro suggests a possible Islamic influence on Nethanel. From the 16th century the notion gained momentum, and by the 18th century it had become widespread both in Ashkenazi and Sephardi circles. Despite the parallels between this maxim and the Christian view on suicide, Shapiro contends that the expression in question "arose out of an interpretation of the various halakhot connected to suicide." The article is an important reminder that Judaism did not always perceive suicide as a heinous sin.

SHMUEL SHEPKARU

See also Martyrdom

Sukkot

Donin, Hayim Halevi, Sukkot (Popular History of Jewish Civilization), New York: Amiel, 1974

Drucker, Malka, Sukkot: A Time to Rejoice, New York: Holiday House, 1982

Gaster, Theodor H., "The Feast of Booths," in Festivals of the Jewish Year: A Modern Interpretation and Guide, New York: Sloane, 1953

Goldwurm, Hersh et al., Succos: Its Significance, Laws, and Prayers: A Presentation Anthologized from Talmudic and Traditional Sources (ArtScroll Mesorah Series), Brooklyn, New York: Mesorah, 1982, 2nd edition, 1989

Goodman, Philip (editor), The Sukkot and Simhat Torah Anthology, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1973

Rubenstein, Jeffrey L., The History of Sukkot during the Second Temple and Rabbinic Periods (Brown Judaica Studies, no. 302), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1995

Schauss, Hayyim, The Jewish Festivals: From Their Beginnings to Our Own Day, New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1938

Sukkot (Tabernacles) is the last of the three annual pilgrimage festivals. Celebrated at the close of the agricultural year in the fall, at the time of the fruit, olive, and grape harvests, Sukkot is the most joyous festival of the year. During the Second Temple Period, worshipers gathered at the Jerusalem Temple for a week-long complex of rituals including processions, water libations, sacrifices, and all-night merrymaking. Scholars have applied several methods of religious studies to shed light on different aspects of the festival. Comparative religion and anthropology illuminate the diverse and colorful rituals practiced at the Temple. Historians of religion seek to understand the rabbinic reinterpretations and transformations of the festival after the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E. Popular books generally concentrate on the lulav (festal wand) and sukkah (booth), the two main rituals to survive the destruction, and describe the liturgy and customs practiced in the past and today.

DONIN's book is a comprehensive and straightforward account of the history, customs, and traditions of Sukkot. He includes the main laws of the sukkah and the four species together with descriptions of how the rituals have been observed at different points in history. Donin offers an excellent summary of the significance of the festival within Jewish tradition and a fine discussion of its spiritual motifs. Numerous photographs and illustrations enhance the book. This work is recommended for anyone seeking a readable overview of almost every aspect of the festival.

DRUCKER explains the festival and its customs on an elementary level. The book contains brief historical summaries but primarily describes Sukkot as it is celebrated today. It contains recipes, activities, and instructions on how to build and decorate a sukkah. The book is for those interested in learning how to celebrate at home or in the synagogue and is appropriate for children.

GOODMAN provides an extensive anthology that includes biblical, talmudic, medieval, and other historical sources concerning the festival; summaries of important laws and customs; translations of prayers and liturgical poetry; and descriptions of the colorful festival rituals. There are brief accounts of the historical development of the festival and its rituals and of the nature of Sukkot celebrations in disparate Jewish communities. Goodman also includes short stories, poems, humorous anecdotes, and recipes related to the festival. This is a valuable compendium of a great number of diverse sources.

GASTER's chapter on Sukkot applies sociological and anthropological approaches to the study of religion in order to interpret the customs and rituals of the festival. He describes Sukkot in terms of seasonal festivals occurring at set points of the agricultural cycle. Gaster employs cross-cultural comparisons to shed light on fertility and rain-making rituals and points out pagan influences. His main emphasis is the festival as celebrated in biblical and ancient times, especially the festivities at the Jerusalem temple. While many of Gaster's interpretations are speculative, he offers rich and interesting comparative perspectives on the festival and its customs.

GOLDWURM's book, a volume of the ArtScroll Mesorah Series, offers an Orthodox manual for understanding and celebrating the festival. The first section contains moral and spiritual insights related to Sukkot and its rituals, essentially a collection of sermonic points culled from various sources. The second section defines commandments and customs. The third section is a digest of laws divided into 124 sections, a how-to manual for the interested observer. The fourth section contains liturgy and blessings in both Hebrew and English with a commentary. The book is intended as a practical guide for the contemporary Orthodox Jew.

RUBENSTEIN presents a scholarly analysis of the development of the festival and its rituals from late biblical times through the end of the talmudic period. The work reconstructs the festival as celebrated in the Jerusalem Temple and studies the changes that occurred when the Temple was destroyed. The first half collects and discusses references to Sukkot in sources from the Second Temple era, including Josephus, Philo, and the Qumran scrolls. The second half provides a detailed legal history of rabbinic laws related to the festival and discusses midrashic traditions that express the rabbinic interpretations of the symbols and rituals. The book is intended for scholars, particularly those interested in history.

SCHAUSS includes three chapters on Sukkot. The first two provide narrative accounts written in the present tense of Sukkot celebrations in the Jerusalem Temple and in Eastern Europe; these chapters offer vivid, imaginative descriptions of what an eyewitness might have observed. The third chapter explains the origins and significance of the principal rituals.

JEFFREY L. RUBENSTEIN

Symbols and Symbolism

Altmann, Alexander (editor), Biblical Motifs: Origins and Transformations (Philip W. Lown Institute of Advanced Judaic Studies, Studies and Texts, vol. 3), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1966

Ginsburg, Elliot K., The Sabbath in the Classical Kabbalah (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989

Goodenough, Erwin R., Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period (Bollingen Series, 37), 13 vols., New York: Pantheon, 1953–1968; abridged edition, edited by Jacob Neusner, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988; Oxford: Princeton University Press, 1992

Kanof, Abram, Jewish Symbolic Art, Jerusalem and Woodmere, New York: Gefen, 1990

Neusner, Jacob, Symbol and Theology in Early Judaism, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1991

Although Judaism, rooted in the aniconism of the Second Commandment, has traditionally expressed some ambivalence about the use of symbols, there is still a rich history of Jewish symbolism through the ages. Both figurative painting and relief carvings, especially dating from the third century C.E. onward, have been found in synagogue excavations. From antiquity to the present, symbolism has played an important part in Jewish religious life, both in the home and in places of worship.

The most elaborate of works on Jewish symbolism is the 13-volume set by GOODENOUGH (1953–1968), who examined the archaeological evidence from the Greco-Roman world, documenting the symbols found in synagogues from that time and place, including artifacts from Dura Europos in Syria. Not content merely to collect and document, however, Goodenough applies a striking interpretation to the images he assembled. Until his study, it was generally believed that Judaism in late antiquity was a nonvisual culture adequately described by the rabbinic works of the time. Goodenough posits, however, that there were actually two forms of Judaism at this time: that defined by the rabbis, and a more popular and mystical form, influenced by Hellenistic ideas and somewhat similar to the Judaism of Philo, and represented in the surviving synagogue art. His conclusions, however, are still disputed. The final two volumes of the series contain summary and conclusions, and indexes and maps, respectively. Published posthumously, they provide invaluable assistance in approaching such a massive amount of information.

The 1988 edition of Goodenough is an abridgement of his findings, edited and condensed by Jacob Neusner into a single volume. Neusner makes much of the most striking information collected by the author easily accessible to the general reader; the abridgement is also valuable because most of the original 13 volumes are now out of print. Included are both archaeological material and Goodenough's interpretations of it. In addition, the editor provides a foreword that outlines Goodenough's work and discusses the views of those who have disputed his conclusions.

NEUSNER's own study of early Jewish symbolism is heavily influenced by Goodenough's material and his readings of it. In fact, Neusner presents his book as exploring the work of Goodenough and that of the interpreter of early rabbinic theology, Max Kadushin. The author emphasizes that symbolism appears not only in frescos and mosaics but also in literary material, stressing that words, including the words of the rabbis, also can be highly symbolic, more concerned with evoking attitudes and emotions—which is (Neusner claims) the purpose of symbols—than is generally supposed. This very dense book then looks at both literary and artistic materials from early Judaism before coming to the conclusion that the kinds of symbols found in the ancient synagogues can also be found in the rabbinic writings of the time.

KANOF offers a simple yet highly perceptive and richly informative survey of current knowledge of the range and distribution of Jewish symbols in late antiquity and the Middle Ages. The various forms and their likely significance are discussed by type, in chapters concentrating on messianic symbols, the symbolic significance of the temple, temple vessels, the menorah, flora, fauna, and the signs of the zodiac. With further contextualizing chapters on religious symbolism in general and “pagan” (i.e., Greek) symbolism in particular, and at less than 100 pages of text with more than 100 helpful illustrations, this modest book provides an excellent introduction.

ALTMANN's collection of essays comes from the 1962 and 1963 Lown Institute research colloquia titled “Images and Symbols: Studies in the Origins and Transformations of Biblical Motifs.” The erudite essays cover a variety of topics relating to biblical and early Jewish symbolism, such as a discussion of the differences and interdependence between Jewish and Zoroastrian dualism, studies of symbolism in the Pentateuch, and consideration of the apparent contradictions between the finds in the Dura Europos synagogues and the evidence from talmudic literature.

GINSBURG limits his study to the symbolic representations of the sabbath in the Kabbalah. For this mystical tradition in Judaism and especially for the powerful strain that developed in Safed in the 16th century, the sabbath took on a highly figurative and deeply emotional meaning. Ginsburg first provides a discussion of the Kabbalah and its history and practice, preparing the reader to delve more specifically into ideas about the sabbath. The author then surveys sabbath ideology prior to that of the kabbalists, including analysis of biblical and talmudic beliefs. He discusses the elaborate preparations for the sabbath practiced by the kabbalists and examines the Saturday night rituals and prayers that allowed the practitioner to separate from this highly emotional time, which was seen as a living expression of a union with God, as well as (inevitably) a marriage ceremony of the masculine and feminine aspects of God.

ELEANOR AMICO

Synagogue

- Brooten, Bernadette J., Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue: Inscriptional Evidence and Background Issues (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 36), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1982
- Elbogen, Ismar, Der Jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 1913; translated by Raymond P. Scheindlin as Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1993
- Fine, Steven (editor), Sacred Realm: The Emergence of the Synagogue in the Ancient World, New York: Oxford University Press and Yeshiva University Museum, 1996
- Fine, Steven, This Holy Place: On the Sanctity of the Synagogue during the Greco-Roman Period (Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity Series, vol. 11), Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1997
- Grossman, Susan and Rivka Haut (editors), Daughters of the King: Women and the Synagogue: A Survey of History, Halakhah, and Contemporary Realities, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1992
- Heilman, Samuel C., Synagogue Life: A Study in Symbolic Interaction, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976
- Korros, Alexandra Shecket and Jonathan D. Sarna, American Synagogue History: A Bibliography and State-of-the-Field Survey, New York: Wiener, 1988
- Prell, Riv-Ellen, Prayer and Community: The Havurah in American Judaism, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1989
- Urman, Dan and Paul V.M. Flesher (editors), Ancient Synagogues: Historical Analysis and Archaeological Discovery, 2 vols., New York: Brill, 1995
- Wertheimer, Jack (editor), The American Synagogue: A Sanctuary Transformed, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987

The synagogue, as an institution of Jewish life dedicated to the reading and teaching of Scripture, was well established by the first century C.E., but its functions shifted dramatically in the centuries following the destruction of the Temple. Probably by the end of the second century, it was also becoming a place of communal prayer under rabbinic direction. By the late rabbinic period, it had become a place of holiness, marked by the permanent presence of the Torah scroll and Temple imagery. Rabbinic literature and archaeology are the primary sources for information about the origins of the synagogue. While archaeologists have focused on architectural and decorative features of the synagogue, textual study has investigated the development of rabbinic liturgy.

URMAN and FLESHER's volume represents a state-of-the-art survey of the synagogue in late antiquity, including new material and collecting and translating (where necessary) essential previously published articles. Section four, "The Synagogue's Nature and the Jewish Community," addresses the social functions of the synagogue most directly. The extensive bibliography points the reader to all relevant earlier work, including the important collections of English articles edited by Joseph Gutmann, Rachel Hachlili, and Lee Levine.

FINE (1996) centers on architectural analysis, but it also includes articles by Fine on the holiness of the synagogue and by Shinan on the liturgical life of the synagogue. FINE (1997) brings the textual and archaeological evidence into dialog in order to document and explain the transition of the synagogue from an early tannaitic meeting place of tentative sanctity to the fully holy place reflected in evidence from the fourth century onward. He argues that the synagogue's holiness, while deriving in part from appropriation of Temple images and ideas, comes primarily from "the community and its sacred scrolls." In the course of this study, he charts the emerging role of the synagogue in Jewish life under rabbinic guidance and in its Greco-Roman and Babylonian contexts.

BROOTEN, examining primarily diaspora inscriptions, finds evidence that women held official roles in ancient synagogues. In the course of her discussions, she examines necessarily the meanings of the various titles held, thus providing an important survey of current knowledge of male leadership at the time. The second half of the book explores background issues, especially the women's gallery and, more briefly, women's prayer, philanthropy, and proselytism.

There exists no adequate study of the development of the medieval synagogue as an institution. Information may be gleaned here and there in the various works on medieval synagogue architecture and on medieval liturgy or medieval society in general. The most comprehensive, if somewhat dated, discussion may be found in the third section of ELBOGEN. Significant articles, however, are included as well in GROSSMAN and HAUT's collection. This volume is divided into three sections. The first, "History," contains studies of women's public religious life from the Jerusalem Temple through the synagogues of various parts of the medieval Jewish world. The second, "Halakhah," presents discussions of the legal issues that have most affected women's roles in the synagogue, including Orthodox and non-Orthodox voices. The third, "Contemporary Realities," offers both scholarly studies of Mediterranean, Persian, and American Jewish women's synagogue experiences and personal vignettes by women who have filled various roles in the synagogue.

Grossman and Haut's collection is also conspicuous for the significant degree to which it examines the synagogue experience of non-Western Jews; most contemporary work in English has focused on the U.S. experience. For example, WERTHEIMER's volume consists of a series of 14 commissioned essays by leading scholars. After an introductory overview, the essays consider the history of the U.S. synagogue from both denominational and thematic perspectives. The latter group of essays includes histories of individual yet paradigmatic congregations, as well as discussions of the immigrant experience, synagogue seating, music, and the non-liturgical educational and social functions of the synagogue in the United States. Those interested in pursuing research on individual U.S. communities should consult KORROS and SARNA, which also includes comprehensive introductory essays.

The social sciences have contributed significantly to understanding of the U.S. synagogue experience. HEILMAN's volume reports the results of a participant-observer study of a modern Orthodox congregation in the northeast. Here, Heilman is concerned less with the religious life of the synagogue than with the human interactions surrounding the formal activities of prayer and study. Beyond the expected chapters on synagogues as houses of prayer, study, and assembly, Heilman includes studies of factors shaping the community of the synagogue, such as gossip and joking, and markers of social boundaries and of subgroups in the synagogue. Thus, he takes note of aspects such as choral singing, swaying during prayer, participation in appeals, and the resolution of arguments.

PRELL's book, in contrast, derives from her research as a participant-observer in an informal havurah-style community in Los Angeles in the mid-1970s. Unlike Heilman's Orthodox Jews, whose religious expression is dictated by tradition and law, these Jews are searching for religious expression consonant with their secular countercultural commitments. While also sensitive to social issues, Prell's study examines how the dialogue between received ritual and modernity shapes the religious life and identity of this community. In so doing, she provides both important background on the general U.S. synagogue scene against which the havurah communities rebelled and a theoretical structure by which the ritual performances of other synagogues may be analyzed.

RUTH LANGER

See also Architecture, Synagogue

Syria

Deshen, Shlomo and Walter P. Zenner, Jews among Muslims: Communities in the Precolonial Middle East, New York: New York University Press, and Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire: Macmillan, 1996

Frankel, Jonathan, The Damascus Affair: "Ritual Murder," Politics, and the Jews in 1840, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997

Harel, Yaron, "Temurot be-Yahadut Suriah, 1840-1880," Ph.D. diss., Bar-Ilan University, 1992

Marcus, Abraham, The Middle East on the Eve of Modernity: Aleppo in the Eighteenth Century, New York: Columbia University Press, 1989

Shelemay, Kay Kaufman, Let Jasmine Rain Down: Song and Remembrance among Syrian Jews, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998

Stillman, Norman, The Jews in Arab Lands in Modern Times, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1991

Sutton, Joseph A.D., Magic Carpet: Aleppo-in-Flatbush: The Story of a Unique Ethnic Jewish Community, New York: Thayer-Jacoby, 1979

Sutton, Joseph A.D., Aleppo Chronicles: The Story of the Unique Sephardeem of the Ancient Near East, in Their Own Words, New York: Thayer-Jacoby, 1988

Williams, Bill, The Making of Manchester Jewry: 1740-1875, Manchester: Manchester University Press, and New York: Holmes and Meier, 1976

Zenner, Walter P., Global Community: The Jews of Aleppo, Syria, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 2000

The study of Syrian Jews, like that of other Middle Eastern Jewish communities, is still in a formative stage. While these communities have a venerable history, reaching back to the beginnings of the Jewish dispersion, the Eurocentric nature of Judaic scholarship has led to neglect of these communities in more recent times. Forty years ago, an English-speaking student wishing to learn about the Jews of Syria had to rely on encyclopedia articles, accounts by travelers and missionaries, and the American Jewish Yearbook, published by the American Jewish Committee and the Jewish Publication Society of America, which gave an annual account of events in various countries. Only if the reader knew Hebrew or French was it possible to find some original sources and scholarship. The situation has changed, but it is still necessary to look for material in places other than books devoted solely to this topic. This survey will deal with books on the Jews of Syria as well as works on their descendants who have emigrated. These Syrian Jewish communities outside of Syria have become quite important during the 20th century. Several of the volumes listed here are overviews of Middle Eastern Jewry as a whole. Others are works on Jewish communities with a significant Syrian-Sephardi component.

STILLMAN provides a brief history and selection of sources on Jews in Arab lands in his volume. Several of these documents give reports of the Jews in Syria in recent times. They are drawn from European and Jewish sources, including Hebrew rabbinic literature. They provide illustrations of dramatic events (such as the Damascus affair of 1840) and general social conditions (such as a rabbinic comment on female dancers). Some of the sources from Egypt refer apparently to immigrants from various countries including Syria.

MARCUS describes Middle Eastern urban life in 18th-century Aleppo on the eve of the full incorporation of this Ottoman city into the European-dominated capitulations system. The book is about Aleppo as a whole, not only its Jews. Marcus has utilized Hebrew sources as well as documents in Arabic, French, English, and Turkish. He helps significantly to place the Jews in the broader context of Syrian life.

HAREL's doctoral dissertation was written in Hebrew but with a lengthy English summary. This book is based on primary documentary material, and it covers social, economic, and political institutions and events during the period from 1840 to 1880. Harel is in the process of publishing his research on the Jews of Damascus and Aleppo in a variety of English as well as Hebrew journals.

DESHEN and ZENNER's collection consists of articles dealing with Middle Eastern Jewish society just before European colonization. Most of the articles deal with a specific Jewish community (Morocco, Tunisia, Syria, Iraq, Iran). There are two articles on Syria by Zenner. One deals with the external relations of the Jews with their non-Jewish neighbors, the government, and the economy. The other article discusses primarily the family and community in Aleppo and Damascus in the 19th and early 20th centuries. A bibliography referring to periodical literature and some primary source material in English, Hebrew, and other languages is included.

FRANKEL tells the story of the accusation of ritual murder against the Jews of Damascus in 1840 as an episode in European history. He does provide the local background in addition to the global political context, but his study focuses attention on the European consuls, especially the French consul, rather than on local Christians, as prime movers in the affair. He provides portraits of individual actors in the event, including Moses Abulafia, a rabbi who was tortured into becoming a witness for the prosecution of Jews and whose son was a prominent Damascus rabbi in the next generation. Still, it should be noted that Syrian Jewry is not at the center of his account of this incident.

WILLIAMS's book describes the growth of the Jewish community in Manchester, England, prior to the Russian immigration in the 1880s. Again, the Syrian Jewish immigrants play only a small role in the overall picture. He does, however, describe them vividly and shows how the various segments of the Manchester Jewish community—English, German, Greek-Sephardi, and Syrian-Sephardi—interacted in the late 19th century. Williams places the Syrian-Sephardi immigrants into the broader context of the British cotton trade and a growing middle-class Jewish community.

SUTTON (1979) describes the New York (Brooklyn) Syrian Jewish community, treating all phases of its life, from its origins in immigration to business, the family, synagogues, resorts, and portraits of individuals. He also includes material on Aleppo, whence much of the Brooklyn Syrian community originates.

SUTTON (1988) includes a long overview of the community plus oral histories that he recorded in New York City. These include the recollections of early emigrants from Syria, later émigrés, and people who lived in other communities, including Egypt, Brazil, Mexico, Britain, Israel, and various locations in the United States. Most of those who had lived outside New York City at one time in their lives, however, were residents of Brooklyn or Deal, New Jersey, by the time they were recorded.

SHELEMAY, an ethnomusicologist, looks at the Syrian Jewish tradition of writing Hebrew hymnody (pizmonim and bakkashot) to fit Arabic melody-types. She analyzes the recent development of this tradition among Jews from Syria living in Brooklyn, Mexico, and Israel and places it into the general development of these Syrian Jewish communities. She also shows how singers from the Syrian communities have kept the tradition of singing these songs alive in several different countries under a variety of circumstances. She demonstrates how Syrian Jews have managed to maintain separate communities but how they have also perpetuated selected elements of their Middle Eastern Jewish culture and adapted them to their Israeli and diaspora societies.

ZENNER is preparing for publication a book that deals with Jews from Aleppo, both in Syria and in their dispersion in recent times to England, the United States, Latin America, and Israel. He stresses the relationship between the economic roles played by Jews from Aleppo and their changing ethnic identities. He makes an effort to explain why certain communities have perpetuated stronger communal structures and identities than others.

WALTER P. ZENNER

Szold, Henrietta 1860–1945

American Zionist and humanitarian

Dash, Joan, Summoned to Jerusalem: The Life of Henrietta Szold, New York: Harper and Row, 1979

Gidal, Tim, Henrietta Szold: A Documentation in Photos and Text, New York: Gefen, 1997

Lowenthal, Marvin, Henrietta Szold: Life and Letters, New York: Viking, 1942

Shargel, Baila Round (editor and translator), Lost Love: The Untold Story of Henrietta Szold: Unpublished Diary and Letters, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1997

Henrietta Szold was a leading American-born Zionist activist; an important figure among exponents of Jewish studies; an influential teacher; the founder of Hadassah, the women's division of the Zionist movement; and the founder of Youth Aliyah, an organization that facilitated the emigration to Palestine of thousands of young Jews before and during the Holocaust. In the United States, she dedicated herself to a scholarly, pedagogic, and editorial career, while in Palestine she focused on organizational and social service activities.

LOWENTHAL presents the first comprehensive biography of Szold. His book traces Szold's life, beginning with her early years and education in Baltimore, Maryland, and her decision to found a night school for Russian Jewish immigrants. It describes her conversion to Zionism and her 26-year career as the editorial secretary of the Jewish Publication Society. Lowenthal recounts the founding of Hadassah and Szold's work in Palestine as the director of the organization, with its special commitment to the provision of medical services, which would lead to the founding of the Hadassah hospital in Jerusalem. The book provides a detailed chronology of Szold's activities, reconstructing the main events and developments in her life through letters and speeches. Lowenthal emphasizes Szold's achievements, but he describes as well her difficulties and frustrations.

DASH follows a geographical rather than a chronological paradigm in her account of Szold's life. She focuses on the major personal influences in Szold's life, such as Louis Ginzberg, her admired and beloved mentor at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. Dash reveals that Szold was not just the editor and translator of Ginzberg's multi-volume scholarly work, Legends of the Jews, but that she also developed a passionate attachment to Ginzberg, a sentiment that was not reciprocated. Dash emphasizes the intellectual and ideological dimensions of Szold's development as a Zionist thinker. Bringing her subject to life, Dash offers detailed descriptions of Szold's meetings with key Zionist leaders, social gatherings, and relationships with family members. This biography presents Szold as a vulnerable and complex woman.

GIDAL creates a more popular overview of Szold's life using photographs and excerpts from letters. There are only a few photographs of Szold, but many pictures capture the new life of young immigrants to Palestine during the late 1930s. Especially striking are photos of the "Teheran children," who were smuggled out of Nazi-occupied Europe and reached Palestine thanks to Youth Aliyah. Some photographs document Szold's strong friendship with Judah Magnes, the leader of Berit Shalom, the political organization that advocated peace with the Palestinians. The narrative in this book is not excessively informative, and it does tend to glamorize Szold, emphasizing the visionary who was personally involved in her projects and cared deeply for the people whose lives she helped change.

SHARGEL focuses on Szold's relationship with Louis Ginzberg against the background of New York in the first decade of the 20th century. Shargel introduces excerpts from Szold's previously unpublished diary in addition to previously unpublished correspondence between Szold and Ginzberg. Numerous letters refer to professional issues and transactions between Ginzberg and his devoted translator-editor. A good number of letters also confirm a sentimental attachment on Szold's part that goes far beyond professional devotion. Diary entries are especially revealing in this regard, exposing the turbulent emotions with which Szold was struggling especially when she heard news of Ginzberg's European fiancée and relating to his subsequent marriage. Shargel suggests that the unrequited love and the deep disappointment Szold suffered may have led to her decision to emigrate to Palestine and immerse herself in Zionist activities. The book rejects previous idealizations of Szold's life, and its contention that Szold's unrequited love may have led to her brilliant political career is somewhat controversial.

ESTHER FUCHS

T

Tabernacle

- Cross, Frank Moore, "The Tabernacle," Biblical Archaeologist, 10(3), September 1947
- Haran, Menahem, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel: An Inquiry into the Character of Cult Phenomena and the Historical Setting of the Priestly School, Oxford: Clarendon, 1977; as Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel: An Inquiry into the Biblical Cult Phenomena and the Historical Setting of the Priestly School, Winona Lake, Indiana: Eisenbrauns, 1985
- Morgenstern, Julian, The Ark, the Ephod and the "Tent of Meeting" (Henry and Ida Krolik Memorial Publications, vol. 2), Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1945
- Onians, John, "Tabernacle and Temple and the Cosmos of the Jews," in Sacred Architecture in the Traditions of India, China, Judaism, and Islam (Cosmos, 8), edited by Emily Lyle, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1992
- Strong, James, The Tabernacle of Israel in the Desert, Providence, Rhode Island: Harris, Jones, 1888; as The Tabernacle of Israel: Its Structure and Symbolism, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Kregel, 1987

The Tabernacle (mishkan) is the tent sanctuary that God commanded the Israelites to build when they were in the wilderness. The word derives from the Latin tabernaculum (tent), which was used in the Vulgate Bible. The sanctuary is also referred to as the "tent of meeting" ('ohel mo'ed) and, less frequently, as the "tent of testimony" (mishkan ha'edut). In Exodus 26, Moses is instructed how it should be built. It is constructed and consecrated in Exodus 40. It was considered the locale of God's physical presence and the designated place where Moses spoke with God. After the arrival of the Israelites in the promised land, the Tabernacle resided in the sanctuary at Shiloh (Joshua 18:1). When Solomon consecrated the Temple in Jerusalem, the priests brought the Tabernacle into it (1 Kings 8:4).

STRONG provides a thorough study of the descriptions of the Tabernacle in the Bible. His first chapter is a brief survey of the Tabernacle's history. His second focuses on the material description of the Tabernacle and has numerous helpful illustrations. He speculates on how it was dismantled for transportation and describes the arrangement of the tribes, each of which had a designated location in relation to the Tabernacle both when marching and at camp. He also summarizes the description of the Holy of Holies. It was separated from the rest of the Tabernacle with screens and contained such sacred objects as the mercy seat, the cherubim, and the Ark of the Covenant. Strong's third chapter speculates on the symbolic significance of such features as the Tabernacle's symmetry and measurements. His book concludes with a discussion of the ways in which the deity manifests himself at the Tabernacle.

CROSS offers an archaeological and historical study of the Tabernacle. He sees in the biblical accounts of the Tabernacle several authentic details about how the Israelites worshiped in the desert. He argues, however, that these authentic details have been combined with "heavily idealized" depictions of the Tabernacle, which come from a later stage of Israelite religion. He considers the biblical descriptions of the Tabernacle in their present form as having been edited substantially in the time of David. David established Jerusalem as the political and religious center of the monarchy, and Cross argues that in bringing the Ark into Jerusalem, David tried to establish the city as a legitimate center of the religion by presenting it as heir to the tradition of the Tabernacle. This argument, however, while plausible and intriguing, cannot be proved.

MORGENSTERN provides examples of desert sanctuaries from Islamic cultures that have affinities with the descriptions of the Tabernacle and the Ark in the Bible. This suggests that the Bible's account is at least in part historically accurate. He aims to find in the Bible and in forms of worship among Muslims "the period and practices of pre-Islamic, ancient Semitic religion." Among his examples is the Bedouin kubbe, a holy tent made of red leather. He is of the opinion that the two main Hebrew terms that are translated by the word Tabernacle (mishkan and 'ohel mo'ed) refer to different shrines from different periods of Israelite history. He argues that the 'ohel mo'ed was understood to be merely the site of divine manifestation, whereas the mishkan, representing a later stage, was thought to be the actual residence of God. Thus, he argues, we can see in the terminology of the Tabernacle stages of a transition of the status of the sanctuary in Israelite religion, evolving from desert shrine toward the Temple of Jerusalem.

The collection of papers read at a 1991 conference on Architecture and Traditional Systems of Belief and edited by Emily Lyle offers insightful discussions on sacred architecture in several religious traditions. Among the essays is ONIANS's. His contribution focuses not on the historical veracity of the Tabernacle but rather on how, as an idea, it contributes to the stability of Judaism. He argues that one way in which Judaism was able to withstand the destructions and desecrations of the Temple was by developing sacred edifices that existed solely in textual form. While physical buildings could be destroyed, the Tabernacle and the Temple could survive in the Bible as verbal constructs. Thus he dates composition of the biblical descriptions of the Tabernacle to the period after Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of the Temple in 586 B.C.E. While the Tabernacle is undoubtedly important as a textual construct, the essay's complete dismissal of a historical basis for the Tabernacle seems too extreme. As other scholars have observed, there is evidence that some elements of the biblical depiction of the Tabernacle are based on a kernel of truth.

HARAN surveys the origins of the Israelite priesthood and the Temple and how this history has influenced the composition of biblical texts. Guiding his studies is the conviction that the priestly texts of the Bible are often archaic, whereas other scholars often assume that many of them were heavily edited or composed much later, around the time of the consecration of the Second Temple. Haran dedicates three chapters to the Tabernacle. The first covers the biblical account of the material composition of the Tabernacle and its contents. The second chapter is on the priestly injunctions regarding the Tabernacle aimed at protecting its sanctity, such as the prohibition of nonpriests from approaching the vicinity of the shrine. His third chapter discusses the commonly accepted view that the biblical account of the Tabernacle is an idealized account based on the Temple of Jerusalem. To assert the antiquity of the pentateuchal account he argues that much of it is related not to the Jerusalem Temple but to legends about the ancient Israelite sanctuary in the town of Shiloh (Joshua 18:1). Like many scholars, he feels that the Bible's description of the Tabernacle contains some authentic information from ancient layers of the religion. He argues, however, that more texts of the Bible reflect these early materials than many other scholars would claim.

MATTHEW GOFF

Talmudic Literature: Translations

- Epstein, Isidore (editor), The Babylonian Talmud: Seder Nezikin, Translated into English with Notes, Glossary and Indices, London: Soncino, 1935–1952
- Goldwurm, Hersh and Yisroel Simcha Schorr (editors), The Talmud/Talmud Bavli: The Schottenstein Edition (ArtScroll Series), Brooklyn, New York: Mesorah, 1990–
- Neusner, Jacob, The Talmud of the Land of Israel: A Preliminary Translation and Explanation (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism), Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1982–1993
- Neusner, Jacob, The Talmud of Babylonia: An American Translation (Brown Judaic Studies), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1984–1993
- Neusner, Jacob, The Talmud of Babylonia: An Academic Commentary (South Florida Academic Commentary Series), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1994–

Steinsaltz, Adin, The Talmud/Talmud Bavli: The Steinsaltz Edition, 21 vols., New York: Random House, 1989–2000

Audio recordings: CD-ROM, published by Torah Communications Network, 1618 43rd St., Brooklyn, NY 11204, (718) 436-4999; tapes, published by Torah Tapes, Inc., 1814 50th St., Brooklyn, NY 11204, (718) 438-3904

Translations are generally described as either “literal” or “dynamic-equivalent.” Literal translations stay as close as possible to the word-for-word meaning of a text and in the process lose elements of the original that depend on larger patterns of literary, logical, idiomatic, or philosophical meaning. Dynamic-equivalent translations strive to replicate these larger patterns of meaning but in the process may move very far from the literal meaning of the words. The careful positioning of a translation between these two stylistic poles is the most difficult work of a translator, and when done well it is invisible. The Talmud may be a uniquely challenging text to translate because its meaning depends equally on a precise terminology and on large rhetorical and logical structures that often span several pages of the original. The translations discussed here address this challenge in different ways and serve the needs of different audiences. They are listed in order from the most literal to the most dynamic-equivalent.

EPSTEIN is the first complete translation of the Babylonian Talmud into English. It is generally a close, literal translation of the standard printed text. It is a good place to look for a precise translation of the often-difficult Aramaic of the Bavli. The standard biblical and talmudic cross references are also translated in concise footnotes, and some censored material is restored. Although it is unexcelled in the accuracy of its literal translation, Epstein generally fails to represent the logical structure of the talmudic argument. It is, however, the standard English translation, and it is suitable for quotation in scholarly writing. Epstein's version is frequently referred to by the name of the publishing house—“Soncino.”

NEUSNER (1982–1993) is the only available translation of the Palestinian Talmud (Yerushalmi). It is a more dynamic-equivalent translation than Epstein, following an innovative format that arranges the text on the page as an outline of the talmudic argument. Each tractate is situated within its order, then outlined chapter by chapter according to the unfolding of the argument. This translation emphasizes the broad shape of the argument, its context, and the conceptual units from which it is constructed.

NEUSNER (1984–1993) is a full translation of the Babylonian Talmud that resembles Neusner (1982) in style and format. It is most useful when read in conjunction with Epstein. NEUSNER (1994–) is intended to replace Neusner (1984–1993). It is more analytic than the previous edition in its arrangement of the text and supplies useful introductions and running commentaries. It is a fully dynamic-equivalent translation, focusing on the rhetorical, conceptual, and juristic content of the Talmud rather than the literal meanings of the individual words.

STEINSALTZ is an English translation of selected tractates from his ongoing project to translate the Babylonian Talmud into modern Hebrew. It combines both literal and dynamic-equivalent translations on a single page, together with a vocalized version of the original Hebrew and Aramaic text. While only four tractates are available in English, these provide the best introduction to reading the Talmud in the original.

GOLDWURM and SCHORR aims primarily at Orthodox-identifying Jewish students and should serve them well. It translates the Mishnah and Gemara, generally following the interpretation of Rashi. Parallel notes offer further interpretation and clarification, drawn largely from other medieval commentaries (e.g., Tosafot, Rashba, Meiri). Comments not directly concerned with elucidating the flow of the text are usually halakhic in nature. They will be helpful to observant Jews who want to deepen their understanding of halakhah but may be otherwise confusing as the presentation is ahistorical. The English text is printed facing a reproduction of the corresponding page from the Vilna edition, with the translated section on each page highlighted. Like Steinsaltz, this translation is intended for beginning to intermediate students who are learning to read the Talmud in Aramaic, and the translators carefully foreground the logical structure as it unfolds. It should be noted that the vocalization of the original is idiosyncratic, representing not the grammatically normative form of the words but the pronunciation current in Ashkenazi yeshivot. As a dynamic-equivalent translation, Goldwurm and Schorr is excellent, but readers in search of a more academic or critical translation would be better served by Epstein or Neusner (1994). Goldwurm and Schorr is frequently referred to by the name of its underwriter, "Schottenstein."

Audio recordings of classes on the entire Babylonian Talmud are distributed on tape and CD-ROM. Each class is about one hour long, covering a single folio of the Talmud. The recordings are intended in the first instance to promote participation in daf yomi—a program in which students worldwide read the same leaf of Talmud every day, taking about seven and one-half years to complete the cycle. In the course of each class, the relevant folio is translated and discussed. The classes thus move very quickly and are suitable for intermediate to advanced students experienced in reading the Talmud in the original. The translation and commentary are similar to those in Goldwurm and Steinsaltz.

WILLIS JOHNSON

See also Talmudic Literature: Hermeneutics; Talmudic Literature: Introductions; Talmudic Literature: Reference Tools; Talmudic Literature: Theology

Talmudic Literature: Reference Tools

Carmell, Aryeh, Aids to Talmud Study, London: East End Jewish Scholarship Centre, 1974; 3rd edition, New York: Feldheim, 1975; as Aiding Talmud Study, 5th edition, London: East End Jewish Scholarship Centre, and New York: Feldheim, 1991

Frank, Yitzhak, The Practical Talmud Dictionary, Spring Valley, New York: Feldheim, 1991, 2nd edition, 1994

Frank, Yitzhak, Grammar for Gemara: An Introduction to Babylonian Aramaic, Jerusalem: Ariel, United Israel Institutes, 1992, new edition, 1995

Krupnick, Eliyahu, The Gateway to Learning: A Systematic Introduction to the Study of Talmud, New York: Feldheim, 1981

Perlmutter, Haim, Tools for Tosafos, Southfield, Michigan: Targum, 1996

Steinsaltz, Adin, The Talmud: The Steinsaltz Edition: A Reference Guide, New York: Random House, 1989

Strack, Hermann Leberecht, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1931; revised by Günter Stemberger and translated by Markus Bockmuehl, 2nd edition, Edinburgh: Clark, 1996

The study of the Babylonian Talmud is regarded as the most prestigious activity by observant Jewish communities. This study has traditionally been reserved almost exclusively for men and taught as the culmination of an educational process that begins with instruction in biblical Hebrew and codified halakhah. Since the 1970s, however, the Ba'alei Teshuvah movement has led a large number of newly observant, English-speaking adults with no prior background in rabbinic culture to begin studying Talmud. Several introductions have been written specifically for this adult audience, and collectively they constitute a huge advance in talmudic pedagogy. Although the Talmud remains an oral tradition best learned from a teacher, it is now possible for a diligent adult to do much toward attaining talmudic literacy on his or her own. Audio recordings are also available of expertly taught classes on every page of the Talmud.

CARMELL is among the best guides available in English. It has been through five editions and presents the bare bones of what a beginner needs to know as he or she sets out in Talmud study: the most common talmudic phrases and abbreviations; a basic Aramaic vocabulary; and tabular summaries of semi-cursive script, gematria (rabbinic numerology), the Hebrew calendar, and talmudic weights and measures. The appendix and charts showing the chronology and interrelationships of the Talmud's major protagonists are especially useful.

FRANK (1992) is an introduction to the grammar of Babylonian Aramaic, the principal language of the Babylonian Talmud and the basis of much rabbinic Hebrew. Although the study of grammar has been discouraged in traditional yeshivot, adult readers coming to the Talmud may find a formal presentation helpful. This book is a comprehensive but not exhaustive survey that presents all the grammar a talmudist will need in a format that is clear and well-organized. It includes a section of exercises that can be studied by individuals or in a classroom. The full paradigms of 30 common Aramaic verbs are particularly helpful.

FRANK (1991) is not a complete dictionary of talmudic Hebrew and Aramaic. It is restricted to the key words and phrases that signal the logical and rhetorical structure of the talmudic argument. Covering an extensive vocabulary, the dictionary translates these terms literally, providing information on grammatical forms and roots and giving extended explanations and examples of how the phrases function in context. Frank concludes with a substantial dictionary of rabbinic abbreviations as well as tables of talmudic weights, measures, coins, and numbers. Practically speaking, this is the single most useful book reviewed in this article.

The range of coverage in KRUPNICK is similar to that found in Carmell, but Krupnick is organized as a textbook for adult beginners. The book's strengths lie in the clarity of its discussion of the structure of talmudic arguments and the way in which it illustrates the function of key Aramaic terms. The examples are well chosen, but they are not extensive enough for this book to stand alone as an introduction to reading the Talmud. The brief discussion of the rules of Rashi's Talmud commentary and of Tosafot, the classic medieval glosses on Rashi, is however exceptional for its clarity.

PERLMUTTER introduces the intermediate student to the character of the Tosafot. The ability to understand a talmudic text together with Tosafot constitutes basic talmudic literacy. Although this volume is the most conceptually advanced of the books under review, it is a model of clarity. In a series of short chapters, Perlmutter explains everything one needs to know to read Tosafot, from vocabulary and syntax to rhetorical structure to hermeneutic strategies and assumptions.

STEINSALTZ was written to accompany the ongoing translation of the entire Talmud into modern Hebrew and of selected tractates into English. It covers much of the same material as Carmell, but it also includes a helpful glossary titled "Halakhic Concepts and Terms." This text is suitable for absolute beginners but it does not stand alone as an introduction to reading the Talmud.

STRACK, which first appeared in German in 1887, is the authoritative academic introduction to talmudic literature. Semberger's updated edition includes massive revision and correction. It has a more scholarly tone than the other books discussed in this article, with exemplary bibliographies (current as of the early 1990s) of primary and secondary materials, including valuable comments on the merits of different editions of rabbinic texts. A concise historical survey is followed by chapters on the rabbinic school system, rabbinic hermeneutics, the nature of oral law, and biographies of major talmudic rabbis. The chapter on the languages of rabbinic literature is an excellent orientation to the subject. The fine treatment of talmudic literature is followed by a valuable survey of midrashic literature. Strack is not intended as a first guide for students learning to read Talmud, but readers with an academic bent will find it fascinating.

WILLIS JOHNSON

See also Talmudic Literature: Hermeneutics; Talmudic Literature: Introductions; Talmudic Literature: Theology; Talmudic Literature: Translations

Talmudic Literature: Introductions

Holtz, Barry (editor), Back to the Sources: Reading the Classic Jewish Texts, New York: Summit, 1984

Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to the Talmud: A Teaching Book, New York: Harper and Row, 1973; revised edition, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1984

Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to Midrash: The Workings of Rabbinic Bible Interpretation: A Teaching Book, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989

Safrai, Shemuel (editor), The Literature of the Sages, Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987

Steinsaltz, Adin, The Essential Talmud, New York: Basic Books, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1976

Strack, Hermann Leberecht, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1931; revised by Günter Stemberger and translated by Markus Bockmuehl, 2nd edition, Edinburgh: Clark, 1996

One can speak of two types of introductions to talmudic literature. One type typically provides historical background, a survey of the literature's contents, and brief biographies of some of the leading rabbinic figures. The second type introduces the reader to the methodology of rabbinic literature in action. A beginning student of rabbinic literature should consult at least one introduction of each type; for the reader's convenience the two groups of introductions will be discussed separately.

The classic introduction to rabbinic literature is by STRACK and STEMBERGER. Originally written in 1887 by Hermann Strack, a German Protestant professor of Old Testament, and first translated into English in 1931, the work was exhaustively revised and updated by Günter Stemberger in 1982, 1991, and again in 1995. The work is both concise and comprehensive, and it includes a brief overview of the history of the rabbinic period as well as thumbnail biographies; a discussion of rabbinic education and methodology; and separate introductions to the Mishnah, the Tosefta, the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds, the later tractates, and the various genres of midrashic works. The information here is as up-to-date as one could hope for—there is even an appendix surveying the electronic resources available for the study of Talmud and midrash—and each section is accompanied by an extensive bibliography.

Another fairly comprehensive introduction to rabbinic literature is SAFRAI. This collection of essays by various scholars begins with a presentation of the historical background of the rabbinic period, followed by a discussion of two concepts—Oral Torah and halakhah—that undergird all of rabbinic discourse and literature. Safrai then presents essays on the Mishnah (with a separate essay for the nonlegal Tractate Avot), Tosefta, Palestinian Talmud, Babylonian Talmud, and the later tractates. There is also a final essay titled "Post-Talmudic Literature in the Land of Israel." Unfortunately, volume two of this work, which will cover midrashic literature, is not yet available.

Although the aforementioned books overlap and agree in many respects, there are subtle but significant differences between them. Among scholars of rabbinic literature, Israeli scholars such as Hanoch Albeck, Efraim Elimelech Urbach, and, to a lesser degree, J.N. Epstein have tended to be more trusting of rabbinic statements and traditions as being historically reliable, while in the United States Jacob Neusner and his disciples have been more skeptical. Although Stemberger and Safrai have consulted both schools of thought, Stemberger leans toward the Neusnerian school while Safrai and his colleagues are members of the Israeli school. Thus, for example, the essay on the Mishnah in Safrai accepts as historically accurate rabbinic statements about the Mishnah's prehistory that Stemberger presents much more provisionally.

STEINSALTZ is significantly different from the previously mentioned works in that it is written from an avowed spiritual perspective rather than from a scholarly one. It is meant to encourage the reader to make Talmud study part of a personal spiritual discipline by introducing the concerns and, much more cursorily, the methods of the Babylonian Talmud. A brief historical section at the beginning of the book cites rabbinic traditions as matters of fact, such as the story of Rabbi Akiba growing up an ignoramus and beginning to study only at age 40. The bulk of the work is actually an outline of the content of the six orders of the Mishnah rather than that of the Babylonian Talmud itself. Perhaps the most moving sections of the book are the last three chapters. Here Steinsaltz argues that a Talmud scholar must not only grow intellectually but also must transform his entire personality in accord with rabbinic teaching. He then argues that the Talmud has not simply been the preserve of the learned but has had a deep influence on the entire Jewish people. Finally, he provides a reminder that "the Talmud has never been completed," and he invites the reader to participate in the ongoing conversation that is talmudic study. In short, while this work is not reliable as a historical and scholarly guide, it provides a powerful argument for the devotional study of rabbinic literature.

There are also works that introduce the reader to rabbinic literature inductively by leading him or her through sample passages of rabbinic works. A pioneer in this regard is Jacob Neusner. NEUSNER (1973) conducts the reader through the relatively brief eighth chapter of Tractate Berakhot, analyzing and comparing the material in the Mishnah, Tosefta, Palestinian Talmud, and Babylonian Talmud. The final chapter draws theological conclusions from the material studied. As always, Neusner finds religious significance not only in the material's content but also in its form. He shows that among other concerns the rabbis are interested in finding the connection between the mundane and the sublime and in facing the tension between logic and life. In his conclusion he argues that Talmud study is an excellent preparation for learning to make decisions in the face of modernity's relativism.

NEUSNER (1989) provides a similar introduction to both the legal and narrative midrashim. In a concluding chapter, Neusner presents his understanding of the larger theological agenda informing the midrashic process. He believes that it is intended to uncover the relevance of the truths contained in Scripture as they apply to the life and times of those engaged in midrash.

Finally, there are the chapters on Talmud and midrash in HOLTZ. After a brief introduction to the background and terminology of rabbinic literature, Robert Goldenberg guides the reader through the first pages of the Babylonian Talmud in order to acquaint him or her with the types of issues that occupied the rabbis and the methods they used to address them. Holtz, after defining midrash and classifying its genres, introduces sample midrashic texts and explains both their methods and their messages.

ELIEZER DIAMOND

See also Halakhah: Introductions; Talmudic Literature: Hermeneutics; Talmudic Literature: Reference Tools; Talmudic Literature: Theology; Talmudic Literature: Translations

Talmudic Literature: Theology

- Kadushin, Max, The Rabbinic Mind, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1952; 3rd edition, New York: Bloch, 1972
- Kraemer, David Charles, The Mind of the Talmud: An Intellectual History of the Bavli, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
- Kraemer, David Charles, Reading the Rabbis: The Talmud as Literature, New York: Oxford University Press, 1996
- Moore, George Foot, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of Tannaim, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1927
- Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to the Talmud: A Teaching Book, New York: Harper and Row, 1973; revised edition, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1984
- Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to Midrash: The Workings of Rabbinic Bible Interpretation: A Teaching Book, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989
- Schechter, Solomon, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, New York: Macmillan, 1909; as Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, New York: Schocken, 1961
- Urbach, Efraim Elimelech, Hazal, pirke emunot ve-de'ot, 1969; as The Sages: Their Concepts and Beliefs, Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1975; Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987

Constructing a rabbinic theology is difficult for at least two reasons. The first is that we have no theological treatises from the talmudic era. Instead, statements of theological import are sprinkled in among the rabbis' legal discussions. Second, the rabbis favor legal, hermeneutical, and narrative discourse, rather than philosophical interchange. Nonetheless, there are some fine studies of rabbinic theology. Most are topically arranged, but some modern studies have focused on the theology implicit in the mode of rabbinic discourse itself.

A pioneering study of rabbinic theology is that of SCHECHTER. He outlines rabbinic views on God and God's relationship to Israel and the world; the centrality of law to rabbinic Judaism; the problem of sin and evil; and the importance and means of repentance. Especially important is a chapter entitled "The Joy of the Law." Here Schechter seeks to dispel the mistaken notion that Judaism is a religion of joyless legalism. Schechter, citing talmudic and medieval sources, shows that for the rabbis there is a joy inherent in the fulfillment of the commandments, in particular because they lead to a profound intimacy with God.

MOORE is the first Christian scholar to have written a theology of Judaism in English based primarily on rabbinic sources rather than the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha. He does so in order to provide the reader with a picture of "normative" Judaism, as Moore puts it, a notion much criticized by other scholars. He provides a survey of all the sources available for deriving Jewish theological views. He then presents rabbinic views from the first two centuries of the Common Era on revelation, God, sin and atonement, observance, morals, piety, and the afterlife. For all Moore's efforts to present an "authentic" picture of Judaism, his presentation, by concentrating mainly on issues of belief, underemphasizes the importance for the rabbis of observance in all areas of life.

A difficult but important work is that of KADUSHIN. He addresses the issue raised earlier by Schechter, namely that there is no systematic theology within rabbinic Judaism and that conflicting views often are presented without resolution. Responding to this observation, Kadushin seeks to explain rabbinic theology in its own terms rather than trying to fit it artificially into a structure more suitable for Christian theology. He proposes that rabbinic ideology consists of what he calls "value-concepts" to which the sages refer with one or more "value-terms," such as Malkhut Shamayim (the kingship of Heaven) and Kiddush Hashem (the sanctification of God's name). These terms and concepts are intentionally left vague, says Kadushin, both so that they can be applied in many different situations with various shades of meaning and so that individuals may understand these concepts and terms according to their own lights. Because of the importance of language for rabbinic thought, moreover, one must be aware that when key rabbinic terms are translated into English their import may be altered significantly. Kadushin also makes extended reference to the social and biological sciences in order to frame his thesis in a more universally accessible form. Although the works to which he refers are now outdated, one must give Kadushin credit for his efforts at synthesizing rabbinic thought and the scientific theories of his day.

More recently URBACH has written a comprehensive review and analysis of rabbinic theology. In his introduction Urbach reviews and critiques the work of his predecessors. His major contribution—which he finds previous studies lacking—is a nuanced, historically aware presentation of rabbinic thought. This means, first of all, recognizing that there are often minority views alluded to or merely hinted at that must be teased out of the rabbinic sources. Often this can be done by consulting the Apocrypha or Qumran literature. Moreover, a study of these works as well as Christian literature makes it clear that rabbinic statements are often responses to views expressed by other groups. An example of this is his comparison of rabbinic and Christian exegesis of the Song of Songs. Finally, by paying close attention to the dating of rabbinic dicta one can trace ideological shifts over time in rabbinic thought (sometimes in response to evolving Christian thought).

NEUSNER (1973, 1989) offers an approach to the study of rabbinic theology that is significantly different from that of his predecessors. He is extremely skeptical about the reliability of the attributions in rabbinic literature and concludes, therefore, that it is not possible to offer a trustworthy survey of the theological views of particular sages. What is feasible, in his opinion, is to derive the theology of various "authorships": that is, the editors of the Mishnah, the editors of the Babylonian Talmud, and so on. For the most part the theology that Neusner derives from these documents is not from the avowedly theological statements in each work but from the type of issues it chooses to discuss and the manner in which it chooses to discuss them. Neusner notes, for example, that the mishnaic preoccupation with the effect of human intention on the ritual status of objects indicates its belief in the efficacy and importance of human will. Neusner understands numerous stories about sages in the Jerusalem Talmud as presenting the sage as an embodiment of Torah. He suggests that the Babylonian Talmud's greater use of Scripture relative to the Jerusalem Talmud and its organizing of discussions around scriptural verses shows its intention of integrating the Oral Torah of the rabbis with the Written Torah of Scripture, thereby giving rabbinic teachings the same status and authority as the Bible.

KRAEMER's (1990, 1996) important contribution is the examination of the basic methodology of rabbinic literature and argumentation, particularly as found in the Babylonian Talmud, so as to show its theological import. He demonstrates that in Babylonia there was an ever-growing interest in the mechanics and possibilities of disputation and that this coincided with an increasing recognition that ultimate truth was not available in any verifiable sense. This bred a love for dialectic coupled with the humility born of realizing the limitations of human intellect. It is this humility, in Kraemer's view, that is rabbinic Judaism's strength and saving grace.

ELIEZER DIAMOND

See also Talmudic Literature: Hermeneutics; Talmudic Literature: Introductions; Talmudic Literature: Reference Tools; Talmudic Literature: Translations

Talmudic Literature: Hermeneutics

- Boyarin, Daniel, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990
- Goldin, Judah, The Song at the Sea: Being a Commentary on a Commentary in Two Parts, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1971
- Holtz, Barry (editor), Back to the Sources: Reading the Classic Jewish Texts, New York: Summit, 1984
- Jacobs, Louis, Studies in Talmudic Logic and Methodology, London: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1961
- Jacobs, Louis, The Talmudic Argument: A Study in Talmudic Reasoning and Methodology, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984
- Mielziner, Moses, Introduction to the Talmud, Chicago: Bloch, 1894; 2nd revised edition, London: Funk and Wagnalls, 1903; 5th edition, New York: Bloch, 1968
- Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to the Talmud: A Teaching Book, New York: Harper and Row, 1973; revised edition, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1984
- Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to Midrash: The Workings of Rabbinic Bible Interpretation: A Teaching Book, San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989
- Porton, Gary, Understanding Rabbinic Midrash: Texts and Commentary, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1985
- Steinsaltz, Adin, The Talmud, the Steinsaltz Edition: A Reference Guide, New York: Random House, 1989
- Steinsaltz, Adin, The Talmud/Talmud Bavli: The Steinsaltz Edition, 21 vols., New York: Random House, 1989–2000

The hermeneutics of rabbinic literature refers both to the methods used by the rabbis to interpret biblical and other rabbinic sources and the various methods that have been proposed to understand rabbinic methodology itself. Because it is difficult to distinguish between these two topics in practice, and because the works reviewed below deal with both issues, the term “hermeneutics” is used in this essay to encompass both types of methodologies. On the other hand, talmudic and midrashic hermeneutics are distinct (although related) disciplines; therefore, this survey addresses works on each of these areas separately, beginning with talmudic hermeneutics.

One of the earliest English introductions to rabbinic hermeneutics is MIELZINER. The first section is comprised of a brief review of the Babylonian Talmud, cognate works, and the Talmud’s major medieval commentators; a listing of manuscripts, printed editions, and translations of the Talmud; a bibliography; an impassioned defense of the Talmud against its detractors; and a powerful invitation to the reader to take up Talmud study. The second and third sections are more directly relevant to the subject at hand. The second, which is titled “The Legal Hermeneutics of the Talmud,” explains the major methods used by the rabbis to interpret scripture, while the third section, “Talmudical Methodology and Terminology,” surveys the various types of rabbinic discourse and the terms used by the rabbis to signal the different types of interchange. Although Mielziner first cites each term in its original Hebrew and Aramaic, he also provides an English translation for each phrase. Furthermore, he provides examples from rabbinic literature for each term. This work brings the reader as close to the spirit of talmudic argumentation as is possible without studying the Talmud itself.

Most of the other works under discussion introduce talmudic methodology inductively, as they investigate some portion of the Babylonian Talmud. For example, Robert Goldenberg (in HOLTZ) translates and analyzes the opening few pages of Berakhot, the first tractate in the Talmud. NEUSNER (1973) is a much broader undertaking than Goldenberg’s effort; it offers a comparative presentation of the eighth chapter of Berakhot as it appears in the Mishnah, the Tosefta, the Jerusalem Talmud, and the Babylonian Talmud. In this way, Neusner not only introduces the hermeneutics of the Babylonian Talmud; he also explains that text’s role as interpreter of earlier material contained in the Mishnah and Tosefta, and he identifies the differences in style and substance between the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds.

STEINSALTZ (1989–2000) is a highly ambitious work of talmudic hermeneutics; it aims to make talmudic literature accessible to the English-speaking student who is unfamiliar with the rabbinic corpus. Steinsaltz’s edition (which translates four out of 37 tractates—Baba Metsia, Ketubbot, Taanit, and Sanhedrin—in 21 volumes) includes a literal translation of the original text of the Talmud (which is included), as well as an expanded translation-commentary, which explains the methods and assumptions behind talmudic discourse. Other useful features include footnotes summarizing selected glosses of the classical medieval commentators, summations of Jewish law that derive from the passage under discussion, side notes on language and terminology and on the social and material world in which the Talmud was composed, and brief biographies of the sages mentioned in each passage.

STEINSALTZ (1989) is intended to facilitate use of Steinsaltz’s multivolume work described above. This volume includes thumbnail biographies of the major Palestinian and Babylonian rabbis of the talmudic period as well as listings and explanations of the major terms used in rabbinic discussion and scriptural interpretation. Unfortunately, these lists are of limited use to the reader who does not know Hebrew: although the explanations are in English, the terms themselves are listed in Hebrew, without transliterations.

The studies by Louis Jacobs provide general introductions to talmudic methodology, which are illustrated with examples from specific passages. JACOBS (1961) is divided into two sections: the first consists of essays about various aspects of rabbinic logic. It includes comparisons of rabbinic methodology to Greek logic and to the methodology of the English philosopher John Stuart Mill, as well as an analysis of the relative authority accorded by the rabbis to logic and to Scripture. The book’s second half presents a study of a number of talmudic passages that demonstrates some of the literary tools used to construct talmudic discourse. JACOBS (1984) contains an excellent introduction to the methods of argumentation employed in the Talmud; it offers analyses of selected talmudic passages from both conceptual and literary perspectives.

BOYARIN provides an extremely sophisticated introduction to midrashic hermeneutics. He employs contemporary literary theories to explain the intent and method of midrash. This work is difficult to read, especially because Boyarin uses the complex vocabulary of literary criticism extensively, but the reader will be amply rewarded for the effort.

Holtz engages midrashic methodology with his translation and explication of some representative midrashim from the various genres. NEUSNER (1989) analyzes a significant number of selections from the major legal and narrative midrashim in his introductory text. He supplements his discussion of particular midrashim with a review of the agendas and methods of each of the midrashic compilations that he cites.

PORTON cites and glosses selections from the early legal midrashim and two of the early narrative midrashim, Genesis Rabbah and Leviticus Rabbah. His analyses are extremely detailed; they enable the reader to follow each step of the midrashic process of reasoning and interpretation. GOLDIN is a commentary on the portion of the Mekhilta (an early rabbinic midrash on Exodus) that examines the Song at the Sea, the poem recited by Moses and Israel to celebrate the miracle that allowed them to cross the sea on dry land while the Egyptians who pursued them drowned. He provides both an elegant translation and incisive glosses.

ELIEZER DIAMOND

See also Talmudic Literature: Introductions; Talmudic Literature: Reference Tools; Talmudic Literature: Theology; Talmudic Literature: Translations

Tannaim see Rabbinic Biography: Talmudic

Targum

- Cathcart, Kevin J., Michael Maher, and Martin McNamara (editors), The Aramaic Bible, Edinburgh: Clark, and Wilmington, Delaware: Glazier, 1987
- Diez Macho, Alejandro, "The Recently Discovered Palestinian Targum and Its Relationship with Other Targums," in Congress Volume: Oxford, 1959 (Supplements to Vetus Testamentum, vol. 7), edited by G.W. Anderson, Leiden: Brill, 1959
- Drazin, Israel, Targum Onkelos to Deuteronomy, New York: Ktav, 1982
- Drazin, Israel, Targum Onkelos to Exodus, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1990
- Drazin, Israel, Targum Onkelos to Leviticus, New York: Ktav, 1994
- Shinan, Avigdor, "Live Translation: On the Nature of the Aramaic Targums to the Pentateuch," Prooftexts, 3(1), 1983
- Sperber, Alexander, The Bible in Aramaic: Based on Old Manuscripts and Printed Texts, vol. 4, B: The Targum and the Hebrew Bible, Leiden: Brill, 1973
- York, Anthony D., "The Targum in the Synagogue and in the School," Journal for the Study of Judaism, 10, 1979

As Aramaic replaced Hebrew as the language of everyday life for Jews during the Babylonian exile (beginning in 597 B.C.E.) and Second Temple period (515 B.C.E.–70 C.E.), it became increasingly necessary to translate the Bible—and especially those parts of the Bible formally read during synagogue services—into Aramaic. The result is called targum (plural targumim), the Aramaic word for "translation." A number of written targum texts have been preserved: Targum Onkelos; Targum Neofiti; the Fragmentary Targum; Targum Pseudo-Jonathan; and various Cairo Genizah fragments of targumim, all on the Pentateuch; a distinct Targum Pseudo-Jonathan on the Prophets; and separate targumim on Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther (three), and Chronicles. These targumim vary considerably in style and theological content.

Scholars have focused on eliminating scribal and printing errors as well as deliberate interpolations that have crept into published targum texts; they have analyzed the interpretative stances and theology of individual targumim; and they have worked to determine whether particular targumim are of Babylonian or Palestinian origin.

CATHCART, MAHER, and McNAMARA and their collaborators are in the process of translating all the targumim into English. Most of the targumim have never been translated before, and this project is a considerable undertaking. Each volume contains a translation of one of the targumim on a biblical book, along with commentary, textual notes, and an introduction to that particular targum and its interpretive stance. Both the translations in this series and their introductory essays are generally high in quality.

A series of commentaries on the targumim has also commenced with contributions to date from DRAZIN (1982, 1990, 1994), as well as M. Aberbach and B. Grossfeld.

SHINAN explores the practice of targum as an actual activity that occurred in synagogue, and he tries to recreate the concerns that a meturgeman (reciter of targum) would have while he worked. The meturgeman was a professional, who apparently made a living from his craft. He would stand beside the Torah reader and recite the Aramaic translation by heart. The close resemblance of the Hebrew and Aramaic languages inspired the meturgeman to create word-plays based on the Hebrew and to diverge from Aramaic grammatical conventions in order to remain close to the Hebrew text of the Bible. The meturgeman was a mediator between rabbinic culture and the masses and incorporated the values of both. The targumim abound in folk beliefs and angelology, and they include a strong didactic emphasis on the rewards of Torah study and fulfillment of commandments, as well as praise for the power of prayer. The fact that the congregation listened to the meturgeman, instead of following a text directly, is reflected in the addition of interjections that were designed to inspire greater attention before important verses. Similarly, curses were changed from second-person to third-person to prevent confusion in the mind of a listener, who might misapprehend and think the curse was directed at him.

SPERBER distinguishes clearly between targum as an institution and targum as a literary document, noting that 1,200 years passed between the initial formulation of the oral targum tradition and the transcription of the oldest extant targum text. He argues that Targum Onkelos is a conflation of the products of two schools of translators, emphasizing the evidence of doublets (that is, two translations of the same unit of text) and sharp differences in style: one school adheres to literal translation as much as possible, deviating only to clarify an idiom or to demonstrate the validity of rabbinic interpretation, while the other school uses a freer, midrashic interpretative stance. Sperber speculates that the more literal elements were of Babylonian origin and the more interpretative parts emanated from the Palestinian tradition. He insists that close attention be paid to the style of targumic translation—it was never simply word-for-word—and he underscores the extent to which targum changes the biblical text when the original text contains ideas that run counter to the views of the period in which it was translated. For example, biblical anthropomorphisms were regularly rewritten. Thus, the idiomatic Hebrew expression "to walk before God" was rendered as "to serve God," while biblical mentions of other gods were changed to refer to idols. Sperber stresses that targum was aimed at the level of common folk: therefore, it contained explanations and revisions of difficult passages, and it included clarifications of grammatical problems.

DIEZ MACHO has published Targum Neofiti, a complete targum to the Pentateuch, which he discovered in the Vatican Library. This targum is an example of the Palestinian tradition, and Diez Macho argues that the fact that it was based on a Hebrew text that differed substantially from the Masoretic Hebrew Bible proves that it was compiled in either the first or second century B.C.E. Targum Neofiti, therefore, is a pre-Christian translation and older than Targum Onkelos.

YORK analyzes rabbinic references to targum and argues that targum was as important in the school as it was in the synagogue. The elementary-school curriculum accorded pride of place to instruction in targum. This fact is not in itself surprising, for there was a close relationship between school and synagogue, and the school with its hazzan (or superintendent) was typically housed in the synagogue. But the schools regarded targum not merely as important but also as inspired. Indeed, it was the targum's status as part of the corpus of Oral Torah that explains the strictures that delayed the act of committing targum to written form for so many centuries.

PAMELA BARMASH

Temple and Temple Mount

- Ben-Dov, M., Hafiroi Har ha-Bayit, 1982; translated as In the Shadow of the Temple: The Discovery of Ancient Jerusalem, New York: Harper and Row, 1985
- Comay, Joan, The Temple of Jerusalem, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1975
- Haran, Menahem, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel: An Inquiry into the Character of Cult Phenomena and the Historical Setting of the Priestly School, Oxford: Clarendon, 1977; as Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel: An Inquiry into Biblical Cult Phenomena and the Historical Setting of the Priestly School, Winona Lake, Indiana: Eisenbrauns, 1985
- Hayward, Robert, The Jewish Temple: A Non-Biblical Sourcebook, London and New York: Routledge, 1996
- Levenson, Jon D., Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible (New Voices in Biblical Studies), Minneapolis, Minnesota: Winston, 1985
- Mazar, Benjamin, The Mountain of the Lord, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1975
- Ritmeyer, Leon and Kathleen Ritmeyer, Secrets of Jerusalem's Temple Mount, Washington, D.C.: Biblical Archaeology Society, 1998
- Rosen-Ayalon, Myriam, The Early Islamic Monuments of Al-Haram Al-Sharif: An Iconographic Study, Jerusalem: Institute of Archaeology, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1989

For a millennium, Jews worshiped God on the Temple Mount, home to Jerusalem's First and Second Temples. The area, known as Mount Moriah, occupies the highest elevation on ancient Mount Zion and enters Jewish history during the time of King David, who acquired the land from the Jebusites. The honor of building the First Temple, however, fell to David's son, Solomon. Approximately 70 years after that temple's destruction in 586 B.C.E., the Second Temple was erected on the same site. This structure underwent numerous renovations, most stunningly during the time of Herod, who expanded the Temple Mount to its largest proportions, approximately 170,000 square yards, or 40 acres. In 70 C.E., the Roman army destroyed the Second Temple, but the Temple has endured as a revered image in Jewish literature and thought. Byzantine rulers left the Temple Mount desolate as proof that God had abandoned the Jews. In the seventh century, Arab Muslims captured Jerusalem and began transforming the Temple Mount into an Islamic holy site with the construction of the al-Aqsa mosque and the Dome of the Rock. Built over the area once occupied by the two successive Temples, the golden Dome stands today as the most recognizable feature of the Jerusalem skyline. Modern archaeological investigations conducted in the 19th and 20th centuries have made substantial contributions to knowledge of the Temple Mount's appearance and function.

COMAY recounts the history of the Temple Mount within the context of Jewish history from the time of Abraham to the early 1970s. Her book provides an accessible description of the Solomonic Temple, the sacrificial rituals performed there, the priesthood, and the Herodian expansion and renovations. She briefly describes the Islamic transformation of the sacred precinct and the Western Wall. Numerous reproductions of medieval and Renaissance illuminated manuscripts and paintings enliven the narrative.

LEVENSON examines the complex and complementary relationship between the two holy mountains in Jewish tradition, Sinai and Zion. In addition to representing the everlasting covenant with the house of David, Mount Zion serves as the location where the voice of God, heard first on Mount Sinai, continues to be experienced. Levenson describes the way in which the Temple occupies a central place in Jewish theology, functioning as the "conduit through which messages pass from earth to heaven"; it is the atemporal location forestalling a collapse into chaos and a spatial microcosm of the universe itself. The Temple, always more than a physical location, was able to transcend its destruction when Judaism transposed its sanctity onto other venues and activities, including prayer, study, synagogue, and the domestic table.

HARAN's detailed study of temple worship in ancient Israel focuses on four topics: the role of the temple in Israelite religion; the priesthood; the rituals; and the pilgrimage festivals, especially Passover, which were major occasions for temple worship. Although he also describes numerous other temples that existed in ancient Israel, the author concentrates on the Temple in Jerusalem. He argues that the Priestly source (P), one of the hypothetical source documents believed to have been used to compose the Pentateuch, should be dated to the First Temple period. (Many scholars dispute this early dating of P.) From this controversial position, Haran believes that the priestly account can be used as a reliable source of information about the operation and ideology of the First Temple.

HAYWARD has selected eight texts written in the Second Temple period that express "what the Temple service meant to Jews of the Second Temple times." These writings reflect the tremendous value and respect Jews attached to the Temple. Hayward allows each text to speak for itself but also provides a brief introduction in which he identifies five recurrent themes related to the Temple: along with its rituals, the Temple establishes and secures order in the cosmos; it acts as a microcosm for the entire universe; it serves as the earthly counterpart to the heavenly angelic worship; it marks the site where Israel seeks God's blessings; and it is prominently associated with light, particularly as a symbol of God's presence.

BEN-DOV presents a richly illustrated history of the Temple Mount and those areas that stood in its shadow from the time of David to the Ottoman Empire, highlighting the tremendous architectural developments introduced during the Herodian, Byzantine, and Umayyad periods. He supplements this narrative with a history of the archaeological excavations, often told through dramatic anecdotes taken from his own experiences at the site. He describes in detail the buildings, bridges, arches, gates, walls, porticos, tunnels, drainage system, and cisterns that made up the Temple Mount, along with the pottery, coins, and other small artifacts that have contributed to a better understanding of the Temple's functions.

MAZAR, who supervised the archaeological excavations conducted around the Temple Mount beginning in 1968, opens his book with a brief summary of the surveys conducted in the 19th and 20th centuries. He then weaves together the literary record and the archaeological data to tell the story of the Temple Mount and surrounding areas of Jerusalem from the earliest construction to the destruction of the Second Temple. The book focuses on the architecture of the First and Second Temples along with the associated structures located on the Temple Mount and in the City of David. The author concludes with an examination of the Islamic holy sites constructed during Umayyad period and subsequent changes introduced by Crusaders, Mamluks, and Turks. Mazar includes hundreds of photographs of the Temple Mount, the excavation sites, and the artifacts uncovered.

Leon Ritmeyer served as the architect involved with the archaeological excavations south of the Temple Mount from 1973 to 1978. Based on the discoveries from these excavations and the reports compiled by 19th-century archaeologists, RITMEYER and RITMEYER identify the probable location of the First and Second Temples (immediately below the current site of the Dome of the Rock) and reconstruct the layout of the Temple Mount before it was devastated by the Roman army. The numerous drawings provide a vivid depiction of the ways the Temple Mount may have looked during the biblical, Hasmonean, and Herodian periods.

ROSEN-AYALON studies the transformation of the Temple Mount into al-Haram al-Sharif, an Islamic holy site. With particular focus on the Dome of the Rock and the al-Aqsa mosque, she concludes that the buildings of the Haram were not constructed in a haphazard manner but were "positioned in accord with a well thought-out plan." She demonstrates that the axial relation between the al-Aqsa mosque and the Dome, not to mention the Dome itself, was inspired by the Basilica and Rotunda of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem in an effort to overshadow the Christian shrine and thereby promote the Islamic identity of the city. In addition, she shows how the Dome's rich decorations were meant to evoke the long-standing identification of Jerusalem as the earthly paradise.

GARY GILBERT

See also Tabernacle; Western Wall

Theater

Beck, Evelyn Torton, Kafka and the Yiddish Theater: Its Impact and His Work, Madison, Wisconsin, and London: University of Wisconsin Press, 1971

Ben-Ari, Raikin, Habima, translated by A.H. Gross and I. Soref, New York: Yoseloff, 1957

Cohen, Sarah Blacher (editor), From Hester Street to Hollywood: The Jewish-American Stage and Screen (Jewish Literature and Culture), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1983

Isser, Edward, Stages of Annihilation: Theatrical Representations of the Holocaust, Madison, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1997

Kaminska, Ida, My Life, My Theater, edited and translated by Curt Leviant, New York: Macmillan, 1973

Klima, Cynthia Ann, "A Tricultural Theatrical Tradition: The History of the German Theater in Prague, 1883-1938," Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin at Madison, 1995

Lifson, David S., The Yiddish Theatre in America, New York: Yoseloff, 1965

Sandrow, Nahma, Vagabond Stars: A World History of Yiddish Theater, New York: Harper and Row, 1977

Jewish theater is a multifaceted art whose form depends on the country where the theater is located and on the audience attracted to such theater. Naturally, Yiddish theater is primarily associated with the Jews of Poland, Russia, and Lithuania. It was originally an unsophisticated form of theater presented by wandering troupes subsisting on very little and often playing for free in cafes and small restaurants. The plays were simple in form, yet it was precisely this simplicity that conveyed lessons to audiences so easily and subtly. Yiddish theater was brought to New York by Eastern European immigrants, and its eventual demise was due to the obliteration during World War II of Eastern European Jewish life, specifically obliteration of the shtetl, which was the primary inspiration for the milieu of Yiddish theater.

The endeavors of the acting company Habima provided a Hebrew-language venue for Jewish theater. Like the Yiddish theater, Habima troupes traveled extensively, often performing in front of audiences that understood little or no Hebrew. Habima's creative roots were in Russia, but finally it found repose in Israel. In Western Europe, there were several small Jewish theaters, but more significant was Jewish involvement in the general theater community. Jewish participation in the cultivation and preservation of drama on stage helped theaters such as the New German Theater (Neues Deutsches Theater) in Prague and theaters in Vienna and Germany to survive even when financial times were catastrophic. Performances of German classics such as Maria Stuart, Emilia Galotti, Faust, and Nathan der Weise were supported greatly by Jewish cultural societies. Following World War II, a new form of Jewish theater began to emerge—the Holocaust drama. This genre was slow to catch on after the war, but in the 1960s interest in such works proliferated. Finally, dramatists such as Wendy Wasserstein, Neil Simon, Lillian Hellman, and Paddy Chayefsky are among the numerous modern Jewish playwrights whose plays have been recognized with various accolades and whose contributions to the great quilt of U.S. culture are considered invaluable.

BECK's work focuses on Franz Kafka's relationship to Yiddish theater. A major change occurred in Kafka's writing around 1912, a year that coincides with his first experience with Yiddish theater in Prague, where performances took place in the modestly decorated Café Savoy. Dramatic elements and clearly defined characters began to make their appearance in his works, and thus his writing became more adaptable to the stage. Beck concentrates on revealing the differences in Kafka's writing prior to and following the year 1912 as well as the transformation of his prose into stageable drama.

BEN-ARI's work traces the history of the first Hebrew acting company, Habima, from its inception as a cooperative community theater to its designation as a state theater in Russia and finally to its reconstitution in Israel. Ben-Ari, a former member of the troupe, lends firsthand knowledge of a theater created to give Jews a sense of identity and to relate the richness of Jewish culture on stage in the original language of the Jews. The chapters "The Habima and Theatrical Theory" and "The Stanislavsky System" describe the implementation of Stanislavsky's acting techniques by Habima's actors. Black-and-white photographs of individual actors, of the acting troupes, and of scenes from plays complement the work. Inspirational and at times emotional, the work is the story of a troupe that triumphed in the face of monetary, political, and social hardships.

COHEN's compilation contains articles reflecting the different facets of Jewish theater, from immigrant Yiddish theater to the contemporary U.S. scene with its themes ranging from the Jewish folklore-laden vision of Isaac Bashevis Singer to the Holocaust. Several playwrights are well represented in the book, including Lillian Hellman, Paddy Chayevsky, Clifford Odets, Neil Simon, Jules Feiffer, and Saul Bellow. Because the work encompasses many areas of Jewish theater, it is well suited to those readers who desire a good overview of the history, development, and modern forms of the medium. Of particular note is Nahma Sandrow's "Yiddish Theater and the American Theater," which follows Yiddish theater from Eastern Europe to New York. In addition, a discussion of Jewish comedy is featured in the work.

ISSER states that his work "seeks to identify emerging patterns and correlations among dramatic texts written on the topic" of the Holocaust. In addition, he makes the case that this delicate subject must not be manipulated for artistic or political purposes, for such treatments are an invitation to historical revisionists. The book is divided into ten chapters, describing plays written to relate the Holocaust to U.S. audiences and discussing various playwrights, such as George Bernard Shaw and Arthur Miller, and their diverse relationships to the theme of Holocaust drama. Chapter five is devoted to German theatrical responses to the Holocaust, and it treats such topics as Peter Weiss's documentary theater and Berthold Brecht's Marxist interpretations of the subject. Isser divides Holocaust drama into two categories: death camp drama and survivor drama. He also addresses the issue of "theatrical space"—that is the victims and the enemy, both on stage and "potentially in the audience." This work provides references to many plays and thoughtful insight into an area of drama that is highly compelling and worthy of further study.

KAMINSKA's memoirs describe her life as a child actress sharing the stage with her mother, Esther Rachel Kaminska, the "Mother of Yiddish Theater." She recounts a life of travel from Warsaw to St. Petersburg, experiencing the Revolution in Russia, antisemitism in Poland, and the Yiddish performance scene in New York. Kaminska relates the hardships of traveling in such a theatrical troupe, including troubles with local authorities, government censors, and war. She details her brush with the Nazis, her life under Communism, European tours in the 1950s, and her jump from stage to celluloid. The book provides valuable insight into people who suffered for their art and who labored to perfect something for which they had immense passion.

KLIMA's dissertation begins with a background sketch of Jewish Prague and the history of Czechs, Germans, and Jews in the city. While the work does not deal specifically with Jewish theater, it does explore the important role Jews played in saving and preserving German drama in Prague. Several Jewish playwrights and their plays are discussed in the work. Included is an extensive appendix that lists newspaper articles about plays, plays performed in German-language theaters, and cafés where Jewish intellectuals gathered to share ideas regarding the Prague literary scene. Also provided is an outline of the stages in Prague. A thorough bibliography makes this work a valuable source for further information on Jewish involvement in the world of Prague German drama.

LIFSON's work traces the historical background of Yiddish theater and shows how many forms of drama, including German expressionism and French impressionism, were imported to the United States by Yiddish acting troupes. Extensively discussed too is the shtetl of Eastern Europe, whose life is thematically central to the spirit of Yiddish theater and whose language "is a dialect of the human soul." Lifson explains why Yiddish theater thrived in New York. Playwrights, their plays, Yiddish actors, the audience, drama clubs, the Folksbiene, and the Jewish Art Theater are treated in separate chapters. Lifson's final chapter outlines the decline of Yiddish theater, which he attributes to the destruction of the shtetl during World War II. Included are black-and-white photographs of dramatic scenes on stage and of notable actors.

SANDROW insists that her purposes are "historical, not critical." The work chronicles the Yiddish theater, from the biblically based dramas of the 17th century to the theaters of New York. She also examines the entry of secular learning into the realm of Yiddish theater during the Haskalah, or Enlightenment. The work encompasses many aspects of Yiddish drama, including German classics translated into Yiddish, and there is a chapter on Avrom Goldfadn, the "Father of Yiddish Theater." Shund, or commercial theater, Soviet Yiddish theater, Yiddish theater in Poland, and drama in the concentration camps and ghettos are thoroughly discussed. Reproductions of original playbills, stage scenes, and cartoons accompany the text.

CYNTHIA A. KLÍMA

Theodicy

Blumenthal, David R., Facing the Abusing God: A Theology of Protest, Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/Knox, 1993
 Kushner, Harold S., When Bad Things Happen to Good People, New York: Schocken, 1981; London: Pan, 1982

Leaman, Oliver, Evil and Suffering in Jewish Philosophy (Cambridge Studies in Religious Traditions, 6), Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995

Levi ben Gershom, The Commentary of Levi ben Gerson (Gersonides) on the Book of Job, edited and translated by Abraham Lassen, New York: Bloch, 1946

Maimonides, Moses, The Guide of the Perplexed, translated by Shlomo Pines, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963

God is good, and God is all-powerful: these two claims have been axiomatic for Jews, Christians, and Muslims since biblical times. And for just as long, people have been trying to reconcile the two propositions with the harsh realities of life. The world is full of suffering, and much of it appears undeserved and pointless. Why does God sometimes fail or refuse to intervene to stop evil or to save his creatures from anguish? This is the problem of “theodicy,” or the justification of the ways of God. In the Bible, this issue constitutes the central theme of the Book of Job, and it is articulated in the cry of the psalmist, “Why do you hide your face, heedless of our misery and our suffering?” (Psalm 44:25).

The debate continued through the rabbinic tradition. Although Rabbi Yannai (second century C.E.) said: “It is not in our power [to explain] the tranquillity of the wicked nor the afflictions of the righteous,” there are several attempts in the Talmud to explain suffering. One collection of sayings speaks of three kinds of suffering: punishment for sin, especially for neglect of Torah; “chastisements of love” (see Proverbs 3:12), which are borne in love; and suffering that purges sin, bringing atonement. Life after death, a firm principle of rabbinic belief, compensates for apparent injustice in this world; the righteous suffer as mortals in order to reap greater reward in the hereafter. Some, especially kabbalists, adopted the concept of reincarnation to explain the suffering of the apparently innocent, such as children. The problem of evil is indeed central for Kabbalah, which sees the origin of what appears as evil (although ultimately all derives from the Creator and therefore is good) in the dominance of the divine attribute of justice over that of mercy. In recent times discussion has been stimulated in reaction to the Holocaust, but little has emerged that is new in principle.

LEAMAN has produced what may well be the first overview of the problem of theodicy in Jewish religious philosophy. (It is not a survey of the problem in Jewish religious thought generally, as it contains no more than passing reference to the Talmud or to the midrashic and kabbalistic sources.) Leaman’s starting and finishing point is the Book of Job, and even this text is investigated from a philosophical standpoint rather than in terms of traditional exegesis. Through his reading of Job, he draws attention to the relationship between experience, philosophy, and religion; Job does not conclude from innocent suffering that God does not exist, nor does Job perceive that all is well in the world. With this foundation, Leaman offers a critical analysis of the views of Philo, Saadya, Maimonides, Gersonides, Benedict de Spinoza, Moses Mendelssohn, Hermann Cohen, Martin Buber, Franz Rosenzweig, and some post-Holocaust thinkers. Returning to Job for his conclusion, Leaman contends that a discussion of evil and suffering is really a discussion about relationships with God.

MAIMONIDES was the most influential Jewish religious thinker of the Middle Ages, and this text is his major philosophical testament. In it, he seeks to harmonize the Scriptures as understood in Jewish tradition with philosophy, that is, with the science and thought of Aristotle as mediated through his Islamic translators and interpreters. Maimonides’ views are often misrepresented by scholars who seek hidden meanings in his words, or by those who cannot accept that his intentions run counter to current orthodoxy. In his bold discussion of God’s providence in book 3 chapters 8–24, he argues that imperfection, hence evil and suffering, lies in the nature of physical matter as subject to generation and corruption. Of the ten concentric spheres that (in Ptolemaic cosmology) make up the universe, only the innermost—the earth—consists of physical matter; because human beings live on this sphere, they share in its material chaos, which lies outside of God’s providence. However, human beings also possess souls, which belong to the nonmaterial universe of the upper spheres. By cultivation of the spirit or intellect, their souls—which are the essential and enduring part of them—are united with the active intellect and placed directly within God’s providence, immune to evil and suffering and open to the flow of divine knowledge through the “chain of being”; this process enables exceptional people to become prophets.

LEVI BEN GERSHOM (Gersonides) lived in Provence in the 14th century and was among the most important scientists of the Middle Ages. In his commentary on Job, he addresses the problem of theodicy. The message of Job, Gersonides says, is that humans should apply reason, or wisdom, to the understanding of their misfortunes; Job was virtuous but not initially wise. The wise person appreciates that God has created the world in the best possible way, even though this creation has occasional unpleasant side effects. Following Averroës, Gersonides maintains that God, in knowing himself, knows particulars. Consistent with his “dignity,” however, God knows them not in detached form, as humans do, but as the necessary result of rational principles; the wise person, understanding this truth, can benefit from special divine providence.

KUSHNER, a Reconstructionist rabbi, presents his deservedly popular book as the work of “a religious man who has been hurt by life.” The text is dedicated to the memory of his son, Aaron, a victim of progeria (premature aging) who died just after his 14th birthday. The diagnosis of Aaron’s malady and the subsequent unfolding tragedy shook the naive faith of Kushner and his wife in the conventional image of God as an “all-wise, all-powerful parent figure who would treat us as our earthly parents did, or even better . . . and would see to it that we got what we deserved in life.” Kushner offers comfort rather than theology. In a key passage, he asserts that God’s words to Job (40:9–14) mean that although God wants the righteous to live peaceful, happy lives, and so shares Job’s anger at the suffering of the righteous, he is unable to save innocent victims from cruelty and chaos. “God can’t do everything,” states Kushner in the title of chapter seven, “but he can do some important things.” Most importantly, God does not solve problems for humans, but he enables them to cope, and through prayer he gives them strength, patience, and hope. Kushner skillfully draws out the universal relevance of his Jewish sources, although it cannot be said that his rather attenuated God has much in common with the God of the Bible or of Maimonides.

BLUMENTHAL, in this bold and imaginative book, follows his mentor, Abraham J. Heschel, in conceiving of God as “anthropopathic”—sharing human feelings. “God, as understood by the personalist stream of the tradition and experience, is personal. So God too must have a character, sensitivities, an individual history, and a moral capacity. . . .” God is fair; God addresses, and can be addressed by, humankind; God is powerful but not perfect; God is loving; God gets angry; God chooses and is partisan. Blumenthal writes in the wake of a sequence of statements from Holocaust theologians, such as Borowitz and Fackenheim, and precisely at a time when child abuse has become a public issue. A new and shocking image becomes available—that of God in Auschwitz as the abusing parent. Just as a parent does not stop being a parent because he abuses, the abusing God remains God and cannot be rejected. People must acknowledge the relationship and continue to live with God. Is such a God worth calling “God”? Blumenthal thinks so, first, because “the realm of the holy is there”; second, because by using religious and moral language, “humankind may be able to save itself from a fate as bad as, or worse than, the Holocaust.” This book issues from the heart, and it will reach the heart. Not for a moment does Blumenthal attempt to lull the reader with easy explanations of messy world conditions or with illusory hopes for the future.

NORMAN SOLOMON

Tithes

- Avery-Peck, Alan J., Mishnah's Division of Agriculture: A History and Theology of Seder Zeraim (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 79), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1985
- Brooks, Roger, Support for the Poor in the Mishnaic Law of Agriculture: Tractate Peah (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 43), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1983
- Haas, Peter J., A History of the Mishnaic Law of Agriculture: Tractate Maaser Sheni (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 18), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1980
- Herman, Menahem, Tithe as Gift: The Institution in the Pentateuch and in Light of Mauss's Prestation Theory (Distinguished Dissertation Series, 20), San Francisco: Mellen Research University Press, 1992
- Jaffee, Martin S., Mishnah's Theology of Tithing: A Study of Tractate Maaserot (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 19), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1981

Scripture designates the tithe as the portion of the produce and animals produced in the land of Israel that is due to God (see, for example, Leviticus 27:30–33; Numbers 18:21–32; Deuteronomy 12, 14:22–29, 26:12–15). Scholarship on the topic addresses either the tithe in the Scripture itself—investigating the passages in their original context—or rab-binic interpretations of the various tithes, particularly as explicated in the Mishnah.

A biblical study, HERMAN's work interprets the tithe in light of anthropologist Marcel Mauss's theory of prestation. Herman's thesis is that the biblical tithe is best understood not as a tax, but as a form of socially governed gift-exchange (“prestation”) in which tangible goods (the tithe) are exchanged for intangible ones (God's protection, blessing, covenant, etc.). After surveying modern critical interpretations of the tithe in Scripture, Herman analyzes the pentateuchal references to the tithe, explains Mauss's gift-exchange theory, and concludes that the tithe was a gift-exchange centered around the covenant between God and the people of Israel.

AVERY-PECK's work is a good place to begin reading on tithing in the Mishnah. This study provides a detailed analysis of the growth and meaning of the mishnaic law of agriculture, and the author offers both a synchronic analysis of the thrust and meaning of the final form of the Order of Agriculture (one of the Mishnah's six fundamental divisions) and a diachronic reconstruction of the various stages of development of the theoretical premises of the law of agriculture. After supplying an overview of the meaning of the final form of this section of the Mishnah, Avery-Peck turns to the component tractates (Peah, Demai, Kilaim, Shebiit, Terumot, Maaserot, Maaser Sheni, Hallah, Orlah, and Bikkurim). Each tractate is introduced, and its thematic units are presented. Building on his evaluations of the individual tractates, the author distinguishes a history of the Mishnah's Order of Agriculture during three time periods: before 70 C.E., the Yavnean period (70 to 140 C.E.), and the Ushan period (140 to 170 C.E.).

Avery-Peck's treatment of the various tractates relies on expositions of the tractates previously published in the Brown Judaic Studies series, particularly those by Brooks, Haas, and Jaffee considered here. These authors, while commenting on different tractates, share a similar approach. They are self-consciously historicist, seeking to illuminate in the manner of their teacher, Jacob Neusner, the social and political circumstances that prompted the theological reflection captured in the Mishnah. Each commentary's centerpiece is an intentionally literal translation of the tractate. This centrality of translation reflects the authors' belief that syntax, formalized literary patterns, and intentional ambiguities are the key to the meaning and interpretation of the tractates.

The commentary on Tractate Peah (the corner-offering for the poor) was written by BROOKS. The premise of this tractate is that the poor are owed a portion of the fruit of the land. This tractate takes up the scriptural references to poor-offerings with respect to the produce in the corner of the field (Leviticus 19:9, 23:22), gleanings (Leviticus 19:9, 23:22), forgotten sheaves (Deuteronomy 24:19), separated grapes (Leviticus 19:10), defective clusters (Leviticus 19:10; Deuteronomy 24:21), and the poor man's tithe (Deuteronomy 26:12). The Mishnah's framers seek to determine the practical implications of the poor's exclusive right to a portion of the crops grown in Israel, guaranteed by the doctrine that God controls the entire land of Israel and is therefore owed tithes, which are to be distributed to those under God's special care—the poor and the priests.

Tractate Ma'aserot (Tithes), commented on by JAFFEE, focuses on two issues: the first, and less important, is the identification of the class of produce that is subject to the tithe; the second, and more pressing, is the question of when a crop is suitable to be tithed and when the tithe must be paid. In Ma'aserot, as in Peah, the framers' answers to these questions are based on the belief that agricultural produce of the land of Israel requires a sacred tax owed to God (Leviticus 27:30). Jaffee argues that the theology of Ma'aserot's thinkers aims to link God to the Israelite farmers by means of the agricultural cycle.

HAAS's commentary on Tractate Ma'aser Shenit (Second Tithe) addresses the agricultural offering that Israelite farmers separate from their harvest and eat in Jerusalem (Deuteronomy 14:22–27). The purpose of the tractate is to establish special restrictions to govern the treatment of this consecrated produce prior to the time it is consumed in Jerusalem. The tractate focuses on two issues: first, it dictates the circumstances under which the tithe can be eaten, and second, it provides a mechanism for the farmer to sell the consecrated produce in order to ease the burden of transportation of the tithe to Jerusalem, and then to use the value of the tithe for the prescribed purpose.

The works of Brooks, Jaffee, and Haas together bring into focus the mishnaic authors' theological and practical understanding of biblical tithes after 70 C.E. The framers of the division of agriculture believed that in spite of the loss of the Jerusalem temple, the people of the land of Israel still owed the biblical tithes to God. The formulation of the laws in the Order of Agriculture establishes the means by which the tithes could be properly paid in the absence of the temple. By focusing on authorial intent and the meaning of a tractate in its original context, these scholars speak to historical questions at the heart of nascent rabbinic Judaism.

SHEILA DUGGER GRIFFITH

Toleration

Erspamer, Peter R., The Elusiveness of Tolerance: The "Jewish Question" from Lessing to the Napoleonic Wars (University of North Carolina Studies in the Germanic Languages and Literatures, vol. 117), Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997

Katz, Jacob, Out of the Ghetto: The Social Background of Jewish Emancipation, 1770–1870, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1973

Low, Alfred D., Jews in the Eyes of the Germans: From the Enlightenment to Imperial Germany, Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues, 1979

Sorkin, David, The Transformation of German Jewry, 1780–1840, New York: Oxford University Press, 1987; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990

Formally, toleration means allowance of religions not officially sanctioned by the government or ruler of a nation. Such toleration may take the form of a full equality or it may merely be a grudging forbearance. Historiographically, the word toleration has been used to refer to the movement in 18th-century Europe spurred by the Tolerance Debate, which argued the issue of Jewish emancipation.

LOW lauds the accomplishments of the Tolerance Debate in increasing the level of toleration in 18th-century Germany and Austria. Despite the relatively recent publication date of this monograph, Low actually began work on the book during the Third Reich, and his aim was to point out that not all important figures in German history were antisemitic. This was a somewhat daring stance at that time for a native Austrian such as Low.

Low points to Emperor Joseph II of Austria and the Edict of Toleration that the emperor passed in 1782, improving the lot of his Jewish subjects. The provisions of these edicts included abolition of the yellow badges that Jews had been forced to wear outside of the ghettos and the annulment of the dehumanizing body toll placed on Jews and their cattle. Other important provisions included granting Austrian Jews the right to send their children to elementary and secondary schools. Attendance at universities, which had never been forbidden, was now expressly allowed. Jews were allowed to frequent public places of amusement. Most dramatically, they were allowed to learn any trade and to engage in wholesale business under the same conditions as Christian subjects, and they were permitted to establish factories.

Frederick the Great of Prussia pursued a more conservative Jewish policy than Joseph II but indirectly advanced the progress of the Jews when he felt it was in his own economic interest to do so. Wealthy Jews enjoyed his support in helping to build up the Prussian economy, but poorer Jews lived in a state of abject misery. Frederick's Jewish regulations, such as the exorbitant taxation of Jews, smacked of a dislike of the Jewish religion and its adherents. However, Jews who established factories were better able to obtain letters of protection that permitted their residence in Prussia. The Enlightenment had both a positive and a negative effect on Frederick's policy toward Jews. On the one hand, he was influenced by the Judeophobia of Voltaire, a favorite in his court. On the other hand, many of his ministers were influenced by Enlightenment precepts calling for religious tolerance and a separation of church and state. Low points out that Frederick the Great had received the Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn and paid his respects to him, but he fails to mention that Frederick refused to ratify Mendelssohn's nomination to teach at the Royal Academy and therefore killed the appointment.

KATZ discusses the limitations of tolerance, especially for Jewish intellectuals. Jews lived in what Katz calls "a semi-neutral society." Because of the Enlightenment, they were allowed to speculate on abstract questions but were not allowed to voice their opinion on practical political matters.

SORKIN casts toleration in dialectical terms. He views the growth of Jewish rights as part of a quid pro quo whereby Jews were to refashion themselves and give up many of their cultural attributes in exchange for more rights. To the extent that Jewish culture remained a separate entity from German culture, Jews' social integration remained incomplete and Jewish emancipation was only partially successful.

ERSPAMER probes this dialectic posited by Sorkin even further and examines the extent to which gentile proponents of emancipation had their arguments on behalf of Jews undermined by their own incomplete acceptance of Jewish culture. The famous German writer Gotthold Ephraim Lessing was one of the initiators of the Tolerance Debate, but in his pro-emancipatory drama of 1779, Nathan the Wise, Nathan is portrayed as both a Jew and a spokesman for the Christian Enlightenment. This imposes contradictions upon him; his effectiveness as a spokesman for the Christian Enlightenment depends on his ability to distance himself from his own Jewish in-group.

This irony appears in the way that Nathan raises his stepdaughter Recha. He brings her up to be part of the multicultural utopia posited by Enlightenment ideals. Nathan is aware that someday Recha will leave him for a broader family setting: the Jew's daughter must herself cease to be a Jew and join a larger circle of humanity. Nathan finds himself in a situation like that of Moses in the Bible: he leads his people (not only Recha, but also the characters Curd, Saladin, and Sittah) to the border of the promised land, but he cannot enter it himself. Utopia is at the same time universal and strangely exclusive. He cannot cease to be a Jew, so he must be excluded from this broader circle of humanity. He is further isolated when his daughter surrenders her Jewishness to enter the broader utopian family. The writings of 18th-century proponents of multiculturalism such as Lessing are beset by cultural fissures. This comes about, for the most part, because multiculturalists seek to enter into dialogue with "Otherness." In order to do so, however, they must first enter into an internal dialogue with themselves, and conceptual fissures inevitably arise because elements of this internal dialogue are often unresolved.

PETER R. ERSPAMER

Tribes, Ten Lost

Adler, Elkan Nathan (editor), Jewish Travellers (Broadway Travellers), London: Routledge, 1930; New York: Bloch, 1931; 2nd edition, as Jewish Travellers: A Treasury of Travelogues from 19 Centuries, New York: Hermon, 1966

Godbey, Allen H., The Lost Tribes a Myth: Suggestions towards Rewriting Hebrew History (Duke University Publications), Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1930

Lyman, Stanford M., "The Lost Tribes of Israel as a Problem in History and Sociology," International Journal of Politics, Culture, and Society, 12(1), Fall 1998

Parfitt, Tudor, Journey to the Vanished City: The Search for a Lost Tribe of Israel, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1992; New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993

Primack, Karen, Jews in Places You Never Thought Of, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1998

Weil, Shalva et al. (editors), Beyond the Sambatyon: The Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes, Tel Aviv: Beth Hatefutsoth, The Nahum Goldman Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, 1991

The fall of the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 B.C.E., as related in 2 Kings 17:5–6, presents the world with one of the great puzzles of Jewish history: What became of the Ten Tribes, traditional descendants of the sons of Jacob, that constituted Israel and were deported with its fall? The southern kingdom of Judah consisted of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and most modern Jews regard themselves as their descendants or identify with the landless religious functionaries of the tribe of Levi. The fates of Reuben, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, Menasseh, Ephraim, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher remain an enigma, however. Certain biblical prophets—above all, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel—express hope that the lost tribes will be restored, while the Apocrypha (Tobit) and Pseudepigrapha (IV Ezra) and Josephus Flavius (Antiquities) speculate about where the tribes may have gone. Various passages of rabbinic literature also discuss this topic. The most popular of these texts are Genesis Rabbah 73:6 and Sanhedrin 10:6 in the Palestinian Talmud, in which the mythical river Sambatyon is mentioned as the insuperable border dividing the lost tribes from their fellow Israelites.

The myth continued to be cherished in post-talmudic times and was popular with Jews and Christians alike in Europe throughout the Middle Ages and early modernity. The search for the Ten Lost Tribes received a fresh impetus with the rise of scientific Bible research and ethnography, as well as the political and technical developments of the 19th and 20th centuries that made important biblical sites more accessible to scholars. Certain Zionist groups continue to pursue the answer to this puzzle, for they believe that their mission, the ingathering of the exiles of Israel, and their notion Klal Israel (the whole community of Israel) mandates outreach to groups in Asia, Africa, and elsewhere whose identity as descendants of the lost tribes is, to say the least, in question. During the last 2,500 years, the Ten Lost Tribes have been identified with numerous communities worldwide. Some of these communities observe customs that from a contemporary perspective appear vaguely "Jewish," at least in part; others do not. Only a few of the peoples who claim descent from the tribes, such as the Indian Bene Israel and the Ethiopian Beta Israel, have made their way into the Jewish mainstream.

The founding father of the Ten Lost Tribes myth in post-talmudic times is the mysterious Eldad ha-Dani, a traveler who appeared in Cairo, Kairouan (Tunisia), and Spain around 880. ADLER, an intrepid manuscript hunter who acquired several important medieval and early modern Jewish travelogues, compiled a valuable anthology of this literature that includes the most serviceable English translation of Eldad's colorful accounts. Eldad claimed to be a member of the lost tribe of Dan, and he stated that Dan lived together with Naphtali, Gad, and Asher in the mythical land of Havila, "where gold is" (Genesis 2:11), which he locates in Ethiopia. Eldad draws a map of the territories of all the Lost Tribes, locating them mostly in Persia, Babylonia, and Arabia, and Adler points out that Eldad's story is still recited regularly in Persian synagogues. Eldad also vividly describes the Sambatyon river, where dangerous torrential waters run six days a week and an impenetrable fire appears on its banks on the sabbath. His stories were accepted by the Jewish authorities of the places he visited, and they reached central Europe during the Middle Ages. Adler himself argues that unqualified skepticism on the part of modern readers toward these tales is “unjustifiable.” Adler also translates travelogues by David Reuveni (c.1500–1535)—who claimed that his brother was Joseph, king of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and one-half of the tribe of Menasseh—and Benjamin of Tudela—the great 12th-century traveler whose narrative features significant discussion of the question of the tribes. Also included in the anthology is Obadiah de Bertinoro’s 15th-century travel diary, which recounts the story of a war between the Ten Tribes and Prester John in Ethiopia.

GODBEY’s classic is still by far the most comprehensive and detailed work on “Ten Tribism,” as Morris Epstein nicknames the phenomenon in his ironically toned prolegomenon to the reissue of this text. Godbey himself combines ironic distance with an ardent fervor for disclosing the historical reality behind the myths. He argues that there is such a reality, but he goes to great pains to distinguish his own positivistic approach from the naive assumptions of the “lost tribes hunters,” who are the objects of many sarcastic attacks in his book. He criticizes travelers who are too hasty to conclude from superficial knowledge of local traditions that certain communities are of Jewish descent, even when the communities themselves protest against this identification—for example, the Muslim Pathans of Afghanistan call themselves Beni-Israel, but they do not consider themselves to be related to the Jews of the region.

Godbey also campaigns against the trends that dominated physical anthropology during his lifetime. Physiognomists of both Jewish and non-Jewish origin studied the facial and physical features of prospective descendants of the Ten Tribes in order to identify “pure Jewish types.” In his view, the “lost tribes hunters” were quite incorrect in presuming that they had discovered irrefutable proof of lines of descent from Jacob’s lost sons to today’s Jews or would-be Jews. To the contrary, he argues, the communities that are allegedly descendants of the Lost Tribes gained this reputation either because of wildly inadequate circumstantial evidence (as in the Pathan case) or because of false genealogical accounts that mask acts of conversion.

Through “careful examination” of the Hebrew Bible and the histories of the communities that are potential descendants of the tribes, Godbey concludes that the “loss” of the Ten Tribes is itself a myth and that the consequences of the deportation of the northern tribes in 722 B.C.E. are overestimated: only a few thousand people were deported from Israel, and there is no reason to assume that they were the biological ancestors of the many communities that have been presumed to be the Lost Tribes. Furthermore, Godbey asserts that there is no evidence that shows historical, ethnological, or religious differences between the southern tribes of Judah and Benjamin and the ten northern tribes. He emphasizes that, in addition to the story of the Ten Tribes, there have been many other instances in which Jewish communities have scattered, thereby producing new dispersed groupings with claims to an Israelite genealogy. Furthermore, Godbey contends that historians have underestimated the importance of Jewish missionary activities. During the last 2,500 years, many groups of people in many places and at many different times have become converts to Judaism, and the beliefs of these isolated communities of descendants of proselytes accordingly reflect different stages of development in the Jewish religion. Thus, the fact that a Jewish group’s traditions differ from the rabbinic mainstream by no means necessarily suggests a genealogical connection to the lost tribes. Among the most obvious examples are certain groups of Yemenite Jews, especially from Hadramaut, and the ancient Berber-speaking Jewish communities of the Moroccan Atlas. While Godbey’s study exudes a scientific character, he clearly has his biases. He firmly believes in the historical value of biblical accounts and presumes that Christianity develops Judaism to its “most spiritual and ethical heights.”

LYMAN analyzes the motivations behind the creation and repeated reinvention of the Ten Lost Tribes myth. Unlike Godbey, he is relatively unconcerned with the “real” histories of the alleged descendants of the Ten Tribes. Instead, he employs a postmodernist epistemology to investigate the meaning of the myth to its believers. He describes his project as a sort of quest to root “the theodicy of Jewish identity” (or survival) in historical context, and he argues that the Lost Tribe descendants are meant to be living proof that obscure or contradictory biblical representations are in fact historically true. He demonstrates that the shape of the myth has changed several times during the course of history. While rabbinic and medieval sources focus on different versions of the Sambatyon story and locate the tribes in remote parts of the Near East and Central Asia, modern mythologists (from Columbus onwards) tend to equate the descendants with existing “exotic and heterodoxical peoples” who are “invested with . . . a complex, sometimes contradictory construction of Jewishness, Jewish history, or Jewish memory.” The second part of Lyman’s article is dedicated to the Samaritans, “an anomalous peoplehood” claiming descent from Ephraim and Menasseh and continuing to survive as an indigenous and ambiguous Israeli-Palestinian minority. The Samaritans have never left the land of Israel, and their religious practices resemble rabbinic Judaism more closely than do the practices of other groups that have been granted the status of Lost Hebrews. Unlike other heterodox groups, however, the Samaritans have not sought rabbinical acknowledgment, because such a sanction would compromise the Samaritans’ claim to the holy Mount Gerizim near Nablus, an ancient Israelite sanctuary and rival to Jerusalem, as well as their claims for the authenticity of their priesthood. The depiction of the Samaritan place in antiquity and brief reviews of sociological theories (such as Max Weber’s) that help explain this community’s distinctive development are very strong points in Lyman’s sober and elegant study.

PRIMACK is a vivid illustration of the well-meaning modern Jewish search for “exotic” communities that may be estranged descendants of the Ten Tribes. The book, which has neither a scientific method nor scientific aims, was published on behalf of two interrelated philanthropic societies, the U.S.-based Kulanu (“All of us”) and the Israeli Amishav (“My people returns”). Both organizations have strong Zionist aspirations: they trace “crypto-Jews” worldwide, working to move these groups to Israel and pressuring the Israeli chief rabbinate to acknowledge these potential immigrants as Jewish. Primack describes the efforts to reach the “descendants” of the Lost Tribes, teach them Judaism, bestow upon them religious objects such as Torah scrolls and prayer shawls, and, finally, prepare them for immigration to Israel.

According to Primack, the most impressive success story of Kulanu/Amishav to date concerns the Shinlung of northeast India, a tribal society of approximately 2 million people, 5,000 to 10,000 of whom are said to be actively practicing Judaism. Since the 1950s, this minority has claimed that they are descendants of the tribe of Menasseh and that their ancestors migrated south from China sometime after the 14th century, eventually reaching the Indian states of Mizoram and Manipur, where they were Christianized during the 19th century. Primack's book presents the Shinlung's claim to Israelite descent and describes the 1996 immigration of approximately 200 Shinlung individuals to Israel, where these immigrants had to undergo conversion and were sent to live in a kibbutz in the Gaza strip. Primack also provides accounts of other groups in regions where one would have "never thought of" finding Jewish communities: for example, Incas in Trujillo, Peru, who decided in 1966 to become Jewish; the Abayudaya of Uganda, who started in 1919 to observe Jewish law and customs; a Telugu-speaking community in Andhra Pradesh, India, who claim to be of the tribe of Ephraim; and the Lemba, a tribal society of more than 100,000 persons living in Zimbabwe, Malawi, Mozambique, and South Africa. These groups are not able or willing to prove their descent from the Ten Tribes in a way acceptable by rabbinic authorities, but, as Primack makes clear, the organizations are nevertheless eager to embrace them on the basis of a very broad interpretation of the notion of the Jewish community. Intended as a guide for individuals who wish to support the organizations' activities, the book shows how an ancient myth can appear in modern garb and serve contemporary political goals.

In 1991, Tel Aviv's Diaspora Museum mounted an exhibition on the Lost Tribes myth entitled "Beyond the Sambatyon." In line with the museum's strongly pedagogic slant, pictures and texts were presented, but no actual ethnographical artifacts were included. The catalog (WEIL et al.) is one of very few comprehensive surveys on the Ten Lost Tribes. In a brief and concise manner, all relevant topics and figures connected with the myth are surveyed, and the catalog reproduces most of the pictures from the exhibition. The catalog's contents can be roughly divided into three categories: first, prints, drawings, and manuscripts that refer to the myth in premodern and early modern times. These include frontispieces of old travelogues, such as those anthologized by Adler; the medieval Prester John story about a mythical Christian conqueror who was said to rule over remote Asian or African lands adjacent to the Sambatyon river where the Ten Tribes dwelt; a reference to Shabbetai Tsevi, who based his claim to be the messiah on (among other things) his alleged reign over the Ten Tribes; a portrait of Manasseh ben Israel, the 17th-century Amsterdam rabbi who recounted the stories of a contemporary traveler, Antonio de Montezinos, who claimed to have met South American Indians who were descendants of Reuben and Levi; and references to the theories of the "British Israelites," who assert that the English are of ancient Israelite origin. Second, the catalog includes photographs of Jewish communities whose ancient Israelite origins are mostly acknowledged by contemporary authorities, such as Yemenite, Indian, Bukharan, Uzbek, Georgian, and Ethiopian groups, as well as the now-extinct Chinese Jews and the Samaritans. Third, the catalog presents extraordinary materials related to groups whose affiliations to Judaism are either in doubt or definitely stem from recent acts of conversion, including some of the communities described by Primack.

PARFITT is a prolific author on the issue of Jewish fringe groups. In the late 1980s he visited the Lemba of southern Africa, also mentioned in Primack's book as one of a handful of "exotic" societies hoping for rabbinical acknowledgement. The Lemba represent a fine case study of a historically non-Jewish community struggling to attain a clear-cut Jewish identity. Parfitt met on his journey leaders and "normal" folk, all of whom expressed a conscious desire to be Jews. The Lemba base their claims on historical projections and on observable parallels between their religious practices and those of Judaism. They describe a past in which they were more physically similar to Jews (the Lemba claim that they were once white with "Semitic" features), and they contend that formerly they possessed a sacred literature, which has been lost. Their oral tradition depicts a golden age in the "vanished city" of Sena, a place of undetermined location, and relates a myth of the tribe's migration from northeast Africa or possibly from Yemen. (Parfitt traveled unsuccessfully to the Hadramaut region of Yemen to search for Sena.) Their myths also recount the Lemba's part in the foundation of Greater Zimbabwe, and they assert that the tribe shares a common ancestry with the Beta Israel of Ethiopia. Like them, the Lemba claim descent from the mythical union between King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, but the Lemba do not seem to identify with any particular lost tribe.

Parfitt also identifies some remarkably detailed similarities between the Lemba cult and customs of the Ethiopian Beta Israel, and he argues that scholars have not yet explained these parallels satisfactorily. The Lemba distinguish certain animals as unclean; they slaughter animals in a way very similar to Jewish custom; they observe rituals of avoidance regarding menstruating women that resemble the purity laws of the Torah; they have ideas (albeit vague) about the holiness of the first day of the new moon; and they practice male circumcision. The Lemba circumcise older boys, not infants, and these acts resemble the initiation rites of other African societies, but the Lemba individuals whom Parfitt interviewed insisted that their ritual was connected to Jewish practice. The lack of a written tradition makes it extremely difficult to trace the historical background of Lemba claims, but Parfitt found many hints that Jewish cultural patterns had only recently been incorporated into Lemba oral tradition. For example, he argues that the Star of David probably first became the symbol of the Lemba Cultural Association of South Africa only after Lemba domestics working for a Jewish family became familiar with the star displayed in the house of their employer. Thus, Parfitt emerges skeptical about the Jewish roots of the Lemba, and he ponders the possibility of Muslim influence upon their tradition. The reader may wish that Parfitt had explained more adequately how Jewishness came to be so strongly inscribed in contemporary Lemba tradition and what Kulanu/Amishav activities may have to do with this development. Additionally, this book does not establish whether the Lemba, or some of them, aspire to emigrate to Israel, as Primack's account suggests. Still, Parfitt's exciting travelogue offers intriguing insights into the creation of a Jewish identity.

MONIKA HUMER

Tsedakah see Charity

Tunisia

- Awret, Irene, Days of Honey: The Tunisian Boyhood of Rafael Uzan, New York: Schocken, 1984
- Ben-Sasson, Menahem, "The Jewish Community of Gabès in the 11th Century: Economic and Residential Patterns," in Communautés juives des marges sahariennes du Maghreb, edited by Michel Abitbol, Jerusalem: Ben-Zvi Institute, 1982
- Deshen, Shlomo, "Southern Tunisian Jewry in the Early 20th Century," in Jews among Muslims: Communities in the Precolonial Middle East, edited by Shlomo Deshen and Walter P. Zenner, New York: New York University Press, and Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire: Macmillan, 1996
- Laskier, Michael M., "From Hafsia to Bizerte: Tunisia's Nationalist Struggle and Tunisian Jewry, 1952-61," Mediterranean Historical Review, 2, 1987
- Memmi, Albert, The Pillar of Salt, New York: Criterion, 1955; London: Elek, 1956
- Rozen, Minna, "The Leghorn Merchants in Tunis and Their Trade with Marseilles at the End of the 17th Century," in Les relations intercommunautaires juives en Méditerranée occidentale, XIIIe-XXe siècles, edited by J.L. Miège, Paris: Editions du Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1984
- Serels, M. Mitchell, "The Non-European Holocaust: The Fate of Tunisian Jewry," in Sephardim and the Holocaust, edited by Solomon Gaon and M. Mitchell Serels, New York: Yeshiva University, 1987
- Udovitch, Abraham L. and Lucette Valensi, The Last Arab Jews: The Communities of Jerba, Tunisia, New York: Harwood Academic, 1984

The Jews of Tunisia were a heterogeneous group, composed of urban and rural Jews, with the former subdivided between indigenous and Livornese. Most of the community was Westernized under the French Protectorate and has emigrated since the 1950s, mainly to Israel and France, but a relatively high proportion of the Jews on the island of Djerba stayed and kept their traditional way of life. Most of the research on Tunisian Jewry is in Hebrew or French.

A personal view of a small Jewish community is provided by AWRET in her biography of a Tunisian Jew, Rafael Uzan. Born in the Tunisian coastal town of Nabeul, Uzan tells of his boyhood, family and communal relations, education, work as a shoemaker, and relations with the Muslims. Details about festivals, pilgrimages, beliefs, and customs are described as is the condition of the Jews during World War II and German occupation.

Based primarily on Genizah documents and responsa literature, BEN-SASSON examines the economic life and residential patterns of the Jews of Gabès, in southern Tunisia, in the 11th century, when the region was under the rule of the Ziridis who represented the Fatimids. The involvement of Jews from Gabès in international and local trade is explored as are their agricultural and manufacturing activities.

DESHEN examines the socioeconomic structure and the institutions of the Jewish society of southern Tunisia in the early 20th century, based primarily on rabbinic sources. As a result of its relatively peaceful history and the economic behavior of the Muslim Berber population among whom they lived, the Jews in this region, and especially on the island of Djerba, developed complementary economic patterns that influenced their social, cultural, and institutional life. Because the Berbers operated a network of migrant merchants throughout Tunisia, the Jews entered into local commerce and filled local positions and did not engage during this period in international or itinerant trade. As a result, Djerban Jewry became sedentary, and the local community grew to exercise a high degree of power over its individual members, especially in religious matters.

The impact of the Tunisian national struggle for independence on the Jewish community of Tunisia is examined by LASKIER. Following a survey of the political background, Laskier describes the Jewish communities in the years 1952 to 1956, including an examination of the reasons for and results of the attacks on the Jews of Hafsia in June 1952. The policy of the State of Israel and the Jewish Agency toward Tunisian Jewry during the same period is examined as is Jewish emigration from Tunisia. Developments during the first years of independence are described next, including Zionist activities and government policy. Laskier concludes with a comparison between the Jewish communities of Tunisia, Morocco, and Algeria prior to and following independence.

MEMMI's autobiographical novel describes growing up in the Jewish community of Tunis and covers the period until the late 1940s. His vivid description includes images of the Jewish neighborhood, customs, the Sabbath, feasts, education, family life, adolescence, and World War II and its aftermath. Memmi provides a very personal view of Jewish life in Tunis in the first half of the 20th century.

ROZEN examines the commercial activities of Livornese Jewish merchants in Tunis at the end of the 17th century. Jews and conversos persecuted by the Inquisition settled in large numbers in Leghorn following the privilege granted in 1593 by the grand duke of Tuscany, who guaranteed freedom and security to merchants of all nations and religions who wished to settle and trade there. This community was very mobile and established branches in other important commercial centers, including Tunis. As Tuscan citizens, these merchants benefited from special extraterritorial protection granted by the capitulations treaties. During the 17th and 18th centuries, the Livornese Jews in Tunis were prominent in international trade. Rozen examines their various economic activities, including their involvement in piracy, their relations with the French merchants in Tunis, and the activities of several specific Jewish firms there. She shows how a "triangle of commerce" was formed in the Mediterranean, linking Leghorn, Tunis, and Marseilles, within which the Jewish merchants from Tunis and Leghorn cooperated with the French merchants in Tunis and Marseilles in order to benefit from the same privileges the French enjoyed under Franco-Ottoman agreements.

SERELS shows how the Jews of Tunisia were affected by anti-Jewish legislation and German occupation during World War II. As a French protectorate since 1881, Tunisia came under the Vichy regime with the fall of France in 1940, and anti-Jewish legislation was introduced. Serels details the implications of this legislation for the individual and the community. Following the Allied invasion of North Africa, German and Italian forces regrouped in Tunisia in late 1942, and anti-Jewish operations intensified, sending Jews to concentration and labor camps. Serels details the anti-Jewish legislation and operations across Tunisia until the withdrawal of the Axis forces in May 1943. The regulations, however, were removed by the Allies only in August 1943.

Based on field study conducted in 1978 and 1979, UDOVITCH and VALENSI describes the life of the approximately 1,200 Jews of the two communities of the island of Djerba, who are effectively the last Jewish communities in the Arab world who have preserved their traditional spiritual, social, and economic life. Against the background of their myths of origin, Udovitch and Valensi examine the history of the communities, stressing their persistence in strict observance of religious rulings, often more rigorously construed than elsewhere. Symbols of identity are examined as is the issue of a sacred space, defining special places for Jews and for women. Communal life is described in detail, emphasizing the roles of individuals and committees who provide a largely lay leadership. Other major issues to be examined are family life, including the role of women, and the daily and annual cycles as related to the community as a whole and to men and women separately. The education of men, from its rigorous beginnings for small boys to adult learning and publishing activity, is examined as are the beginnings of girls' formal school education. Udovitch and Valensi also describe the changing roles of Jews in economic life and the implications for Jewish-Muslim relations. The role of the synagogue is examined, especially that of the Ghriba synagogue and the meaning for Djerban Jews of its status as a pilgrimage destination for those who have left the island. Richly illustrated, the book provides an absorbing examination of internal efforts to preserve traditional Jewish life in a changing society.

RACHEL SIMON

This page intentionally left blank

U

United States: Community Histories

- Cutler, Irving, The Jews of Chicago: From Shtetl to Suburb, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1996
- Dalin, David G. and Jonathan Rosenbaum, Making a Life, Building a Community: A History of the Jews of Hartford, New York: Holmes and Meier, 1997
- Ehrlich, Walter, Zion in the Valley: The Jewish Community of St. Louis, vol. 1: 1807–1907, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1997
- Friedman, Murray (editor), Jewish Life in Philadelphia, 1830–1940, Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues, 1983
- Rottenberg, Dan (editor), Middletown Jews: The Tenuous Survival of an American Jewish Community, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997
- Sandberg, Neil C., Jewish Life in Los Angeles: A Window to Tomorrow, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1986
- Sarna, Jonathan D. and Ellen Smith (editors), The Jews of Boston, Boston: Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston, 1995

Community histories have long been a staple of American Jewish historiography. These histories are diverse, ranging from celebratory anniversary volumes that smooth out the rough edges of the story to scholarly studies that illuminate broad sociological trends as well as the history of the particular local community. In between are a variety of coffee-table books, anthologies, and oral histories. Jewish community history has flourished since the mid-20th century, a development that owes a great deal to the influence of Jacob Rader Marcus, historian, founder, and director of the American Jewish Archives from 1947 to 1995. Marcus not only raised the standard for U.S. Jewish history scholarship, he also encouraged amateur historians to write the stories of their synagogues and communities. In 1953 he published a primer on writing local Jewish history that surveyed the major documentary sources and provided a sample outline. “Do not be disturbed,” he wrote, “if you have had no experience in the past writing history. With a little preparation you, too, can write something that is worthwhile and helpful.” In the years that followed, Marcus advised many authors and wrote prefaces for some of their works. The American Jewish Historical Society has also supported research and publication of these works, and the Jewish Publication Society published many fine traditional community histories, although university and academic presses have increasingly taken over this task.

DALIN and ROSENBAUM present a well-researched volume with an ambitious agenda. They aim “not only to analyze the history of Hartford Jews and their community, but also to place those data in the larger context of American Jewish history, including the history of Jews and Judaism in Connecticut and New England; ethnic, religious, and urban history; and the discipline of American history in general.” The authors are partly successful in meeting these objectives, as they make comparisons with other regions, outline broad social trends, and place Hartford within its regional context. The book overemphasizes institutional history, however, and its survey of women and groups outside the mainstream is too brief. Dalin and Rosenbaum have meticulously documented their research, but the book could use a good general index to complement the name index. On the whole, this book presents a thorough analysis of the community within the course of U.S. Jewish history.

CUTLER offers a general survey of Chicago Jewish history. Despite its colorful and varied history, Jewish Chicago has never been the subject of a good analytical study; previous efforts are dated or narrow in scope. Cutler’s contribution, a coffee-table book sprinkled with photographs, only partly addresses the need. He paints the history of the community with broad strokes, from the first settlement of German Jews through the growth of vibrant neighborhoods on Chicago’s West Side and finally to migrations north of the city. The salient events, institutions, and people are covered, making this book a good introduction. But the study is marred by flaws in documentation, and the author relies too heavily on secondary sources. Many rich archival collections remain unexplored, and a scholarly treatment of this important Jewish community is still needed.

EHRlich also addresses a relatively underrepresented community but with more success than Cutler. This history of the Jewish community of St. Louis is a solid contribution that draws on archival sources, newspapers, and oral histories, as well as general history scholarship. Ehrlich’s work covers not only religious, economic, and political life but also the role of the Jewish press. The author offers few comparisons to other communities, and the photographs lack documentation, but the book is generally well done.

FRIEDMAN is a well-regarded collection of essays on Jewish Philadelphia. Jewish women's history, often relegated to the margins of the story, is surveyed in an essay by Evelyn Bodek, who traces the roles that Jewish women played in the philanthropic institutions of the city. Other essays cover such important subjects as immigrant workers and unions, the relationship between German Jews and Eastern European Jews in the Jewish Federation, and notable communal leaders such as Isaac Leiser. A final essay draws a comparison between the Jewish communities in Philadelphia and Boston, and similar patterns in the development of philanthropic organizations and synagogues in the two cities are traced.

SARNA and SMITH have produced an essential resource for Boston Jewish history that could serve as a model for other volumes of this kind. Presented in a large, coffee-table-book format, this collection focuses on movements and institutions that have been central to the history of Jewish Boston, including Zionism, philanthropy, and education. An introductory essay by Sarna puts Boston in the context of U.S. Jewish history; the author observes that Boston was different from many other U.S. cities in the 19th century because it was late in developing synagogues and other Jewish institutions and because the tensions between German and East European immigrants in Boston were resolved so quickly. Not one of the essays focuses exclusively on the history of Jewish women in Boston, but the subject is integral to the book.

ROTTENBERG edits a volume that is not a traditional community history but a collection of oral histories. The early studies of "Middletown" by Robert and Helen Lynd (1929, 1937) had almost ignored the existence of the Jewish community in Muncie, Indiana; this volume was published to correct this flaw and to explore the demographic and sociological trends of the Jewish community. The 19 oral histories demonstrate restlessness in the community and evaluate the pervasive effects of change and mobility. The book concludes that in many ways the Jewish community participated in the trends that affected the larger community.

SANDBERG focuses attention on the growing Jewish community of Los Angeles, where, he posits, some national trends become evident earlier than they do in the rest of the country. His book is less a history than a sociological study and is concerned with demographics, religious identity, and the long-term survival of the community. Sandberg's research represents an important category of community study that complements the strengths of a more traditional historical study.

JOY KINGSOLVER

See also New York; United States: General Histories

United States: General Histories

Diner, Hasia, A Time for Gathering: The Second Migration, 1820–1880 (The Jewish People in America, vol. 2), Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992

Faber, Eli, A Time for Planting: The First Migration, 1654–1820 (The Jewish People in America, vol. 1),

Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992

Feingold, Henry L., A Time for Searching: Entering the Mainstream, 1920–1945 (The Jewish People in America, vol. 4), Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992

Hertzberg, Arthur, The Jews in America: Four Centuries of an Uneasy Encounter: A History, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989; Chichester, West Sussex: Columbia University Press, 1997

Karp, Abraham J., Haven and Home: A History of the Jews in America, New York: Schocken, 1985; as A History of the Jews in America, London: Aronson, 1997

Marcus, Jacob Rader, United States Jewry, 1776–1985, 4 vols., Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1989–1993

Sachar, Howard M., A History of the Jews in America, New York: Knopf, 1992

Shapiro, Edward S., A Time for Healing: American Jewry since World War II (The Jewish People in America, vol. 5), Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992

Sorin, Gerald, A Time for Building: The Third Migration, 1880–1920 (The Jewish People in America, vol. 3), Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992

Sorin, Gerald, Tradition Transformed: The Jewish Experience in America (The American Moment), Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997

General histories of the Jews in the United States have often been flawed, but some contributions from the last 15 years of the 20th century have shown more promise. The best of them reflect new directions in historiography and challenge easy generalizations.

The "Jewish People in America" series, taken together, is an insightful and well-written survey of American Jewish history that integrates Jewish women's experiences into the overall picture. FABER's volume, the first in the series, traces the history of early American Jewry from the first permanent Jewish settlement in North America in 1654 to the early republic. Finding in these early years the seeds of later experiments with acculturation and assimilation, Faber sees Jewish communities in this period as testing grounds for ideas of voluntary affiliation and citizenship. In the second volume, DINER traces the history of the first wave of immigrants, documenting the ways in which Old World Judaism was transformed into a new Jewish identity. Her work highlights the role of such organizations as B'nai B'rith, landsmanschaftn, and other types of aid associations. SORIN (1992) draws a distinction between acculturation and assimilation, arguing that as immigrants adjusted to life in the United States, they became acculturated in ways that kept their distinct identity intact. FEINGOLD's volume begins with the antisemitism of the 1920s and moves through the subsequent decades of prosperity and upward mobility, covering developments in education, Zionism, and political involvement. A final chapter presents a balanced and cautious approach to the difficult question of the American response to the Holocaust. SHAPIRO begins with the postwar period and notes increasing assimilation through recent years. His particular slant on these trends becomes evident in the last chapter, in which he takes a despairing view of the future and criticizes changes to traditional definitions of Jewish identity. Some astonishing statements, such as the claim that only a few converts were genuinely attracted to Judaism, are unsupported by documentation.

HERTZBERG has written perhaps the weakest of the books reviewed in this essay. Although his survey is very readable, appealing to a broad public, it is marred by careless research and questionable interpretation. Treatment of women's history is minimal; the chapter entitled "The Invention of the Jewish Mother" relies on tenuous assertions and perpetuates stereotypes. Since this book is written for a general audience, it has no footnotes, which makes his arguments even more problematic. The concluding chapters, which speak of disillusionment and the loss of faith, view recent assimilation as a grave threat to any American Jewish future.

KARP outlines the ways in which Jews seeking a haven in the New World made that world their home, becoming integrated into American society and helping to shape it. His volume functions very well as an introduction to the major themes in American Jewish history, but its brisk pace limits it. Primary documents, inserted into the narrative, help give the story immediacy, but at times readers would benefit from more explanation or context. Contrary to the gloomy predictions favored by many commentators, Karp maintains an upbeat view of the future:

American Jews' morale for survival is bolstered by their historic experience in America. They are here despite the prophecies of doom pronounced in every generation. And they can look back to ideologies and strategies for survival which made possible the ongoing enterprise of creative Jewish survival in a free and open society.

MARCUS, who did so much to shape contemporary writing about American Jewish history, produced this monumental four-volume set near the end of his career. Reflecting his focus on colonial and 19th-century Jewish history and his interest in Jewish community histories, these volumes trace developments in the United States in the early period, the period ending in 1840, the "Germanic" period (1840 to 1920), and the East European period (1920 to 1985). Recent history is condensed into a relatively brief overview. Marcus's style is lively and readable, his outlook positive: "There can be no question, for the Jew this is the best country, the freest land in the world. . . . There may be misgivings but he faces the future with trust, with confidence, with dogged faith." But for all its virtues, this set needs to be read alongside some of the other, more recent interpretations of American Jewish history.

SACHAR offers an impressive survey of the range of Jewish endeavor in the United States. His encyclopedic history includes cultural, literary, and political movements. In Sachar's opinion, the success of the Jewish people in the New World had reached new heights by the postwar period. "Taking root in America," he writes, "this was a minority people—transformed within human memory into the largest, wealthiest, the most powerful community in Jewish history—that was engrossed no longer with issues of economic security or political toleration. Rather, its preoccupation henceforth was the encouragement, refinement, and apparently limitless enhancement of group identity and creativity." This vision of the future was dissipated by the identity crises of the last three decades of the 20th century. Disagreement over relations with Israel, embarrassing scandals involving a Jewish underworld, and the loss of faith in a unifying purpose all worked together, in Sachar's view, to produce a profound disillusionment.

SORIN (1997) is a thought-provoking analysis of American Jewish history that deserves careful reading. Sorin builds his history on the central role that immigration played in American Jewish history. Skipping lightly over the early period, his interest lies in how successive waves of immigration shaped American Jewish culture. He elaborates on the argument, presented in the Feingold series, that acculturation did not destroy a distinct Jewish identity or destroy the meaning Jews found in their past. Citing what he calls "rejuvenating events," such as the efforts to bring Jews out of the Soviet Union, he argues that Judaism is constantly being redefined. Sorin is able to set Jewish immigration in the context of the acculturation of other ethnic groups, contrasting Jewish experience with that of Hispanic immigrants of the late 20th century. Overall, the Jewish experience in the United States is "the best example of the success of cultural pluralism."

JOY KINGSOLVER

See also United States: Community Histories

This page intentionally left blank

V

Vegetarianism

- Berman, Louis, Vegetarianism and the Jewish Tradition, New York: Ktav, 1982
- Bleich, Rabbi J. David, "Vegetarianism and Judaism," Tradition, 23(1), Summer 1987
- Cohen, Rabbi Alfred, "Vegetarianism from a Jewish Perspective," Journal of Halacha and Contemporary Society, 1(2), Fall 1981
- Kalechofsky, Roberta (editor), Judaism and Animal Rights: Classical and Contemporary Responses, Marblehead, Massachusetts: Micah, 1992
- Kalechofsky, Roberta (editor), Rabbis and Vegetarianism: An Evolving Tradition, Marblehead, Massachusetts: Micah, 1995
- Kalechofsky, Roberta, Vegetarian Judaism: A Guide for Everyone, Marblehead, Massachusetts: Micah, 1998
- Kalechofsky, Roberta and Rosa Rasiel, The Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook, Marblehead, Massachusetts: Micah, 1997
- Schwartz, Richard H., Judaism and Vegetarianism, Smithtown, New York: Exposition, 1982; 2nd edition, Marblehead, Massachusetts: Micah, 1988

Judaism and vegetarianism? Given the importance of animal sacrifices to biblical religion and of carnivorous foodways to the contemporary Jewish folk ethos, one may wonder whether the two can be related. In fact, there has been much Jewish vegetarian activity recently in the United States, Israel, the United Kingdom, and elsewhere, and there is a broad and growing body of literature exploring connections between Judaism and vegetarianism.

SCHWARTZ has written a comprehensive analysis of all aspects of Jewish vegetarianism. The first chapter presents a "vegetarian view of the Bible" that discusses God's first strictly vegetarian dietary law (Genesis 1:29); God's second vegetarian attempt, represented by the manna; and the view of some Jewish scholars that people will again be vegetarians in the time of the Messiah. The next five chapters consider respectively Jewish teachings on compassion for animals; preserving health; protecting the environment and conserving natural resources; helping hungry people; and pursuing peace. Schwartz also discusses how animal-based diets and agriculture seriously violate these teachings. The book addresses 37 questions that are often asked of vegetarians who take the Jewish tradition seriously. These include such favorites as: Do we not have to eat meat on the Sabbath and Jewish festivals? Were we not given dominion over animals? What about animal sacrifices and the hoped-for restoration of the Temple? Jewish vegetarian groups and activities in the United States, Great Britain (where the Jewish Vegetarian Society has its international headquarters), and Israel are reviewed. Also provided are biographies of famous Jewish vegetarians, an annotated bibliography, recipes and food-related suggestions, and action ideas for those who might want to promote vegetarianism.

KALECHOFSKY (1998) uses similar arguments, stressing contradictions between Judaism and the realities of animal agriculture and diets, to assert that vegetarianism is the ideal diet for Jews today, and she provides an additional consideration, the unity of the Jewish people, "kelal Yisrael." In her view, all of kelal Yisrael could once again share meals in each others' homes and at each others' celebrations if all Jews were vegetarians. The chapter on health extensively discusses recent problems related to the consumption of meat, including "mad cow disease," genetic engineering, and recalls of meat because of outbreaks of e.coli and salmonella poisoning. Kalechofsky provides an insightful historical and sociological context in the chapters "Kashrut and Modernity" and "From Living Soul to Animal Machine."

BERMAN provides a less polemical, more psychological analysis than Schwartz and Kalechofsky. The book is relatively short (the main text is only 72 pages long), but there are valuable chapters titled "Slaughter as a Mode of Worship" and "The Dietary Laws as Atonements for Flesh Eating." These chapters speculate that the sacrifices provided a cover for meat eating in a religion that has such strong teachings on compassion for animals, and that the dietary laws substituted for animal sacrifice after the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed. While vegetarianism is viewed favorably, the author identifies himself as one who, if invited to dinner, would play the "visiting anthropologist" and eat what was served.

KALECHOFSKY (1995) provides thought-provoking essays on Jewish connections to vegetarianism by and about 17 rabbis. The rabbis included in the anthology form a varied group: Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist; male and female; modern and of previous generations; and recent converts to vegetarianism as well as long-time proponents. They differ also in their arguments for vegetarianism, although all are based on Jewish values: preserving health; showing compassion to animals; protecting the environment; and sharing with the hungry. Rabbi Everett Gendler's essay offers an additional cogent argument: people are supposed to exult in creation and to join a chorus of all living creatures singing God's praises; but instead, humans, sharply deviating from this mission, have treated their fellow choir members horribly, killing them and consuming their corpses. Particularly powerful is the essay by the former chief rabbi of Ireland, David Rosen, in which he indicates that eating meat is not acceptable today according to halakhah (Jewish law) because of its negative health effects and also because of the cruelty to animals on factory farms.

KALECHOFKY (1992) provides a wide variety of insightful essays on Jewish teachings related to animal rights and vegetarianism, and she includes two chapters each from the books by Schwartz and Berman. Also reprinted here is the essay by COHEN, an Orthodox scholar who provides a comprehensive overview of the topic. Since he is not a vegetarian, many of his statements that favor vegetarianism are in a sense the more compelling, including his conclusion that "If a person is more comfortable not eating meat, there would be no obligation for him to do so on the Sabbath," and "we may clearly infer that eating meat, even on a Festival, is not mandated by the halacha." He also concedes that "if indeed eating meat is injurious to one's health, it is not only permissible but perhaps even mandatory that we reduce our ingestion of an unhealthy product to the minimum level."

In his scholarly overview of vegetarianism, BLEICH, another non-vegetarian Orthodox rabbi, noted scholar of halakhah, and a professor at Yeshiva University, also concludes that Jews need not be vegetarians: "The implication is that meat may be consumed when there is desire and appetite for it as food, but may be eschewed when there is not desire and, a fortiori, when it is found to be repugnant," and "Jewish tradition does not command carnivorous behavior."

KALECHOFKY and RASIEL provide a thoughtful analysis of the connections between vegetarianism and Jewish holidays, along with 170 recipes and many food-related ideas to enhance the joy of the festivals.

RICHARD H. SCHWARTZ

Veneration of Saints, Pilgrimages, and Holy Places

Adler, Elkan Nathan (editor), Jewish Travellers (Broadway Travellers), London: Routledge, 1930; New York: Bloch, 1931; 2nd edition, as Jewish Travellers: A Treasury of Travelogues from 9 Centuries, New York: Hermon, 1966

Ben-Ami, Issachar, Ha'aratsat ha-kedoshim be-kerev Yehude Maroko, 1984; translated as Saint Veneration among the Jews in Morocco, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1998

Ben-Ari, Eyal, "Saints' Sanctuaries in Israeli Development Towns: On a Mechanism of Urban Transformation," Urban Anthropology and Studies of Cultural Systems and World Economic Development, 16, Summer 1987

Ben-Ari, Eyal and Yoram Bilu (editors), Grasping Land: Space and Place in Contemporary Israeli Discourse and Experience (SUNY Series in Anthropology and Judaic Studies), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997

Bilu, Yoram, "Dreams and the Wishes of the Saint," in Judaism Viewed from Within and from Without: Anthropological Studies (SUNY Series in Anthropology and Judaic Studies), edited by Harvey Goldberg, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1987

Bilu, Yoram and H. Abramovich, "In Search of the Sadiq: Visitationary Dreams among Moroccan Jews in Israel," Psychiatry, 48

Giller, Pinchas, "Recovering the Sanctity of the Galilee: The Veneration of Sacred Relics in the Classical Kabbalah," The Journal of Jewish Thought and Philosophy, 4, 1994

Weingrod, Alex, The Saint of Beersheba (SUNY Series in Israeli Studies), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990

In the modern period, it has been common to portray Judaism as a rootless faith, divested of symbols and without the romanticism of religious shrines. To an important extent, diaspora Judaism certainly did substitute the veneration of texts for the veneration of relics. The resilient portability of text veneration, from its inception in the first Babylonian exile, was able to sustain diaspora culture. Nonetheless, Judaism has a rich history of veneration of graves and shrines, which has seen a burst of new activity in the late 20th century. From the biblical and rabbinic periods, and particularly in the practice of Jewish mysticism, the sacred shrine has been of great importance.

GILLER sets out the underpinnings of veneration of sacred relics in the central kabbalistic works. Giller also addresses the contemporary spread of grave site veneration in the context of other relic-based traditions in Christianity and Buddhism.

The tradition of pilgrimage and of literary reports of these pilgrimages is deeply rooted in Jewish literature of the Middle Ages. A number of these medieval reports have been translated in ADLER, notably that of Benjamin of Tudela, who visited the Holy Land in 1170 and described its sacred places. His description is augmented by the accounts of Petahiah of Regensburg, who also alluded to Persian Jewish traditions that posit the grave sites of 550 "prophets and sages." Petahiah also identified many grave sites in Persia that are venerated by Jews to this day. These accounts are further augmented by the 13th-century accounts of Samuel ben Samson and Menahem ben Peretz ha-Hebroni. Menahem made a point of relying on local traditions and defending their antiquity. There is also a late-13th-century anonymous student of Nahmanides who writes on grave sites, as well as Ashtori ha-Parhi, Ya'akov ben Natanel ha-Cohen, and Moshe Basula from the early part of the 14th century. The late Renaissance and early modern period is represented by the advent of moreh derekh (road guide) literature. The first formal moreh derekh, compiled by Uri Ben Shim'on, became the widely distributed Yihus ha-Avot. It is the first published work on the grave sites of the saints and was translated into Arabic and Ladino.

The establishment of new sacred sites, specifically in the "development towns" of Israel, are documented in BEN-ARI, in BILU, and in BILU and ABRAMOVICH. Bilu's studies emphasize the activities of the Moroccan community, both in Morocco and Israel, as a particularly rich source of religious traditions. Bilu has documented the phenomenon of the translocation of saints from Morocco and elsewhere, who appear to the faithful in visitational dreams. Bilu views this phenomenon as an expression of local identity among new immigrants from Middle Eastern countries. Because such communities were often marginal and economically dependent in the decades following mass migration to Israel, Bilu suggests that the phenomenon is a reflection of a dispossessed community's need to claim the land and thereby validate their presence. A number of important essays on this phenomenon have been collected in BEN-ARI and BILU.

Easily the most important English-language monograph on this topic is BEN-AMI. There are three reasons for this. First, and quite simply, there are no others; perhaps this form of religious expression is so remote from the English-speaking Jewish experience that no book-length studies of the subject have been written in English, nor have any others appeared in English translation, but further studies are clearly needed. Second, Ben-Ami succeeds so well because he brings to his task both the skills of an accomplished folklorist and the local knowledge, as an Israeli of Moroccan origin, to avoid the shortcoming of his chosen discipline, whereby specific facts are often sacrificed to the claims of putatively universal truths to homogenizing effect. Third and most important, he has an extraordinarily big story to break.

When the Frenchified Lithuanian Jewish intellectual Nahum Slouschz traveled through the pre-Sahara at the beginning of the 20th century, he was appalled by one jarring experience that seemed to conflict horribly with the pristine, patriarchal Judaism he had discovered. This was his encounter with an extended family of Syrian origin who manifested extreme violence, not to say evil, and yet were clearly doing a roaring trade as holy men. There was only one construction Slouschz could think to put upon what he saw: the enterprising Abuhaseera clan, learning of the successful methods of the self-promoting Galician zaddikim, had seen fit to try their luck among the still more susceptible Jews of the mountains and deserts of North Africa. The data amassed by Ben-Ami, however, more than suffices to demonstrate the contrary: that the rebbe cults of the Hasidim, not to mention the older but less crucial traditions of prostration at the graves of patriarchs in the land of Israel or prophets in Mesopotamia, are all of them light and superficial elements in contrast to the place of holy people and holy places—the latter usually sanctified by association with holy people but sometimes intrinsically holy—in the religious life of Moroccan Jewry. Ben-Ami identifies no less than 652 saints actively venerated by Moroccan Jews in the last quarter of the 20th century or at least within the memory of his informants, Moroccan immigrants in Israel. Half of the book constitutes a remarkable Who's Who, in which Ben-Ami digests the testimonies he has collected and collates it with published primary and secondary sources. About some of his subjects there is nothing known except a name, while about others there is a great deal of material, whether factual, as in the case of a mainstream rabbinic authority such as Raphael “the Angel” Berdugo, or literary/legendary, as in the case of a folk hero such as Lala Solica, who elected to die a martyr's death rather than marry the sultan. The remainder of the study is devoted to analysis, with sections on the nomenclature of Moroccan Jewish sainthood, hereditary sanctity, miracles wrought by saints, saints appearing in dreams, pilgrimages, pilgrim hymnody, confraternities responsible for organizing pilgrimages and maintaining shrines, and the relationship between Jews and Muslims at these holy places. Among the multitude of accompanying appendices, along with a map of holy places and an index of folk-motifs, there are lists of Muslim saints venerated by Jews and Jewish saints venerated by Muslims—a scarcely surprising manifestation of the “maraboutism,” with its heavily “pagan” and mystical influences, that is the common heritage of rural Moroccans. Ben-Ami concludes with a study of the enduring place of Jewish marabouts in contemporary Israel, and a prime example of this phenomenon forms the subject for WEINGROD's profile.

PINCHAS GILLER

Venice

- Bloch, Joshua, Venetian Printers of Hebrew Books, New York: New York Public Library, 1932
- Calimani, Riccardo, Storia del Ghetto di Venezia, Milan: Rusconi, 1985; translated by Katherine Silberblatt Wolfthal as The Ghetto of Venice, New York: Evans, 1987
- Pullan, Brian, “Venetian Jewry and the Monti di Pietà,” in his Rich and Poor in Renaissance Venice: The Social Institutions of a Catholic State, to 1620, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, and Oxford: Blackwell, 1971
- Pullan, Brian, The Jews of Europe and the Inquisition of Venice, 1550–1670, Oxford: Blackwell, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1983
- Ravid, Benjamin, Economics and Toleration in Seventeenth Century Venice (Monograph Series, no. 2), Jerusalem: American Academy for Jewish Research, 1978
- Ravid, Benjamin, “The Socioeconomic Background of the Expulsion and Readmission of the Venetian Jews, 1571–1573,” in Essays in Modern Jewish History: A Tribute to Ben Halpern, edited by Frances Malino and Phyllis Cohen Albert, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1982
- Roth, Cecil, Venice, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1930

The Jews of Venice have been subjects of both general narrative histories and more documented texts focusing on particular aspects of Jewish life there, including moneylending, the Inquisition, Jews' position in society, and their treatment by the Venetian government. While the first two texts discussed below are perhaps more suitable for the general reader, those that follow are aimed at scholars seeking specific documented information.

ROTH's history of the Jews of Venice was his attempt to "redeem [the Ghetto scene] from the neglect from which it has hitherto suffered." Continually cited by later authors, although not the most scholarly study now available, Roth's work is narrative in tone, with few notes, several illustrations, a very brief bibliography, and an anecdotal style. Roth begins with the arrival of the Jews in antiquity as slaves and traders and ends with Venice's unification with Italy in 1866, focusing on Venice's intolerance and its critical protection of the Jews. Among other subjects, Roth treats the Jews' governing structures, religious organization, daily rituals, entertainment, and education, and their involvement in the arts, alchemy, and gambling. He finishes with the decline and fall of Venice and its Jews as medieval repressive measures again were reinforced against the Jews in the mid-18th century. Because Roth was writing before World War II, his tone is perhaps less tragic than that of the authors who followed. Roth's work pays homage to Jewish life in Venice; it is almost a biography of the Ghetto, enjoyable to read, and still a must for the scholar of Venetian history or the casual inquirer.

CALIMANI's story of the Venetian Ghetto is comprehensive, well organized, and accessible, dated only by his mention of the "shadow of nuclear weapons" at its close. It is, in a way, an updated version of Roth's history, similarly marked by few historical or documentary notes, a narrative style, and an informed tone. Almost a digest of all prior scholarship, this work presents the characters whose lives invigorated the Ghetto (many of whom also were described by Roth 55 years earlier), the status of printing, and the moneylenders and their charters. He cites the scholars he follows while producing a sympathetic chronological portrait of Ghetto life, which he ends by reiterating the Jews' position as aliens denied Italian citizenship, despite their integration into Venetian society by the end of the 19th century. Calimani's likable style draws any reader into the complicated history of the Jews of Venice.

In contrast to these broader, less scholarly texts, RAVID (1982) uses the archives of Venice to shed new light on the 1571 decision to expel Jewish moneylenders from Venice. Convincingly using textual evidence, he proves that this decision, previously thought to have been unanimous, was resisted by government officials. He also highlights early charter renewals to show this was not a sudden change of attitude by the Venetian government. After giving a brief history of Jewish moneylenders' settlement in Venice, he demonstrates that the process of renewing their charter had been tenuous each time around, involving religious and economic tensions and ever-increasing restrictions. He places the events of 1571 in the context of the defeat of the Venetians at Cyprus and antisemitic sentiments that, although always present, were heightened by this event.

RAVID (1978), parts of which began as his dissertation, answers the previous lack of scholarship on Simone Luzzatto's Discorsi by using once again documents in the Venetian State Archives. Ravid sees the Discorsi, reflecting the Jewish condition in Venice, as responding specifically to the impact of a 1636 robbery by Jews, and as an answer to several anti-Jewish texts of the mid-16th century. Ravid delineates Luzzatto's two-part text: a description of the role of Jews in Venice—especially in the maritime economy—and a defense of Jewish customs and the Jews' friendly attitude toward non-Jews. Ravid reviews the first ten discorsi in depth, presenting them as an attempt to maintain the tenuous status of the Jews in Venice by proving their financially important role in the maritime trade; he then briefly glosses over the later discourses, which refute accusations against Jews and their religion. He notes Luzzatto's lack of historical influence but treats the document in a positive light, despite what some readers may find the almost pathetic nature of Luzzatto's text.

PULLAN (1983) draws on documentary evidence from the mid-16th century to 1670, and especially Inquisition records, in a detailed study of those who suffered at the hands of the Inquisition. The three-part study describes first the Inquisition, then various groups of Jews in Venice at the time, and finally the focus of the Inquisition: Jewish converts to Christianity. Pullan defines the unique qualities of the Venetian Inquisition in relation to its counterparts, especially in Spain and Portugal. He explains that in Venice, Jews and Christians were meant to be separated and the Inquisition was used to define that order; anyone indecisive or not accepting the "debased role of Jews" was subject to the Inquisition. The text is fortified by an extensive bibliography, index, and documentation of consulted manuscripts. By using specific individual cases and records, Pullan permits the reader a personal glimpse into history, supported by his strongly documented scholarship of the period in general.

PULLAN's (1971) long study in its entirety examines Venetian history through study of government policy toward the poor. As "innovations in poor relief introduced between the mid-15th and early 17th centuries," Pullan devotes the final third of his study to the Jewish moneylenders and to the pawnshops called Monti di Pietà, which were forced to provide inexpensive credit and low-interest loans to the poor. Extremely well documented, Pullan's text provides a comparative study of the Jewish banks and the Monti di Pietà over 150 years, revealing the changing nature of Jewish moneylending. In the process he highlights the uncharitable treatment of the Jews in light of the Venetian government's attempts to provide charity to the poor. Pullan again shows that the Venetian government's aim was to preserve the existing social and political order of the Republic, regardless of the treatment of the Jews. He includes an extensive bibliography, index, and notes.

BLOCH's text is a straightforward explanation of the history of Jewish printing in Venice, focusing on the first half of the 16th century. Bloch highlights the contribution of Christian printing pioneer Daniel Bomberg, who established the city's first Hebrew printing press in 1515. He also discusses those who worked with Bomberg and those who inherited his business after his own press ended operations in 1549. Bloch comments on the difficulties Jews encountered when attempting to participate in printing activity in Venice, and he gives a clear history of the craft, citing many books that could be useful both for further study of the history of printing and more broadly of Jews in Venice.

W

War and Peace

- Artson, Bradley Shavit, Love Peace and Pursue Peace: A Jewish Response to War and Nuclear Annihilation, New York: United Synagogue of America, 1988
- Hurwitz, Deena, Walking the Red Line: Israelis in Search of Justice in Palestine, Philadelphia: New Society, 1992
- Landau, Yehezkel, Violence and the Value of Life in Jewish Tradition (Oz VeShalom Publications English Language Series, 2), Jerusalem: Oz VeShalom, 1984
- Landes, Daniel, Confronting Omnicide: Jewish Reflections on Weapons of Mass Destruction, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1991
- Polner, Murray and Naomi Goodman (editors), The Challenge of Shalom: The Jewish Tradition of Peace and Justice, Philadelphia: New Society, 1994
- Saperstein, David (editor), Preventing the Nuclear Holocaust: A Jewish Response, New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1983
- Siegel, Danny, Family Reunion: Making Peace in the Jewish Community: Sources and Resources from Tanach, Halachah, and Midrash, Spring Valley, New York: Town House, 1989
- Wilcock, Evelyn, Pacifism and the Jews (Conflict and Peacemaking), Stroud, Gloucestershire: Hawthorn, 1994

The institution of war and the commandment to pursue peace are discussed in both legal and ethical traditional sources. These subjects take on a special urgency today because of the existence of the State of Israel, because of the deployment of weapons of mass destruction, and because of the rise in interethnic violence all over the world. For this reason, most of the books discussed here concern themselves with contemporary issues as well as with historical and theoretical material. Most of these titles were published by or are distributed through organizations that sponsored their production.

ARTSON's survey of the subject of peace and war is based on Jewish sources from all periods. Beginning with a consideration of such basic issues as the nature of the Jewish heritage, the sources of aggression, and the value of human life, this book systematically covers the issues of warfare and peacemaking. It quotes traditional sources, and Rabbi Artson offers his own commentary on them. This is the most complete work on this subject currently available. The book includes an extensive bibliography.

POLNER and GOODMAN have collected a variety of essays by both activists and intellectuals who have grappled with the difficulties of peacemaking. The opening section, "The Tradition," consists of rabbinic essays by authors from several streams of Judaism. The next two sections, "The Holocaust" and "Israel," are concerned with the two toughest issues to which contemporary Jewish pacifists must respond, while "Reverence for All Life" contains discussions of vegetarianism in the Jewish tradition. The latter part of the book is divided into two long sections: "Saying No to War and Tyranny" and "Testimonies," both of which offer essays by and about activists working against militarism and for peace, including the perspectives of Jewish conscientious objectors from World War I to the present day. The volume has a detailed index and a bibliography.

WILCOCK presents the reader with a series of substantial historical essays on Jewish pacifists and peace activists of the 20th century. The first two chapters deal with Jewish pacifism during World War I in Britain and in the United States, focusing on the careers of John Harris and Rabbi Judah Magnes. Chapters three through five examine Jewish peacemaking in Palestine during the British Mandate. These chapters include not only the expected studies of such well-known figures as Enzo Sereni and Judah Magnes but also a chapter on the ultra-orthodox Jews of Jerusalem who opposed Zionism and pursued peaceful relations with their Arab neighbors. The two chapters exploring World War II and the Holocaust are especially remarkable. The first considers Rabbi Abraham Cronbach's insistence on pacifism during a time when such a philosophy might seem unthinkable to any Jew. The second chapter on this period discusses nonviolent resistance by Jews under Nazi rule, including the use of such tactics in the concentration camps; the analysis is a powerful response to the claim that nonviolence can only work in a democracy. The remaining two essays deal with more contemporary issues. The first evaluates Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel's opposition to the war in Vietnam, and the second studies Israeli pacifism as exemplified by Natan Hofshi. This book includes an appendix with quotations from biblical and rabbinic sources on war and peace.

SIEGEL is a slim volume that presents to lay readers a compelling argument based on Jewish tradition for the nonviolent resolution of conflict at all levels. Quotations from traditional sources are woven together by the author's commentary, and although the text is less than one hundred pages long, it provides a cogent defense of the ethics of peacemaking.

LANDAU is a brief collection of essays meant for religious Jews who live in Israel or who are concerned with peace-making in Israel. The authors are all Orthodox, and only one is not a rabbi. Contributions to the anthology include "The Morality of Warfare," by Lord Jakobovits, former Chief Rabbi of Great Britain; "Violence and the Value of Life," by Rabbi Emanuel Rackman, president of Bar-Ilan University; and "The Jewish Attitude Towards Peace and War," by Rabbi David Shapiro. The book also offers an annotated collection of quotations on the ethics of warfare compiled by Professor Uriel Simon of Bar-Ilan University.

LANDES brings together essays by rabbis from a wide spectrum of backgrounds on issues pertaining to possible Jewish responses to the topic of weapons of mass destruction. Seeking guidance from an ancient tradition about how to address this contemporary problem, the authors discuss biblical and rabbinic thinking on such matters as cataclysm, the limitations of warfare in Jewish law, and the prohibition on destructiveness even in times of war. The opinions expressed here range from condemnation of the existence of nuclear weapons to justification for such weapons as instruments of justice and security. Most of the authors, however, argue against the stockpiling of nuclear weapons and oppose national security policies that depend on the maintenance of a nuclear threat. This volume was published at the end of the Cold War but continues to be all too relevant.

SAPERSTEIN is a handbook for activists. It is divided into two parts: "Jewish Perspectives" and a "Factual Section." Most of the first section consists of essays on halakhic and aggadic perspectives on war, nuclear war, and nuclear strategy. At the end of this section there is a compendium of statements by U.S. Jewish organizations on nuclear weapons. The latter section is a collection of essays on nuclear weapons issues. Some parts of this section are now out of date, but much of the analysis continues to be valuable as background to the discussions in the first section.

HURWITZ has brought together a collection of brief essays by Israelis, both Jewish and Arab, who work for justice and peace in the State of Israel. Many opinions that are not within the Israeli political mainstream are represented; all of the writers are committed to nonviolence in pursuing their ideals and programs. The volume includes an appendix listing and describing organizations that work for justice and peace within Israel.

PHILIP J. BENTLEY

Weizmann, Chaim 1874–1952

Russian-born British Zionist, first president of Israel

Berlin, Isaiah, Chaim Weizmann, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York: Farrar, Straus and Cudahy, 1958

Leon, Dan and Yehuda Adin (editors), Chaim Weizmann: Statesman of the Jewish Renaissance: The Chaim Weizmann Centenary, 1874–1974 (Confrontation Series, no. 3), Jerusalem: Zionist Library, 1974

Litvinoff, Barnet, Weizmann: Last of the Patriarchs, London: Hodder and Stoughton, and New York: Putnam, 1976

Reinharz, Jehuda, Chaim Weizmann: The Making of a Zionist Leader, New York: Oxford University Press, 1985

Reinharz, Jehuda, Chaim Weizmann: The Making of a Statesman, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993

Rose, Norman, Chaim Weizmann: A Biography, New York: Viking, 1986; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1987

Weizmann, Chaim, Trial and Error: The Autobiography of Chaim Weizmann, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, and London: Hamilton, 1949

Despite his pivotal role in the formation of Israel, Chaim Weizmann has been considered, in terms of books produced, the least interesting of all the Zionist leaders. Overshadowed by Theodor Herzl, who led the Zionist organization before him, and then by David Ben-Gurion, who shaped the young State of Israel after him, Weizmann has been strangely neglected by historians. He was a leader who championed a "synthetic" approach that combined the practicalities of settlement with international politics. His aversion to ideology and factionalization has appealed neither to the iconography of the left nor to that of the right in Israel as Ben Gurion and Jabotinsky respectively have done. The relative paucity of analytical material about him is belied by Weizmann's crucial 30-year leadership of what he developed from a small and fractious Jewish federation into a foundling state, at the same time establishing himself personally as a chemist of international renown.

WEIZMANN recognized that he had been responsible for a series of remarkable achievements, and in addition to publishing his autobiography in 1949 he donated his meticulously preserved papers to what would eventually be Yad Chaim Weizmann. Being almost completely blind by the late 1940s, he dictated much of the later part of Trial and Error to Maurice Samuels and revised it with his help. Perhaps as a result of this method of production, the book retains an engagingly anecdotal character and offers insight into the way Weizmann thought. As part of a clear and extensive history of his life it includes more detailed accounts of trips and meetings than would interest later biographers because the events were either inconsequential or unverifiable. Despite its occasional unreliability with regard to details, it is a compelling account of the development of Weizmann hand in hand with Zionism.

In his short overview of the achievements of Weizmann, originally given as an address at the Hebrew University in 1957, BERLIN demonstrates the greatness of his subject. Berlin knew Weizmann, and from his perspective as fellow Jew and fellow long-term resident in England one might have expected him to have given a more personal account of the man. In fact it is an explanation of what makes a great man and why Weizmann is such a man. It does analyze Weizmann's achievements in uniting the Jewish people and helping to form a Jewish state as well as Weizmann's passion for England, but more than a philosophical treatise this is a personal testament from a great thinker who knew Weizmann well.

The small volume of essays compiled by LEON and ADIN includes another essay by Berlin that provides a compressed biographical account of Weizmann. The collection also includes articles by two prime ministers of Israel (David Ben-Gurion and Moshe Sharrett), a deputy prime minister (Abba Eban), and Weizmann's closest friend (Meyer Weisgal). The book provides different perspectives from highly eminent people on how Weizmann's attitudes toward science, Zionism, and his friends were all profoundly intertwined. The editors also offer 12 photographs of Weizmann taken between 1880 and 1949 with a series of family members and luminaries that trace his life from childhood to presidency. The final essay, "The Missing Voice" by Meyer Weisgal, is a brief and poignant reminiscence of Weizmann's "low castigating prophetic" voice, and it is followed by a selection of 25 pages of Weizmann's quotations organized according to topic as if to fill in that "missing voice."

LITVINOFF provides a relatively brief and breezy tour of the life and times of Weizmann. He does so by abandoning both the scholarly and the hagiographic approach, adopting instead a familiar tone for the narrative. His style suffers from being anachronistic, sometimes having hindsight, sometimes registering historical surprise, but it has the effect of making Weizmann seem like a friend rather than some distant figure on a pedestal. At times Litvinoff is surprisingly cavalier with small details, and at other times the breadth of the brush strokes with which he paints the historical settings are remarkable. The success of this book is in presenting the mood of the milieu in which Weizmann operated and keeping it a volume of manageable size.

REINHARZ (1985 and 1993) has been writing the belated but scholarly and definitive biography of Weizmann. The first volume begins with the social and historical background of Motol, where Weizmann's parents lived and where he was born, and ends before World War I. The second volume takes up where the first leaves off and reaches into the British mandate but barely into the 1920s. The final book (unfinished at the time of writing) will cover the end of Weizmann's life. Reinharz's research is irreproachable, but the prose is often pedestrian and unnecessarily dense. Each of the volumes is more than 500 pages long, and, although much of the space is taken up by rigorous footnotes and bibliographies, the combination of excessive detail and stolid writing makes this err toward the pedantic side of scholarship. The subtitles, "The Making of a Zionist Leader" and "The Making of a Statesman," suggest the reason for including so much background detail. Reinharz has sacrificed telling the story of Weizmann's life in favor of a comprehensive coverage of its context, but this biography is still a vital resource for any reader interested in the details of Weizmann's life.

The biography written by ROSE was published at almost the same time as the first volume of Reinharz's biography, and it suffers from not having been able to take advantage of the research that Reinharz used. Its 462 pages are, however, well written and interesting to read, and it does have an index and some referencing apparatus. For a good and thoroughly informative read about Weizmann's life, this is the book that strikes the balance between the story and the facts. Rose keeps a distance between himself and his subject without letting Weizmann seem remote. The book does have the annoying tic of repeating the same story with the same brief analysis and wording when an event that had been introduced thematically is reached chronologically, but it is a small price to pay for a complete and satisfying biography in one volume.

DAN FRIEDMAN

Western Wall

Ben-Dov, M., Mordechai Naor, and Zeev Anner (editors), Ha-Kotel, 1981; translated by Raphael Posner as The Western Wall, New York: Adama, 1983

Kasher, Menahem M., Kotel ha-Ma'aravi, 1972; translated by Charles Wengrov as The Western Wall: Its Meaning in the Thought of the Sages, New York: Judaica Press, 1972

Ronnen Safdie, Michal, The Western Wall, New York: Hugh Lauter Levin, 1997

For centuries, the Western Wall has served as Judaism's most holy site, where Jews have assembled to mourn the destruction of the Temple, pray, observe festivals, and since 1967, stage national and personal celebrations. Built by Herod in the first century B.C.E., the Western Wall represents part of the retaining wall that surrounded the Temple platform. It is constructed out of large, well-hewn stones, some weighing more than 100 tons. Above the Herodian courses rest smaller stones added in later centuries. The destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E. and subsequent alterations to the Temple Mount left the Western Wall as one of the few architectural remains of the Second Temple. Judaism's deep attachment to the Western Wall was slow to develop. In response to the Bar Kokhba revolt in the second century C.E., the Roman government denied Jews access to Jerusalem and the wall. Other locations such as the Mount of Olives, where Jews could look down into the city and upon the ruins of the Temple, became important venues for worship. Jewish writings from the destruction of the Temple through the Middle Ages contain few references to the Western Wall. The wall's celebrated role in Jewish consciousness emerges in the 16th century when Turkish rulers granted Jews greater access to the site. At the same time, older traditions that spoke of the western wall of the sanctuary as the permanent residence of the Shekinah, God's earthly presence, came to be applied to the Western Wall, thereby confirming its sacred character. Subsequent centuries witnessed growing veneration for and conflicts over the wall. A secondary wall was built parallel to the Western Wall in the 16th century, creating a small, enclosed space where Jews worshiped for 400 years, until 1948 when the Old City of Jerusalem fell under Jordanian control. Following the Six Day War in 1967, which returned the Western Wall to Jewish possession, the enclosure wall and many structures immediately opposite the Western Wall were removed, and a large plaza was constructed to allow throngs of worshipers and visitors to experience the wall.

Ben-Dov played an integral role in the excavation of the Temple Mount, including the Western Wall, from 1968 through the 1980s, and the anthology edited by BEN-DOV, NAOR, and ANNER collects 11 essays on various topics related to the Western Wall. The volume offers the most comprehensive study of the wall in English. Chapters one and two, both written by Ben-Dov, report on the history of the wall, its architecture, and the major archaeological investigations conducted in the 19th and 20th centuries. Chapter three summarizes many of the accounts left by travelers who visited the wall in antiquity, the Middle Ages, and the early modern period. Chapter four describes some of the customs associated with the Western Wall and the halakhic decisions regulating proper behavior at the wall. Chapter five relates several folktales connected with the wall. Chapter six recounts early attempts by wealthy Jews to purchase the wall and the violent struggles over the Western Wall among Jews, Arabs, and the British during the Mandatory period. Chapter seven narrates the events surrounding the capture of the wall in 1967 and the initial reactions among Jews to the news that the wall was under Israeli control. Chapter eight describes the plans for building the plaza in front of the Western Wall. Chapter nine examines depictions of the wall in Jewish and Christian arts and crafts. Chapter ten identifies the various flora and fauna that live at the wall. The volume concludes with Ben-Dov's reflections on four historical and contemporary aspects of the stones themselves.

KASHER explores the meaning of the Western Wall particularly after the site came into Israeli possession. He structures his presentation largely in the form of a commentary on passages from a variety of Jewish sources, such as the Bible, rabbinic literature, the Zohar, prayers originally written for recitation at the wall, and those that have come to be used in this manner. Kasher not only recalls how Jews in the past have spoken of the wall, but sees the return of the wall to Jewish control as a unique opportunity to establish the prophesied single congregation of Israel that will herald the ingathering of the exiles and inauguration of the messianic redemption. He notes an early medieval text that suggests that in the messianic age, God will require Jews to make a holy pilgrimage not three times a year, as stipulated in the Bible, but at the beginning of each month. Kasher regards the new custom of worshiping at the wall on Rosh Hodesh, the celebration marking the beginning of a Jewish month, as the fulfillment of this vision.

RONNEN SAFDIE, a professional photographer, has assembled a vivid pictorial essay on life at the Western Wall. Her 135 color photographs are not only elegant, they eloquently capture many of the "stories of the wall." Through her lens, the viewer encounters hasidic men in their black coats and hats, Italian nuns dressed in white, Ethiopian Jews shielding themselves from the sun with brightly colored umbrellas, and Jews at prayer shielding themselves from the rain with their prayer shawls. Ronnen Safdie has captured the young and old, men and women, Jews and non-Jews; those praying; those celebrating festivals, weddings, and bar mitzvahs; and those gathered at the wall in search of healing. Ronnen Safdie's residence in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City overlooking the wall has allowed her to become intimately familiar with the drama that takes place at the wall at all hours of the day and night.

Wiesel, Elie 1928–

Hungarian-born American Holocaust survivor, novelist, and human rights activist

- Berenbaum, Michael, The Vision of the Void: Theological Reflections on the Works of Elie Wiesel, Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1979
- Brown, Robert McAfee, Elie Wiesel, Messenger to All Humanity, Notre Dame, Indiana: Notre Dame University Press, 1983, revised edition, 1989
- Cargas, Harry J., Responses to Elie Wiesel, New York: Persea Books, 1978
- Estess, Ted L., Elie Wiesel, New York: F. Ungar, 1980
- Fine, Ellen S., Legacy of Night, The Literary Universe of Elie Wiesel, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1982
- Rosenfeld, Alvin H. and Irving Greenberg, Confronting the Holocaust: The Impact of Elie Wiesel, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978

The novelist and human rights advocate Elie Wiesel is probably the most famous Holocaust survivor currently active in the Western world. Born in Transylvania in 1928, he received a thorough Jewish education. Deported with his family to Auschwitz in 1944, he lost most of his family and was liberated in 1945. His first great work, Night, was rejected by a number of publishers until finally accepted in 1960. Since then, Wiesel has written 30 books, received the Nobel Prize for Peace in 1986, and devoted his life to preserving the memory of the victims of the Holocaust. There is now a very large amount of critical and scholarly work on the many facets of Wiesel's writing—his literary techniques, theology, philosophical significance, activism, and impact.

BERENBAUM analyzes the religious and theological implications of Wiesel's work. Beginning with an exposition of Wiesel's trilogy, Night, Dawn, and The Accident, he charts the increasing crisis of faith of the pious young teenager who was taken to Auschwitz in 1944. Wiesel's journey back to God appears in later novels such as The Town Beyond The Wall, in which a friendship between two sufferers reveals God's faint presence in human goodness. In Wiesel's later work, the emphasis is on the struggle against indifference and a rediscovery of the hasidic values of the hallowing of the world and the affirmation of life. Later, in The Oath, the protagonist exclaims, "We shall do it [i.e., struggle against indifference] without the help of the Messiah; he is taking too long. We shall start right here." Berenbaum also stresses Wiesel's theme of spiritual madness as wisdom and presents a view of Wiesel as the modern Job, protesting injustice and suffering. For Wiesel the struggle against Auschwitz lies in bearing witness and in Jewish solidarity. Berenbaum concludes that Wiesel has made a great impact on contemporary Jewish theology. Still, Wiesel has produced no ready-made theology of the Holocaust. For him the Holocaust is the ultimate theological challenge. The questions will continue; for now, the only response lies in the struggle against evil.

BROWN, a Protestant theologian, has written a survey of the personal, philosophical, and artistic dimensions of Wiesel's work. His entire book is informed by the theme of a journey—

Wiesel's own journey and the parallel road that the reader must take together with him. Brown has made his own journey, for he states at the outset that the Holocaust is an ethical problem for Christians, since the executioners of the Holocaust were themselves baptized Christians. Brown argues persuasively that with Wiesel storytelling takes on a moral significance, and thus Wiesel becomes a "messenger to all humanity." The book begins with Wiesel's initial message of darkness in Auschwitz and continues with the evolution of Wiesel's novels from themes of escapism and detachment to participation and activism. Wiesel's journeys—back to his hometown of Sighet and back to Torah, Hasidic tradition, and Jewish mysticism—are rendered movingly by Brown. Still, Brown emphasizes, the "silence of God" and the "necessity of contention" with God, as well as return and reconciliation, are important themes in Wiesel's work. The last chapters deal with Christian responsibility and the importance of following Wiesel's journey for mending the world. Brown's work reveals the great impact that Wiesel has had on some prominent Christian thinkers.

Like Brown, CARGAS is a Christian, but a Catholic, and an authority on the Holocaust and its literature. This volume represents a wide-ranging collection of essays on Wiesel by major Jewish and Christian scholars, theologians, and literary critics. Two interviews with Wiesel himself are presented in the beginning and the middle of the volume. This proves to be a good technique, for the first interview prepares the reader for the rich variety of responses to come, while the next conversation sums up the major issues and prepares the ground for the final portion of the book. The essays range from an analysis of Night, to the evolution of hope in the subsequent novels, to an important essay by Josephine Knopp on "Wiesel and the Absurd," to analysis of the theological implications of Wiesel's work. The book ends with a fine summary by Cargas on Christian response to Wiesel's work. This volume was compiled in 1978, well before Wiesel received the Nobel Prize for Peace, and it registers the remarkable attention that Wiesel received even at that early date.

ESTEES puts together a very useful survey for the beginner in this volume of the extensive series Modern Literature Monographs. This excellent summary approaches Wiesel primarily as an interrogator—a questioner of himself, of humanity, and of God. It begins with the premise (following Wiesel's own assertion) that the autobiographical novel Night, Wiesel's only work to deal with Auschwitz directly, is the foundation of all his later work. The most stimulating chapter in the book is presented as a centerpiece and is titled "The Drama of Interrogation." This chapter explores the endless questions posed by Wiesel that make him a type of "wise man" for the 20th century. The importance of Wiesel as questioner puts him at the core of Jewish tradition. A useful chronology and bibliography round out this useful little book.

FINE has written probably the best book on the literary techniques of Wiesel and the best analysis of Night available. The pervasive theme of the book is Wiesel's role in witnessing and bearing witness. All of his protagonists are witnesses, says Fine. Fine suggests that Wiesel has been influenced not only by Jewish mysticism and Hasidism, but also by 20th-century existentialism. An authority on French literature, Fine demonstrates how the work of Albert Camus, the great existentialist novelist of the absurd, made a significant impact on the young Wiesel. It is often overlooked that all of Wiesel's novels have been written in French, his adopted language. Fine provides many intriguing details in this regard, and looks also at the one exception: the first, much longer Yiddish version of Night, written in 1956 and published in Buenos Aires under the title And The World Remained Silent. She emphasizes the important theme of the father-son relationship in the novel and analyzes the ending of the book, in which Eliezer looks into a mirror and sees a corpse with piercing eyes staring back at him, as a new beginning, a point of departure where writing and testifying become reasons for living.

ROSENFELD and GREENBERG, an expert on Holocaust literature and a distinguished rabbi and theologian, respectively, compiled this book of essays on Wiesel in 1978, the same year in which Cargas compiled his. This is the perfect supplement to the Cargas volume, presenting material not touched by the other book. Rosenfeld provides an excellent introduction on "The Problematics of Holocaust Literature." The theme of silence is explored by Terrence Des Pres, while the essay by Rosette C. Lamon provides a fascinating story of why and how Wiesel turned to French as the language for his works. Essays by Byron Sherwin and Emil Fackenheim locate Wiesel in Jewish traditions of midrash (commentary or explication) and lamentation. Leo Eitinger, the prominent psychiatrist and authority on Holocaust-related psychiatric trauma, synthesizes his role as healer and survivor and relates this to the work of Wiesel. The final statement by Wiesel himself, "Why I Write," has become Wiesel's famous credo of purpose, and provides a powerful conclusion to this excellent collection: "Why I write? To wrench those victims from oblivion. To help the dead vanquish death."

LEON STEIN

Wisdom Literature

- Brenner, Athalya (editor), A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature (Feminist Companion to the Bible, 9), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995
- Crenshaw, James L. (editor), Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom (Library of Biblical Studies), New York: Ktav, 1976
- Crenshaw, James L., Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction, Atlanta, Georgia: Knox, 1981; London: SCM, 1982; revised edition, Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/Knox, 1998
- Day, John, Robert P. Gordon, and H.G.M. Williamson (editors), Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J.A. Emerton, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995
- Gammie, John G. and Leo G. Perdue (editors), The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, Winona Lake, Indiana: Eisenbrauns, 1990
- Murphy, Roland E., The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (Anchor Bible Reference

- Library), New York: Doubleday, 1990; 2nd edition, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1996
- Perdue, Leo G., Wisdom and Creation: The Theology of Wisdom Literature, Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon, 1994
- von Rad, Gerhard, Weisheit in Israel, 1970; translated by James D. Martin as Wisdom in Israel, Nashville, Tennessee: Abingdon, and London: SCM, 1972
- Westermann, Claus, Wurzeln der Weisheit: Die ältesten Sprüche Israels und anderer Völker, 1990; translated by J. Daryl Charles as Roots of Wisdom: The Oldest Proverbs of Israel and Other Peoples, Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster/Knox, and Edinburgh: Clark, 1995

The “Wisdom Literature” of the Bible is best identified negatively: it is the literature that does not address the dominant biblical themes of the election of Israel, covenant, and “salvation history.” Instead, it is concerned with universal human experiences, and its theology represents God as the creator and sustainer of the world. The term was originally applied to three books of the Hebrew canon: Proverbs, Job, and Kohelet (Ecclesiastes). Scholars often extend the category to include the books of Ben Sira (Sirach or Ecclesiasticus) and the Wisdom of Solomon, which are considered canonical by Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox Christians, as well as a few Psalms. The extent of “wisdom influence” in the rest of the Bible is currently a matter of debate.

MURPHY has written an introduction directed to first-time readers of the wisdom literature, presenting a range of opinions on the most fundamental issues in wisdom scholarship without feeling compelled to resolve every issue. He attempts to cover a great many topics in relatively few pages, however, so the long and complex books of Proverbs and Job receive necessarily light treatment. The discussion of Kohelet is deeper and quite thought-provoking. The chapter on the personification of Wisdom is also very thorough. Murphy’s thinking on several key issues has evolved significantly over the years since the publication of the first edition, and these new ideas are summarized in an appendix to the second edition.

CRENSHAW (1981), while not assuming any prior knowledge of the wisdom literature, approaches it from a more philosophical point of view. The introduction and first two chapters situate the wisdom tradition within Israel’s intellectual history. Crenshaw provides a remarkably concise explanation of the various forms of proverbs, and he conveys clearly the structure and dominant themes of the Book of Proverbs. His discussion of Job effectively integrates literary and philosophical considerations. It is important to realize that Crenshaw is presenting his own point of view and not necessarily a scholarly consensus. Thus, for example, he portrays Kohelet as a thorough pessimist, disregarding the carpe diem theme that other scholars have seen as Kohelet’s solution to life’s vanity. Nonetheless, his serious engagement with the problems addressed by Israel’s sages prepares his readers well to meet the challenges of tackling the wisdom books.

Crenshaw’s approach is profoundly influenced by VON RAD’s groundbreaking work on the wisdom literature. Von Rad presents Israel’s wisdom as a philosophical tradition that developed in school settings. He traces a series of themes through the wisdom literature, rather than treating each book separately. He concludes that for the Israelite sage, creation was an ordered system that called for trust in God; at the same time, human knowledge of the world’s order was limited by the mystery of the divine will. Although scholars now dispute some of his basic assumptions—such as the idea that wisdom began as a movement toward secularism, challenging the “pan-sacralism” of Israel’s early history, and only later became “theologized”—this book has set the agenda for most subsequent studies of the wisdom literature.

The most serious challenge to this approach to wisdom is WESTERMANN’s study, which focuses on the earliest wisdom texts, Proverbs 10–31. He argues that most of these sayings reflect the experience of ordinary people living in small agrarian communities, not that of an elite group of sages. Rather than looking for the origins of Israelite wisdom in the productions of the scribal cultures of the ancient Near East (as biblical scholars are wont to do), he views the proverb as a form of expression typical of preliterate cultures. Westermann’s argument depends on hypothetical reconstructions of the original forms of proverbs, since he acknowledges that the present form of most biblical proverbs is literary. Still, he has a valid point that there is little evidence to support von Rad’s claim that the wisdom tradition originated in an educational context.

PERDUE sets out to fill a long-standing gap in biblical scholarship: the lack of a comprehensive study of the theology of the wisdom literature. Although creation is generally recognized to be an important wisdom theme, Perdue argues that creation theology accounts for all of the major emphases of the wisdom literature, including its humanism, its interest in order and the relation of human beings to their environment, and its concern with theodicy. The two main thrusts of creation theology are cosmology (the creation of the world) and anthropology (the creation of humanity), which stand in a dialectical relationship throughout the wisdom literature. Perdue successfully illustrates the interplay of these two themes in each of the wisdom books, although he tends to harmonize the outlooks of the very different books.

The remaining books are collections of highly diverse essays, and therefore they can only be described in broad strokes. Most of the studies in CRENSHAW (1976) were already considered classics by the time he assembled them. This book is a valuable introduction to the history of 20th-century scholarship on wisdom, including important contributions by German scholars that are only here translated into English. GAMMIE and PERDUE provide a wide-ranging study of the role of the sage in ancient Israel and its neighboring cultures, as well as the evolution of this role in early Judaism. Thus, the biblical wisdom literature is contextualized both historically and from a cross-cultural perspective. DAY, GORDON, and WILLIAMSON also include a number of essays on the ancient Near Eastern background of Israelite wisdom, but their main focus is the influence of the wisdom tradition on other parts of the Bible, especially the prophets. BRENNER collects studies by feminist scholars on the portrayal of women in the wisdom literature, particularly the “strange woman” in Proverbs 1–9, along with three feminist readings of Job. Hence it is by no means a complete companion to wisdom literature, but readers who are looking for new approaches to biblical texts will find it stimulating.

KARINA MARTIN HOGAN

Wise, Isaac Mayer 1819–1900

Bohemian-born American rabbi and pioneer of Reform Judaism

- Heller, James, Isaac M. Wise: His Life, Work, and Thought, New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1965
- Knox, Israel, Rabbi in America: The Story of Isaac M. Wise (Library of American Biography), Boston: Little Brown, 1957
- May, Max, Isaac Mayer Wise, the Founder of American Judaism: A Biography, New York: Putnam, 1916
- Meyer, Michael, Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism (Studies in Jewish History), New York: Oxford University Press, 1988
- Rubinstein, Aryeh, "Isaac Mayer Wise: A New Approach," Jewish Social Studies, Winter–Spring 1977
- Silverstein, Alan, Alternatives to Assimilation: The Response of Reform Judaism to American Culture, 1840–1930 (Brandeis Series in American Jewish History, Culture, and Life), Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1994
- Temkin, Sefton, Isaac Mayer Wise: Shaping American Judaism (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992; as Creating American Reform Judaism: The Life and Times of Isaac Mayer Wise, London and Portland, Oregon: Vallentine Mitchell, 1998

Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise was a pioneer of Reform Judaism in the United States. Wise advocated a union of Jewish congregations, a common prayer book, a rabbinic training institution, and a national rabbinic organization. The establishment of the Hebrew Union College in 1875 was his greatest achievement.

HELLER was one of Wise's successors in the pulpit of Cincinnati's B'nai Yeshurun Congregation. His lengthy work is divided into two major sections. The first is a straightforward, detailed description of Wise's life and achievements. The second portion is a systematic account of his thinking in a number of key areas. Throughout, Wise himself is quoted liberally. Heller has not written a critical biography of Wise; Heller does not fully assess Wise's place in American Jewish or Reform movement history, nor does he evaluate the worth or depth of Wise's ideas. Rather, his painstakingly researched, scrupulously documented, lengthy work is more in the nature of a chronicle. It conveys a good deal of valuable information, especially on Wise's early years, but it is not an objective analysis of its subject. Heller does not conceal his admiration and sympathy for Wise and is at pains to portray him as a moderate, constructive Reformer.

KNOX's balanced and lucid work is a relatively brief narrative of Wise's life, contributions, and thought. Although it includes a useful "Note on Sources," it is lacking in footnotes and is not a scholarly study but rather a helpful introduction to its seminal subject. Chapters seven and eight are the most notable. The former provides a succinct and cogent summary of Wise's philosophy of religion in general and of Judaism in particular. The latter insightfully compares and contrasts Wise's religious stance with that of prominent 19th-century liberal Protestant leaders.

MAY, the grandson of I.M. Wise, wrote the first full-length biography of this immensely influential Reform Jewish pioneer. Although (forgivably) partial, it provides some valuable biographical details. The study also demonstrates how Wise's success was due in no small measure to his indefatigable energy, personal charisma and contacts, and most effective journalistic, organizational, and oratorical abilities. May's theme is to recount Wise's efforts to Americanize Judaism so that it was, "free, progressive, enlightened, united, and respected." In doing so he allows Wise to relate in his own words a good deal of his life and activities. May does not go further than this. As he states in his preface, "I have not attempted to give an estimate of Rabbi Wise as an author and theologian because I am not competent to do so."

MEYER's panoramic and highly regarded book is the most authoritative to date on the history of the Reform movement. His remarks concerning Wise reflect the author's ability clearly to present objective and informed judgments based upon a superb command of historical sources, a penetrating intellect, and well-honed historical sensibility. Meyer succinctly and convincingly analyzes and assesses Wise's character, religious thinking, activities, and legacy to American Judaism. The author recognizes Wise's opportunism and tendency for self-aggrandizement, but also his persistence and clarity of vision. He discusses Wise's radical as well as moderate Reformist tendencies and also pays tribute to Wise's success in working for a strong and self-confident American Judaism.

RUBINSTEIN's polemical article is a critical reassessment of what he terms the traditional portrayal of Wise as an advocate of moderate Reform Judaism, a champion of Jewish unity, and an individual who was beset by jealous, short-sighted, and doctrinaire enemies. Rubinstein argues that Wise was in fact a radical Reformer, provoked more disunity than unity, and made enemies due to his own faults and shortcomings. Rubinstein is highly critical of what he sees as Wise's disdain for consistency, his causistry, self-serving deceptive behavior, and lack of a coherent religious philosophy. He views Wise as essentially an opportunist who tried to be all things to all people, thereby irrevocably tarnishing his accomplishments and reputation.

SILVERSTEIN's goal is to assess the influence of the general American environment on the Reform movement. He emphasizes the broader social and cultural forces, for example those affecting rabbinic function and status, that helped lead to a uniquely American version of Reform Judaism. This focus also stresses the influences emanating at the congregational level, since individual congregations offer concrete examples of the impact of larger trends. One such congregation Silverstein studies in depth is I.M. Wise's B'nai Yeshurun of Cincinnati. With this orientation, Silverstein effectively demonstrates that religious change flows not merely from individual rabbinic and ideological sources but also from the laity of local congregations and larger tendencies. Thus, Wise reflected the desires of his congregants, as well as the influence of Episcopalian and Unitarian bodies, in advocating a national Reform organization. The laity also strongly supported the founding of the Hebrew Union College, which was affected by Protestant denominational college models. This does not mean that Wise and Reform Jews slavishly followed Christian precedents. Rather, they adopted religious patterns and techniques suitable to the American environment.

TEMKIN was a long-time, well-respected scholar of I.M. Wise and the author of Encyclopaedia Judaica's article concerning him (volume 16). Temkin has produced the most recent and the most significant full-length biography of his subject. Comprehensive, penetrating, and thoroughly documented, Temkin's work is arranged chronologically and reflects a sympathetic although not uncritical view of the American reformer. He succeeds in presenting an impressively informed, well-rounded, and balanced picture of the individual who perhaps more than any other successfully adapted Judaism to its American environment. Temkin emphasizes the crucial role Wise's editorship of The Israelite newspaper had in establishing him as an American Jewish spokesman and argues convincingly that Minhag America, Wise's prayer book, was his most important work. Temkin stresses the ongoing impact of Enlightenment ideas on Wise but notes that his significance lies far more in his concrete pioneering achievements in institution-building than in his theology or scholarship. Throughout his study, Temkin is careful to place Wise within the larger context, both Jewish and general, of his time. He accurately describes Wise's sense of mission, vision, and strength of personality but does not overlook his weaknesses: "It was his persistence that won him the war where his impetuosity lost him many battles."

ELLIOT LEFKOVITZ

Wise, Stephen Samuel 1874–1949

Hungarian-born American rabbi and Zionist leader

- Shapiro, Robert D., A Reform Rabbi in the Progressive Era: The Early Career of Stephen S. Wise (Harvard Dissertations in American History and Political Science), New York: Garland, 1988
- Urofsky, Melvin I., A Voice That Spoke for Justice: The Life and Times of Stephen S. Wise (SUNY Series in Modern Jewish History), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1982
- Voss, Carl Hermann, Rabbi and Minister: The Friendship of Stephen S. Wise and John Haynes Holmes, Cleveland, Ohio: World, 1964; 2nd edition, Buffalo, New York: Prometheus, 1980
- Voss, Carl Hermann, "The Lion and the Lamb: An Evaluation of the Life and Work of Stephen S. Wise," American Jewish Archives, 21, April 1969
- Voss, Carl Hermann (editor), Stephen S. Wise: Servant of the People, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1969

Wise, Stephen S., Challenging Years: The Autobiography of Stephen Wise, New York: Putnam's, 1949; London: East and West Library, 1951

Wise, Stephen S., The Personal Letters of Stephen Wise, Boston: Beacon, 1956

Stephen Samuel Wise was a prominent figure in U.S. Jewish life and politics during the first half of the 20th century. Wise was born in Budapest a little more than a year before his family immigrated to the United States and settled in New York. He was ordained by Adolf Jellinek, the Chief Rabbi of Vienna, in 1893 and earned his doctorate from Columbia University in 1902. His first pulpit was at B'nai Jeshurun in New York. In 1899, Wise became the rabbi at Congregation Beth Israel in Portland, Oregon. In 1905, he received a call to preach at Temple Emanu-El. He declined this offer of New York's most prestigious pulpit, but nevertheless he returned permanently to New York the following year. Thereupon, he set about founding the Free Synagogue, telling the New York Tribune on 20 October 1906 that in his new institution he would "as its name implies, be free and untrammled, free to voice without fear, or scruple the high moral and spiritual teaching of the synagogue." Wise remained a flamboyant and controversial leader and emerged as an important spokesman for social justice and Zionism.

WISE (1956) has edited the personal letters of his father to his wife Louise Waterman, his children, his grandson, and John Haynes Holmes (a Protestant minister who participated in interfaith services with Stephen Wise, Sr.). These letters are interesting primary source material on the rabbi, offering a glimpse into his private life. The collection is divided into five parts: 1899 to 1900, which covers the period from the meeting of Wise and Waterman until their marriage; 1901 to 1906, the years in Portland; 1907 to 1918, the founding of the Free Synagogue until the end of World War I; 1919 to 1932, the end of World War I until the rise of Hitler; and 1933 to 1949.

SHAPIRO's study provides a thorough and objective view of the life and career of Wise. The work is broken down into six sections: the education of an U.S. rabbi, the early Zionist career, the early years at the Free Synagogue, from pulpit to politics, and the fight for Americanism and Zionism. Shapiro discusses nearly every significant event in Wise's life and offers ample documentation to support his claims and ideas.

UROFSKY's monumental biography is a heavily biased look at Wise's controversial life. In Urofsky's eyes, Wise was correct in every situation; the author fails to understand that at times Wise's challengers had valid reasons for their objections to his behavior. The work is not entirely useless, however, for Urofsky does provide coverage of all phases of Wise's life.

VOSS's (1969a) article was written on the 20th anniversary of Wise's death. The work highlights Wise's achievements as a rabbi, scholar, and activist. Voss, who knew and worked with Wise, adds some personal notes and discusses Wise as an inspirational contemporary.

VOSS's (1969b) selection of Wise's professional letters is broken down into five sections: "Years of Growth" (1892–1911), "The New Freedoms" (1912–1919), "America at the Crossroads" (1920–1932), "The Lonely Agony" (1933–1939), and “If I Forget Thee, O Jerusalem” (1940–1949). This work includes an excellent chronology of Wise’s life and achievements.

VOSS (1964) is an account of the relationship of Wise and Holmes. In this important study, Voss explores the unusual friendship of a rabbi and a minister and their unique collaboration, describing how their interfaith services led to a tremendous outcry against Wise and were condemned on all sides. Voss discusses other collaborations between Wise and Holmes as well.

WISE (1951) defends his actions in his posthumously published autobiography. As a public figure, he was aware of the fact that many people did not agree with his ideas and ideologies, and he wrote this work to set the record straight on events and to justify his choices. Wise discusses most of the big controversies that surrounded him in his tenure as a public figure. He writes about his Zionist feelings, his ideas on social justice, the founding and workings of the Free Synagogue, his political roles, his public speaking, antisemitism and World War II, Jewish-Christian relations, and interfaith worship.

HAVVA S. CHARM

Wissenschaft des Judentums

Heschel, Susannah, Abraham Geiger and the Jewish Jesus (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism), Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998

Meyer, Michael, “Leopold Zunz and the Scientific Ideal,” in his The Origins of the Modern Jew: Jewish Identity and European Culture in Germany, 1749–1824, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1967

Schorsch, Ismar, From Text to Context: The Turn to History in Modern Judaism (Tauber Institute for the Study of European Jewry Series, 19), Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1994

Wiener, Max, “The Ideology of the Founders of Jewish Scientific Research,” YIVO Annual of Jewish Social Science, 5, 1950

Wiener, Max, “Abraham Geiger’s Conception of the Science of Judaism,” YIVO Annual of Jewish Social Science, 11, 1956–1957

The movement for a Wissenschaft des Judentums (a “science,” or scientific approach to the study, of Judaism) arose in Germany in the 1820s. This movement paralleled and took its cue from the rise of historical thinking exemplified by Baron Alexander von Humboldt, Leopold von Ranke, and G.W.F. Hegel in non-Jewish German intellectual and academic circles. Yet at the same time, it exhibited the distinguishing marks of its proponents, who were members of an excluded minority trying to win political emancipation and achieve social integration. Furthermore, the members of the Berlin Verein für Kultur und Wissenschaft des Judentums (Association for the Culture and Study of Judaism), who were in large part the architects of the new “critical” study of Jewry, often associated themselves with the movement for reform in Judaism. Although the Verein and its journal devoted to the Wis-senschaft des Judentums were short-lived, modern and contemporary Jewish studies owes its existence to the intellectual innovation of this Berlin association’s founders. Unfortunately, the movement has not been studied extensively in English academic writing; most of the scholarly literature about this topic (as well as the primary sources) are available only to readers of German. While the foci of the secondary works vary, all agree that the Wissenschaft des Judentums was a political and social phenomenon as well as an intellectual endeavor.

MEYER’s chapter on Leopold Zunz, whose biography illustrates the greatest achievements of the Wissenschaft des Judentums in its own day, provides a succinct and provocative overview of the political motivations and considerations behind the creation of the new scientific study of Judaism. This chapter contributes to Meyer’s case that a productive tension arose from Jewish attempts to participate in German intellectual and political life. In Meyer’s view, the goal of Zunz and other like-minded individuals was “to bring Judaism under the aegis of science, to make it respectable by bringing it into the light of Wissenschaft,” or pure science. Meyer investigates not only the program of Wissenschaft itself, but also the more general social and political circumstances that led to the founding of the Verein and its collapse several years later.

SCHORSCH’s monograph is an invaluable contribution to English-language research on the Wissenschaft des Judentums. This volume is the most comprehensive treatment of a subject that is usually relegated to a footnote in other, more general treatments of the modern German-Jewish experience. The political and social contexts for the Verein and Wissenschaft make a necessary appearance on these pages. However, Schorsch primarily focuses on the proponents of Wissenschaft; for this study, the vicissitudes of their biographies stand in place of more wide-ranging historical analysis. This attribute of his book is both its strength and its weakness. While informative about the lives of the Verein members and other individuals associated with or influenced by Wissenschaft, Schorsch’s narrative is weakened by its lack of a general or comparative perspective on 19th-century historicism or other socio-intellectual currents. This focus solely on Jewish historicism may explain in part also why he views the Jewish “turn to history” in a uniformly unproblematic light. Nonetheless, his study is a necessary source for any further research on the topic.

WIENER (1950) sets the stage for his discussion of Wissenschaft ideology by comparing the traditional modes by which Jews studied themselves and their past with the “critical” method offered by the Wissenschaft des Judentums. In particular, he questions why Wissenschaft’s first object of study was rabbinic, rather than biblical, literature. He argues that it was precisely the feeling of continuity between rabbinic Judaism and the scholars’ own time that made that period compelling; the members of the Verein “were groping to find expression for their deepest Jewish interests.” That they sought entrance into the halls of Prussian academe instead of becoming rabbis as their fathers had did not call their commitment to Judaism into question. On the contrary, they saw themselves as acting both for the benefit of Jews and Judaism and, at the same time, as acting in accordance with the philosophical spirit of their age, i.e., Hegelian idealism. Wiener would have us understand the Wissenschaft des Judentums as a highly political, even emotional, program rather than the pure science of which the Verein members often spoke.

In his article on Abraham Geiger, WIENER (1956–1957) investigates the Wissenschaft des Judentums through the life of a man who tried not only to craft a new tool for scholarship, but also to live out an ideology based on his intellectual endeavor. Geiger, an important rabbinical figure aligned with the Reform movement, used Wissenschaft to bolster his position that Judaism was “an instrument which would lead to pure humanity.” As such, he provides an excellent illustration of a person for whom historical scholarship could serve an agenda whose proponents were accused of radical anti-historicism. Geiger additionally demonstrates the tendency to use scholarship about Judaism as a haven for those who do not or cannot remain within Orthodoxy, which has become only more pronounced through the modern age.

HESCHEL's work, structured around the biography and work of Abraham Geiger, challenges the reader to rethink many of the dichotomies that previously characterized scholars' assessment of the politics of the Wissenschaft des Judentums. Heschel is unwilling to accept either Gershom Scholem's condemnation of the historiographic movement for its assimilationism or Schorsch's paean to the achievements of the movement for its emancipatory aims. Rather, she uses feminist and postcolonial theory to argue that Geiger in particular (and the Wissenschaft des Judentums by extension), like Manet's scandalous Olympia, “reversed the gaze” of the dominant Christian majority and forced leaders of Protestant thought to confront the Jewish subaltern in their midst. Heschel breathes new life into an often-stagnant debate through her fruitful use of poststructuralist theory and her examination of the tensions within Protestant, as well as Jewish, intellectual history in 19th-century Germany.

MARA BENJAMIN

See also Jewish Studies

Wolfson, Harry 1887–1974

Lithuanian-born American historian of philosophy

Feuer, Lewis S., “Recollections of Harry Austryn Wolfson,” American Jewish Archives, 28, 1976

Goldberg, Hillel, Between Berlin and Slobodka: Jewish Transition Figures from Eastern Europe, Hoboken, New Jersey: Ktav, 1989

Goldin, Judah, “On the Sleuth of Slobodka and the Cortez of Kabbalah,” American Scholar, 49, Summer 1980

Harvey, Warren Zev, “Hebraism and Western Philosophy in H.A. Wolfson's Theory of History,” Immanuel, 14, Spring 1982

Schwarz, Leo W., Wolfson of Harvard: Portrait of a Scholar, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1978

Harry Wolfson was a celebrated historian of philosophy and a professor of Jewish studies at Harvard University. He was unrivaled as an authority on Hellenistic, patristic, Islamic, scholastic, and Jewish philosophy. His two-volume study The Philosophy of Spinoza painstakingly traces the philosopher's medieval sources.

SCHWARZ, who was among Wolfson's earliest students at Harvard and his ardent admirer and friend for some 40 years, has written a full-length encomium of his teacher. He begins by tracing Wolfson's odyssey from his birthplace in Ostrin, Lithuania (the middle name Austryn that Wolfson adopted is an Anglicized variation of the name of this town), to the yeshivah of Slobodka where he honed his knowledge of the Talmud and traditional Jewish learning. Schwarz depicts Wolfson's progress from Slobodka to the Lower East Side of New York City, then to Scranton, Pennsylvania, and on to Harvard, arriving in 1908 during the time of Santayana and the “golden age” of philosophy. There he received both his bachelor's degree and his doctorate in philosophy (1915) and spent the next six decades of his life teaching Jewish studies. In 1925 he was appointed Nathan Littauer Professor of Hebrew Literature and Jewish Philosophy, a chair created especially for him, but his knowledge of all medieval philosophy—Jewish, Christian, Islamic—was unrivaled in the United States at the time.

The chairman of the Semitics department once wrote to Wolfson, “You seem to have developed a new method . . . in the field of medieval philosophy; you trace words and ideas through half a dozen languages, like hunters following a fox, and never returning empty-handed.” Wolfson called the analytical method referred to the “Talmudic hypothetico-deductive method of text interpretation,” and equated it with the scientific method as it applied to the study of texts. Schwarz explains how it was this traditional Jewish method of text study that Wolfson consciously followed in all his monumental and magisterial studies of Crescas, Spinoza, Philo, the Kalamists (Muslim theologians), and the church fathers, though externally he conformed to all the accepted canons of modern scholarship. Even so, Wolfson's scheme of medieval philosophy begins with a Jew, Philo, in the first century, and ends with a Jew, Spinoza, in the 17th century.

Wolfson had a fine literary style and a knack for making abstruse ideas clear, and Schwarz offers several memorable examples of his considerable expository skills. He explained, for example, the three views on the origin of the soul—those of creation, preexistence, and traducianism—in these terms: “custom-made,” “ready-made,” and “second-hand.” In considering the origin of the universe, Wolfson differentiates between the theories of creation out of preexistent matter, creation ex nihilo, and emanation by comparing the first to a potter who molds his vessel out of clay, the second to a magician pulling rabbits out of a hat, and the third to a spider spinning a web out of itself.

In Schwarz's portrait Wolfson comes through as a likeable personality, not a remote, scholastic recluse. Even the eccentricities that amused his contemporaries (he kept manuscripts in a refrigerator and drafts of his books in the stove of his bachelor apartment) lend a human touch to this eulogistic tribute.

HARVEY offers a perceptive discussion of Judaism's contribution to Western philosophy according to Wolfson's early and mature views.

GOLDBERG maintains that Wolfson's vaunted method of research was taken over from the discourses of Rabbi Moses Mordecai Epstein, who was the senior Talmud lecturer at the yeshivah of Slobodka while Wolfson studied there and who in 1901 published the first volume of his work Levush Mordecai, which, he states in the preface, constitutes the record of the lectures that he delivered at the yeshivah. Shorn of embroidery, Goldberg claims that Wolfson at Harvard applied to philosophical texts the critico-conceptual method of Talmud analysis of his teacher in Slobodka, and he offers a lucid point-by-point comparison of the rabbi and the professor that can be readily followed by English readers without rabbinic training.

There is a scholarly consensus that Wolfson had an extraordinary mind, that he was one of the greatest Jewish scholars of the 20th century, and that he wrote magisterial volumes that, though dated, remain standard reference works. What is in dispute is Wolfson the human being and his character. Goldberg portrays Wolfson as an insecure, cynical, distant, and elitist egotist who was interested only in himself and his coterie of cronies. According to Goldberg, Wolfson wrote a number of articles between 1915 and 1921 that were so vile and degenerate that they could only be matched by the scribblings of the antisemitic underworld. Among other things, Wolfson is shown to ridicule Judaism and Jewish ceremonies, poke fun at Jewish beggars, and call Yiddish literature the cesspool of European letters. It emerges that Wolfson's undivided loyalty was to Harvard, not to its Jewish students, and he took no interest in Jewish-related problems at the university. Goldberg further claims that when Harvard instituted a numerus clausus, Wolfson was silent; when Harvard refused to offer any positions to Jewish refugee professors during the Nazi era, Wolfson was silent; and when Harvard scheduled admission examinations on Yom Kippur, Wolfson was silent.

Wolfson confessed that he was not troubled by Harvard's procedure, and he characterized those who protested the policy as driven by "outer convenience," while those who violated the Day of Atonement in order to take the examination were driven by "inner duty." Goldberg reports that when Wolfson was old and sick, he occasionally told Jewish visitors: "Those Goyim think Aquinas is a great philosopher; they spend years studying him. I tell you Maimonides is far greater. In two or three days I can study this Aquinas and know him." However this may be, it should be observed that there is no scintilla of all this in his published works. When the Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies published a Festschrift in honor of the great Aquinas scholar Etienne Gilson, Wolfson contributed a learned article titled "St. Thomas on Divine Attributes," which he dedicated "as a token of high regard and admiration for my good friend Professor Gilson."

GOLDIN's essay discusses an article by Professor Gershom Scholem that adds several accusations to Goldberg's indictment. The two most important are that Wolfson snubbed Jewish scholars and coveted Gentile praise. Specifically, in Wolfson's work on Spinoza, Wolfson does not mention Leo Strauss's monumental study, Spinoza's Critique of Religion, which had appeared several years before his own two-volume work. Goldin absolves him of this charge, explaining that Wolfson never permitted himself to be deflected from his course for polemical purposes while writing his books. This may be so, but in 1938, when Strauss came to the United States as a refugee, Wolfson did not lift a finger to find him a position (Wolfson's former instructor, Horace Kallen, was successful in finding Strauss employment at the New School), despite the fact that by this time Strauss's contribution to medieval philosophy equaled—or surpassed—that of Wolfson. The second charge Goldin concedes. A word of praise from a learned Jesuit meant more to Wolfson than the accolades of all Jewish scholars, even including Louis Ginzberg, whom he held in high regard.

FEUER was a student of Wolfson who became somewhat estranged from him when Feuer, against Wolfson's advice, joined a radical student protest. They became reconciled, and Wolfson shared his reminiscences with Feuer shortly before Wolfson's death. Feuer's portrait is between the disembodied intellectual plaster saint of Schwarz's hagiography and the Faustian figure portrayed by Goldberg. Feuer sees Wolfson as a lonely bachelor-scholar who toiled away seven days a week for nearly 60 years and who described himself as a "maker of footnotes." Wolfson used to ask Feuer to take him to the movies, where Wolfson routinely fell asleep and on awaking would try to reconstruct the plot just as he tried imaginatively to reconstitute Spinoza's mind. At the train station on the way back to Cambridge, Wolfson would buy all the sensationalistic scandal sheets and girlie magazines, to the great embarrassment of Feuer. For much of his career, Wolfson was at Harvard but not quite of Harvard; his appointment was on a year-to-year basis. In 1925, after a decade of teaching, Harvard decided that his appointment as an assistant professor would be terminated unless the Jewish community would fund his salary. Luckily a patron was found in the person of Lucius Littauer, who established a chair of Jewish studies at Harvard, and Wolfson was appointed its first incumbent. It is to this fact that Feuer attributes what he interprets, in essence, as Wolfson's insecurity.

JACOB HABERMAN

Women: Biblical

- Bal, Mieke, Lethal Love: Feminist Literary Readings of Biblical Love Stories (Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987
- Bal, Mieke, Murder and Difference: Gender, Genre, and Scholarship on Sisera's Death (Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988
- Bal, Mieke, Death and Dissymmetry: The Politics of Coherence in the Book of Judges (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism), Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988
- Brenner, Athalya, The Israelite Woman: Social Role and Literary Type in Biblical Narrative (Biblical Seminar Series), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, 1985
- Brenner, Athalya (editor), The Feminist Companion to the Bible, 10 vols., Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993–1996

- Brenner, Athalya, The Intercourse of Knowledge: On Gendering Desire and "Sexuality" in the Hebrew Bible (Biblical Interpretation Series, vol. 26), New York: Brill, 1997
- Brenner, Athalya and Carole Fontaine, A Feminist Companion to Reading the Bible: Approaches, Methods and Strategies, Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997
- Brenner, Athalya and Fokkeli van Dijk Hemmes, On Gendering Texts: Female and Male Voices in the Hebrew Bible (Biblical Interpretation Series, vol. 1), New York: Brill, 1993
- Camp, Claudia V. and Carole R. Fontaine (editors), Women, War, and Metaphor: Language and Society in the Study of the Hebrew Bible (Semeia, 61), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1993
- Day, Peggy (editor), Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1989
- Exum, J. Cheryl, Fragmented Women: Feminist (Sub)versions of Biblical Narratives (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 163), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: JSOT, and Valley Forge, Pennsylvania: Trinity Press International, 1993
- Exum, J. Cheryl, Plotted, Shot, and Painted: Cultural Representations of Biblical Women (Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series, 215), Sheffield, South Yorkshire: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996
- Meyers, Carol, Discovering Eve: Ancient Israelite Women in Context, New York: Oxford University Press, 1988
- Pardes, Ilana, Countertraditions in the Bible: A Feminist Approach, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1992
- Trible, Phyllis, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (Overtures to Biblical Theology, 2), Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978; London: SCM, 1992
- Trible, Phyllis, Texts of Terror: Literary-Feminist Readings of Biblical Narratives (Overtures to Biblical Theology, 13), Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984
- Weems, Renita, Battered Love: Marriage, Sex, and Violence in the Hebrew Prophets (Overtures to Biblical Theology), Minneapolis, Minnesota: Fortress, 1995

The last two decades of the 20th century witnessed a veritable explosion of biblical studies concerned with women and gender. The study of the Hebrew Bible has been immeasurably enriched by this new infusion of often brilliant scholarship, and to many it seems that the turn of the millennium must see a long-overdue paradigm shift in the field of biblical studies, due, in no small part, to precisely this body of work.

Athalya Brenner, through her own work, in collaboration with colleagues, and as editor of the premier series of feminist biblical studies, has contributed immensely to the present wealth of material. BRENNER (1993–1996) comprises a vast store of collected essays by a wide range of biblical scholars on diverse aspects of the biblical book(s) to which each volume is devoted. The series includes volumes on Genesis; Exodus through Deuteronomy; Judges; Samuel and Kings; the Latter Prophets; Song of Songs; wisdom literature; Esther,

Judith and Susanna; Ruth; and the Hebrew Bible in the New Testament. An introductory collection, edited by BRENNER and FONTAINE and published after the series itself, attempts to provide critical overviews of the theoretical insights, methodological strategies, and disciplinary perspectives that inform the articles in the ten-volume series. One of the most impressive things about the series is the skill and matter-of-factness with which individual authors and the collections themselves effectively integrate traditionally distinct genres of expression and analysis and meld a profoundly activist impulse with conventional (and unconventional) protocols of academic research. Such interventions are the hallmarks of critical feminist scholarship, and this series provides many fine examples of that scholarship at its best.

Two of Brenner's own books chart very nicely the increasing sophistication and depth of work on women and gender in biblical studies. BRENNER (1985) provides a basic introduction to the Bible's female characters and to some of the foundational questions and problems posed by the first generation of feminists who made their way into biblical studies in the academy. She asks both about social institutions and about literary paradigms in exploring how the biblical texts portray and classify female characters and the roles those characters play. Published 12 years later, BRENNER (1997) explores the ways in which "human love, desire and sex . . . are gendered in the Hebrew Bible." Early questions about "what" led to further questions about "how"—the means and the mechanisms by which biblical knowledge about women, men, sex, and desire is created and perpetuated. These latter questions are pursued by Brenner through chapters on linguistic and semantic data, bodies, procreation and contraception, incest, adultery, rape, and what she terms "pornoprophetics"—pornographic elements in the biblical prophetic literature.

The impetus for this latter work was BRENNER and VAN DIJK HEMMES's collaboration. The two friends and scholars have probed all manner of passages from the Bible in examining the extent to which voices of authority in the text—rather than authorship of the text—might be gendered. Brenner provides an introduction; van Dijk-Hemmes follows with a methodological summary and brief essays applying her method to texts ranging from victory and mockery songs through wisdom speeches and prophetic pronouncements, love songs, laments, vows, and prayers, to birth songs and naming speeches. This section is followed in turn by Brenner's close analyses of chapters from Proverbs and Qohelet (Ecclesiastes). Finally, each offers an experimental reading of texts of "prophetic pornography," precursors to Brenner's continued work on the subject following van Dijk-Hemmes's untimely death in 1994. The book is a valuable first foray into an extremely complex aspect of biblical interpretation, one that only becomes more intriguing with further critical refinement.

Bal's trilogy came as a revelation (indeed, a revolution) to biblicists from an outsider to the field, and it has been instrumental in shaping the work of an entire rising generation of scholars. Already well known for her work in narratology, Bal applied her formidable intellect to a set of biblical stories—both those found in the Bible and those (in art, literature, children's books, etc.) that are part of the received traditions—and provided a multilayered examination of the interrelated dynamics of dominance, violence, and gender encoded in them. BAL (1987) reconsiders biblical “love stories” in which danger and death have traditionally been assigned the shape of a woman; BAL (1988a) critiques the discipline of biblical scholarship through the careful dissection of academic discourses applied to the different accounts of Sisera’s death found in Judges 4–5; and BAL (1988b) juxtaposes the patriarchal coherence of received traditions on the Book of Judges and Bal’s own proposed countercoherence that recognizes the centrality of the women’s stories and emphasizes the significance of sexual and domestic violence to the book as a whole. Various technical errors scattered throughout these books, and subsequently addressed by professional biblicalists, in no way detract from the impressive scope of Bal’s project. In all three books, Bal employs psychoanalysis and structuralism/poststructuralism as key hermeneutical tools, a choice that may be off-putting to some; many others will find Bal’s theory-laden discourse daunting. While greater accessibility would have made these works even more valuable, they will reward the effort required to understand them.

Cheryl Exum is one of many scholars who have drawn on both Bal’s and Brenner’s insights in enhancing her own approach to reading stories of biblical women. EXUM (1993) takes a primarily literary approach, with a hefty dose of psycholitics, to consider, among other things, the ways in which female biblical characters suffer violence not only physically at the hands of other (male) characters but also textually at the hands of the authors and editors of the traditions. She offers what she calls “feminist (sub)versions” of the texts she reads, neither reclaiming their women nor discarding the texts for their misogyny. EXUM (1996) moves even further into the broad field of cultural studies and, taking her cue from Bal and others, explores several biblical women in their manifestations in film, opera, fine art, and narrative, as objects of a male gaze. She also takes this opportunity to expand on and refine some of her earlier work on the women surrounding Moses in the Exodus stories and to add her own voice to the growing body of work on the violent pornography found in biblical prophecy.

PARDES, likewise, owes a great debt to Bal, with whom she nonetheless takes issue in calling for a more historical approach to the study of biblical women. Pardes blends critiques of prior scholarship on biblical women and her own proposals about method with sustained examples and illustrations of that method applied to the stories of Eve, Rachel and Leah, Zipporah, Ruth, the Shulamite, and Job’s wife. Among other strategies, she offers readings of P against J, midrash against Torah, and Song of Songs against prophetic misogyny in her ongoing conversation with these texts and other scholars who study them.

MEYERS offers a historical and social scientific approach to the paradigmatic biblical woman, Eve—both the much-maligned character of the second and third chapters of Genesis and the “everywoman”—the flesh-and-bones peasant of ancient Israel. Several chapters of the book synthesize for the reader significant archaeological data and biblical texts through which Meyers draws her picture of ancient household and family life and the struggle to scratch out a living in the largely barren highlands of early Iron Age Israel. The core of the book is a retranslation and reinterpretation of Genesis 2–3 in light of the sociological/anthropological models Meyers constructs. Eve, in this reading, becomes a kind of separate but equal partner of Adam, one who shares with him the ever-increasing burden of agricultural and domestic labor, but who suffers as well the disability of increased demands for child-bearing (“I will greatly increase your toil and your pregnancies”) required for subsistence in the Israelite highlands. Meyers’s clear and accessible style and her effort throughout to defend the biblical text against what she terms feminist critics’ “misplaced preoccupation with biblical androcentrism” and patriarchy have made this book popular in nonacademic study groups and college classrooms alike.

DAY’s anthology comprises a fine collection whose breadth of subject matter is equalled only by the range of methods employed. Each piece offers a brief but deep treatment of a particular question, issue, or text—often setting the Bible in its wider Near Eastern context and in dialogue with other ancient documents and artifacts. Social history and philology stand side-by-side with literary and cultural criticism and folklore studies. Hagar’s story finds resonances in the Epic of Gilgamesh, and Jephthah’s daughter’s “rite of passage” in the Iphigenia and Kore myths. The Israelite’s “Queen of Heaven” has a sister in Astarte and Ishtar, and Esther is unveiled as an exemplum to all diaspora Jewry of a feminine nonconfrontational model of effective power. The book is an excellent introduction to the field, is eminently readable, and includes enough footnotes to keep even the hardcore experts engaged.

CAMP and FONTAINE’s is another significant anthology that brings together an impressive array of biblical scholars—in this case around a broad but specific topic. The book considers “how metaphor ‘works’ in the Hebrew Bible, and how such workings both shape and are shaped by social realities” that infuse the lives of women and the cultures of violence that spawn war. Some essays are more focused on theoretical issues of gender and metaphor; most, however, deal with particular texts and tropes in which women, men, sex, and warfare are key elements. Three response essays, one from a linguistic perspective, the other two situated in postmodern psychoanalytic theory (the first of these two by Bal), complete the volume.

Metaphor, sex, and violence are the focus as well of WEEMS’s book-length treatment of images of sexual/marital violence in the books of the Prophets. Weems considers, from many angles, the content of the marriage metaphor as a representation of God’s relationship with Israel in the books of Hosea, Ezekiel, and Jeremiah, and the ways in which their invocation of battered, humiliated, sexually abused “promiscuous” wives could become a way of talking about divine love—a love inextricably bound up with and expressed through jealousy, terror, and torture. Weems argues that both the prophetic authors and their intended priestly audience were male; and thus the sexualized female body served as a battleground in a power struggle between men. Following very careful and systematic explorations of the rhetorical force and deployment of this metaphor in the ancient Near East, Weems concludes her book with a meditation on how contemporary readers—survivors of sexual and domestic violence, ethicists, theologians, marginalized peoples, liberationists—can (or cannot) read these texts, and how any work on them must be self-consciously relevant to such readers and their experiences of violence.

Finally, Phyllis Trible's books hold a special place as among the earliest fruits of modern biblical scholarship on women and gender. For many in the present generation of biblical scholars, Trible's work was an introduction to the tools and texts that provided a way to begin to think about women, sexuality, and feminine God language. TRIBLE (1978) and TRIBLE (1984) employ rhetorical criticism as their primary methods and offer close readings of selected texts. As volumes two and 13 of Fortress Press's "Overtures to Biblical Theology" series, the studies often have something of a homiletic quality about them—Trible (1984) began as a series of lectures directed toward "the preaching enterprise in the church." Many of Trible's proposals and conclusions have been seriously challenged by others in the field, and her attempts to rescue the Bible through readings that efface the misogynistic and patriarchal elements, while discovering "original" pro-feminist impulses, have gained for her work a great many supporters and detractors alike.

CYNTHIA M. BAKER

See also Women: Ancient and Modern; Women: Contemporary; Women: Status

Women: Ancient and Modern

- Antler, Joyce, The Journey Home: Jewish Women and the American Century, New York: Free Press, 1997
- Baskin, Judith (editor), Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1991, 2nd edition, 1998
- Baskin, Judith (editor), Women of the Word: Jewish Women and Jewish Writing, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1994
- Glenn, Susan A., Daughters of the Shtetl: Life and Labor in the Immigrant Generation, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1990
- Henry, Sondra and Emily Taitz, Written Out of History: A Hidden Legacy of Jewish Women Revealed through Their Writings and Letters, New York: Bloch, 1978; as Written Out of History: Our Jewish Foremothers, New York: Biblio, 1990
- Hyman, Paula E. and Deborah Dash Moore (editors), Jewish Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia, 2 vols., New York: Routledge, 1997; London: Routledge, 1998
- Levine, Amy-Jill (editor), "Women Like This": New Perspectives on Jewish Women in the Greco-Roman World (Early Judaism and Its Literature, no. 1), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1991
- Lowenthal, Marvin (editor and translator), The Memoirs of Glückel of Hameln, New York and London: Harper and Brothers, 1932
- Ofer, Dalia and Lenore J. Weitzman, Women in the Holocaust, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1998

Sacks, Maurie, Active Voices: Women in Jewish Culture, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995

Umansky, Ellen and Dianne Ashton, Four Centuries of Jewish Women's Spirituality: A Sourcebook, Boston: Beacon, 1992

Weissler, Chava, Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women, Boston: Beacon, 1998

There are a number of good collections and a range of monographs exploring Jewish women's lives and works from antiquity through the present day.

Baskin's two collections have become standard texts in many college-level Judaism and women's studies courses. Each volume presents a fine array of scholarly articles representing a range of academic disciplines and highlighting individual personalities and broader cultural dynamics of different places and periods. The essays are arranged more or less chronologically, and the historical-geographical center of each book is early modern and modern Europe and the United States, with the Middle Ages and the Middle East receiving brief attention in each volume, while antiquity is granted a token nod in BASKIN (1991). (The chronological distribution may reflect the focus of English-language scholarship being undertaken in both Jewish and women's history in general.) Baskin's (1991) usefulness as a textbook is enhanced by its balance of geohistorical and thematic survey articles. Each article provides a small taste of existing scholarship on a period or theme, and the notes provide some direction for further exploration. Select annotated bibliographies would have been a valuable addition. The more substantial volume of the two, BASKIN (1994) offers a similarly useful mixture of general survey articles and articles focused on particular writers or themes. Both volumes present significant primary research by contemporary scholars in a format accessible to a nonspecialist audience.

Another book that seeks to provide a historical survey is HENRY and TAITZ's study. These authors have constructed a running narrative focused on fictional characters and historical Jewish women, beginning with biblical Jewish heroines and concluding with U.S. political and intellectual leaders. The book reads like a popular "who's who" of model Jewish women, and its publication in the late 1970s provided for many readers an introduction to the rich resources available for reconstructing Jewish women's history. The volume will engage young and novice readers, and it contains enough primary source citations to make it a useful reference for the college classroom as well.

Nine of the 11 essays edited by LEVINE examine images of Jewish women in (usually male-authored and sometimes strikingly misogynist) Greco-Roman literature, while the remaining two essays consider evidence about female authorship in antiquity. The quality of critical scholarship and writing in these essays varies widely from very fine to not-so-fine, and an uncritical, apologetic interest appears now and then, most explicitly in Judith Romney Wegner's "Philo's Portrayal of Women—Hebraic or Hellenic?" Nonetheless, the collection does provide a good introduction to the study of images of women in the Jewish pseudepigrapha.

LOWENTHAL renders a great service to modern readers with his translation of the memoirs of Glikl of Hameln, an ordinary, capable, and comfortably wealthy German Jewish woman of the late 17th and early 18th centuries. This account, written by Glikl as a testament to and legacy for her children, combines autobiographical narrative with business records, moralizing exhortations, and prayers, and it is tinged on occasion with the shadows of larger historical events such as the Cossack massacres of Jews in Poland and the rise and fall of Shabbetai Tsevi. Glikl's text is the earliest extant Yiddish memoir by a woman, and it is unsurpassed as a firsthand glimpse into the life of a European Jewish woman of the period.

WEISLER has likewise filled a significant lacuna with her translation and examination of Yiddish tkhines, Ashkenazi prayers (some authored by women) that were created for the pious devotions of women and "men who are like women"—the former were often barred from the classical Hebrew rabbinic literature so highly valued in these early modern Jewish communities, while the latter were uneducated in that tradition. Weissler divides her study into three parts, each comprising both scholarly analysis and extensive quotation of the prayers. Part one introduces the genre and its settings, provides the theoretical frameworks for the study, and considers constructions of gender, bodies, and the spiritual aspirations of women in the tkhines. Part two explores mystical overtones and images in some of these prayers, and part three completes the study with a look at the transformation of the tkhines in the new world of U.S. Jewish immigrants at the turn of the 20th century. A final essay, titled "The Feminist Scholar and the Tkhines," offers Weissler's own reflections on identity and commitments.

A short excerpt from Glikl's memoir and a selection of tkhines are included among the impressive store of primary sources compiled and edited by UMANSKY and ASHTON. Spanning the years between 1560 and 1990 and framed by a general introduction and final list of sources, this anthology focuses on the vitally important but inevitably amorphous realm of "spirituality," presented here through the voices of women from many generations and locations. These poems, memoirs, prayers, rituals, meditations, letters, essays, reflections, dedications, and speeches are divided into four chronological categories: "1560–1800: Traditional Voices," "1800–1890: Stronger Voices," "1890–1960: Urgent Voices," and "1960–1990: Contemporary Voices." As the book unfolds, each category comprises progressively more sources and a greater multiplicity of voices; each section is introduced with a carefully crafted introduction that supplies an overall context and a brief background summary of each author and her work(s). Most of this collection consists of excerpts or full pieces published elsewhere, although a number of the most recent contributions were written expressly for this publication. Together, the pieces create a rich sourcebook that lends itself to many settings; the volume will interest scholars, students, practitioners, dreamers, poets, and the merely curious.

In the collection of articles edited by SACKS, one finds a dizzying array of topics and approaches held together, once again, under the general rubric of varied "voices." Thus, the first essay, a rather cursory recital of the standard received wisdom titled "Women as Wives in Rabbinic Literature," is the single entry under the heading of "Male Voices." Sacks's intention here is explicit: she presents this essay "so that readers can later compare what they read with these more expected assertions." Unfortunately, this routine version of rabbinic Judaism is not only uninteresting in itself, it also sets an unnecessarily weak tone for the generally engaging and often insightful articles that follow. Following the collection's less-than-promising start, however, the quality of the analysis improves in the remaining sections of the book, which are loosely organized under the headings of "Public Voices" (articles on early Zionist women and Reform sisterhoods); "Literary Voices" (articles on Grace Aguilar and Holocaust narratives); "Ritual Voices" (pieces on new rituals, bar mitzvah moms, and newly orthodox women); "Folk Voices" (work on Tunisian immigrants to Israel, Orthodox high school girls, and Judeo-Spanish song traditions); and "An Anthropological Voice" (a programmatic and substantive essay by noted anthropologist Susan Starr Sered). There is much intriguing information and analysis here. Moreover, the 11 essays, to varying degrees, model an interdisciplinary, "wholistic," and woman-centered approach to scholarship on Jewish women that enriches this field of inquiry immeasurably.

The world of turn-of-the-20th-century immigrant sweatshops and smaller contract shops is the focus of GLENN's study of first-generation Jews in the United States. The author explores the everyday lives and self-perceptions of young Jewish women workers in the garment industries of the United States' urban centers, and she suggests that the gender divisions of the work environment enabled the women to develop a sense of self-possession and self-esteem that provided a strong base for political organizing, labor union activity, and community building. The book valuably highlights the involvement of Jewish women in the unionization of the garment industry, but it is less strong in its apprehension of the specifically Jewish and Yiddish cultural history of these immigrant women. Glenn's rich synthesis and analysis of a variety of materials make this an excellent overview of an important and fascinating subject.

OFER and WEITZMAN's book is an extremely impressive and invaluable contribution to Holocaust studies, Jewish studies, and gender and women's studies. Included here are essays by the majority of the late 20th century's most capable and articulate scholars on women, gender, and the Holocaust, as well as a handful of survivors' testimonies, which were penned explicitly for this volume and are presented alongside the third-person descriptive and analytical essays that make up the bulk of this collection. The focus of the essays range from Jewish life in prewar Europe and under the growing Nazi movement to life in the ghettos, the resistance, and the camps. Matters and materials examined include diaries and memoirs, institutions and movements, everyday events, coping strategies, and scholarly research on the Holocaust and on Holocaust literature. Information about women and women's experiences is finely woven together with analyses of gendered aspects of torture, suffering, coping, and resistance during the Holocaust, as well as with discussions of the significance of gender for events and stories that followed. The editors provide a compelling general introduction to their project and brief introductions to each section and piece presented in the volume.

ANTLER is a consummate storyteller, and her well-researched, narrative presentation of the lives and times of dozens of 20th-century Jewish women is as readable as it is informative. Antler does not maintain skeptical distance from or offer critical analysis of her subjects; instead, she unabashedly celebrates women who become heroines—big and small—in these tellings of their tales. The author's real contribution is her provision of vivid detail, historical and cultural context, and a sense of the ongoing struggles around identity, community, and commitment exemplified by each of these Jewish women. She highlights well some of the complex gender dynamics inherent in the events and lives she recounts, but she never strays from the laudatory tone that characterizes the work as a whole.

The encyclopedia produced by HYMAN and MOORE is a veritable gold mine of historical and biographical information on a vast number of U.S. Jewish women whose lives or work have had a measurable local, national, or global impact. Discussions of women, the editors note, are strikingly few in most reference works on Jews and Judaism, while the Jewishness of many Jewish women is effaced or disregarded in most reference works on women. This two-volume encyclopedia "rectifies this loss and provides a usable past" for any and all who would make use of its resources. While the vast majority (800) of the entries are biographical, these articles are supplemented by more than 100 topical entries on such subjects as theater, Zionism, anarchists, the Young Women's Hebrew Association, and the labor movement. In their preface, the editors provide a few definitional caveats: "American" refers to the United States and includes immigrants and refugees as well as native-born residents and some émigrés; "Jewish" refers to those born of one or more Jewish parents as well as converts to or from Judaism, including a number of women who rejected any Jewish identity or considered their Judaism irrelevant; and "historical encyclopedia" indicates a focus on the biographies of persons no longer living and the lives of Jewish women over the age of 60 who have already proven to be of historical consequence. The several exceptions to this last rule encompass primarily entertainers, athletes, and prominent women in contemporary national politics. Each article is accompanied by a recommended bibliography and, where appropriate, selected published titles by the person profiled.

CYNTHIA M. BAKER

See also Women: Biblical; Women: Contemporary; Women: Status

Women: Contemporary

- Beck, Evelyn Torton, Nice Jewish Girls: A Lesbian Anthology (Crossing Press Feminist Series), Trumansburg, New York: Crossing, 1982; revised edition, Boston: Beacon, 1989
- Daniel, Ruby and Barbara C. Johnson, Ruby of Cochin: An Indian Jewish Woman Remembers, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1995

- Heschel, Susannah, On Being a Jewish Feminist, New York: Schocken, 1983
- Kaufman, Debra Renee, Rachel's Daughters: Newly Orthodox Jewish Women, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1991
- Kaye/Kantrowitz, Melanie, The Issue Is Power: Essays on Women, Jews, Violence, and Resistance, San Francisco: Aunt Lute, 1992
- Kaye/Kantrowitz, Melanie and Irena Klepfisz, The Tribe of Dina: A Jewish Women's Anthology (Sinister Wisdom, 29/30), Montpelier, Vermont: Sinister Wisdom, 1986; revised edition, Boston: Beacon, 1989
- Moore, Tracy (editor), Lesbiot: Israeli Lesbians Talk about Sexuality, Feminism, Judaism and Their Lives, London and New York: Cassell, 1995
- Piercy, Marge, He, She, and It: A Novel, New York: Knopf, 1991
- Pogrebin, Letty Cottin, Deborah, Golda, and Me: Being Female and Jewish in America, New York: Crown, 1991
- Sered, Susan Starr, Women as Ritual Experts: The Religious Lives of Elderly Jewish Women in Jerusalem, New York: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Sharoni, Simona, Gender and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict: The Politics of Women's Resistance (Syracuse Studies on Peace and Conflict Resolution), Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1995
- Siegel, Rachel Josefowitz and Ellen Cole (editors), Celebrating the Lives of Jewish Women: Patterns in a Feminist Sampler (Haworth Innovations in Feminist Studies), New York: Harrington Park, 1997

The number of available books about contemporary Jewish women's experiences and concerns is substantial and continues to grow. There are several impressive studies that focus on contemporary Jewish women, and yet some of the most interesting and illuminating treatments of the subject come in the form of collections of first-person writings that have appeared over the past few decades.

Compiled and edited while she was still a graduate student at the University of Pennsylvania, HESCHEL's anthology has been a veritable handbook for budding Jewish feminists. BECK's anthology provides a similar "bible" for many Jewish women—lesbian, feminist, and otherwise. KAYE/KANTROWITZ and KLEPFISZ's anthology rounds out this foundational triad of collected writings by and about contemporary women engaged in thinking about, wrestling with, and celebrating many dimensions of Jewish women's experiences. All three books contain a variety of materials. The pieces in Heschel's book are all in essay form, but they range in content from critical analysis to autobiography and personal reflection, from theological manifesto to recipe for ritual. The texts collected by Kaye/Kantrowitz and Klepfisz and by Beck are decidedly more secular in orientation than Heschel's work, with many meditations on ethnic and sexual identity politics and explorations of cultural and political legacies. These latter two volumes feature poetry, fiction, and photographs, as well as essays of various sorts. Each collection is a rich resource in its own right as well as a snapshot of a time that has already become "history." All three volumes stand in similar self-conscious relation to contemporary Jewish and women's movements, and all seek to provide resources and inspiration for those movements and the myriad communities and commitments that they embrace.

KAYE/KANTROWITZ compiles a collection of the author's own writings, including analytical and activist essays, book reviews, speeches, fiction, and personal reflections that emphasize how violence and power relations reproduce each other on micro and macro levels. Rape and other forms of violence against women, war, racism, antisemitism, and imperialism, as well as intricate and deadly connections among these practices and ideologies, are examined from the self-consciously and explicitly Jewish, American, and female perspective of the author. Written over a 15-year period, these texts also provide a glimpse into the world of both an individual and a wider community of progressive Jewish women confronting the ever more complex networks of oppression and resistance that characterized the late 20th century.

A very different perspective on the world emerges from the stories, songs, recollections, and photographs of Ruby Daniel and her community as captured by DANIEL and JOHNSON. Born and raised in Cochin, in the southern Indian state of Kerala, Daniel is heir to one of the most ancient communities of Jews outside of the Mediterranean and Middle East, and the volume is a wellspring of folklore and family legend presented through the memories of this engaging and articulate informant. The contents are divided into three sections. The first, a reflective autobiography of Daniel's life in India and her move to Israel, includes memories of her childhood and young adulthood, a family history and genealogy, portraits of extended family members, and Daniel's perceptions of other surrounding communities. The second part describes the Cochin Jewish community, its synagogues and other institutions, and its relationships with the local and British colonial ruling powers. In the final section, Daniel provides a holiday calendar complete with colorful descriptions of family and community celebrations of the major Jewish holidays. Photographs and song texts add still more dimensions to the multilayered collage. Johnson's extremely useful and informative footnotes accompany Daniel's narrative and help to explain the historical context, enabling the reader to distinguish between Daniel's individual perceptions and received stereotypes, and addressing how others might have viewed the same events or the practices of neighboring communities. The memoir is a real treasure.

SIEGEL and COLE's collaborative effort presents first-person accounts by dozens of (primarily American) Jewish women reflecting on their histories, upbringings, transformations, and accommodations to their various definitions of Jewish identity. Photographs and short biographies of the contributors add a nice touch to this collection of thoughtful and often conversation-like pieces by women both unknown (such as Elisa Goldberg, a Philadelphia artist) and widely known (such as Susan Weidman Schneider, the editor-in-chief of Lilith: The Independent Jewish Women's Magazine, and Lenore Walker, an expert on the psychology of domestic violence). Contributors range from teenagers (such as Elisha Glass, a sophomore at Ithaca High School in western New York State) to great-grandmothers (including Siegel herself). Almost all of the women are professionals in social work, psychology, or the humanities, yet each speaks first and foremost as a woman and Jew, often describing her professional and other life choices as outgrowths of dynamics deeply rooted in these two identity categories. There is no apparent organization to the book's presentation; it is, to use the editors' metaphor, a sampler whose patterns lie both above and below its finely textured surface.

Another collection of contemporary Jewish women's stories takes the form of edited transcripts from a U.S.-Israeli oral history project. MOORE and her collaborators have brought together 21 narratives by Israeli lesbians representing, it seems, the most international collection of contemporary Jewish women's voices to date (over half are native-born Israelis, and the remainder are immigrants from all over the Western world). A distinctive feature of this collection of autobiographical accounts is the fact that each piece is edited by a different hand. The reader therefore enjoys the tandem presentation of one woman's oral history through another's selection and arrangement of her material. These pairings are supplemented by brief biographical statements by the editors at the start of the volume. The documentary collection is introduced by a short history of the project, a thumbnail sketch of Israel and its political scene, and an account of the beginnings of lesbian organizing in that context.

POGREBIN interweaves events and stories from her life with deeper reflections on meaning and identity. Her musings are thoughtful, if not profound or enlightening; her analyses and propositions are relatively tame and circumscribed. Pogrebin has a wonderful knack for presenting herself to the reader, warts and all, in the conversational tone that characterizes the book. Among her many recollections are a tribute to her mother, an account of a meeting with Golda Meir, a sermon for her niece's bat mitzvah, a survey of Jewish female images in Hollywood films, and meditations on biblical stories and heroines. The final 100 pages of the book recount experiences and insights Pogrebin gained in dialogue with black and Jewish feminists over many years and describe encounters between Jewish feminist Zionists (including Pogrebin herself) and Palestinian nationalist feminists. Pogrebin's essays in this part of the book convey a very vivid sense of the learned ignorance, misunderstandings, suspicions, and deep resistances such dialogues can reveal, as well as the few glimmers of insight that participants sometimes acquire. Thus, she offers a view of a seemingly intractable, complicated, and deeply frustrating endeavor marked by few successes but impressive for the sheer persistence of the parties involved as they work toward common understanding and peaceful solutions. Pogrebin's mixed-genre monograph is both idiosyncratic and deeply resonant, an ethical autobiography that is at once a cautionary tale and a call to action.

An Israeli professor of peace and conflict resolution, SHARONI presents accounts of Israeli Jewish women's struggles for security and justice juxtaposed with corresponding accounts of Palestinian women and their political work. The combination is provocative and compelling. Sharoni alternates political theory and sociological gender analysis with historical overviews of women's movements, and she supplies a close examination of the lives and political activities of women in the years between the start of the intifada and the signing of the Declaration of Principles by the Israeli government and the Palestine Liberation Organization (1987 to 1993). A final chapter considers political alliances between Israeli Jewish women and Palestinian women. Photographs scattered throughout the book provide poignant visual documentation, and a substantial bibliography points to a wealth of related sources.

A rather different community of Israeli women is explored in SERED's ethnographic study of elderly Kurdish and Yemenite immigrants to Israel. Sered's study focuses explicitly on the ritual activities and identifications of sacredness by this community of women. She finds that these women do not merely suffer under the disabilities of divisions and strictures imposed on them in the name of Jewish tradition; they also mobilize some of those same traditional mythologies and practices to create meaning and community that are woman-centered and that value and sanctify the concerns of their everyday lives. Sered allows the women's stories and self-descriptions to reveal the inadequacy of models that assume that male-centered, non-domestic rituals are more important than the often female-centered, domestic (and non-domestic) rituals that mark the "ultimate concerns of life, suffering, and death." This book represents ethnography at its best, and Sered's skill and insight provide an engaging and edifying portrait of a community of Jewish women at the end of their lives and at the height of their creative powers.

Unlike Sered's subjects, who grew up with the constraints and traditions that shaped their lives and identities, the women described by KAUFMAN are "newly-orthodox" Jews. Like Sered, Kaufman presents these women through their own words and from their own perspectives, highlighting concerns that they identify as most important and compelling to them, rather than emphasizing issues that an "outsider" or a male member of their community might expect to take precedence. The bulk of the book is descriptive, but the volume employs a finely-wrought framework of interpretive observations and summaries that downplays neither the patriarchal and often reactionary aspects of Jewish Orthodoxy nor the appearance of reasoned choice in the accounts of the ba'alot teshuvah. The women in this study come primarily from secular or minimally religious backgrounds, and most are young, educated, single women. Perhaps the most interesting insight proffered by Kaufman is that while these women energetically reject "feminism" (which appears as a one-dimensional caricature in their accounts), their own explanations of their choices and their articulations of Orthodox Jewish values frequently employ feminist rhetoric. For example, it is precisely the feminist values of woman's self-possession and control over her body and sexuality that these women displace from "secular" feminism and attribute to Orthodox Judaism. Kaufman's general conclusions, which come at the end of the book, provide a fine summary and raise many intriguing questions about women, gender, Judaism, Orthodoxy, and the study of modern (and postmodern) identity politics.

PIERCY, a prolific poet, essayist, and fiction writer, develops many Jewish characters and themes in her writings. Any number of the female characters in her various works, like Piercy herself, would fall comfortably under the rubric of "contemporary Jewish women." This particular novel stretches the boundaries of this category only slightly by presenting characters from an imagined but not-too-distant future. The protagonists of the story are Shira and her grandmother Malkah, two generations of women who inhabit the "Jewish free town" of Tikva in a time when transglobal corporations have replaced most of the boundaries, functions, and institutions (including ethnic and religious ones) of the now defunct nation states. Masterfully intertwining a vision of an eerily recognizable future with old and new tales of the Golem of Prague and blending Jewish mysticism with feminism and the politics of survival, Piercy creates a fable full of fascinating Jewish women who are themselves as familiar as they are futuristic.

CYNTHIA M. BAKER

See also Feminism; Gender; Women: Ancient and Modern; Women: Biblical; Women: Status; Women's Literature: Modern and Contemporary

Women: Status

- Biale, Rachel, Women and Jewish Law: An Exploration of Women's Issues in Halakhic Sources, New York: Schocken, 1984
- Brooten, Bernadette J., Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue: Inscriptional Evidence and Background Issues (Brown Judaic Studies, no. 36), Chico, California: Scholars Press, 1982
- El-Or, Tamar, Educated and Ignorant: Ultraorthodox Jewish Women and Their World, Boulder, Colorado: Rienner, 1994
- Grossman, Susan and Rivka Haut (editors), Daughters of the King: Women and the Synagogue: A Survey of History, Halakhah, and Contemporary Realities, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1992
- Hauptman, Judith, Rereading the Rabbis: A Woman's Voice, Boulder, Colorado: Westview, 1997; Oxford: Westview, 1998
- Levitt, Laura, Jews and Feminism: The Ambivalent Search for Home, New York: Routledge, 1997
- Peskowitz, Miriam B., Spinning Fantasies: Rabbis, Gender, and History (Contraversions, 9), Berkeley, California, and London: University of California Press, 1997
- Swirski, Barbara and Marilyn P. Safir (editors), Calling the Equality Bluff: Women in Israel (Athene Series), New York: Pergamon, 1991
- Wegner, Judith Romney, Chattel or Person?: The Status of Women in the Mishnah, New York: Oxford University Press, 1988

As gender studies has emerged as a scholarly discipline and has developed ever more compelling and sophisticated questions, methods, insights, and analyses, categories such as women's "status" and "role" (once rather widely employed) have largely fallen into disuse. Thus it is that only one of the works considered here has "status" in its title—and then only in its subtitle, where it is linked to the very circumscribed domain of early rabbinic law. The rest, for the most part, reframe or reconceive that broad constellation of issues previously blanketed by the concept of status, a concept at once too amorphous and too narrow to be genuinely descriptive of the experience of (Jewish) women across ages, classes, nationalities, ethnicities, and so forth.

BROOTEN's book, despite being unattractively published as an unrevised Harvard dissertation manuscript, has achieved a wide and well-deserved readership both within and outside the academy. Brooten's thesis, that "women served as leaders in a number of synagogues during the Roman and Byzantine periods," was one of the earliest challenges to long-held assumptions about women's exclusion from positions of Jewish communal leadership in antiquity. In part one, Brooten closely examines 19 Latin and Greek inscriptions from tombs and dedicatory plaques in which Jewish women bear such titles as "leader of the synagogue," "mother of the synagogue," "elder," "leader," "fatheress," and "priest." While these inscriptions were known to scholars long before Brooten collected them in her study, each was summarily and uncritically dismissed as merely honorific—that is, unreflective of any authority or active leadership responsibility—when associated with women. The absence of compelling evidence to justify such summary dismissal is well highlighted by Brooten, who also provides insights from literary sources and non-Jewish inscriptions by which to better understand the possible meanings adhering to each title. In part two, Brooten considers related issues; most importantly she asks about the existence of separate women's galleries in ancient synagogues. Again, she demonstrates convincingly both the paucity of evidence for such separated, gendered spaces, and the almost universal presupposition on the part of archaeologists that such spaces must have existed, resulting in a systematic misreading of evidence in order to substantiate that claim. While a historian's caution precludes Brooten's ability to make any positive claims with certainty, her careful scholarship and canny skepticism make for a powerful corrective to scholarship on women driven more by stereotype than by sound analysis.

GROSSMAN and HAUT in a sense pick up where Brooten leaves off. Their book is a wide-ranging anthology spanning ages and continents, genres and disciplines. The editors divide their materials into three sections: "History," "Halakhah," and "Contemporary Realities," much of the latter given over to "Personal Vignettes" and a few newly developed rituals. All the articles are accessible to the general reader, and only a handful offer anything in the way of sustained analysis; the majority are largely descriptive. Description, in fact, is this collection's greatest strength. The reader is offered glimpses into medieval and modern synagogue practices; prayer and purity practices; halakhic and sociological trends; illiterate, semi-literate, and formally educated groups of women; and Iranian, Yemenite, Ashkenazi, hasidic, and havurah communities, among others. Inevitably, the quality of the individual pieces varies greatly, but with so many voices and perspectives included, the book presents an interesting cross-section of women within the communities they continue to build.

WEGNER's book affords a valuable resource for the study of early rabbinic texts and their formulations of women's variable legal status. Drawing on her own extensive legal training, Wegner delineates the categories of women recognized in the mishnaic system and elucidates the rationale underlying the rabbis' treatment of women as sometimes "chattel," sometimes "person." All women are persons, Wegner argues, as regards public rights and responsibilities and criminal liability. However, three categories of women (minor daughter, wife, and levirate widow) are reduced to chattel in instances in which a man's private proprietary claims to their sexuality are at issue. Wegner's thesis, although well and carefully argued, has real limitations. Her systematic and at times uncritical use of such analytic classifications as "autonomous" and "dependent," "public" and "private," and "chattel" and "person," while useful for clarifying certain important dynamics and issues, has the effect of obscuring many others of at least equal significance. In addition, despite the author's occasional nod toward questions of social practice, the unreflective and inaccurate gender stereotypes that continue to burden much scholarship on this period are widely evident here as well. The book serves as a useful point from which to enter this field of inquiry, but a broader range of analytical tools would have added greatly to its value.

Such analytical tools are employed to good effect in two subsequent books treating the same period and body of texts. HAUPTMAN proposes to read early rabbinic texts from a woman's perspective. More to the point, she reads as a professional talmudist standing squarely within that tradition and employing its native modes of analysis and argumentation. She begins by critiquing others' approaches that, to her mind, do these texts an injustice either by reading individual passages "shorn of their larger contexts" within the rabbinic corpus or by condemning their deeply patriarchal character from the standpoint of contemporary egalitarianism and social justice. The book presents an interesting mix in both its organization and agenda. The chapters are drawn partly from categories created by the mishnaic/talmudic system itself (e.g., Sotah, the suspected adulteress, and Niddah, menstrual impurity and immersion) and partly from more general legal issues in which women have a stake (e.g., the offering of testimony, rights to inheritance, ritual obligations and exemptions). Similarly, in substance, her careful and close readings of her selected texts move between naming the injustices and disabilities suffered by women within the rabbinic system of law and constructing an apologetic that holds that the rabbis introduced a number of measures "to ameliorate the lot of women" created by the received tradition of biblical legislation. Hauptman is very clear that she is not engaging in social history and that her explorations within the rabbinic legal system may well not reflect common practice of the period. At the same time, however, her arguments about the early rabbis' remedial stance often seem to presuppose practical limitations on women that are not to be found in the Torah itself. On the whole, this fine collection of studies serves as an excellent example of how the talmudic tradition contains within itself dynamic models and methods for creating improvements in women's halakhic status—and why those who continue to embrace talmudic traditions should embrace these impulses as well.

PESKOWITZ's book is, in some respects, more closely focused: it concentrates explicitly on early rabbinic texts, largely legal, involving spinning and spinners. Even so, the study has great depth and critical acuity, as it goes to the heart of questions about how gender norms and hierarchies of power are “naturalized” and rendered invisible through association with repetitive, tedious, mundane activities such as spinning and weaving. Peskowitz explores evidence from a number of literary, archaeological, and artistic sources to flesh out her reading of the rabbinic texts; and she draws on an intriguing array of current cultural studies in reflecting on the “ideological work” of storytelling and the deeply gendered process of history-writing itself.

While examining many of the rabbinic texts also considered by Wegner, Hauptman, and Peskowitz, BIALE’s project is expressly contemporary and not historical. Biale does not ask about ancient rabbinic intentions or impulses but rather organizes her book, in digest form, around issues of practical concern to halakhically observant Jewish women. These range from the performance of ritual commandments through marriage, divorce, and abandonment, to sexuality, reproductive choices, domestic violence, and rape (themes revisited and recast by Hauptman). The book’s importance is twofold. First, it provides a condensed reference source spanning centuries of debates, dissents, and legal decisions (by Jewish men) that continue to have a profound effect on the lives of many Jewish women. Second, it introduces its readers to the most basic tools of talmudic exegesis and argumentation (tools traditionally denied to women) and calls attention to vital elements of the halakhic process that may hold some promise for those such as Biale and Hauptman who seek to work within that system to promote change. While Biale is a bit too optimistic in her reading of 2,000 years of rabbinic legislation, wherein she sees “a gradual and persistent effort to redress the fundamental imbalance in power between men and women,” her book does serve as a useful primer on the long history and perpetuation of that imbalance.

In her Bar Ilan doctoral dissertation, translated from the Hebrew, EL-OR offers a candid illustration of what the exclusion of women from talmudic learning (and its attendant access to power and status in Orthodox Judaism) looks like in a contemporary haredi, or ultraorthodox, community in Israel. El-Or’s is an anthropological sketch of the lives of Gur hasidic women with particular analytical attention to the ways in which the gender-segregated educational institutions of the community work to reproduce an exclusively male authority structure wherein knowledge is validated and legitimated only through its ascription to men, while the intellectual capabilities of women are rendered invisible (and undesirable) to both men and the women themselves. El-Or considers this “education for ignorance” a paradox—one of many negotiated by the haredi community in its complicated accommodation to modernity. The paradox does not result from any illusion that education and ignorance are necessarily incompatible, but rather from the disjuncture between the clear aims of this education to keep the women intellectually resistant to non-haredi Israeli and Jewish culture while at the same time excluding them from the intellectual pursuits (talmudic study) that underpin the value system of the community. But these women are intellectually engaged and literate, asserts El-Or, and the greatest paradox, as she sees it, is that “the women use their literate ignorance as a conscious, emotional, and social means of living as educated Jewish women.”

The insights and observations of many other women in Israel are collected by SWIRSKI and SAFIR in a book whose title invokes the Israeli myth of gender equality in order to highlight just how great the social, economic, and legal disparities between men and women (as well as Jews and non-Jews, Ashkenazim and Sephardim) really are. The editors have arranged the 43 essays in this collection into seven sections. These sections address the themes of family, sex and reproduction, militarism, labor, political power, the implications of living in a “Jewish State,” the kibbutz and moshav movements, domestic and state-sanctioned violence against women, and feminism in Israel. While the essays are primarily by and about middle-class Jewish (Ashkenazi) Israelis, there are a few pieces by and about Israeli Arab and Sephardi women as well. As the editors themselves acknowledge, many voices and perspectives are missing from this collection, but it is, nonetheless, a rich compendium of biography and statistics, history and ethics, analysis and activism. It serves as an invaluable introduction to Israeli life and politics as experienced and understood by contemporary Israeli women.

LEVITT reconfigures the old question of status in yet another provocative and compelling way as she explores the gendered interplay of modern Judaism, with its troubled rabbinic legacy, and Western liberalism, with its deep investments in colonialism and assimilation. Through a series of critical and very personal readings of a broad range of texts, Levitt scrutinizes her relationship to the promises and limitations of liberalism, feminism, and Judaism—all “places” where she, the granddaughter of Eastern European Jewish immigrants, has sought to find a “home in America.” The first half of the book moves from consideration of the ketubbah (rabbinic marriage contract) and talmudic rape law, to Napoleonic legislation and Jewish responses to emancipation, to feminist critiques of the sexual contract implicit in liberal civil society and liberal Jewish theology. Part two is an ongoing conversation with Jewish and non-Jewish feminists in an attempt to make audible an explicitly Jewish voice in feminist studies.

CYNTHIA M. BAKER

See also Feminism; Gender; Women: Contemporary; Women’s Literature: Modern and Contemporary

Women’s Literature: Early Modern

- Ashkenazi, Yaakov ben Yitzchak, Tz’edah Ur’edah: The Classic Anthology of Torah Lore and Midrashic Comment (ArtScroll Judaica Classics), 3 vols., translated by Miriam Stark Zakon, Brooklyn, New York: Mesorah, 1983–1984
- Cardin, Nina Beth (editor and translator), Out of the Depths I Call to You: A Book of Prayers for the Married Jewish Woman, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1992
- Freehof, Solomon B., “Devotional Literature in the Vernacular: Judeo-German, Prior to the Reform Movement,” CCAR (Central Conference of American Rabbis) Yearbook, 33, 1923

- Klirs, Tracy Guren (compiler), The Merit of Our Mothers/Bizkhus imobes: A Bilingual Anthology of Jewish Women's Prayers, Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1992
- Segal, Agnes Romer, "Yiddish Works on Women's Commandments in the Sixteenth Century," in Studies in Yiddish Literature and Folklore (Monograph Series, 7), Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1986
- Tarnor, Norman (compiler and translator), A Book of Jewish Women's Prayers: Translations from the Yiddish, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1995
- Weissler, Chava, Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women, Boston: Beacon, 1998
- Zakutinsky, Ruth (compiler and translator), Techinas: A Voice from the Heart: "As Only a Woman Can Pray," Brooklyn, New York: Aura, 1992

Early modern Jewish women's literature (mid-16th through 18th century) is notable for a flourish of works written in Yiddish. The three major genres represented in this literature are tehinot, personal and supplicatory prayers recited by women; mitsvot nashim, compilations and digests of laws, especially those edicts incumbent primarily upon women; and translations of and commentaries on the Bible.

The tehinot served as a women's folk liturgy, and they addressed women's lives and concerns. Biblical matriarchs and heroines are invoked in the tehinot in addition to the patriarchs. Numerous tehinot were composed for Rosh Hodesh (the new month), a time known as a women's holiday. These prayers frequently emphasize adherence to the three best-known traditional duties pertaining to women—halah, tithing of dough; nidah, rules pertaining to marriage and family purity; and hadlakat ha-ner, lighting candles on the sabbath and holidays. These women's obligations are often referred to by the acronym HaNaH, and it is primarily these topics that are addressed in the mitsvot nashim. (The term HaNaH, more familiar to English readers as Hannah, is also of course the name of the biblical personality who prayed for a child in the Book of Samuel and who serves as a model of Jewish prayer.) The tehinot, mitsvot nashim, and Bible paraphrases were extremely popular and published in numerous editions. Despite their fame as women's literature, most of these works were written by men for women, with the exception of tehinot, which were composed by women as well.

Tehinot were first published in the late 16th century, and editions continue to be issued today. Thus, the time frame of these Yiddish prayers extends beyond the early modern period. The anthologies of tehinot discussed below are generally translations of mid-19th- and early 20th-century editions. Despite these publication dates, however, they include tehinot that were written far earlier. One of these earlier collections, Shas Tehine Hadoshe, compiled by Ben-Zion Alfes (1850–1940) in the early 20th century, was relied on extensively as a source of tehinot by both Norman Tarnor and Ruth Zakutinsky (although misidentified by the latter). Alfes's text also is indicative of the vitality of the genre, for he includes tehinot originally written as much as two centuries earlier as well as tehinot that he composed.

CARDIN edits, translates, and provides an introduction to a manuscript of prayers presented by the physician Giuseppe Coen to his wife Yehudit Kutscher Coen in 1786. This collection is distinctive because the prayers are in Hebrew with introductory instructions in Italian. Despite this difference, the topics addressed and the function served by these Hebrew prayers are quite similar to those of the Yiddish tehinot described above. They therefore indicate that the genre of women's prayers was alive outside the Yiddish speaking community, although the Yiddish prayers are better known and documented. Indeed, additional manuscripts of women's prayers in Hebrew from Italy are extant, and internal evidence in these manuscripts suggests that they were frequently passed down from mother to daughter.

FREEHOF's article is the pioneering English-language study of Yiddish tehinot. The introductory portions of the article explore the Jewish legal justification for the use of the vernacular in prayer and the place of spontaneous personal prayer in Judaism. These halakhic concerns are scarcely mentioned in later studies of tehinot. Thus, this initial discussion of tehinot introduces a pattern characteristic of many subsequent investigations of the genre—these studies are serious works, but they are nonetheless framed by the prevailing issues of the times in which they were written. In the case of Freehof, the questions of prayer in the vernacular and innovation in prayer were important topics on the agenda of the Reform movement. The body of Freehof's study focuses on the Seder Tefilot u-Vakashot, a standard work of tehinot initially published in the mid-18th century (further identified by Weissler in her work cited here), and Freehof includes English translations of a number of tehinot. His closing topic is the use and influence of Kabbalah on the tehinot literature.

ASHKENAZI, of Janow, Poland, wrote this text at the beginning of the 17th century. His title derives from the phrase in Song of Songs 3:11: "Go out and see [daughters of Jerusalem]." The text includes a translation of the Pentateuch, weekly Haftarot, and the Five Scrolls, intertwined with traditional commentaries and midrashic, aggadic, and mystical material written in Yiddish in a lyrical yet intimate folk style. The first known edition was published in Basel in 1622 and quickly became extremely popular, as the numerous editions subsequently published demonstrate. Known as the "taytsh humesh" (vernacular Bible), Ashkenazi's work was widely studied in Jewish households on the Sabbath, particularly by mothers with their children and by groups of women. It is now presented in its entirety in a lucid English version. This is a popular rather than a scholarly edition, which is accessible to most readers, even though it is directed at an audience with a high degree of familiarity with traditional sources. A brief glossary of Hebrew terms is appended. A more extensive list would have opened the work to a wider audience, however.

KLIRS's anthology of tehinot has its origins in her rabbinical thesis, which was revised to make it accessible to general audiences. This bilingual edition has the Yiddish text and the English translation on facing pages. The tehinot were transcribed from the original Yiddish editions and appear in a modern typeface. The volume includes a general introduction to the tehinot literature, footnotes explaining unfamiliar references, and a glossary that includes terms that may be unknown to the average reader. A selected bibliography and a list of Yiddish editions from which the tehinot were chosen are also appended to the book.

SEGAL's is the only article available in English on mitsvot nashim. These legal digests were first written c.1475 and became very popular. Versions of mitsvot nashim are currently extant both in manuscript and printed form. Segal compares three different texts written prior to 1602. (Later editions were chiefly reprints or abridgments of these three.) Mitsvot nashim were written by scholars in a readable, enjoyable, popular style. The authors sought to disseminate knowledge and insure adherence to the laws, but they emphasized that their writings applied to standard situations and that any questions that arose from particular circumstances should be referred to a rabbi. Interwoven with the legal rulings is ethical and narrative material from a wide range of Jewish literature. This feature of the mitsvot nashim exposed women to sources they would not otherwise have encountered.

TARNOR selected tehinot and translated them into English. This work contains English only and does not feature the original Yiddish texts of the tehinot. He provides a useful introduction, extensive notes, a short glossary, and a bibliography that includes the titles of the tehinot collections from which the tehinot in the book were selected. The tehinot presented here cover the Jewish daily ritual and yearly holiday cycle, as well as tehinot for special occasions—such as “To synagogue the first time after rising from childbed”—and particular requests, among them “Deliverance from bad neighbors.”

WEISLER, the leading scholar in the field, provides an excellent overview of the tehinot literature. She is the only contemporary researcher to have gone beyond translation of tehinot to in-depth analysis of them. Her book presents the tehinot in several contexts, namely related religious literature for women, women's spiritual lives, definitions of gender in Ashkenazi Jewry, and the integration of kabbalistic material into mainstream Jewish life. Translations of tehinot, including tehinot written by women, appear throughout the book to illustrate and illuminate Weissler's lively discussion of the genre. The history of the tehinot is traced from its origins through its distinct patterns of development in Eastern and Western Europe and subsequent transformation in the United States. The place of the study of tehinot in contemporary feminist scholarship is addressed, as is the much-debated issue of authorship and women's authorial involvement.

Another bilingual anthology of tehinot has been compiled and translated by ZAKUTINSKY. The book opens from right to left, in the manner of a Hebrew book. The English translation is on the left page, facing the original Yiddish texts, reset in modern typeface. In contrast to the other works discussed, Zakutinsky approaches the material as a vehicle for contemporary women's prayer (rather than study, inspiration, or contemplation). Thus, the preface advises that it is preferable to say tehinot in Yiddish rather than English, and a guide to Yiddish pronunciation is included. Although this popular work does not include a glossary, it does contain brief introductory and explanatory materials that help make the prayers accessible even to those who are not familiar with the world of traditional Judaism. Nearly half the book is devoted to tehinot for the Sabbath when the new month is blessed; the remainder includes prayers for holidays and for special occasions and situations, among them: “A baby's first tooth” and “For a stepmother.”

SHULAMITH Z. BERGER

See also Women; Women's Literature: Modern and Contemporary

Women's Literature: Modern and Contemporary

- Baskin, Judith (editor), Women of the Word: Jewish Women and Jewish Writing, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1994
- Halio, Jay and Ben Siegel (editors), Daughters of Valor: Contemporary Jewish American Women Writers, Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1997
- Lichtenstein, Diane, Writing Their Nations: The Tradition of Nineteenth-Century American Jewish Women Writers, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992
- Shapiro, Ann (editor), Jewish American Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical and Critical Sourcebook, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1994
- Sokoloff, Naomi, Anne Lapidus Lerner, and Anita Norich (editors), Gender and Text in Modern Hebrew and Yiddish Literature, New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1992

With the development of feminist literary criticism has come an increased interest in the writing of Jewish women. This interest has taken several forms: recovering the works of previously neglected Jewish women writers; seeking out the works of emerging ones; developing critical and theoretical frameworks to understand themes, languages, and styles in women's writing; and examining the role of gender in literature and popular culture.

In the first book-length application of feminist criticism and gender theory to Hebrew and Yiddish literature, SOKOLOFF, LERNER, and NORICH present a collection of essays by a group of feminist literary scholars and creative writers. Noting that the two distinct literary traditions have long been described in gendered terms—with Hebrew, the holy tongue, largely inaccessible to women, and Yiddish, the daily “mother tongue,” troped as female—the essayists discuss their interrelatedness as Jewish literature, while placing them also in the context of Western literature. In addition to providing a theoretical framework, the essays focus primarily on the works of women poets, and they also offer reflections by several contemporary women fiction writers, as well as a gender analysis of several male writers.

Taking a more historical approach and spanning a longer period of time, the essays in BASKIN explore the writing of Jewish women in a variety of languages from the Middle Ages to the present. Written by literary scholars, several of the essays focus on individual writers such as Devorah Baron, Anzia Yezierska, Cynthia Ozick, Emma Lazarus, and Maya Bejerano; others explore the image of women in different literary contexts such as medieval Hebrew literature, Yiddish literature, or the writing of S.Y. Agnon. Some of the essays explore broad themes, such as women in the Holocaust and feminism in Israeli writing.

Several studies focus on the writing of Jewish American women writers. LICHTENSTEIN explores the literary tradition of 19th-century Jewish women in America, incorporating a wide spectrum of writing, from private letters and diaries to published works by established poets and writers. Through these writings, she traces women's struggle to assert a dual identity, both Jewish and American, at a time when such multiple loyalties were considered suspect. Responding, like Jewish men, to the pressures of assimilation and additionally to the marginality of gender, Jewish women sought ways to reconcile American and Jewish culture. By constructing a hybrid image of the Jewish woman, melding the mythic ideals of the American "true woman" and the Jewish "mother in Israel," Lichtenstein shows how women's writing staked out a position at once American, Jewish, and female.

SHAPIRO argues that Jewish American women writers have been doubly marginalized, by ethnicity (or religion) and by gender, and largely left out of the American as well as the Jewish literary canon. The essays contained in this volume, written by different literary scholars and covering more than 50 individual poets, playwrights, and fiction writers, trace the development of distinctive themes, concerns, and paradigms in the works of these Jewish American women writers and document their works' critical reception.

Focusing on writing since World War II, with an emphasis on the last quarter of the 20th century, HALIO and SIEGEL's volume of essays by literary scholars traces the growing influence of Jewish American women writers. Examining fiction, drama, and poetry, as well as memoirs and criticism, the collected essays explore the ways in which a broad spectrum of authors have articulated issues connected to Judaism and gender. Topics include representations of the Holocaust in Jewish American women's writing, Jewish fiction in the multicultural context, and the place of Jewishness in writers as diverse as Erica Jong, Pauline Kael, Cynthia Ozick, Adrienne Rich, Anne Roiphe, and Wendy Wasserstein.

SARA R. HOROWITZ

See also Feminism; Gender; Women; Women's Literature: Early Modern

This page intentionally left blank

Y

Yemen and the Arabian Peninsula

- Ahroni, Reuben, Yemenite Jewry: Origins, Culture, and Literature (Jewish Literature and Culture), Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986
- Ahroni, Reuben, The Jews of the British Crown Colony of Aden: History, Culture, and Ethnic Relations (Brill's Series in Jewish Studies, vol. 12), New York: Brill, 1994
- Barer, Shlomo, The Magic Carpet, New York: Harper, and London: Secker and Warburg, 1952
- Caspi, Misha'el Masrawi, Daughters of Yemen, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985
- Klorman, Bat-Zion Eraqi, The Jews of Yemen in the Nineteenth Century: A Portrait of a Messianic Community (Brill's Series in Jewish Studies, vol. 6), New York: Brill, 1993
- Koningsveld, P. S. van, J. Sadan, and Q. Samarra'i, Yemenite Authorities and Jewish Messianism: Ahmad ibn Nasir al-Zaydi's Account of the Sabbatian Movement in Seventeenth Century Yemen and Its Aftermath, Leiden: Leiden University, Faculty of Theology, 1990
- Newby, Gordon Darnell, A History of the Jews of Arabia: From Ancient Times to Their Eclipse under Islam (Studies in Comparative Religion), Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988
- Nini, Yehuda, The Jews of Yemen, 1800–1914, Philadelphia: Harwood Academic, 1991
- Parfitt, Tudor, The Road to Redemption: The Jews of the Yemen, 1900–1950 (Brill's Series in Jewish Studies, vol. 17), New York: Brill, 1996
- Tobi, Jacob, West of Aden: A Survey of the Aden Jewish Community, Netanya: Association for Society and Culture, 1994

One of the oldest diaspora communities, the Jews of Yemen were widely spread across the country, mostly keeping traditional ways of life among the Arabs until their emigration, mainly to Israel, starting in 1892 and peaking in the 1950s. Under British rule since 1839, Adeni Jews were highly Westernized. They are one of the most researched Middle Eastern communities, and much of the published work is in Hebrew, with important scholarship in English as well.

AHRONI (1986) is a comprehensive survey of Jewish life in Yemen. Against the background of Yemen's history and socio-economic structure, Ahroni examines Yemenite Jewry from antiquity to the end of Ottoman rule in 1914. His survey starts with the biblical period, moving to postbiblical and pre-Islamic times, including the mass Judaization and the Jewish kingdoms of that period. Most of the book deals with the Muslim period: the attitude of Muhammad and Islam toward Yemenite Jews, Jewish literary activity, the impact of the Sabbatian movement on Yemenite Jewry, the exile of the Yemenite Jews to Mauza' in 1679, and developments during the 18th and 19th centuries. Based on an extensive list of publications, the book provides a succinct survey of Jewish life in Yemen through 1914.

AHRONI (1994) focuses on the British period in Aden, starting with an examination of the years preceding the 1839 British conquest. Ahroni then describes the impact of the British occupation on the Jews, the arrival of Jewish refugees from Yemen in the late 1920s and early 1930s, and Muslim-Jewish relations, including the 1932 riots. Special chapters deal with daily life, marriage and divorce, education, and the Judeo-Arabic vernacular. The impact of Zionism, especially in the 1940s, the 1947 riots, and the mass emigration are detailed. This well-researched and annotated study provides a comprehensive overview of the Adeni community.

BARER provides a contemporary description of the mass emigration of Yemeni Jews in the mid-20th century and details their move from all over Yemen to Aden, the airlift to Israel, the involvement of Israeli and other volunteers in the operation, and the arrival in Israel.

CASPI's book is a collection of Yemenite Jewish female poetry and love poetry in the original Judeo-Arabic and Hebrew with English translation. Female poetry was oral and sung at exclusively female gatherings, and it expresses the intimate feelings of women about many private issues, including their attitude toward men and their position in the community in general. Yemenite Jewish female poetry is always in the Judeo-Arabic vernacular and is highly expressive, explicit, and erotic, while men's poetry is often in Hebrew and slightly veiled when it deals with love. The collection is of value to those interested in literature, gender studies, folklore, and linguistics.

KLORMAN examines the Yemeni Jewish messianic movements of the nineteenth century in the context of Jewish and Muslim messianism in general and in Yemen in particular. The Mahdist idea in Islam is examined with reference to its manifestations in Yemen. Similarly, the Sabbatian movement is described, with emphasis on its spread in Yemen. Three 19th-century Jewish messianic movements are discussed, as are the messianic expressions in the waves of Jewish immigration to Palestine from 1881 to 1914. Focusing on this central issue for the Yemenite Jewish community helps explain its uniqueness and even how its internal structure, cultural life, and socioeconomic conditions were shaped by this preoccupation.

KONINGSVELD, SADAN, and SAMARRA'I's work provides a scholarly publication of an Arabic 17th-century text dealing with Jewish messianism in Yemen in 1666 and 1667. The Arabic text is based on oral and written Muslim sources and thus provides a unique perspective on Jewish messianism in Yemen. The book includes a survey of the text, the manuscript, the author, and his purpose. It also provides a historical survey of the waves of messianic outbursts and details of the social and legal aspects of the status of Yemenite Jews in the 17th century. This is followed by a complete translation, edition, and reproduction of the Arabic text. This is a unique opportunity to examine an important phenomenon of Yemenite Judaism as it appeared to the Muslim bystander.

NEWBY's study is a reconstruction of Arabian Jewish history up to the early Islamic period and is based mostly on Muslim sources, which were often hostile to Jews and Judaism due to Jewish resistance to Muhammad and Islam. After defining the region he intends to examine, Newby scrutinizes the legends of the beginnings of the Jewish communities in Arabia. He then discusses the Roman period with special reference to the Jewish kingdom in Yemen under Dhu Nuwas. A central part of the study is devoted to the Jews of Hejaz and the results of their encounter with Muhammad and Islam. Special attention is given to historiographic and methodological issues.

NINI's book focuses mainly on the 19th century, examining the life of the Jewish community as a minority among the Muslims. It opens with a general description of the country, its population, administration, and political developments. Against this background developments within the community are examined, with special reference to communal institutions and leaders and the messianic movements of the 19th century. Nini also examines the relations of Yemenite Jews with Jews outside Yemen and the waves of immigration to Palestine between 1881 and 1914. The study is based on archival and published sources (mostly in Hebrew) and interviews.

Following a short history of the Jews of Yemen, PARFITT focuses on the community during the 20th century. He examines the attitude of the imam and the Muslims in general toward the community, their social, economic, and cultural life, and communal organization. Special attention is paid to the worsening of conditions for the community and the mass migration to Israel through Aden at mid-century. Parfitt utilizes archival sources, including a private archive and memoirs of one of the British participants in the emigration operation, and provides very detailed information on the emigration process.

TObI's book is an insider's description of the Jewish community of Aden. Aden-born Tobi, who later immigrated to Israel and then to England, describes the history and life of the community. Following a survey of Aden and its Jews until the British conquest of 1839, Tobi examines the organization of the community and its social, economic, and cultural life, with details on the 1947 riots and the emigration that followed. Special attention is given to customs and festivals. With its lively personal description and numerous photographs and documents, this is a useful source on the community.

RACHEL SIMON

Yeshivot: Medieval

- Beinart, Haim (editor), Moreshet Sepharad/The Sephardi Legacy, 2 vols., Jerusalem: Magnes Press of Hebrew University, 1992
- Gil, Moshe, "The Babylonian Yeshivot and the Maghrib in the Early Middle Ages," Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, 57, 1990–1991
- Goitein, S.D., A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza, vol. 2: The Community, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967
- Golb, Norman, The Jews in Medieval Normandy: A Social and Intellectual History, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998
- Kanarfogel, Ephraim, "Rabbinic Authority and the Right to Open an Academy in Medieval Ashkenaz," Michael, 12, 1991
- Kanarfogel, Ephraim, Jewish Education and Society in the High Middle Ages, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1992
- Neuman, Abraham, The Jews in Spain: Their Social, Political and Cultural Life during the Middle Ages, 2 vols., Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1942
- Pick, Shlomo, "The Jewish Communities of Provence before the Expulsion of 1306," Ph.D. diss., Bar Ilan University, 1996

Every major Jewish center during the Middle Ages boasted a network of talmudic academies. The differences between the centers had to do mostly with the means by which these yeshivot were sustained, the relationship between the yeshivot and the communities including the rights and prerogatives of the academy heads, the contents of the curriculum, and the level of the students. Complicating the picture is the fact that smaller or more informal study halls or adult groups, taught by lesser known figures, often functioned in the same locale or region as more formal or better known yeshivot.

During the geonic period, there were two central academies in Babylonia (Sura and Pumbedita, both of which relocated to Baghdad toward the end of the ninth century) and a central Palestinian academy. In addition to the gaon who headed each of these academies, there was an academic hierarchy of scholars charged with fulfilling various functions. A small number of families dominated the leadership of these well-organized institutions. These academies had two main sources of income: donations, which were sent together with questions addressed to the gaon, and taxes imposed on the communities in areas considered subject to the authority of one yeshivah or another.

GIL traces the connections between the Babylonian and Palestinian yeshivot and the Jewish communities of North Africa. There was a struggle between Palestine and Babylonia for influence on these communities, with Babylonia winning out in the early 11th century. Babylonia's ascendancy may be attributed both to the perceived superiority of its scholars and to the mass migration from Babylonia to the Maghreb. Until the first half of the tenth century, the connection between Babylonia and the Maghreb was almost exclusively through the academy of Sura. Gil presents evidence for the earliest ongoing contacts with Pumbedita. He also highlights the role that the community of Kairwan in Tunisia played in copying and distributing geonic responsa and in raising funds for the academies.

Much additional information about the central Palestinian academy has come to light in material from the Cairo Genizah. In addition to presenting Genizah material on the Gaonate, GOITEIN uses the Genizah documents to sketch a picture of the social and intellectual character of the yeshivot throughout the Middle East during this period. He notes the competition for students between the central or regional schools and the local study halls and attempts to determine the sizes of these different types of schools and the ages of their students. Goitein also traces the different titles of those who administered the various yeshivot. While scientific and philosophical study was popular among Jews in the Muslim world, the yeshivot do not seem to have taught these disciplines; instead, the academies offered only a traditional curriculum of talmudic, halakhic, and biblical studies.

The transition in the 11th century from the heyday of the geonic era to the period of the Rishonim is marked by a migration of Jews to western Europe and the establishment of yeshivot there. NEUMAN, in his social and cultural history of the Jews in medieval Spain, includes a chapter on the academies there. Despite the relative decentralization of authority, many of the issues that were of concern during the geonic period remained, including the means by which to support the schools, forms of communication between major yeshivot and local study halls, and the titles and responsibilities that academy heads were to carry. Neuman traces the leading yeshivot in Spain from the Muslim period through the period of the Christian Reconquista, describing their locations and their heads. Neuman suggests that a number of academies were housed in local synagogues, and he discusses the ways that rabbinic texts were provided to students and the difficulties that occasionally arose in this endeavor.

Several studies in BEINART also deal with the yeshivot in medieval Spain, filling in a number of new details as a result of more recent research. Avraham Grossman provides a comprehensive listing of the most significant academy heads and rabbinic scholars in medieval Spain from the Muslim period through the 15th century. He discusses their works, the nature of their contributions, and the locales and impact of their yeshivot. Contrary to the picture painted by Neuman and others, Yom Tov Assis argues that support and control of the yeshivot in medieval Spain, in both economic and curricular matters, was not the responsibility of a particular city or community. Rather, these initiatives were in the hands of individual scholars and patrons, while "societies" consisting of members drawn from the community, but functioning separately, were established in order to oversee these and other social and cultural services.

KANARFOGEL (1992) focuses on the yeshivot of medieval Ashkenaz but makes a number of comparative assessments in arriving at his conclusions. Ashkenazi society, beginning with the pre-Crusade period, was reluctant to pay advanced-level Torah scholars for their study or even for teaching, except under limited conditions. Although scholars should be aided in earning their livelihoods through business or other pursuits, Ashkenazi Jewry did not even grant tax exemptions for scholars until the late Middle Ages. Andalusian Jewry, on the other hand, typically gave financial support to their scholars, and this continued through the medieval period in Spain, despite the objections of Maimonides (who did advocate tax exemptions for scholars). Spanish and Provençal academies and communities provided stipends and funding for students, while there is almost no evidence of this in Ashkenaz.

In the pre-Crusade period, the Ashkenazi yeshivot were identified with the cities in which they were located (as were the leading European monasteries). As was the case, however, in regard to the cathedral schools and their masters (beginning c.1100), the academies of the tosafists were identified primarily with the head of the academy, not the locale in which they were situated. This may also have been a function, in part, of the dialectical method that was the hallmark of the tosafist academies and that depended in large measure on the intellectual capabilities of the academy head and his students (similar, once again, to the nature of the cathedral schools). In Spain and in Provence, following the pattern of the geonic yeshivot, centers of learning remained the more prominent consideration or means of identification. Communities often appointed the academy heads in Spain, using a formal instrument for this purpose. As KANARFOGEL (1991) demonstrates, the right to open an academy in Ashkenaz was governed not by the tenets of communal government but by the halakhically defined relationship between teachers and students.

Kanarfogel (1992) provides evidence for estimating the size of the tosafist academies. These yeshivot were located, for the most part, in the home of the principal, which meant that the size of an academy probably did not exceed 25. Leading Provençal and Spanish yeshivot, which were housed in synagogues or other specially designated communal structures, appear to have been larger. In addition to discussing the parameters of tosafist dialectic, Kanarfogel shows that biblical studies were not part of the regular curriculum in the academies of high medieval Ashkenaz, which marks another change from the pre-Crusade period.

In his chapter on the yeshivot of Provence in the 12th and 13th centuries, PICK argues that the Provençal academies underwent significant change during the period. In the 12th century, yeshivot catering to the most advanced students were, for the most part, communally maintained and supported. By the end of the 13th century, the academies became more identified with the scholars who headed them, and their focus was more on the discussion of halakhic works and conclusions than on talmudic casuistry. Pick also discusses the structures in which the yeshivot may have been housed.

GOLB suggests that the yeshivot in northern France were founded and maintained by the cities and towns in which they were located. Many of the sources, however, that Golb cites in support of his contention are Spanish or Provençal. Golb also relies on Sefer Hukkei ha-Torah, a unique blueprint for setting up a system of elementary education and for the founding of advanced talmudic academies. The place (or region) of origin of this document, however, and whether or not it was actually implemented remain matters of considerable scholarly contention. Finally, Golb believes that the Jewish communal structure discovered by archaeologists at Rouen (the capital of Normandy) is the remains of the communally funded academy characteristic of northern France (rather than a mere synagogue structure), and he advances the argument that this academy was an intellectual center of considerable importance during the 12th and 13th centuries.

EPHRAIM KANARFOGEL

See also Yeshivot: Modern

Yeshivot: Modern

- Alon, Gedalyahu, "The Lithuanian Yeshivas," translated by Sid Z. Leiman in The Jewish Expression, edited by Judah Goldin, New York: Bantam, 1970
- Heilman, Samuel C., Defenders of the Faith: Inside Ultra-Orthodox Jewry, New York: Schocken, 1992
- Helmreich, William B., The World of the Yeshiva: An Intimate Portrait of Orthodox Jewry, New York: Free Press, and London: Collier Macmillan, 1982
- Lichtenstein, Aharon, "The Ideology of Hesder," Tradition, 19, Fall 1981
- Menes, Abraham, "The Yeshivot in Eastern Europe," in The Jewish People, Past and Present, vol. 2, New York: Jewish Encyclopedia Handbooks, 1955
- Solomon, Norman, The Analytic Movement: Hayyim Soloveitchik and His Circle (South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism, no. 58), Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1993

Yeshivot (singular, yeshiva) are academies for the advanced study of the Talmud and rabbinic literature. A Russian philosopher of religion once described the yeshiva as a personification of the Hegelian absolute. He was referring not merely to the extraordinary standards of knowledge and memory common among the academies' students, who paradigmatically knew the Talmud so intimately that were one to pierce a volume with a pin they were able to identify the word on each page through which the pin struck. He was also speaking of the intensity of the students' thirst for knowledge, their inner strength, and their self-sacrificing devotion to Torah study, which took priority over all other considerations. Similarly redolent of this consuming involvement, one of the characters in Chaim Grade's engrossing novel, The Yeshiva, nostalgically reminisces: "We'll never be able to get the Yeshiva out of our systems."

In his accessible study of the yeshivot in the modern period, MENES succinctly traces the revival of talmudic learning to the influence of the 18th-century Gaon of Vilna. Shortly after the Gaon's death, his disciple, Rabbi Hayim Volozhiner, founded the Volozhin Yeshiva in 1802, marking the beginning of a new epoch in the history of higher Jewish learning in Lithuania and Poland. Menes stresses that Rabbi Hayim was an able administrator, and the fact that only the best students were admitted to the yeshiva enhanced the prestige of the institution. Rabbi Hayim abolished the old custom of "eating days," which dictated that each day the student had to seek his meals in a different household. Instead, students received a modest stipend, which enabled them to live in a frugal but dignified manner. Soon, Menes demonstrates, other yeshivot adopted the model of the Volozhin Yeshiva. The author also discusses the yeshivot of the Musar movement, developed under the impetus of the 19th-century rabbi Israel Salanter Lipkin, where, in addition to the Talmud and its commentaries, moralist literature was studied and great stress was laid on the ethical factor in religious life, and he describes the leading Musar yeshiva, Keneset Yisrael in Slabodka, near Kovno, Lithuania. Photographs of some of the yeshivot and their heads enhance the essay.

ALON studied at the Slabodka Yeshiva and later taught Talmud and Jewish history at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. In this essay, which was published shortly after the destruction of the yeshivot by the Nazis, the author emphasizes that the yeshivot are not to be confused with seminaries for the training of rabbis. Rather, he identifies the primary aim of the yeshivot as the study of the Torah both for its own sake and to produce a group of learned Jews to act as a leaven that raises the standards of scholarship and piety in the community at large. In Slabodka, students used to say that "if a student prepared himself for ordination from the very start and studied the dietary laws in Yoreh Deah, you could be sure that he was neither gifted or knowledgeable in Torah." Even the followers of the Enlightenment, who aggressively criticized most traditional forms of Jewish life, sang the praises of the yeshiva students for their attachment to study and the search for truth. Alon mentions a hearsay report (happily confirmed later) that 300 students from the Mir Yeshiva, as well as fugitives from other yeshivot, had found wartime refuge in Shanghai, where they studied and taught the Torah with an even greater intensity than before. Indeed, these men plucked from the fire of the Nazi devastation were the pioneers who set up new yeshivot in the United States and, to a lesser extent, in Israel.

HELMREICH is a professor of sociology and Judaic studies at the City University of New York and an observant Jew who studied at several yeshivot. He combines four different approaches in his study of yeshivot in the United States: participant observation; in-depth interviews with the heads of the leading yeshivot, including Rabbis Moshe Feinstein (Mesivta Tifereth Yerushalayim), Shneur Kotler (Lakewood), Yitzchok Hutner (Chaim Berlin), and Joseph B. Soloveitchik (Yeshiva University); statistical information gathered from responses to a detailed questionnaire sent to the alumni of an unnamed yeshiva; and written material from a wide variety of sources, listed in the 11-page bibliography at the end of the book. The final chapters of the book consider whether the yeshivot are successful in reaching their goals. The author's answer is a guarded "yes." Helmreich concludes that the traditional yeshiva movement is here to stay. His statistical survey shows that 91 percent of yeshiva graduates continue to study the Talmud on a regular basis (two out of three do so daily), and an even greater percentage remain strictly Orthodox in their practice. The retention rate in the yeshivot is good, and the vast majority of graduates are committed to sending their children to yeshivot and to transmitting the same life pattern to the next generation. Despite Helmreich's generally sanguine appraisal, he does not overlook certain striking weaknesses and problems, two of which are particularly conspicuous: first, the exclusive emphasis in the curriculum (except at Yeshiva University) on Talmud study leaves the students deficient in such areas as Bible, Jewish history, and even in Hebrew language and grammar. Second, the opposition to secular learning in general, and college attendance in particular, fosters a feeling of insularity and smugness among the students about the superiority of their lifestyle, which is often expressed as intolerance of outsiders.

HEILMAN, an Orthodox Jewish sociologist, supplements Helmreich's study by investigating the ultraorthodox yeshivot in Israel. Heilman uses anthropological participant-observer methods to study the group from within; thus, he identifies with his subjects and their views and then steps back to examine his subjects critically but sympathetically. The study is extremely well written and free from technical jargon.

LICHTENSTEIN's essay is devoted to a type of yeshivah peculiar to the State of Israel. The hesder yeshivah reflects a special five-year arrangement through which high school graduates combine approximately 16 months of army service with advanced talmudic studies for the balance of the time. Students at these yeshivot have won the admiration of even vehemently anticlerical elements in Israeli society for their heroism in battle, and they have helped the religious community to avoid the stigma of parasitism that arises when regular yeshivah students acquire draft exemptions. At some of these hesder schools, particularly at the academy headed by Lichtenstein in Har Etzion, the level of learning is on a high plane, even if by no means comparable with the attainments common in such traditionalist Israeli yeshivot as Brisk, Hebron, or Ponevezh.

SOLOMON explicates with great success the complex methodology for talmudic studies first employed in the Lithuanian yeshivot that subsequently spread to all traditional academies of talmudic learning. At the end of the 19th century, Rabbi Hayim Soloveitchik and his circle created an impressive system of abstract concepts for understanding the Talmud and halakhah and their inner logic. Solomon compares the work of these talmudists to the analytical approach to jurisprudence first championed by John Austin in England and pursued by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in the United States and Hans Kelsen in Europe, although he detects no direct interplay of influence between the Lithuanian talmudists and these jurists. The author also contends that the method has affinities to philosophical analysis, a popular movement in Anglo-American philosophy in the middle of the 20th century that regards all philosophical problems as arising from a misuse of language and proposes that all confusions dissolve once the concepts are clearly analyzed. Many obscure passages in the Talmud do indeed become illuminated by the conceptual method that Solomon investigates. At the same time, however, the exponents of this method paid a price for their neglect of everything outside the "four ells of halakhah" and their disdain of modern historico-critical studies. Their interpretations frequently fail simple historical tests, as when Maimonides, in a responsum unknown to Rabbi Hayim Soloveitchik, anticipates a difficulty raised and cleverly resolved by the latter and explains it away as the careless mistake of a copyist, who misplaced a subordinate clause in the text of Maimonides' Code.

JACOB HABERMAN

See also Yeshivot: Medieval

Yiddish Literature

Harshav, Benjamin, The Meaning of Yiddish, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990

Liptzin, Solomon, The Maturing of Yiddish Literature, New York: David, 1970

Miron, Dan, A Traveler Disguised: A Study in the Rise of Modern Yiddish Fiction in the Nineteenth Century, New York: Schocken, 1973

Roskies, David G., A Bridge of Longing: The Lost Art of Yiddish Storytelling, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1995

Wisse, Ruth R., The Schlemiel as Modern Hero, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971

Yiddish literature has been an important part of Jewish cultural expression since the late Middle Ages when Northern European Jews began composing prose and poetry in their patois of Germanic, Hebrew, Slavic, and Romance elements. At the end of the 18th century, a distinct modern Yiddish literature diverged from old Yiddish literature. This division between the modern and the old involved content, style, and even language. Old Yiddish literature employed a stylized and crystallized Yiddish literary language that did not correspond to spoken Yiddish. Modern Yiddish literature, by contrast, employs a new literary Yiddish that is based on spoken dialects.

LIPTZIN's study presents an overview of Yiddish literature in the early 20th century, primarily between 1914 and 1939. He chronicles how Yiddish literature was invigorated by developments in the diaspora in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Liptzin discusses the various literary movements within Yiddish literature in Europe and the Western hemisphere. At the beginning of each chapter, he helpfully lists the writers associated with the city or area under discussion. He then examines particular authors, focusing on literary style, major works, and significant literary contributions. Liptzin also includes relevant discussions of the historical context and social and political situations that shaped the types of Yiddish literature produced. This agreeable survey of individual Yiddish authors and the centers of creativity (New York, Kiev, Moscow, Minsk, Warsaw) is an excellent primer for anyone interested in the heyday of modern Yiddish literature.

WISSE's theme is the literary character of the schlemiel (loser) as depicted in the Yiddish literature of the 20th century. She discusses different aspects of the evolution of this stock character as well as the particular authors who prompted the developments. According to Wisse, the schlemiel represents a coping mechanism in response to a seemingly hostile world. The graver the circumstances and the dimmer the hope, the more the schlemiel transcends those circumstances and provides a valid, albeit unconventional, interpretation of events. Thus, Wisse argues, the schlemiel is the literary hero of a people who choose not to see the world as it is, but as it should be. The study begins with a brief history of the fool in the Jewish folklore of the Middle Ages and then turns to the schlemiel's literary debut in Adalbert von Chamisso's 1813 novel Peter Schlemihl. Next, Wisse traces the deepening of the character through the works of Mendele Moykher Sforim, Sholem Aleichem, and I. I. Trunk. Wisse also addresses the impact of the Holocaust on the use of the schlemiel in the work of Isaac Bashevis Singer, the effect of Americanization on the schlemiel, and the perception of the Jew in American literature. The monograph closes with a look at the groundbreaking works of Saul Bellow and the morose, antipathetic views of the schlemiel that prevailed in the 1960s.

As a backdrop for his examination of the writing of Sholem Yankev Abramovitch, better known as Mendele Moykher Sforim (Mendele the Book Peddler), MIRON describes the literary movements among European Jews in the 19th century. The author explains that his book is about "loss and reinvention." The protagonists are those modern Jews who attempt to salvage supposedly traditional forms of culture for a non-traditional audience. Miron suggests that in this act of drawing on and modifying "traditional" forms, modern Yiddish literature is an act of "creative betrayal" that both draws from and feeds back into the collective life of the people. With great skill, he portrays the rise of Yiddish literature, paying special attention to the works of Sholem Aleichem and I.L. Peretz. After examining how Yiddish gradually supplanted Hebrew as the language of choice for many authors because of the creative freedom it offered, Miron turns to the truism that the determining characteristic of Yiddish literature is that it was written in Yiddish. He discusses the political, social, and psychological elements that made Yiddish a major literary language and highlights the scholastic and political hurdles that impeded the Yiddish literary movement.

The fundamental contribution of HARSHAV's study is his fine examination of Yiddish as a language. In the first part of the book, the author examines the history and nature of Yiddish and considers the various social, political, psychological, and etymological aspects of the language. In the second part, Harshav, like Miron, recounts the history of Yiddish literature. Harshav argues that the impetus of modern Yiddish literature came from the late-19th-century Ashkenazi enlightenment, the Haskalah, which catapulted Yiddish onto the literary stage by encouraging Ashkenazim to embrace the literary genres of their host culture and to become vital components within that culture. Prompted by the Haskalah, Jewish authors began using the Yiddish language and the poetic and prose forms current in their host culture. Harshav emphasizes the difficulties that accompanied the Yiddish writers' attempts to legitimize their use of the Yiddish language and popular writing styles. This section of the book treats European and U.S. Yiddish authors, and Harshav argues that most European authors followed the conventions of Russian poetic style, while U.S. authors attempted to develop their own distinct styles. Harshav's study concludes with an overview of the introspective movement in American Yiddish poetry, emphasizing the poetry of Jacob Glatshetyn.

ROSKIES gives a broad picture of the development of modern Yiddish literature from the stories of Nahman of Bratslav (18th century) to the work of post-Holocaust writers. In his chronological treatment of Rabbi Nahman, Isaac Meir Dik, I. L. Peretz, Sholem Aleichem, Der Nister (Pinkhes Kahanovitsh), Itzik Manger, Singer, and his fellow post-Holocaust authors, Roskies examines the sociological considerations that motivated these writers and their contemporaries to write in particular styles of Yiddish. He surveys the history of Yiddish typography, the characterization of Yiddish as the language of women and the uneducated, the ideological strife between the Haskalah and Hasidism, and the authors' struggles to validate their own use of Yiddish over Hebrew.

KEVIN EDWARD GRIFFITH

Yom Kippur see Festivals and Fasts; Sin and Atonement

Z

Zionism

- Avineri, Shlomo, The Making of Modern Zionism: Intellectual Origins of the Jewish State, New York: Basic Books, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1981
- Berkowitz, Michael, Zionist Culture and West European Jewry before the First World War, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Herzl, Theodor, Der Judenstaat, 1896; as The Jewish State, London: Nutt, 1896; New York: Maccabaeon, 1904
- Herzl, Theodor, Altneuland, 1902; translated by Lotta Levensohn as Old-New Land, New York: Bloch, 1941
- Herzl, Theodor, Theodor Herzls Tagebücher, 1895–1904, 1922; as The Diaries of Theodor Herzl, New York: Grosset and Dunlap, 1956; London: Gollancz, 1958
- Laqueur, Walter, A History of Zionism, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1972
- Mosse, George L., Confronting the Nation: Jewish and Western Nationalism (Tauber Institute for the Study of European Jewry Series, 16), Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England for Brandeis University Press, 1993
- Pinsker, Leon, Autoemancipation! Mahnruf an seine stammesgenossen von einem russischen Juden, 1882; as Auto-Emancipation, New York: Maccabaeon, 1906; London: Federation of Zionist Youth, 1937
- Reinharz, Jehuda, Chaim Weizmann (Studies in Jewish History), New York: Oxford University Press, 1985
- Reinharz, Jehuda and Walter Schatzberg (editors), The Jewish Response to German Culture: From the Enlightenment to the Second World War, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England for Clark University, 1985
- Reinharz, Jehuda and Anita Shapira (editors), Essential Papers on Zionism (Essential Papers on Jewish Studies), New York: New York University Press, 1996
- Urofsky, Melvin I., American Zionism from Herzl to the Holocaust, Garden City, New York: Anchor, 1975; London: University of Nebraska Press, 1995
- Vital, David, The Origins of Zionism, Oxford: Clarendon, 1975
- Vital, David, Zionism: The Formative Years, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1982
- Vital, David, Zionism: The Crucial Phase, New York: Oxford University Press, and Oxford: Clarendon, 1987

Zionism emerged as a political movement committed to the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine in the last decades of the 19th century, when European Jews responded both to the larger currents of romantic nationalism engulfing the continent and to rising antisemitism. Like other 19th-century European romantic nationalists who sought to ground their communal identity in a unified national culture, Zionists asserted that the new Jewish homeland would provide for a return to more pristine Jewish ways of living. As such, Zionism reinvigorated Jewish culture while also refocusing the priorities of that culture on the revival of a Jewish national consciousness. Zionism also inspired a revival of Hebrew as a literary and spoken language. With the founding of the State of Israel, a largely secular Zionist movement slowly incorporated Jewish religious elements into its self-understanding. By the 1970s, Zionism had become a virtually inseparable component of Jewish culture and identity. This essay reviews the views of two early Zionists and several works of history about the Zionist movement.

PINSKER articulates his vision of a Jewish state in response to Russia's pogroms in 1881 and 1882. Pinsker rejects assimilation as a viable response to antisemitism, contending that Jewish culture and tradition make Jews foreigners regardless of the specific European communities in which they reside. Given their unique language and history, Jews can only survive as Jews if they regain their historical sense of national dignity and establish a state to ensure their personal security. Pinsker directs Jewish nationalistic aspirations toward the political and cultural self-liberation of the Jewish community. Along with Herzl's works, Pinsker's treatise should be counted among the cornerstones of modern Zionism.

Herzl, the symbolic father of modern Zionism and an early advocate of a more secular vision of a Jewish homeland, reflects the spirit of the German-Jewish Enlightenment. In Paris as the representative of a liberal Vienna newspaper, he covered the 1894 Dreyfus Affair. Dreyfus—a model of the assimilated Jew and a proud officer of the French military, willing to die for his country—was tried and convicted of treason, a verdict that revealed to Herzl an unexpected layer of virulent antisemitism in French society. In response, he moved away from assimilation, acculturation, and conversion as possible solutions to the so-called Jewish problem. Although unaware of what Pinsker had written a decade earlier, Herzl similarly concludes that antisemitism remains an all-pervasive factor in European culture and a threat to European Jewry. As evident in HERZL (1922), Herzl felt a sense of mission and immediacy as he composed HERZL (1896), in which he places the so-called Jewish problem squarely within the arena of international politics, arguing that the normalization of the Jewish presence in the world would be possible only through the creation of a Jewish state. HERZL (1902) is a novel that envisions a utopia in which Jews cooperate in the utilization of scientific advances and natural resources.

LAQUEUR offers an effective overview of the origins and course of Zionism from the French Revolution through the creation of the State of Israel. He identifies antisemitism as the primary force behind the movement's emergence and also stresses the effects of Zionism on the Arabs. This is primarily a political history; Laqueur does not address cultural or social issues in significant depth.

VITAL's three-volume series (1975, 1982, 1987) delving into Zionism's political and institutional history follows the interpretive model of Vladimir Jabotinsky, arguing that Zionism elevated Jews from the role of objects of history to that of historical actors who guide and shape their own future. Vital's analysis of political issues is considerably deeper than Laqueur's, but like Laqueur, Vital places little emphasis on cultural and intellectual trends. Nevertheless, Vital's work is still considered the classic among overviews of the history of political Zionism.

REINHARZ and SHAPIRA present a massive collection of 31 articles that describe Zionism as a national movement with clear ideological origins, demonstrating that as the movement rejected the Uganda solution, it also distanced itself from the idea of the diaspora. The volume also shows how Zionism's modest successes in Europe in the early 20th century did not prevent splits within the movement or its Americanization, and it explains that Zionism in the land of Israel differed from its European and American counterparts on the question of how to transform long-held national myths into an authentic Jewish state. Five articles explore the Zionists' conflict with the British and Arabs regarding plans for the future of Palestine, and the final four chapters address the emergence of a new and unique Hebrew culture in Palestine.

REINHARZ and SCHATZBERG offer 17 essays that explore Jewish responses to changes in German culture from the Enlightenment through the Second World War; collectively, they provide important background for the history of Zionism. The opening essays outline the attempts by German Jews to assimilate into German society. While Emancipation allowed the possibility of a respectable place within society, German Jews coupled German Bildung with social respectability. Within German Jewry, concerted efforts were made to minimize those aspects of Jewish tradition that alienated Jews from German culture and society. Yet as quickly as German Jewry adapted new modes of defining its identity, antisemitic trends in German culture increasingly viewed Jews as social outsiders. Thus, Zionism took hold as some Jews realized the failure of their attempts at assimilation and became motivated to look for new options.

AVINERI's inquiry into the intellectual origins of modern Zionism traces its evolution through the lives of 17 leading Zionists. Beginning with Nachman Krochmal and Heinrich Graetz, European Jewry recovered its sense as a historical force. As Jewish nationalists toyed with contemporary political ideologies and movements, Jewish intellectuals responded to the challenges of modernity, the Enlightenment, and Jewish tradition. Drawing from Pinsker's idea of self-emancipation and Herzl's vision of a Jewish state, some Zionist thinkers placed European Jewry at the crux of a crisis of Western civilization. Nachman Syrkin, Ber Borochov, and Aharon David Gordon reflected the attitudes of Eastern European Jewry and gravitated toward the ideologies of the political left, while Asher Ginzberg, Yehiel Michal Pines, and the more religiously inclined, mingled political Zionism with a sense that the creation of a Jewish state would also be a form of religious fulfillment. Avineri brings Zionism into contemporary history with a discussion of David Ben-Gurion, a leader willing to be ruthless in his pursuit of the power necessary to realize the goals of the Zionist movement. A political pragmatist, Ben-Gurion sought the diplomatic and military alliances in the international arena that would further the realization of Zionist objectives and then protect the nascent Israeli state. In conclusion, Avineri regards Zionism as a permanent revolution: revolutionary in its impact on Jewish identity and permanent in its continued emphasis on Jewish distinctiveness.

MOSSE uses a sophisticated cultural-intellectual perspective to guide his analysis of the interplay of European Jewry and rising nationalism. Within 12 short essays, Mosse traces the rise of European nationalism from the French Revolution through its emergence as the new secular religion. Anchored in Enlightenment thought and pursuing assimilation through education, Western European Jewry failed to recognize that the rise of the German Nazi party was part of a larger shift in European civilization toward anti-intellectualism. Similarly, most European Jews did not sufficiently realize that in an increasingly insecure world, their more humanistic liberalism was at odds with the secular ideologies of the Italian Futurist movement and U.S. culture in general (both of which lauded modern technologies and materialism as symbols of prosperity and power). However, two Zionists of successive generations, Max Nordau and Gershom Scholem, were well aware of the growing gap between Jews and their surrounding societies, and they presented within their studies of Jewish history, culture, and religion a vision of Jewish nationalism that avoided the pitfalls of European nationalism by preserving liberal values. While Mosse's work may not seem as directly related to the rise of political Zionism as the studies of the previously mentioned authors, his careful weaving together of European and Jewish cultural-intellectual history provides a dynamic and original interpretation of the context from which Zionism emerged.

BERKOWITZ focuses on the Zionist movements in Central and Western Europe from 1897 to 1914, stressing their efforts to bring conceptions of Jewish identity closer to the Zionist program. Specifically, Zionists emphasized their commitment to revitalizing Jewish uniqueness, and they integrated middle-class European Jewry's nationalism and hopes for full emancipation with the call for a modernized humanist Judaism. It was this combination of politics and culture within the Zionist ideology that eventually sufficed to motivate Western European Jewry to celebrate the renaissance of Jewish nationalism and to welcome calls for a Jewish state in Palestine.

REINHARZ's well-documented biography of Chaim Weizmann uses a vast array of resources, including personal correspondence, speeches, and press accounts, to follow Weizmann from his emergence as a Zionist leader through his role as Israel's first president. In this important political history, Reinhartz describes Weizmann's careful efforts to balance relationships among the leading Zionist personalities involved in the formation of a Jewish state, as well as among Zionist and British policy makers.

UROFSKY turns his talents toward a study of Zionism in the United States and the role played by Louis D. Brandeis in the U.S. movement. Brandeis directed U.S. Zionism to provide financial, moral, and political support for Jewish settlement in Palestine, but—unlike Weizmann—he did little to recruit those seeking to settle in Palestine. As Urofsky interprets it, American Zionism lacked ideological depth. The distance between American and continental European Zionism grew as Europeans criticized the unwillingness of Jews in the United States to break ties with American culture and become more physically involved in the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. European Zionists did not understand that their U.S. counterparts perceived a vicarious Zionism to be a means of preserving both a Jewish and an American identity, without violating their commitment to the creation of a Jewish state.

DAVID MEIER

See also Israel, State of: Judaism in; Kibbutz; Zionism, Labor; Zionism, Revisionist

Zionism, Labor

Cohen, Mitchell, Zion and State: Nation, Class, and the Shaping of Modern Israel, Oxford and New York: Blackwell, 1987

Kimmerling, Baruch, Zionism and Economy, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Schenkman, 1983

Lockman, Zachary, Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine, 1906–1948, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996

Merhav, Peretz, The Israeli Left: History, Problems, Documents, San Diego, California: Barnes, and London: Tantivy, 1980

Preuss, Walter, The Jewish Labour Movement in Palestine: Its Aims and Achievements, Berlin: Verbandsbüro Po'alei Zion, 1928

Preuss, Walter, The Labour Movement in Israel: Past and Present, Jerusalem: Mass, 1965

Shafir, Gershon, Land, Labor, and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914 (Cambridge Middle East Library, 20), Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989; updated edition, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996

Shalev, Michael, Labour and the Political Economy in Israel (Library of Political Economy), Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992

If the aim of Zionism was to revive a Jewish national life in Palestine, its realization would have been impossible without the concomitant establishment of a viable Jewish economic life in the country. Unlike most other settler movements, which received economic and military support from colonial rulers, Jewish immigrants were forced to develop their own socioeconomic structures to ensure the burgeoning yishuv's survival and growth. The labor movement played a decisive role in this process, substantially establishing the Jewish economic and security systems first of pre-1948 Palestine and then of Israel.

PREUSS (1928) is a monograph produced for the left-wing Po'alei Zion movement. It describes the labor movement's understanding of Palestine and its indigenous population, which would play a determinant role in the evolution of labor Zionist ideology and practice. The tract explains "the importance of colonizing and opening up new countries by means of labor and not by exploitation. . . . The settlement of backward and undeveloped countries is an integral part of upbuilding a socialist commonwealth."

PREUSS (1965) similarly contends that Palestine's condition as "sparsely populated and neglected" meant that from the beginning "conventional methods of class warfare were inadequate." The goal of the labor movement in the 1920s, then, was to build a new Jewish commonwealth that would ensure for the entire population "a decent existence and maintenance . . . of the civilized standards [of] Eastern Europe."

This combined socialist and colonial ideology profoundly influenced the construction of Zionist, and subsequently Israeli, national identities. Yet their conflation and the effect on pre- and post-1948 policies were not examined by scholars until recently.

For example, MERHAV offers a detailed history of the various components of the Zionist and Israeli "Left," moving chronologically from the foundations of the labor movement in the diaspora through the establishment, union, and dissolution of the numerous parties that emerged in Palestine during the late Ottoman and Mandate periods and finally ending with the gradual demise of labor hegemony in post-1948 Israel, epitomized by the victory of the Likud in 1977. Merhav's analysis attempts to elucidate the lines of development and stages of consolidation of the labor movement, in particular the trend by the Ahdut ha-Avodah and later Mapai parties toward "reformism" and the compromise of socialist principles for the sake of party unity. Yet Merhav's general avoidance of discussing the Left's conflictual relationship with either its main economic competitor, the Palestinian Arab workers, or its primary ideological adversary, the Revisionist movement, means that the reader cannot contextualize or prioritize the wealth of details presented in his descriptive analysis.

Such lacunae are partially addressed by COHEN, whose central thesis is that the well-known political triumph of the labor movement in the 1930s was accompanied by a self-transformation crucial for shaping the future of Israeli politics in the post-1948 period, that is, the "reification" of the state by the Labor leadership (the term is borrowed from Georg Lukács's reading of Marx). This process was epitomized by Ben-Gurion's concept of mamlakhtiyut, which symbolized the move from a desire to create an am oved, or working nation in its own state, to the idea of a state standing above all classes as a “thing unto itself.”

Under Ben-Gurion’s leadership, statism dominated the labor movement, which, with the Histadrut as its “state” apparatus, identified itself with the state rather than identifying the nation’s interests with those of the working class. Concomitant with this reification of the state was the positioning of the army as the “key mediator between the individual and the state and society,” a development prompted by the centrality of the discourse of security in Zionist and then Israeli politics after 1936. Even more, Ben-Gurion posited that only the army could play the vital role of educating and socializing immigrants from dozens of countries into citizens of a new Israeli nation. In Cohen’s view, the ideology of mamlakhtiyut sowed the seeds for labor’s later defeat by the Right in 1977, which can be understood as the natural realization of the militant, statist worldview that Ben-Gurion’s labor and Jabotinsky’s “revisionist” ideologies shared, despite their differences in strategy.

If a central tenet of Ben-Gurion’s statism was the paramount importance of security, Shafir and Lockman help us understand how the security discourse arose out of the economic competition between Jewish and Arab workers and its relationship to the land question in Palestine. SHAFIR’s analysis focuses on the period before World War I, which he sees as the formative period for the ideologies and practices underlying both the Israeli and the Palestinian national movements. His thesis is that before they could exert authority over the growing Zionist community, the agricultural pioneers who would lead the labor movement first had to crystallize their own method of state and nation formation during the period from 1882 to 1914. His investigation demonstrates that the “militant, exclusivist nationalism” that ultimately characterized labor Zionism evolved specifically out of several simultaneous struggles on the behalf of Jewish workers: against the difficulties of adapting to strenuous agricultural labor, against the low wages paid by the Jewish planters, and against the Palestinian workers who accepted wages far below what most Jews could endure. Out of these struggles the concept of “Kibush Avodah,” or the “Conquest of Labor,” was born.

When by 1909 the Conquest of Labor proved to be an “abysmal failure,” the labor movement transformed the object of conquest from the labor market to the land itself. With this new focus on land as the prerequisite for building a socialist Jewish economy, the kibbutz emerged as a primary device for conquering both land and labor for Jews. Shafir’s analysis reveals that the two primary conflicts between Arabs and Jews before 1948—labor and land—had their roots in the incipient Zionist labor movement’s struggle for survival.

Picking up on Shafir’s insights, LOCKMAN attempts to construct a “relational history” of Jews and Arabs in Palestine/Israel, that is, a history that understands that through “mutually formative interactions” both Jewish and Arab communities “shaped one another in complex ways and at many levels.” Specifically, Lockman examines the often simultaneously conflictual and cooperative relationship between the Jewish labor movement and the Arab working class (in particular, between Arab and Jewish railway workers), comparing the reality of Arab-Jewish relations to the rhetoric of the Zionist labor leadership and the “conquest of labor,” as well as analyzing evolving “security” strategies in the wake of the Arab revolt of 1936 to 1939.

By explaining the relationship between labor Zionist and colonial discourses, Lockman helps us understand the ideology underlying the earlier studies presented above. He argues that a colonialist understanding of Palestine as being “neglected” and its native inhabitants as being “backward” has combined with the language of socialism, class struggle, and international working-class solidarity to create the contradictory (socialist and nationalist) impulses of labor Zionism that to this day characterize the movement’s socioeconomic policies and its stances on peace and security.

Kimmerling and Shalev combine the sociological and historiographic approaches of Shafir and Lockman with econometric analyses of the Zionist/Israeli economies during the pre- and post-1948 periods. In so doing, these two authors help us understand the economic ramifications of labor Zionist ideology and policies over time, and they illuminate how evolving economic realities (both internal and worldwide trends) led to fundamental changes in both.

KIMMERLING examines how the Zionist movement managed to accomplish its major goal of establishing a Jewish state despite its “economic nonviability” in comparison to other immigrant-settler societies. Kimmerling analyzes the main streams of Zionist economic ideology and their interaction with the actual economic reality in Palestine/Israel by discussing the processes of change that occurred in Israeli society as it shifted from a model of economic activity anchored in Zionist ideology and the needs of state-building to an economy based on increased industrialization in the decades after achieving sovereignty.

The author begins by explaining that the early labor Zionist “pioneering economy” was distinguished from the economies of other colonial movements because the Zionists lacked abundant and inexpensive land and faced ideological constraints on exploiting the cheap local labor. Kimmerling then shows how this type of economic regime affected the influx of Jewish capital to the country and the resulting development of both the Arab and Jewish sectors of the economy during the Mandate period, particularly through the transfer of this Jewish capital to the Arab sector through land purchases and employment. (Despite labor Zionism’s ideological opposition to employing Arab labor, Arabs constituted a significant percentage of the Jewish economy’s workforce until 1936.) He also discusses how the Jewish socioeconomic system’s dependence on exchange with the Arab sector led Arab leaders to engage in “economic warfare” against Jews in order to cripple the Jewish economy. Like labor Zionism’s exclusivist ideology, the attempts to seal off the Arab economy did not achieve long-term success.

The second half of the book examines how sovereignty changed the dynamics of both labor Zionist ideology and the Israeli economy. Like Cohen, Kimmerling discusses the importance of statism for constructing a role for the state as a “rich father,” tightly controlling disbursement of the postindependence inflow of foreign capital. Funds were coming from immigrants, the floating of bonds and loans, diaspora contributions, German reparations, and the like, and the state began to act as an “economic (institutional) entrepreneur that tried to develop the economy and to administer a social policy” through selective investments in the private sector. Kimmerling concludes his study by examining the far-reaching changes that occurred in the kibbutz system in the era of sovereignty, particularly the industrialization of the kibbutz economy. This economic change led to a dimming of the ideological role of the kibbutz in Israeli society from its earlier position as “the most original creation of the Zionist enterprise,” with its emphasis on building an egalitarian society based on productive physical labor (all of which centered around agriculture). The 1977 Likud victory and the subsequent liberalization and consumerization of the economy signified the diminishing status of the kibbutz and the Labor party hegemony which supported it.

SHALEV provides perhaps the most in-depth analysis of the relationship between labor ideology and economic policy available in English or Hebrew. In line with the methodological focus on labor unions and parties underlying the “new political economy,” the book focuses exclusively on the history and policies of the Histadrut and the Mapai party. Shalev begins by addressing how and why the Histadrut deviated from European models of labor organization, particularly in its concern for the realization of national interests in the rural sector rather than the class interests of urban wage-earners. The imbrication of the concerns of labor with Zionist policy demonstrates that the economic dynamics of the meeting between Arabs and Jews in the labor market set into motion both Jewish labor exclusivism and ethnic tension between the two communities. Like Shafir, Shalev finds that these developments began around 1908 as the image of the Jewish laborers underwent ideological transformation from that of wage-earners competing with Arabs to that of settlers struggling to acquire territory.

Shalev also explains why, after 1948, the Arab minority (and, later, Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza) became incorporated into a segmented labor system rather than participating in a labor market based on upward mobility and full integration. He attributes the emergent labor policies as much to the pursuance by the Histadrut of its perceived labor-market interests as to continued national hostility toward Arabs. The author next evaluates the historical dominance of the Mapai party, attributing its central role to the extensive overlap between the interests of the working and middle classes, the relatively small role of private capital in the Jewish/Israeli economy, and the Mapai’s focus on territorial and military expansionism in the postsovereignty era. He concludes that the economic crises of the 1960s and 1970s, along with the incorporation of the Occupied Territories and subsequent militarization of the Israeli economy after 1967, gradually led to changes in economic and political policy and, particularly, to the weakening of the state economy vis-à-vis both domestic business interests and foreign trends. These developments, in turn, weakened the hegemony of both the Histadrut and the Mapai party. In this way, Shalev demonstrates the determinative roles played by both national conflict and worldwide economic developments in the political economy of pre- and postsovereignty Israel.

MARK LEVINE

Zionism, Revisionist

Katz, Shmuel, Lone Wolf: A Biography of Vladimir (Ze'ev) Jabotinsky, 2 vols., New York: Barricade, 1996

Laqueur, Walter, “In Blood and Fire: Jabotinsky and Revisionism,” in his A History of Zionism, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1972; reprinted with a new introduction, New York: Schocken Books, 1989

Schechtman, Joseph B., The Vladimir Jabotinsky Story, vol. 1: Rebel and Stateman: The Early Years, New York: Yoseloff, 1956, and vol. 2: Fighter and Prophet: The Last Years, New York: Yoseloff, 1961

Schechtman, Joseph B. and Yehuda Benari, History of the Revisionist Movement, vol.1: 1925–1930, Tel-Aviv: Hadar, 1970

Shapiro, Yonathan, The Road to Power: Herut Party in Israel, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991

Shavit, Jacob, Jabotinsky and the Revisionist Movement, 1925–1948, London and Totowa, New Jersey: Cass, 1988

Weinbaum, Laurence, A Marriage of Convenience: The New Zionist Organization and the Polish Government 1936–1939 (East European Monographs, no. 369), New York: Columbia University Press, 1993

Revisionist Zionism began in 1925 as a militant faction within the international Zionist movement. Revisionism’s founder, the Russian Zionist orator Vladimir Ze’ev Jabotinsky, called for a revision of the Zionist movement’s strategy for achieving a Jewish national home in Palestine, a strategy he regarded as excessively cautious. Jabotinsky’s dissatisfaction with the Zionist leadership’s responses to Palestinian Arab violence and British policy in Palestine led to the secession of the Revisionists from the Zionist movement in 1935. After Jabotinsky’s death, his followers spearheaded the armed Jewish revolt against British forces in Palestine from 1944 to 1947. They subsequently entered the political arena as the Herut Party, forerunner of the contemporary Likud Party in Israel.

The early historiography of Revisionism was the work of movement veterans who tended to portray its activities in uncritical terms. SCHECHTMAN’s two-volume biography of Jabotinsky, followed by SCHECHTMAN and BENARI, the first volume of a projected two-volume history of Revisionism (the second volume never appeared), offers a view of the Zionist firebrand and his movement through the eyes of one of his former senior aides. According to Schechtman and Benari, the Revisionists are scorned prophets: if heeded, Jabotinsky’s pleas to European Jewry to emigrate en masse to Palestine during the 1930s would have preempted the Holocaust; the Revisionists’ early skepticism regarding British intentions was borne out by the subsequent shifts in British policy against Zionism; and the Revisionists’ advocacy of a more forceful approach to Palestinian Arab hostility, if adopted, would have checked the violent Arab outbreaks of the 1920s and 1930s. As for the fate of the movement itself, Schechtman and Benari maintain that the Revisionists might well have been elected to lead the world Zionist movement if not for the widely publicized, although ultimately unproved, accusations that several of their members were involved in the assassination of Labor Zionist leader Haim Arlosoroff in 1933, at the pinnacle of Revisionism's popularity.

The first serious critique of the Revisionist movement was that of LAQUEUR. He agrees that Revisionism had strong appeal in the Jewish world, especially among East European Jewish youth. Laqueur further notes that in retrospect there is no doubt the movement "recognized certain basic facts [about Palestine and the situation of European Jewry] earlier and more clearly than other Zionist parties." At the same time, while absolving Jabotinsky himself of his rivals' accusations of fascism, Laqueur is critical of what he regards as "the fascist aberrations of some of his followers," which in Laqueur's view Jabotinsky made no serious effort to combat. Laqueur also takes the Revisionists to task for criticizing British rule in Palestine while offering no alternative allies to whom the Zionist movement might turn.

A partial rejoinder to the latter point is the finding of WEINBAUM that the secret alliance between the Revisionists and the Polish government between 1936 and 1939 resulted in Polish military assistance to the Revisionists' militant underground, as well as Polish aid for Revisionist transports of unauthorized Polish Jewish immigrants to Palestine in defiance of British quota restrictions.

Laqueur concludes that Revisionism, whatever its achievements, is little more than a relic of the Zionist past. While other Zionist factions went on to become a part of contemporary Israeli political culture, "the history of revisionism ends with the death of the leader," he writes. "Jabotinsky left no clear message to be readily applied in the world of the 1970s."

Later historians saw Jabotinsky's legacy in a different light, especially after Jabotinsky's disciples, the Likud Party, were for the first time elected to power in Israel in 1977, five years after Laqueur's assessment appeared. SHAVIT, in contrast to Laqueur, asserts that "no Zionist leader continues to be as relevant for his followers as does Jabotinsky." In Shavit's view, Revisionism "produced a deep-rooted and organic political tradition" that, while for several decades confined to the political opposition, eventually emerged victorious and "became a part of the mainstream of the prevailing Israeli political and ideological reality."

On the specific points of historical controversy, Shavit falls somewhere between Schechtman and Laqueur. Shavit is less convinced than Laqueur as to the influence of fascism within the Revisionist rank and file, regarding the alleged parallels between the Revisionists and European fascists as superficial. At the same time, Shavit finds far less merit than Schechtman in the specifics of the Revisionist platform. "Revisionism offered Zionism a way it could not possibly follow," Shavit contends, maintaining that the gradual building of a Palestinian Jewish society, rather than a political or military struggle or immediate mass immigration, was the key to the realization of Zionist goals.

In SHAPIRO's analysis of the evolution of the Revisionists' Herut Party and the factors leading to its electoral triumph in 1977, the pre-World War II European nationalist movements are said to have been of decisive influence in the shaping of Revisionism. While not quite branding Revisionism fascist, Shapiro contends that Polish nationalism was the model for the development of the Revisionist movement into a "leader party," centered first around Jabotinsky and later Menahem Begin. After Israel's creation in 1948, Herut refrained from developing the favor-doling bureaucracy typical of Israeli political parties and instead emphasized what Shapiro calls "status politics," appealing to those who felt politically or culturally excluded from the Israeli ruling establishment. In the 1970s Herut's regular constituency was supplemented by large numbers of Sephardi Jews—immigrants and children of immigrants from Arab countries—who had suffered discrimination at the hands of the ruling Labor Party. This alliance of traditional Revisionists and Sephardim propelled Jabotinsky's heirs to power.

Although KATZ, like Schechtman, is an alumnus of the Revisionist movement, his 1996 biography of Jabotinsky is a far more serious work of scholarship than Schechtman's, utilizing a wealth of original documents from archives on several continents and covering many aspects of Jabotinsky's life that Schechtman missed. While Schechtman is loath to criticize the Revisionist leader, Katz is more objective and does not mind pointing out Jabotinsky's failings, although he does not find very many of them. Katz believes that historical events such as the Holocaust, Britain's turn against Zionism, and Arab belligerency vindicate the Revisionist view of the Jewish people as trapped in a hostile world where survival has always depended upon strength and assertiveness.

RAFAEL MEDOFF

Zohar

- Dan, Joseph, The Zohar and Its Generation (Jerusalem Studies in Jewish Thought, vol. 8), Jerusalem: Magnes, 1989
- Giller, Pinchas, The Enlightened Will Shine: Symbolization and Theurgy in the Later Strata of the Zohar (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993
- Huss, Boaz, "Sefer ha-Zohar as a Canonical, Sacred and Holy Text: Changing Perspectives of the Book of Splendor between the Thirteenth and Eighteenth Centuries," Journal of Jewish Thought and Philosophy, 7, 1997
- Liebes, Yehuda, Studies in the Zohar (SUNY Series in Judaica), Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993
- Scholem, Gershom, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (Hilda Stroom Lectures), New York: Schocken, 1941; 3rd edition, New York: Schocken, 1954; London: Thames and Hudson, 1955
- Tishby, Isaiah and Yeruham Fishel Lachower, Mishnat ha-Zohar, 1949; translated by David Goldstein as The Wisdom of the Zohar (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989

The Zohar is the most important work in Jewish mysticism. Widely circulated in esoteric circles in the Middle Ages and very generally accepted as canonical or sacred among the majority of the world's Jews from the Renaissance through the 19th century, its teachings formed the basis of most subsequent Jewish mysticism. The Zohar is not a single work but a collection of some two dozen separate compositions, comprising in published editions more than 1,200 folios of densely printed Aramaic text. Modern scholars of Kabbalah, such as Gershom Scholem and Isaiah Tishby, posit a process of literary development that can be charted from the confusion of the Zohar's structure. According to this "documentary hypothesis," the mysticism of the Zohar developed from a system based in philosophy to one based in theosophy.

Scholem's earliest research on the Zohar dealt with whether Moses de Leon wrote the Zohar and suggested, idealistically perhaps, that the work's origins were in antiquity and not at the hand of that 13th-century Castilian mystic. Only later did Scholem conclude that de Leon composed the whole text. The essay "The Zohar: The Book and Its Author" in SCHOLEM analyzes the trail of linguistic mistakes and anachronisms that make clear the work's late origins. Busy explaining de Leon's literary method, Scholem neglected to do justice to him as a towering spiritual and artistic genius of the Middle Ages. Scholem maintains that de Leon wrote the main sections of the Zohar, then composed the Hebrew writings for which he claimed authorship. In this way, Scholem explains these works' references to the Zohar.

In his introduction to TISHBY and LACHOWER, Tishby was able to conclude to the contrary that the Zohar was largely written after the Hebrew works of de Leon. This monumental two-volume thematic systematization of the Zohar includes extensive topical introductions to the book's major preoccupations and provides excellent translations of a number of its sections. Tishby's introductions to every section are among the most cogent treatments of kabbalistic material available in English.

LIEBES has made a strong case for multiple authorship of a number of compositions originally credited to Moses de Leon. Liebes associates the origins of this circle of mystics with the gnostic kabbalists of Castile: Bahya ben Asher, Joseph ben Shalom Ashkenazi, and Todros Abulafia. Beyond this analysis, Liebes emphasizes the extent to which the Zohar's authors lost their own identities in the process of developing a new romantic mythos that linked the Galilean mystics of talmudic antiquity directly with the coming messianic age. Liebes also includes English translations of two of his most important articles, "The Messiah of the Zohar" and "How Was the Zohar Written?" In these articles, Liebes addresses issues of the Zohar's authorship, the dominant themes therein, and the underlying rationale for its pseudepigraphical nature.

There has been a flowering of advanced Zohar scholarship in recent years, much of which is encapsulated in DAN, which appears as a volume of the journal Jerusalem Studies in Jewish Thought, itself one of the most important venues for relevant scholarship in the last three decades. While most of the contributions to Dan's volume are in Hebrew, these are briefly summarized by Dan in his introduction. Among the important studies published in English in this volume are those by Ronald Kiener on Islam in the Zohar, Stephen Benin on Christian parallels to the Zohar's conception of divine passibility, and Mark Verman on 13th-century kabbalistic practice prior to the appearance of the Zohar.

HUSS addresses the ways in which the Zohar gained status as an essential sacred text in Judaism. GILLER addresses a number of themes in the Zohar's later sections. Both of these works trace the movement of the Zohar from the margins of the Jewish literary heritage to its center.

PINCHAS GILLER

Zoroastrianism and Judaism see Dualism

This page intentionally left blank

INDEXES

This page intentionally left blank

BOOKLIST INDEX

Books and articles discussed in the entries are listed here by author/editor name. The page numbers refer to the booklists themselves, where full publication information is given.

- Abegg, Martin, The Dead Sea Scrolls, 136
 Abella, Irving, A Coat of Many Colours, 100
 Abella, Irving, None Is Too Many, 100
 Aberbach, David, At the Handles of the Lock, 9
 Aberbach, David, Bialik, 72
 Aberbach, David, Realism, Caricature, and Bias, 402
 Abitbol, Michel, The Jews of North Africa during the Second World War, 454
 Abraham, A.S., The Dying Patient and Euthanasia, 171
 Abraham, A.S., Medical Halachah for Everyone, 87
 Abraham, Margaret, Ethnic Identity and Marginality, 288
 Abrahams, Beth-Zion, The Life of Gluckel of Hameln, 1646–1724, Written by Herself, 211
 Abrahams, Israel, The Birth of a Community, 571
 Abrahams, Israel, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, 103
 Abrahams, Israel, Maimonides, 423
 Abramovich, H., In Search of the Sadiq, 610
 Abrams, Daniel, From Germany to Spain, 456
 Abramson, Glenda, The Great Transition, 236
 Abramson, Glenda, Tradition and Trauma, 9
 Abravanel, Isaac, Principles of Faith/Rosh Amanah, 2, 148
 Abulafia, Anna Sapiir, The Interrelationship between the Hebrew Chronicles on the First Crusade, 130
 Ackroyd, Peter R., Israel's Prophetic Tradition, 30
 Adar, Zvi, Jewish Education in Israel and in the United States, 157
 Adelman, Howard, Is Jewish Studies Ethnic?, 315
 Adelman, Howard, The Jewish Language, 157
 Adelman, Howard, The Jewish People, 157
 Adelman, Howard, New Light on the Life and Writings of Leon Modena, 416
 Adin, Yehuda, Chaim Weizmann, 614
 Adler, Elkan Nathan, Jewish Travellers, 599, 610
 Adler, Hermann, The Baal Shem of London, 57
 Adler, Israel, Musical Life and Traditions of the Portuguese Jewish Community of Amsterdam in the XVIIIth Century, 438
 Adler, Israel, The Study of Jewish Music, 438
 Adler, Jacques, The Jews of Paris and the Final Solution, 190
 Adler, Rachel, Engendering Judaism, 182, 526
 Adorno, Theodor W., Dialectic of Enlightenment, 48
 Agnon, Shmuel Yosef, Days of Awe, 185
 Agus, Irving, The Heroic Age of Franco-German Jewry, 46, 205, 209
 Agus, Irving, Rabbi Meir of Rothenberg, 51, 512
 Agus, Irving, Urban Civilization in Pre-Crusader Europe, 227
 Agus, Jacob, Banner of Jerusalem, 346
 Agus, Jacob, Guideposts in Modern Judaism, 568
 Agus, Ronald E., The Binding of Isaac and Messiah, 396
 Aharoni, Yohanan, The Land of the Bible, 344
 Aharoni, Yohanan, The Macmillan Bible Atlas, 74, 520
 Ahlström, Gösta W., The History of Ancient Palestine, 250
 Ahmad, Barakat, Muhammad and the Jews, 428
 Ahroni, Reuben, The Jews of the British Crown Colony of Aden, 356, 637
 Ahroni, Reuben, Yemenite Jewry, 637
 Albert, Phyllis Cohen, The Modernization of French Jewry, 190
 Alcalay, Ammiel, After Jews and Arabs, 517
 Alderman, Geoffrey, The Jewish Community in British Politics, 381
 Alderman, Geoffrey, London Jewry and London Politics, 1889–1986, 381
 Alderman, Geoffrey, Modern British Jewry, 221, 381
 Aldred, Cyril, The Egyptians, 20
 Aleksandrov, G.S., The Role of Aqiba in the Bar Kokhba Rebellion, 14
 Alexander, Philip S., Artifact and Text, 91
 Alexander, Sidney, Marc Chagall, 106
 Alexander, Tamar, A Judeo-Spanish Traditional Play (Salonica, 1932), 351
 Alexander, Tamar, Judah the Pious as a Legendary Figure, 57
 Allen, Leslie C., Psalms 101–150, 508
 Allison, Henry E., Benedict de Spinoza, 573
 Allony, Nehemiah, The Reaction of Moses Ibn Ezra to 'Arabiyya, 280
 Alon, Gedalia, The Jews in Their Land in the Talmudic Age, 253, 318, 465
 Alon, Gedalia, Jews, Judaism, and the Classical World, 317
 Alon, Gedalia, The Lithuanian Yeshivas, 640

- Alpert, Rebecca, Exploring Judaism, 519
- Alpert, Rebecca, Like Bread on the Seder Plate, 268, 526
- Alshekh, Moses, The Book of Proverbs with Rav Peninim, 506
- Alt, Albrecht, Essays on Old Testament History and Religion, 329
- Altabé, David Fintz, Konsezh o Tomar, 351
- Altabé, David Fintz, Parallels in the Development of Modern Turkish and Judeo-Spanish Literatures, 351
- Altabé, David Fintz, Reflections of Sephardic Life in the Ottoman Empire in Two Judeo-Spanish Novels, 351
- Altabé, David Fintz, The Romanso, 1900–1933, 351
- Altabé, David Fintz, Spanish and Portuguese Jewry before and after 1492, 492
- Alter, Robert, After the Tradition: Essays on Modern Jewish Writing, 72
- Alter, Robert, The Art of Biblical Poetry, 81, 484
- Alter, Robert, The Literary Guide to the Bible, 80
- Altmann, Alexander, Astrology, 49
- Altmann, Alexander, Biblical Motifs, 580
- Altmann, Alexander, Eternality of Punishment, 7
- Altmann, Alexander, Free Will and Predestination in Saadia, Bahya, and Maimonides, 422
- Altmann, Alexander, Isaac Israeli, 447
- Altmann, Alexander, Leo Baeck and the Jewish Mystical Tradition, 61
- Altmann, Alexander, Moses Mendelssohn, 404
- Altshuler, David, The Precious Legacy, 494
- Amipaz-Silber, Gitta, The Role of the Jewish Underground in the American Landing in Algiers, 1940–1942, 15
- Amishai-Maisels, Ziva, Chagall's Jewish Jokes, 107
- Amram, David W., The Makers of Hebrew Books in Italy, 497
- Amzalak, Moses Bensabat, Portuguese Hebrew Grammarians and Grammars, 367
- Anderson, Bernhard W., The Living World of the Old Testament, 75
- Anderson, Bernhard W., Understanding the Old Testament, 75
- Andrew, M.E., The Ten Commandments in Recent Research, 141
- Angel, Leonard, The Book of Miriam, 526
- Angel, Marc D., La America, 351
- Angel, Marc D., Exploring the Thought of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, 568
- Angel, Marc D., Judeo-Spanish Drama, 351
- Angel, Marc D., The Pirkei Abot of Reuben Eliyahu Israel, 351
- Angel, Marc D., Voices in Exile, 553
- Ankori, Zvi, Karaites in Byzantium, 335
- Anner, Zeev, The Western Wall, 615
- Antler, Joyce, The Journey Home, 626
- Applebaum, Shimon, Jews and Greeks in Ancient Cyrene, 371
- Applebaum, Shimon, Prolegomena to the Study of the Second Jewish Revolt, 64
- Arendt, Hannah, The Jew as Pariah, 48
- Arendt, Hannah, The Origins of Totalitarianism, 48
- Argall, Randal A., 1 Enoch and Sirach, 69
- Arkush, Allan, Moses Mendelssohn and the Enlightenment, 404
- Armistead, Samuel G., The Judeo-Spanish Ballad Chapbooks of Jacob Abraham Yoná, 351
- Armistead, Samuel G., Judeo-Spanish Ballads from Oral Tradition, 351
- Armistead, Samuel G., Judeo-Spanish Traditional Poetry in the United States, 351
- Armistead, Samuel G., Sephardic Folklore and Eastern Mediterranean Oral Tradition, 351
- Armstrong, Karen, Jerusalem, 309
- Arndt, Judy, The Enduring Remnant, 50
- Aron, Joseph, The Enduring Remnant, 50
- Aronoff, Susan, Women in Bondage, 11
- Aronowicz, Annette, Translator's Introduction to Nine Talmudic Readings by Emmanuel Levinas, 365
- Aronsfield, C.C., The Ghosts of 1492, 571
- Artson, Bradley Shavit, Love Peace and Pursue Peace, 613
- Aschheim, Steven, Brothers and Strangers, 93, 518
- Ashkenazi, Jacob ben Isaac, Tz'enah Ur'enah, 632
- Ashton, Dianne, Four Centuries of Jewish Women's Spirituality, 626
- Ashtor, Eliyahu, The Jews of Moslem Spain, 254, 282, 553, 572
- Attal, Robert, Les Juifs d'Afrique du Nord, 454
- Attridge, H.W., Josephus and His Works, 319
- Aubet, María Eugenia, The Phoenicians and the West, 98
- Auld, A.G., Kings without Privilege, 115
- Aumann, Moshe, Carta's Historical Atlas of Israel, 521
- Aune, David, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World, 499
- Ausubel, Nathan, A Treasury of Jewish Humor, 272
- Avalos, Hector, Illness and Health Care in the Ancient Near East, 399
- Avery-Peck, Alan J., Mishnah's Division of Agriculture, 10, 597
- Avery-Peck, Alan J., The Priestly Gift in Mishnah, 10
- Aviad, Janet, Return to Judaism, 58
- Aviezer, Nathan, In the Beginning, 128
- Avigad, Nahman, Discovering Jerusalem, 298, 309
- Avineri, Shlomo, The Making of Modern Zionism, 71, 643
- Avisar, Ilan, Screening the Holocaust, 266
- Avishur, Yitzhak, Some New Sources for the Study of the Text and Language of Saadya's Translation of the Pentateuch into Judeo-Arabic, 356
- Avi-Yonah, Michael, The Jews of Palestine, 465
- Avi-Yonah, Michael, The Jews under Roman and Byzantine Rule, 298
- Avi-Yonah, Michael, The Macmillan Bible Atlas, 520
- Avi-Yonah, Michael, The Madaba Mosaic Map, 521
- Avni, Haim, Argentina and the Jews, 361
- Avni, Haim, Spain, the Jews, and Franco, 572
- Awret, Irene, Days of Honey, 602
- Bachrach, Bernard S., Early Medieval Jewish Policy in Western Europe, 572
- Bacon, Gershon C., The Jews in Poland and Russia, 377, 533
- Bacon, Gershon C., The Politics of Tradition, 489
- Bacon, Josephine, The Illustrated Atlas of Jewish Civilization, 521
- Bader, Gershom, The Encyclopedia of Talmudic Sages, 511
- Baeck, Leo, Does Traditional Judaism Possess Dogmas?, 148
- Baeck, Leo, The Essence of Judaism, 480
- Baer, Yitzhak F., A History of the Jews in Christian Spain, 254, 393, 553, 572
- Baer, Yitzhak F., The Origins of Jewish Communal Organization in the Middle Ages, 51
- Bahat, Dan, The Illustrated Atlas of Jerusalem, 309, 521
- Bahloul, Joëlle, The Architecture of Memory, 15
- Bailey, Lloyd R., Biblical Perspectives on Death, 138
- Baker, Leonard, Days of Sorrow and Pain, 61
- Bal, Mieke, Death and Dissymmetry, 623
- Bal, Mieke, Lethal Love, 623
- Bal, Mieke, Murder and Difference, 623
- Balka, Christie, Twice Blessed, 268, 526
- Bamberger, Bernard J., Proselytism in the Talmudic Period, 123
- Bamberger, Fritz, Leo Baeck, 61
- Band, Arnold J., Nostalgia and Nightmare, 9
- Banitt, Menahem, Rashi, 83, 566
- Bar-Efrat, S., Narrative Art in the Bible, 81
- Barer, Shlomo, The Magic Carpet, 637

- Bargad, Warren, From Agnon to Oz, 236
- Bargebuhr, Frederick, The Alhambra, 281, 282
- Baron, Salo W., Essays on Maimonides, 156
- Baron, Salo W., History and Jewish Historians, 220, 244, 532
- Baron, Salo W., The Jewish Community, 51
- Baron, Salo W., The Revolution of 1848 and Jewish Scholarship, 384
- Baron, Salo W., The Russian Jew under Tsars and Soviets, 533
- Baron, Salo W., Saadia's Communal Activities, 537
- Baron, Salo W., A Social and Religious History of the Jews, 83, 162, 248
- Baron, Salo W., Steeled by Adversity, 162
- Baron, Salo W., Yehudah Halevi, an Answer to an Historic Challenge, 322
- Barr, James, Biblical Faith and Natural Theology, 77
- Barr, James, The Scope and Authority of the Bible, 77
- Barrett, C.K., The Gospel of John and Judaism, 25
- Barthold, W., Khazars, 339
- Bartlett, John Raymond, Archaeology and Biblical Interpretation, 36
- Barton, George A., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes, 153
- Barton, John, Amos's Oracles against the Nations, 502
- Barton, John, Oracles of God, 499
- Barton, John, Reading the Old Testament, 80
- Bar-Yitshak, Hayah, Jewish Moroccan Folk Narratives from Israel, 189
- Barzilay, Isaac E., Between Reason and Faith, 2
- Barzilay, Isaac E., Yoseph Shlomo Delmedigo, Yashar of Candia, 514
- Bar-Zohar, Michael, Ben-Gurion, 68
- Bar-Zohar, Michael, Beyond Hitler's Grasp, 63
- Baskin, Judith R., Jewish Women in Historical Perspective, 167, 182, 248, 395, 626
- Baskin, Judith R., Rabbinic Reflections on the Barren Wife, 147
- Baskin, Judith R., Women of the Word, 183, 626, 634
- Basser, Herbert W., Midrashic Interpretations of the Song of Moses, 411
- Basser, Herbert W., The Mystical Study of Ruth, 331
- Bat Ye'or, The Decline of Eastern Christianity under Islam, 297
- Bat Ye'or, The Dhimmis, 297
- Bauer, Yehuda, A History of the Holocaust, 259
- Baumgarten, A.I., The Name of the Pharisees, 472
- Baumgarten, Murray, Klezmer, 435
- Baumgartner, Walter, The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament, 235
- Bayme, Steven, Facing the Future, 123
- Bayme, Steven, The Jewish Family and Jewish Continuity, 180
- Bazak, Jacob, Jewish Law and Jewish Life, 120
- Beattie, Derek Robert George, Jewish Exegesis of the Book of Ruth, 83
- Beck, Evelyn Torton, Kafka and the Yiddish Theater, 594
- Beck, Evelyn Torton, Nice Jewish Girls, 268, 628
- Becking, Bob, Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible, 22
- Beentjes, Pancratius C., The Book of Ben Sira in Modern Research, 69
- Beider, Alexander, A Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Russian Empire, 459
- Bein, Alex, Theodor Herzl, 240
- Beinart, Haim, The Converso Community in 16th and 17th Century Spain, 289
- Beinart, Haim, The Conversos and Their Fate, 289
- Beinart, Haim, Conversos on Trial, 289
- Beinart, Haim, Moreshet Sepharad: The Sephardi Legacy, 289, 492, 638
- Beit-Arié, Malachi, Hebrew Codicology, 391, 551
- Beit-Arié, Malachi, Hebrew Manuscripts of East and West, 551
- Beit-Arié, Malachi, The Makings of the Medieval Hebrew Book, 551
- Beit-Arié, Malachi, Specimens of Mediaeval Hebrew Scripts, 551
- Beit-Hallahmi, Benjamin, Tradition, Innovation, Conflict, 301
- Beker, Avi, Jewish Communities of the World, 63
- Belkin, Samuel, Philo and the Oral Law, 474
- Beller, Ilex, Life in the Shtetl, 558
- Beller, Steven, Vienna and the Jews, 1867-1938, 104
- Ben-Ami, Issachar, Saint Veneration among the Jews in Morocco, 387, 421, 610
- Ben-Amos, Dan, In Praise of the Baal Shem Tov [Shivhei ha-Besht], 302
- Benardete, Maír José, Hispanic Culture and Character of Sephardic Jews, 351
- Ben-Ari, Eyal, Grasping Land, 610
- Ben-Ari, Eyal, Saints' Sanctuaries in Israeli Development Towns, 610
- Ben-Ari, Raikin, Habima, 594
- Benari, Yehuda, History of the Revisionist Movement, 647
- Benbassa, Esther, The Jews of the Balkans, 63
- Ben-Dov, M., In the Shadow of the Temple, 593
- Ben-Dov, M., The Western Wall, 615
- Ben-Hayyim, Zeev, Hebrew Grammar, 235
- Ben-Horin, M., Emancipation and Counter Emancipation, 162
- Benjamin, Don C., Old Testament Parallels, 74
- Benmayor, Rina, Social Determinants in Poetic Transmission: The Sephardic Romancero, 351
- Ben-Menahem, Hanina, Judicial Deviation in Talmudic Law, 5
- Ben Rafael, Eliezer, Crisis and Transformation, 341
- Ben-Sasson, Haim Hillel, A History of the Jewish People, 248
- Ben-Sasson, Menahem, The Jewish Community of Gabes in the 11th Century, 602
- Ben Shlomo, Yosef, Poetry of Being, 346
- Bentwich, Norman De Mattos, Solomon Schechter, 545
- Benvenisti, Meron, City of Stone, 309
- Ben-Yehuda, Eliezer, A Dream Come True, 71
- Ben-Zvi, Itzhak, The Exiled and the Redeemed, 407
- Berenbaum, Michael, The Vision of the Void, 616
- Berg, Johannes van den, Jewish-Christian Relations in the Seventeenth Century, 401
- Berger, Alan L., Children of Job, 18
- Berger, Alan L., Methodology in the Academic Teaching of the Holocaust, 263
- Bergman, Peter M., Uriel Acosta, 7
- Bergman, Samuel Hugo, Faith and Reason, 118, 179
- Berkley, George E., Vienna and Its Jews, 104
- Berkovits, Eliezer, Faith after the Holocaust, 263
- Berkovits, Eliezer, Major Themes in Modern Philosophies of Judaism, 519, 530
- Berkowitz, Michael, Zionist Culture and West European Jewry before the First World War, 643
- Berlin, Adele, Biblical Poetry through Medieval Jewish Eyes, 484
- Berlin, Adele, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism, 484
- Berlin, Adele, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative, 542
- Berlin, Charles, Jewish Film and Jewish Studies, 186
- Berlin, Isaiah, Chaim Weizmann, 614
- Berman, Louis, Vegetarianism and the Jewish Tradition, 609
- Berman, Paul, Blacks and Jews: Alliances and Arguments, 89
- Berman, Phyllis, Tales of Tikkun, 526

- Bermant, Chaim, The Walled Garden, 180
- Bernasconi, Robert, Re-reading Levinas, 365
- Bernstein, Ellen, Ecology and the Jewish Spirit, 155
- Bernstein, Ellen, Let the Earth Teach You Torah, 155
- Bernstein, Louis, Challenge and Mission, 417
- Berrin, Susan, A Heart of Wisdom, 526
- Berti, Silvia, Introduction to Essays on Ancient and Modern Judaism by Arnaldo D. Momigliano, 419
- Besso, Henry V., Judeo-Spanish, 356
- Beth-Hillel, David d', Unknown Jews in Unknown Lands, 288
- Bettan, Israel, Studies in Jewish Preaching, 267
- Bevan, Edwyn R., The Legacy of Israel, 477
- Bhende, Asha, Demographic and Socio-Economic Characteristics of Jews in India, 288
- Biale, David, Eros and the Jews, 45, 555
- Biale, David, Gershom Scholem, 547
- Biale, Rachel, Women and Jewish Law, 11, 147, 183, 630
- Bickerman, Elias J., Four Strange Books of the Bible, 166
- Bickerman, Elias J., The Jews in the Greek Age, 237
- Bilde, Per, Flavius Josephus between Jerusalem and Rome, 319
- Bilik, Dorothy, The Memoirs of Glikl of Hameln, 211
- Bilski, Emily D., Golem! Danger, Deliverance, and Art, 218
- Bilu, Yoram, Dreams and the Wishes of the Saint, 610
- Bilu, Yoram, Grasping Land, 610
- Bilu, Yoram, In Search of the Sadiq, 610
- Binder, Abraham Wolf, Biblical Chant, 431
- Bindman, Yirmeyahu, Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto, 384
- Birnbaum, Ellen, The Place of Judaism in Philo's Thought, 474
- Birnbaum, Philip, Karaite Studies, 335
- Birnbaum, Pierre, Anti-Semitism in France, 190
- Birnbaum, Pierre, Paths of Emancipation, 162, 552
- Birnbaum, Salomo, The Hebrew Scripts, 551
- Birnbaum, Salomo, Jewish Languages, 356
- Black, Eugene, The Social Politics of Anglo-Jewry, 1880–1920, 221
- Blau, Joseph L., Modern Varieties of Judaism, 194, 325
- Blau, Joseph L., Reform Judaism, 380
- Blau, Joseph L., The Story of Jewish Philosophy, 478
- Blau, Joshua, The Emergence and Linguistic Background of Judaeo-Arabic, 327, 356
- Blau, Joshua, Hebrew Language, 235
- Blau, Joshua, Judaeo-Arabic Papyri, 327
- Blau, Joshua, Judeo-Arabic, 357
- Blau, Joshua, On a Fragment of the Oldest Judeo-Arabic Bible Translation Extant, 356
- Blau, Joshua, On Early Judaeo-Arabic Orthography, 327, 356
- Bleich, J. David, Contemporary Halakhic Problems, 88, 529
- Bleich, J. David, Jewish Bioethics, 87
- Bleich, J. David, Judaism and Animal Experimentation, 24
- Bleich, J. David, Judaism and Healing, 87
- Bleich, J. David, Providence in the Philosophy of Gersonides, 363
- Bleich, J. David, Vegetarianism and Judaism, 609
- Bleich, J. David, With Perfect Faith, 148, 179, 479
- Blenkinsopp, Joseph, Ezra-Nehemiah, 176
- Blenkinsopp, Joseph, A History of Prophecy in Israel from the Settlement in the Land to the Hellenistic Period, 499
- Blenkinsopp, Joseph, The Pentateuch, 469
- Blenkinsopp, Joseph, Sage, Priest, Prophet, 495
- Blenkinsopp, Joseph, Wisdom and Law in the Old Testament, 69
- Bloch, Abraham P., The Biblical and Historical Background of Jewish Customs and Ceremonies, 185
- Bloch, Ariel, The Song of Songs, 526, 570
- Bloch, Chana, The Song of Songs, 526, 570
- Bloch, Joshua, Venetian Printers of Hebrew Books, 611
- Bloch-Smith, Elizabeth, Judahite Burial Practices and Beliefs about the Dead, 102, 138
- Block, Daniel, The Book of Ezekiel, 174
- Blom, J.C.H., The History of the Jews in the Netherlands, 449
- Bloom, Harold, Cynthia Ozick, 461
- Bloom, Harold, Gershom Scholem, 547
- Bloom, Harold, The Sorrows of American Jewish Poetry, 488
- Bloom, Herbert I., The Economic Activities of the Jews of Amsterdam in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries, 449
- Bloomfield Ramagen, Sonia, The Seridó, 131
- Blumenthal, David R., Facing the Abusing God, 595
- Blumenthal, David R., God at the Center, 364
- Bodian, Miriam, Hebrews of the Portuguese Nation, 449, 492
- Bohlmán, Philip V., The World Centre for Jewish Music in Palestine, 1936–1940, 433
- Bokser, Baruch M., The Origins of the Seder, 464
- Bokser, Ben Zion, From the World of the Cabbalah, 324
- Bokser, Ben Zion, The Maharal, 324
- Boling, Robert G., Joshua, 320
- Boling, Robert G., Judges, 329
- Bonfil, Roberto, Jewish Life in Renaissance Italy, 304, 525
- Bonfil, Roberto, Rabbis and Jewish Communities in Renaissance Italy, 51, 304, 513
- Bonfil, Roberto, Some Reflections on the Place of Azariah de Rossi's Meor Enaim in the Cultural Milieu of the Italian Renaissance Jewry, 532
- Borgen, Peder, Philo of Alexandria, 474
- Borodowski, Alfredo F., Isaac Abravanel on Miracles, 414
- Borowitz, Eugene B., Choices in Modern Jewish Thought, 118, 568
- Borowitz, Eugene B., Contemporary Christologies, 311
- Borowitz, Eugene B., Exploring Jewish Ethics, 54
- Borowitz, Eugene B., How Can a Jew Speak of Faith Today?, 179
- Borowitz, Eugene B., Liberal Judaism, 54
- Borowitz, Eugene B., Reform Judaism Today, 524
- Bosmajian, Hamida, Metaphors of Evil, 261
- Bottéro, Jean, Mesopotamia, 20
- Bowker, John, Jesus and the Pharisees, 472
- Bowman, John, Samaritan Documents, 540
- Bowman, Steven B., The Jews of Byzantium, 1204–1453, 63
- Boyarin, Daniel, Carnal Israel, 45, 90, 555
- Boyarin, Daniel, Diaspora, 144
- Boyarin, Daniel, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash, 409, 412, 590
- Boyarin, Daniel, Jews and Other Differences, 285
- Boyarin, Daniel, A Radical Jew, 467
- Boyarin, Daniel, Unheroic Conduct, 90, 198
- Boyarin, Jonathan, Diaspora, 144
- Boyarin, Jonathan, Jews and Other Differences, 285
- Boyarin, Jonathan, Storm from Paradise, 307
- Bradshaw, Paul F., The Changing Face of Jewish and Christian Worship in North America, 380
- Bradshaw, Paul F., The Making of Jewish and Christian Worship, 379
- Braham, Randolph, The Holocaust in Hungary, 273
- Braham, Randolph, Hungarian-Jewish Studies, 273
- Braham, Randolph, The Politics of Genocide, 273
- Brann, Ross, The Compunctious Poet, 485, 553
- Brann, Ross, Judah Halevi, 322
- Brann, Ross, Languages of Power in Islamic Spain, 283
- Brann, Ross, Structure and Meaning in the Secular Poetry of Moshe Ibn Ezra, 280

- Bratcher, Robert G., A History of Bible Translation and the North American Contribution, 73
- Braude, William, Pesikta de-Rab Kahana, 409
- Braude, William, Pesikta Rabbati, 409
- Brauer, Erich, The Jews of Afghanistan, 292
- Brauer, Erich, The Jews of Kurdistan, 293
- Brawley, Robert L., Luke-Acts and the Jews, 25
- Braybrooke, Marcus, Children of One God, 477
- Breitowitz, Irving, Between Civil and Religious Law, 11
- Brener, Anne, Mourning and Mitzvah, 526
- Brenner, Athalya, A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna, 166
- Brenner, Athalya, A Feminist Companion to Reading the Bible, 80, 624
- Brenner, Athalya, A Feminist Companion to Ruth, 535
- Brenner, Athalya, The Feminist Companion to the Bible, 80, 623
- Brenner, Athalya, A Feminist Companion to the Latter Prophets, 500
- Brenner, Athalya, A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, 570
- Brenner, Athalya, A Feminist Companion to Wisdom Literature, 617
- Brenner, Athalya, The Intercourse of Knowledge, 555, 624
- Brenner, Athalya, The Israelite Woman, 623
- Brenner, Athalya, On Gendering Texts, 506, 624
- Brenner, Michael, After the Holocaust, 208
- Brenner, Rachel Feldhay, Writing as Resistance, 261
- Breslauer, S. Daniel, Contemporary Jewish Ethics, 564
- Breslauer, S. Daniel, The Hebrew Poetry of Hayyim Nahman Bialik (1873–1934) and a Modern Jewish Theology, 72
- Breslauer, S. Daniel, Mordecai Kaplan's Thought in a Postmodern Age, 334
- Breuer, Edward, The Limits of Enlightenment, 404
- Breuer, Mordechai, The Masorah Magna to the Pentateuch, 398
- Breuer, Mordechai, Tradition and Enlightenment, 1600–1780, 205
- Briggs, Charles, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament, 235
- Briggs, Lloyd Cabot, No More for Ever, 15
- Bright, John, Covenant and Promise, 165
- Bright, John, A History of Israel, 250, 344
- Brill, Allan, The Mystical Path of the Vilna Gaon, 161
- Brim, Charles J., Medicine in the Bible, 399
- Brin, Gershon, Studies in Biblical Law, 81
- Brinkman, J.A., A Political History of Post-Kassite Babylonia, 1158–722 B.C., 59
- Brisman, Shimeon, A History and Guide to Judaic Bibliography, 91, 521
- Brisman, Shimeon, A History and Guide to Judaic Encyclopedias and Lexicons, 521
- Brod, Max, Israel's Music, 433
- Brody, Heinrich Haim, Moses Ibn Ezra, 280
- Brody, Heinrich Haim, Selected Poems of Moses Ibn Ezra, 280
- Brody, Robert, The Geonim of Babylonia and the Shaping of Medieval Jewish Culture, 172, 204, 537
- Bronner, Leila Leah, The Stories of Elijah and Elisha as Polemics against Baal Worship, 500
- Brook, Kevin A., A Brief History of the Khazars, 339
- Brook, Stephen, The Club, 381
- Brooks, Roger, The Spirit of the Ten Commandments, 5
- Brooks, Roger, Support for the Poor in the Mishnaic Law of Agriculture, 10, 597
- Brooten, Bernadette J., Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue, 581, 630
- Brovender, Chaim, Hebrew Language, 235
- Brown, Francis, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament, 235
- Brown, K.L., Mellah and Madina, 421
- Brown, Michael, Jew or Juif?, 100
- Brown, Raymond E., The Community of the Beloved Disciple, 25
- Brown, Robert McAfee, Elie Wiesel, Messenger to All Humanity, 616
- Brown, William P., Character in Crisis, 506
- Brude-Firnau, Gisela, Theodor Herzl Writes the Manifesto The Jewish State, 240
- Bryce, Glendon E., A Legacy of Wisdom, 506
- Buber, Martin, The Beginning of the National Idea, 324
- Buber, Martin, I and Thou, 480
- Buber, Martin, The Letters of Martin Buber, 93
- Buber, Martin, On Zion, 300
- Buber, Martin, The Origin and Meaning of Hasidism, 231
- Buber, Martin, Scripture and Translation, 530
- Buber, Martin, Tales of the Hasidim, 303, 364
- Buber, Martin, Two Types of Faith, 179
- Büchler, Adolf, Types of Jewish-Palestinian Piety from 70 B.C.E. to 70 C.E., 45
- Budick, Sanford, Midrash and Literature, 409
- Bulka, Reuven P., Dimensions of Orthodox Judaism, 417
- Bulka, Reuven P., Jewish Divorce Ethics, 147
- Bunis, David M., The Language of the Sephardim, 356
- Bunis, David M., A Lexicon of the Hebrew and Aramaic Elements in Modern Judezmo, 356
- Bunis, David M., Modernization and the Language Question among Judezmo-Speaking Sephardim of the Ottoman Empire, 351
- Bunis, David M., Pyesa di Yaakov Avinu kun sus izus (Bucharest 1862), 351
- Bunis, David M., Sephardic Studies, 438
- Burnaby, Sherrard B., Elements of the Jewish and Muhammadan Calendars, 97
- Burney, C.F., The Book of Judges, 329
- Burns, Michael, Dreyfus, 190
- Burnshaw, Stanley, The Modern Hebrew Poem Itself, 375
- Burtt, Edwin A., Types of Religious Philosophy, 168
- Bush, Lawrence, Jews, Money, and Social Responsibility, 527
- Butler, Trent C., Joshua, 320
- Byrnes, Robert F., Antisemitism in Modern France, 190
- Cahan, Yehuda Leyb, Yidishe folkslider mit melodien, 436
- Calimani, Riccardo, The Ghetto of Venice, 611
- Calmann, Marianne, The Carrière of Carpentras, 503
- Camp, Claudia, What's So Strange about the Strange Woman, 506
- Camp, Claudia, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs, 506
- Camp, Claudia, Women, War, and Metaphor, 624
- Campbell, Antony, Sources of the Pentateuch, 469
- Canelo, David Augusto, The Last Crypto-Jews of Portugal, 131
- Cantor, Aviva, Jewish Women/Jewish Men, 183
- Cardin, Nina, Out of the Depths I Call to You, 632
- Cardin, Nina, The Seminary at 100, 121
- Cargas, Harry J., Responses to Elie Wiesel, 616
- Carlebach, Elisheva, The Pursuit of Heresy, 556
- Carlebach, Elisheva, Redemption and Persecution in the Eyes of Moses Hayim Luzzatto and His Circle, 384
- Carmell, Aryeh, Aids to Talmud Study, 587
- Carmell, Aryeh, Challenge, 548
- Carmi, T., The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse, 485
- Carmichael, Calum M., The Laws of Deuteronomy, 142
- Carmichael, Calum M., The Origins of Biblical Law, 141
- Carmichael, Joel, The Satanizing of the Jews, 370
- Carmilly-Weinberger, Moshe, The Rabbinical Seminary of Budapest, 1877–1977, 273

- Caro, Joseph, Code of Hebrew Law/Shulhan 'Aruk, 139
- Carpenter, Dwayne E., Alfonso X and the Jews, 572
- Carpenter, J., The Hexateuch According to the Revised Version, 469
- Carpi, Daniel, Notes on the Life of Rabbi Judah Messer Leon, 405
- Carroll R., Mark Daniel, Contexts for Amos, 502
- Carroll, Robert P., From Chaos to Covenant, 308
- Carroll, Robert P., Jeremiah, 308
- Carroll, Robert P., When Prophecy Failed, 500
- Caspi, Misha'el Masrawi, Daughters of Yemen, 637
- Cassuto, Umberto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus, 173
- Cassuto, Umberto, A Commentary on the Book of Genesis, 200
- Cassuto, Umberto, The Documentary Hypothesis and the Composition of the Pentateuch, 469
- Catane, Mochè, Recueil des Gloses, 566
- Cathcart, Kevin J., The Aramaic Bible, 592
- Ceresko, Anthony R., Introduction to the Old Testament, 75
- Cesarani, David, The Making of Modern Anglo-Jewry, 221
- Charles, R.H., The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English, 32
- Charlesworth, James H., The Dead Sea Scrolls, 136
- Charlesworth, James H., Jesus' Jewishness, 311
- Charlesworth, James H., The Messiah, 406
- Charlesworth, James H., The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, 32, 239
- Charny, Carmi, The Modern Hebrew Poem Itself, 375
- Chasiotes, Ioannes K., The Jewish Communities of Southeastern Europe, 63
- Chavel, Charles B., Ramban, 389, 427, 513
- Chazan, Robert, Barcelona and Beyond, 427
- Chazan, Robert, Daggers of Faith, 572
- Chazan, Robert, European Jewry and the First Crusade, 27, 130, 206, 254, 396
- Chazan, Robert, In the Year 1096, 130
- Chazan, Robert, Medieval Stereotypes and Modern Antisemitism, 369
- Chetrit, Joseph, Judeo-Arabic and Judeo-Spanish in Morocco and Their Socio-linguistic Interaction, 356
- Childs, Brevard S., The Book of Exodus, 173
- Childs, Brevard S., Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture, 75
- Childs, Brevard S., Isaiah and the Assyrian Crisis, 295
- Chill, Abraham, The Mitsvot, 120
- Chirichigno, Gregory C., Debt-Slavery in Israel and the Ancient Near East, 562
- Chomsky, William, David Kimhi's Hebrew Grammar (Mikhlol) Systematically Presented and Critically Annotated, 343
- Chomsky, William, Hebrew, the Eternal Language, 367
- Chouraqui, André N., Between East and West, 454
- Chouraqui, André N., A Man in Three Worlds, 15
- Christensen, Duane L., A Song of Power and the Power of Song, 142
- Christianson, Eric, Narrative Strategies in Ecclesiastes, 153
- Clifford, Richard, Creation Accounts in the Ancient Near East and in the Bible, 128
- Clifford, Richard, Proverbs, 506
- Clines, David J.A., Interested Parties, 81
- Clines, David J.A., The New Literary Criticism and the Hebrew Bible, 80
- Cogan, Mordechai, II Kings, 344
- Coggins, Richard J., Israel's Prophetic Tradition, 30
- Coggins, Richard J., Samaritans and Jews, 540
- Cohen, Abraham, An Anglo-Jewish Scrapbook, 1600-1840, 125
- Cohen, Abraham, The Five Megilloth, 153
- Cohen, Abraham, Joshua and Judges, 320
- Cohen, Abraham, Midrash Rabbah, 153
- Cohen, Alfred, Vegetarianism from a Jewish Perspective, 609
- Cohen, Arthur A., Introduction to Anatomy of Faith by Milton Steinberg, 576
- Cohen, Arthur A., The Natural and the Supernatural Jew, 576
- Cohen, Chester G., Shtetl Finder, 558
- Cohen, D., Judeo-Arabic, 357
- Cohen, Gary, Jews in German Society, 494
- Cohen, Gerson D., A Critical Edition with a Translation and Notes of the Book of Tradition (Sefer ha-qabbalah), 254, 277
- Cohen, Gerson D., The Reconstruction of Gaonic History, 204
- Cohen, Gerson D., Studies in the Variety of Rabbinic Cultures, 277
- Cohen, Hayim J., Asian and African Jews in the Middle East, 1860-1971, 407
- Cohen, Hayim J., The Jews of the Middle East, 1860-1972, 407
- Cohen, Hermann, Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism, 480, 560
- Cohen, Hershel, Nahalat Shafrah, 139
- Cohen, Israel, Vilna, 161, 377
- Cohen, Jeremy, Be Fertile and Increase, Fill the Earth and Master It, 155, 555
- Cohen, Jeremy, The Friars and the Jews, 27, 254, 572
- Cohen, Jeremy, Rationales for Conjugal Sex in RaABaD's Baalei ha-Nefesh, 1
- Cohen, Judith R., Evolving Roles of Women in Judeo-Spanish Song, 351
- Cohen, Judith R., Judeo-Spanish Songs in the Sephardic Communities of Montreal and Toronto, 438
- Cohen, Judith R., Sonography of Judeo-Spanish Song, 438
- Cohen, Judith R., Women's Role in Judeo-Spanish Song, 351, 438
- Cohen, Mark R., The Autobiography of a Seventeenth-Century Venetian Rabbi, 416, 514, 525
- Cohen, Mark R., Jewish Self-Government in Medieval Egypt, 159, 201, 254
- Cohen, Mark R., Jews among Arabs, 454
- Cohen, Mark R., Leone da Modena's Riti, 416
- Cohen, Mark R., Under Crescent and Cross, 297
- Cohen, Martin, The Martyr, 393
- Cohen, Mitchell, Zion and State, 645
- Cohen, Mortimer J., Jacob Emden, 164, 514
- Cohen, Naomi G., Philo Judaeus, 474
- Cohen, Noah J., The Concept of Ts'a'ar Ba'ale Hayyim (Kindness, and the Prevention of Cruelty, to Animals), 24
- Cohen, Richard I., The Burden of Conscience, 190
- Cohen, Richard I., Jewish Icons, 284
- Cohen, Robert, Jews in Another Environment, 361
- Cohen, Robin, Global Diasporas, 144
- Cohen, Sarah Blacher, Cynthia Ozick's Comic Art, 462
- Cohen, Sarah Blacher, From Hester Street to Hollywood, 594
- Cohen, Sarah Blacher, Jewish Wry, 272
- Cohen, Seymour J., How to Be a Jew, 326
- Cohen, Shaye J.D., The Beginnings of Jewishness, 123, 373
- Cohen, Shaye J.D., From the Maccabees to the Mishnah, 237, 252
- Cohen, Shaye J.D., The Jewish Family in Antiquity, 180
- Cohen, Shaye J.D., Josephus in Galilee and Rome, 319
- Cohen, Shaye J.D., The Place of the Rabbi in Jewish Society of the Second Century, 19
- Cohen, Shaye J.D., The Significance of Yavneh, 318
- Cohen, Shaye J.D., The State of Jewish Studies, 315
- Cohen, Steven, American Modernity and Jewish Identity, 552
- Cohen, Steven, Content or Continuity?, 123
- Cohen, Steven, Cosmopolitans and Parochials, 417
- Cohen, Steven, The Jewish Family, 180
- Cohen, Stuart A., The Three Crowns, 496

- Cohen-Almagor, Raphael, The Boundaries of Liberty and Tolerance, 333
- Cohen Stuart, G.H., The Struggle in Man between Good and Evil, 150
- Cohn, Haim H., Human Rights in the Bible and Talmud, 269
- Cohn, Leopold, The Story of a Modern Missionary to an Ancient People, 34
- Cohn, Norman, Warrant for Genocide, 370
- Cohn-Sherbok, Dan, Fifty Key Jewish Thinkers, 478
- Cohon, Baruch Joseph, The Structure of the Synagogue Prayer-Chant, 432
- Cole, Ellen, Celebrating the Lives of Jewish Women, 628
- Collins, John J., Apocalypse: Morphology of a Genre, 30
- Collins, John J., The Apocalyptic Imagination, 30, 33
- Collins, John J., Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls, 30, 136
- Collins, John J., Daniel, 135
- Collins, John J., Jewish Wisdom in the Hellenistic Age, 33, 69
- Colombat, André, The Holocaust in French Film, 266
- Colson, F.H., Philo in Ten Volumes (and Two Supplementary Volumes), 474
- Comay, Joan, The Temple of Jerusalem, 593
- Commission on the Philosophy of Conservative Judaism, Emet Ve-Emunah, 121
- Compton, Susan P., Chagall, 107
- Conrad, Edgar, Reading Isaiah, 295
- Conrad, Eric, Lily H. Montagu, 419
- Contentau, Georges, Everyday Life in Babylon and Assyria, 59
- Coogan, Michael David, Stories from Ancient Canaan, 98, 484
- Cook, Edward, The Dead Sea Scrolls, 136
- Cook, Johann, The Septuagint of Proverbs, 506
- Cook, Michael J., Mark's Treatment of the Jewish Leaders, 472
- Cooper, David A., God Is a Verb, 526
- Cooper, Eli Louis, Am Segullah, 347
- Cooper, Judith Elias, The Jews of Calcutta, 62
- Coopersmith, Harry, Songs of Zion, 436
- Cooper-White, Pamela, Schoenberg and the God-Idea, 546
- Corcos, David, Studies in the History of the Jews of Morocco, 421
- Cowan, Paul, Mixed Blessings, 527
- Cowan, Rachel, Mixed Blessings, 527
- Craigie, Peter C., Psalms 1-50, 508
- Crawford, Timothy G., The Masorah of Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, 398
- Crenshaw, James L., Ecclesiastes, 153, 187
- Crenshaw, James L., Old Testament Wisdom, 69, 617
- Crenshaw, James L., Story and Faith, 75
- Crenshaw, James L., Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, 153, 617
- Critchley, Simon, The Ethics of Deconstruction, 365
- Critchley, Simon, Re-reading Levinas, 365
- Cronbach, Abraham, Social Thinking in the Sefer Hasidim, 230
- Cross, Frank Moore, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic, 286
- Cross, Frank Moore, The Development of the Jewish Scripts, 234
- Cross, Frank Moore, The Tabernacle, 585
- Crossan, John Dominic, The Historical Jesus, 311
- Crown, Alan D., A Companion to Samaritan Studies, 540
- Crown, Alan D., The Samaritans, 540
- Crüsemann, Frank, The Torah, 469
- Curley, Edwin, Behind the Geometrical Method, 573
- Cutler, Irving, The Jews of Chicago, 605
- Cutter, Charles, Jewish Reference Sources, 521
- Dagan, Avigdor, The Jews of Czechoslovakia, 104, 313, 494
- Daiches, David, The King James Version of the English Bible, 110
- Dalin, David G., Making a Life, Building a Community, 605
- Dalmat, Dan, Bibliographia Hungarica-Judaica (Magyar-Zsidó Bibliográfia, 1945-1990), 273
- Dan, Joseph, The Ancient Jewish Mysticism, 167, 212
- Dan, Joseph, The Early Kabbalah, 331
- Dan, Joseph, Ethical Wills, 169
- Dan, Joseph, Gershom Scholem and the Mystical Dimension of Jewish History, 547
- Dan, Joseph, Jewish Mysticism and Jewish Ethics, 167, 230
- Dan, Joseph, Mysticism, Magic, and Kabbalah in Ashkenazi Judaism, 387
- Dan, Joseph, The Zohar and Its Generation, 648
- Dán, Róbert, Occident and Orient, 273
- Dana, Joseph, Natural Qualifications of a Medieval Poet According to Moshe Ibn Ezra, 280
- Daniel, Ruby, Ruby of Cochin, 117, 628
- Daniélou, Jean, The Theology of Jewish Christianity, 312
- Danzger, M. Herbert, Returning to Tradition, 58
- Darr, Kathryn Pfisterer, Isaiah's Vision and the Family of God, 295
- Dash, Joan, Summoned to Jerusalem, 583
- Daube, David, Collected Works of David Daube, 85
- Daube, David, On Acts 23, 539
- David, Esther, The Walled City, 67
- Davidman, Lynn, Feminist Perspectives on Jewish Studies, 183
- Davidman, Lynn, Gender and the Experience of Conversion, 58
- Davidman, Lynn, Tradition in a Rootless World, 58
- Davidovitch, David, The Ketuba, 338
- Davidson, Gustav, A Dictionary of Angels, 22
- Davidson, Israel, Otsar ha-shirah veha-piyut, 486
- Davidson, Israel, Parody in Jewish Literature, 272
- Davidson, Israel, Saadia's Polemic against Hiwi al-Balkhi, 537
- Davies, Alan T., Antisemitism and the Foundations of Christianity, 25
- Davies, Philip R., The Origins of the Ancient Israelite States, 250
- Davies, Philip R., Second Temple Studies 1, 176
- Davies, W.D., The Cambridge History of Judaism, 237
- Davies, W.D., The Gospel and the Land, 300
- Davies, W.D., Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 467
- Davies, W.D., The Territorial Dimension of Judaism, 300
- Davis, Avrohom Yosef, The Book of Joshua, 321
- Davis, Colin, Levinas, 365
- Davis, Judith, Mazel Tov, 65
- Davis, Judith, Whose Bar/Bat Mitzvah Is This Anyway?, 65
- Davis, Moshe, The Emergence of Conservative Judaism, 121
- Davis, Natalie Z., Women on the Margins, 211
- Davis, Robert, The Jews of Venice, 525
- Dawidowicz, Lucy S., The Jewish Presence, 285
- Dawidowicz, Lucy S., The War against the Jews, 1933-1945, 259
- Dawson, David, Allegorical Readers and Cultural Revision in Ancient Alexandria, 17
- Day, John, Wisdom in Ancient Israel, 617
- Day, Linda, Three Faces of a Queen, 166
- Day, Peggy, Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel, 624
- De Breffny, Brian, The Synagogue, 38, 40
- De Felice, Renzo, Jews in an Arab Land, 371
- De Haas, Jacob, Theodor Herzl, 240
- Deines, Roland, The Pre-Christian Paul, 467
- Dekro, Jeffrey, Jews, Money, and Social Responsibility, 527
- De Lange, Nicholas Robert Michael, Atlas of the Jewish World, 521
- De Lange, Nicolas Robert Michael, Origen and the Jews, 111
- Delitzsch, Franz, Biblical Commentary on the Proverbs of Solomon, 506
- Delitzsch, Franz, Kobelet, 153
- Demetz, Peter, Prague in Black and Gold, 494

- Demski, Aharon, These Are the Names, 459
- Derrida, Jacques, Writing and Difference, 365
- Dershowitz, Nachum, Calendrical Calculations, 97
- Deshen, Shlomo, Jewish Societies in the Middle East, 407
- Deshen, Shlomo, Jews among Muslims, 407, 582
- Deshen, Shlomo, The Mellah Society, 421
- Deshen, Shlomo, Southern Tunisian Jewry in the Early 20th Century, 602
- Desser, David, American-Jewish Filmmakers, 186
- Dethier, Hubert, Love and Intellect in Leone Ebreo, 3
- Deutsch, Gotthard, Zachariah Frankel, 194
- Deutsch, Shaul S., Larger Than Life, 223
- Dever, William G., Recent Archaeological Discoveries and Biblical Research, 36
- Devir, Ori, Off the Beaten Track in Israel, 298
- Diamant, Anita, The New Jewish Wedding, 338, 395
- Diamant, Anita, Saying Kaddish, 140
- Diamond, Eliezer, Hunger Artists and Householders, 45
- Díaz Esteban, Fernando, Abraham ibn Ezra and His Age, 278
- Díaz Más, Paloma, Sephardim, 351
- Dienstag, Jacob I., Eschatology in Maimonidean Thought, 389
- Diez Macho, Alejandro, The Recently Discovered Palestinian Targum and Its Relationship with Other Targums, 592
- Di Lella, Alexander A., The Wisdom of Ben Sira, 70
- Diner, Hasia R., In the Almost Promised Land, 89
- Diner, Hasia R., A Time for Gathering, 606
- Dinnerstein, Leonard, Antisemitism in America, 29
- Dinur, Ben Zion, Israel and the Diaspora, 144
- di San Lazzaro, G., Hommage à Marc Chagall, 107
- Dishon, Judith, Women in Medieval Hebrew Literature, 167
- Dobrinsky, Herbert C., A Treasury of Sephardic Laws and Customs, 553
- Dolgin, Janet L., Jewish Identity and the JDL, 333
- Domb, Cyril, Challenge, 548
- Domb, Jerahmeel Israel Isaac, The Transformation, 450
- Domb, Risa, Home Thoughts from Abroad, 236
- Don, Yehudah, A Social and Economic History of Central European Jewry, 104, 273
- Doneson, Judith, The Holocaust in American Film, 266
- Donin, Hayim Halevi, Sukkot, 579
- Don-Yehiya, Eliezer, Religion and Politics in Israel, 301
- Dorff, Elliot, Conservative Judaism, 121
- Dorff, Elliot, Contemporary Jewish Ethics and Morality, 564
- Dorff, Elliot, Knowing God, 214
- Dorff, Elliot, A Living Tree, 101
- Dorn, Pamela J., Change and Ideology, 438, 440
- Doron, Pinhas, The Mystery of Creation According to Rashi, 566
- Douglas, Mary, Implicit Meanings, 145
- Douglas, Mary, In the Wilderness, 455
- Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger, 145, 257, 366
- Dov Baer ben Samuel, of Linitz, In Praise of the Baal Shem Tov (Shivhei ha-Besht), 57
- Drazin, Israel, Targum Onkelos to Deuteronomy, 592
- Drazin, Israel, Targum Onkelos to Exodus, 592
- Drazin, Israel, Targum Onkelos to Leviticus, 592
- Dresner, Samuel H., Levi Yitzhak of Berditchev, 364
- Driver, Godfrey Rolles, Semitic Writing, 234
- Driver, Samuel Rolles, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament, 235
- Droge, Arthur J., A Noble Death, 396, 577
- Drory, Rina, Bilingualism and Cultural Images, 328
- Drory, Rina, Words Beautifully Put, 357
- Drucker, Malka, Sukkot, 579
- Drucker, Reuven, Yehoshua/The Book of Joshua, 321
- Dubnow, Simon, History of the Jews, 248, 318
- Dubnow, Simon, History of the Jews in Russia and Poland, 313, 489, 533
- Dubnow, Simon, Nationalism and History, 144
- Duker, A.G., Emancipation and Counter Emancipation, 162
- Dundes, Alan, Auschwitz Jokes, 272
- Dunlop, D.M., The History of the Jewish Khazars, 339
- Eaglestone, Robert, Ethical Criticism, 365
- Eckman, Lester, The History of the Musar Movement, 430
- Eckman, Lester, The Teachings of the Fathers of the Musar Movement, 430
- Edelstein, Alan, An Unacknowledged Harmony, 477
- Efron, John, Defenders of the Race, 518
- Ehrlich, Avrum M., Leadership in the HaBaD Movement, 223
- Ehrlich, Avrum M., Sanhedrin Studies, 543
- Ehrlich, Walter, Zion in the Valley, 605
- Eichhorn, David Max, Conversion to Judaism, 123
- Eichrodt, Walther, Theology of the Old Testament, 77
- Eidelberg, Shlomo, Jewish Life in Austria in the Fifteenth Century as Reflected in the Legal Writings of Rabbi Israel Isserlein and His Contemporaries, 206
- Eidelberg, Shlomo, The Jews and the Crusaders, 27, 130
- Eidelberg, Shlomo, R. Juspa, Shamash of Warmaisa (Worms), 514
- Eidensohn, Daniel, Yad Moshe, 181
- Eilberg-Schwartz, Howard, People of the Body, 90, 555
- Eilberg-Schwartz, Howard, The Savage in Judaism, 198, 257
- Eisen, Arnold M., The Chosen People in America, 110
- Eisen, Arnold M., Galut, 144
- Eisen, Arnold M., Rethinking Modern Judaism, 54, 552
- Eisen, Arnold M., Taking Hold of Torah, 54
- Eisen, Robert, Gersonides on Providence, Covenant, and the Chosen People, 83, 363, 414
- Eisenbach, Artur, The Emancipation of the Jews in Poland, 1780–1870, 162
- Eisenberg, Evan, The Ecology of Eden, 527
- Eisenberg, Robert, Boychiks in the Hood, 544
- Eisenstein, Ira, Reconstructing Judaism, 519
- Elazar, Daniel J., Authority, Power, and Leadership in the Jewish Polity, 543
- Elazar, Daniel J., The Balkan Jewish Communities, 63
- Elazar, Daniel J., Covenant and Polity in Biblical Israel, 490
- Elazar, Daniel J., Kinship and Consent, 51
- Elazar, Daniel J., Maintaining Consensus, 100
- Elazar, Daniel J., The Other Jews, 553
- Elbaum, Jacob, Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague and His Attitude to the Aggadah, 324
- Elbogen, Ismar, Jewish Liturgy, 379, 380, 483, 581
- Eldar, Ilan, The Grammatical Literature of Medieval Ashkenazi Jewry, 367
- Elias, Flower, The Jews of Calcutta, 62
- Elior, Rachel, The Paradoxical Ascent to God, 223
- Elkin, Judith L., Jews of the Latin American Republics, 361
- El-Kodsi, Mourad, The Karaites of Egypt, 1882–1986, 159
- Ellenson, David, Rabbi Esriel Hildesheimer and the Creation of a Modern Jewish Orthodoxy, 516

- Elman, Yaakov, Authority and Tradition, 460
 Elon, Amos, Herzl, 240
 Elon, Ari, From Jerusalem to the Edge of Heaven, 527
 Elon, Menachem, Jewish Law, 225
 El-Or, Tamar, Educated and Ignorant, 630
 Emmanuel, Isaac, History of the Jews of the Netherlands Antilles, 361
 Emmanuel, Suzanne, History of the Jews of the Netherlands Antilles, 361
 Endelman, Todd M., Jewish Apostasy in the Modern World, 34
 Endelman, Todd M., The Jews of Georgian England, 1714–1830, 163, 221
 Endelman, Todd M., Radical Assimilation in English Jewish History, 1656–1945, 552
 Englander, Lawrence A., The Mystical Study of Ruth, 331
 Epstein, Isidore, The Babylonian Talmud, 586
 Epstein, Isidore, The Responsa of Rabbi Simon b. Zemah Duran as a Source of the History of the Jews in North Africa, 15
 Epstein, Lawrence J., Conversion to Judaism, 124
 Epstein, Louis M., The Jewish Marriage Contract, 338
 Epstein, Louis M., Marriage Laws in the Bible and the Talmud, 395
 Epstein, Louis M., Sex Laws and Customs in Judaism, 555
 Epstein, Marc Michael, Dreams of Subversion in Medieval Jewish Art and Literature, 284
 Eran, Amira, Abraham Ibn Daud's Definition of Substance and Accident, 277
 Erens, Patricia, The Jew in American Cinema, 186
 Erspamer, Peter R., The Elusiveness of Tolerance, 48, 233, 598
 Eskenazi, Tamara C., The Sabbath in Jewish and Christian Traditions, 538
 Estess, Ted L., Elie Wiesel, 616
 Etkes, Immanuel, Rabbi Israel Salanter and the Mussar Movement, 161, 430, 516
 Etzion, Judith, The Music of the Judeo-Spanish Romancero, 438
 Exum, J. Cheryl, Fragmented Women, 624
 Exum, J. Cheryl, The New Literary Criticism and the Hebrew Bible, 80
 Exum, J. Cheryl, Plotted, Shot, and Painted, 624
 Eytan, Eli, Hebrew Language, 235
 Ezra, Esmond David, Turning Back the Pages, 62
 Ezrahi, Sidra DeKoven, By Words Alone, 261
 Faber, Eli, A Time for Planting, 606
 Fackenheim, Emil L., To Mend the World, 263, 480
 Fackenheim, Emil L., What Is Judaism?, 325
 Fager, Jeffrey A., Land Tenure and the Biblical Jubilee, 10
 Falk, Marcia, The Book of Blessings, 527
 Falk, Marcia, Love Lyrics from the Bible, 527, 570
 Falk, Marcia, The Song of Songs, 527, 570
 Falk, Ze'ev, Jewish Matrimonial Law in the Middle Ages, 147
 Falk, Ze'ev, Law and Religion, 269
 Faur, José, Golden Doves with Silver Dots, 460
 Feinberg, Chaim, Leaping Souls, 400
 Feingold, Henry L., A Time for Searching, 606
 Feinstein, Moses, Responsa of Rav Moshe Feinstein, 87, 181
 Feld, Merle, A Spiritual Life, 527
 Feldman, David M., Birth Control in Jewish Law, 88, 555
 Feldman, David M., Marital Relations, Birth Control, and Abortion in Jewish Law, 88, 555
 Feldman, Emanuel, Biblical and Post-Biblical Defilement and Mourning, 138
 Feldman, Emanuel, Jewish Law and the New Reproductive Technologies, 529
 Feldman, Louis H., Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World, 217, 237
 Feldman, Louis H., Josephus and Modern Scholarship (1937–1980), 252
 Feldman, Seymour, The Binding of Isaac, 36
 Feldman, Seymour, 1492: A House Divided, 2, 3
 Feldman, William M., Rabbinical Mathematics and Astronomy, 97, 548
 Feliks, Yehuda, The Animal World of the Bible, 188
 Feliks, Yehuda, Nature and Man in the Bible, 155, 188
 Fellman, Jack, The Revival of a Classical Tongue, 71, 367
 Fenton, Paul, Gleanings from Moseh Ibn Ezra's Maqalat al-hadiqa, 280
 Fenton, Paul, The Literary Legacy of David ben Joshua, Last of the Maimonidean Negidim, 390
 Fenton, Paul, The Treatise of the Pool, 390
 Feuer, Lewis S., Recollections of Harry Austryn Wolfson, 622
 Fewell, D.N., Compromising Redemption, 535
 Fewell, D.N., Narrative in the Hebrew Bible, 82
 Fierman, Morton C., Leap of Action, 242
 Filippis, Dimitrios, An Introduction to the Sephardic Language and Literature of the Spanish-Speaking Jews of Thessaloniki, 351
 Fine, Ellen S., Legacy of Night, The Literary Universe of Elie Wiesel, 616
 Fine, Lawrence, The Contemplative Practice of Yihudim, 383
 Fine, Lawrence, Essential Papers on Kabbalah, 332
 Fine, Lawrence, Maggidic Revelation in the Teachings of Isaac Luria, 383
 Fine, Lawrence, Safed Spirituality, 331, 383
 Fine, Steven, Sacred Realm, 38, 581
 Fine, Steven, This Holy Place, 581
 Fineststein, Israel, Jewish Society in Victorian England, 163
 Fink, Dan, Let the Earth Teach You Torah, 155
 Fink, Nan, Stranger in the Midst, 527
 Finkel, Avraham Yaakov, Contemporary Sages, 544
 Finkel, Avraham Yaakov, The Responsa Anthology, 181
 Finkelman, Shimon, Reb Moshe, 181
 Finkelstein, Israel, From Nomadism to Monarchy, 36
 Finkelstein, J.J., The Ox That Gored, 85
 Finkelstein, Louis, Akiba, 14, 511
 Finkelstein, Louis, The Cambridge History of Judaism, 237
 Finkelstein, Louis, Jewish Self-Government in the Middle Ages, 52, 209
 Finkelstein, Louis, The Jews, 248
 Finkelstein, Louis, Louis Ginzberg, 210
 Firestone, Tirtzah, With Roots in Heaven, 527
 Fisch, Harold, S.Y. Agnon, 9
 Fischel, Walter J., Azerbaijan in Jewish History, 292
 Fischel, Walter J., Isfahan, 292
 Fischel, Walter J., Jews in the Economic and Political Life of Mediaeval Islam, 407
 Fischel, Walter J., The Jews of Central Asia (Khorasan) in Medieval Hebrew and Islamic Literature, 292
 Fischel, Walter J., The Jews of Persia, 1795–1940, 292
 Fischel, Walter J., New Sources for the History of the Jewish Diaspora in Asia in the 16th Century, 292
 Fischman, Naomi, Western and Eastern Cultures Reflected in Modern Hebrew Literature, 236
 Fishbane, Michael, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel, 80, 85
 Fishbane, Michael, The Garments of Torah, 81
 Fishberg, Maurice, The Jews, 517
 Fishelis, Avraham, Judges, 329
 Fishelis, Shmuel, Judges, 329
 Fisher, Eugene J., Twenty Years of Jewish-Catholic Relations, 113
 Fisher, Eugene J., Visions of the Other, 113
 Fishman, David, Russia's First Modern Jews, 161

- Fishman, Joshua A., Never Say Die!, 357
 Fishman, Sylvia Barack, A Breath of Life, 180, 183
 Fishman, Talya, Shaking the Pillars of Exile, 5, 7, 416, 525
 Fishman, William J., East End Jewish Radicals, 1875–1914, 381
 Fitzmyer, Joseph A., A Wandering Aramean, 357
 Flam, Gila, Singing for Survival, 436
 Flannery, Edward H., The Anguish of the Jews, 113
 Flanzbaum, Hilene, The Americanization of the Holocaust, 261
 Fleisher, Robert, Twenty Israeli Composers, 433
 Flesher, Paul V.M., Ancient Synagogues, 581
 Flesher, Paul V.M., Oxen, Women or Citizens?, 562
 Flint, Peter, The Dead Sea Scrolls after Fifty Years, 136
 Fokkelman, J.P., Narrative Art and Poetry in the Books of Samuel, 542
 Folberg, Neil, And I Shall Dwell among Them, 40
 Fontaine, Carole, A Feminist Companion to Reading the Bible, 80, 624
 Fontaine, Carole, Traditional Sayings in the Old Testament, 506
 Fontaine, Carole, Women, War, and Metaphor, 624
 Foss, Clive, Byzantine and Turkish Sardis, 38
 Fossum, Jarl E., The Name of God and the Angel of the Lord, 22
 Fowler, Jeaneane D., Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew, 459
 Fox, Everett, The Five Books of Moses, 73, 527
 Fox, Joseph, Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Kotzk, 400
 Fox, Marvin, Interpreting Maimonides, 41, 422
 Fox, Marvin, R. Isaac Arama's Philosophical Exegesis of the Golden Calf Episode, 36
 Fox, Michael V., Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther, 166, 187
 Fox, Michael V., Proverbs, 506
 Fox, Michael V., Qohelet, 153
 Fox, Michael V., Qohelet and His Contradictions, 153
 Fox, Michael V., The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs, 570
 Fox, Michael V., Tearing Down and Building Up, 153
 Foxbrunner, Roman A., The Hasidism of Rabbi Shneur Zalman of Lyadi, 223
 Fraade, Steven, Ascetical Aspects of Ancient Judaism, 45
 Fraade, Steven, From Tradition to Commentary, 412, 460
 Fraade, Steven, The Nazirite in Ancient Judaism (Selected Texts), 45
 Frame, Grant, Babylonia, 689–627 B.C., 59
 Frank, Anne, The Diary of a Young Girl, 449
 Frank, Daniel H., History of Jewish Philosophy, 277, 478
 Frank, Daniel H., A People Apart, 110, 257
 Frank, Yitzhak, Grammar for Gemara, 587
 Frank, Yitzhak, The Practical Talmud Dictionary, 587
 Frankel, Ellen, The Five Books of Miriam, 527
 Frankel, Jonathan, The Damascus Affair, 582
 Franks, Abigail, The Lee Max Friedman Collection of American Jewish Colonial Correspondence, 452
 Fredericks, Daniel C., Coping with Transience, 153
 Freedman, David Noel, The Anchor Bible Dictionary, 33, 74, 165
 Freedman, David Noel, Palestine in Transition, 250
 Freedman, David Noel, Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy, 484
 Freedman, H., Midrash Rabbah, 409
 Freedman, Jacob, Polychrome Historical Haggadah for Passover, 224
 Freehof, Solomon B., Devotional Literature in the Vernacular, 632
 Freehof, Solomon B., The Responsa Literature, 227
 Freeman, Lucy, The Story of Anna O., 463
 Freid, Jacob, Jews and Divorce, 147
 Frenkley, Helen, Ecology in the Bible, 155
 Frerichs, Ernest S., The Bible and Bibles in America, 73
 Freudenthal, Gad, Maimonides' Stance on Astrology in Context, 49
 Frieden, Ken, Classic Yiddish Fiction, 402, 471, 557
 Frieden, Ken, Tales of Mendele the Book Peddler, 403
 Friedenberg, Robert V., Hear O Israel, 267
 Friedland, Eric L., Were Our Mouths Filled with Song, 380
 Friedlander, Albert H., Leo Baeck, 61
 Friedlander, Gerald, Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer, 409
 Friedländer, Michael, The Commentary of Ibn Ezra on Isaiah, 278, 295
 Friedländer, Michael, Essays on the Writings of Abraham ibn Ezra, 278
 Friedländer, Saul, Probing the Limits of Representation, 261
 Friedman, Elizabeth, Colonialism and After, 15
 Friedman, Jerome, The Most Ancient Testimony, 110
 Friedman, Lawrence S., Understanding Cynthia Ozick, 462
 Friedman, Lester D., American-Jewish Filmmakers, 186
 Friedman, Lester D., The Jewish Image in American Film, 186
 Friedman, Maurice, Abraham Joshua Heschel and Elie Wiesel, 242
 Friedman, Maurice, Encounter on the Narrow Ridge, 93
 Friedman, Maurice, Martin Buber, 93
 Friedman, Maurice, Martin Buber's Life and Work, 93
 Friedman, Menachem, Habad as Messianic Fundamentalism, 223
 Friedman, Mordechai Akiva, Jewish Marriage in Palestine, 201, 338, 395
 Friedman, Mordechai Akiva, Marriage as an Institution, 147
 Friedman, Murray, Jewish Life in Philadelphia, 1830–1940, 605
 Friedman, Murray, What Went Wrong?, 89
 Friedman, Robert I., The False Prophet, 333
 Friesel, Evyatar, Atlas of Modern Jewish History, 521
 Friess, Horace L., Felix Adler and Ethical Culture, 168
 Fritz, Volkmar, An Introduction to Biblical Archaeology, 36
 Fritz, Volkmar, The Origins of the Ancient Israelite States, 250
 Fromm, Herbert, On Jewish Music, 435
 Frymer-Kensky, Tikva, In the Wake of the Goddesses, 287
 Fuchs, Esther, Israeli Mythologies, 236
 Fuerst, Wesley J., The Books of Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, Lamentations, 187
 Fuks, Suzon, Keeping the Light, 117
 Fuks-Mansfeld, Renate, The History of the Jews in the Netherlands, 449
 Funkenstein, Amos, Perceptions of Jewish History, 244, 246, 427
 Furman, Andrew, Israel through the Jewish-American Imagination, 18
 Gabler, Neal, An Empire of Their Own, 186
 Gager, John G., The Origins of Anti-Semitism, 25
 Gal, Allon, David Ben-Gurion and the American Alignment for a Jewish State, 68
 Galliner, Helmuth, Agathius Guidacerius 1477?–1540, 367
 Gammie, John G., The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, 617
 Gans, Mozes Heiman, Memorbook, 449
 Ganzfried, Solomon, Code of Jewish Law/Kitzur Schulchan Aruch, 140
 Gaon, Solomon, The Influence of the Catholic Theologian Alfonso Tostado on the Pentateuch Commentary of Isaac Abravanel, 2

- Garber, Zev, Academic Approaches to Teaching Jewish Studies, 325
- Garber, Zev, Methodology in the Academic Teaching of Judaism, 325
- Garber, Zev, Methodology in the Academic Teaching of the Holocaust, 263
- Garber, Zev, The Samaritan Passover, 540
- Garber, Zev, Shoah, 263
- García Martínez, Florentino, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated, 136
- Garrett, Don, The Cambridge Companion to Spinoza, 573
- Garshowitz, Libby, Gracia Mendes, 446
- Garsiel, Moshe, The First Book of Samuel, 542
- Gartner, Lloyd P., Jewish Education in the United States, 157
- Gartner, Lloyd P., The Jewish Immigrant in England, 1870–1914, 221
- Gaster, Moses, History of the Ancient Synagogue of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, the Cathedral Synagogue of the Jews in England, Situate in Bevis Marks, 453
- Gaster, Moses, The Ketubah, 338
- Gaster, Moses, Samaritan Eschatology, 540
- Gaster, Moses, The Samaritans, 540
- Gaster, Theodor H., The Feast of Booths, 579
- Gaster, Theodor H., Passover, 464
- Gat, Moshe, The Jewish Exodus from Iraq, 1948–1951, 293
- Gay, Ruth, The Jews of Germany, 208
- Geiger, Abraham, Abraham Geiger and Liberal Judaism, 197
- Geiger, Abraham, Judaism and Islam, 429
- Gelb, Ignace J., A Study of Writing, 234
- Gelles, Benjamin, Peshat and Derash in the Exegesis of Rashi, 83
- Gellman, Ezra, Essays on the Thought and Philosophy of Rabbi Kook, 346
- Genn, Mordecai, The Influence of Rabbinic Literature on the Poetry of Hayim Nahman Bialik, 72
- Gerber, Jane S., Jewish Society in Fez 1450–1700, 421
- Gerber, Jane S., The Jews of Spain, 554
- Gerhardsson, Birger, Memory and Manuscript, 460
- Gershenzon, Shoshana, The Circle Metaphor in Leone Ebreo's Dialoghi d'amore, 4
- Geva, Hillel, Ancient Jerusalem Revealed, 309
- Gibbs, Robert, Correlations in Rosenzweig and Levinas, 530
- Gidal, Tim, Henrietta Szold, 583
- Gieschen, Charles A., Angelomorphic Christology, 22
- Gikatilla, Joseph ben Abraham, Gates of Light/Sh'are Orah, 331
- Gil, Moshe, The Babylonian Yeshivot and the Maghrib in the Early Middle Ages, 638
- Gil, Moshe, Documents of the Jewish Pious Foundations from the Cairo Geniza, 201
- Gil, Moshe, The Exilarchate, 172
- Gil, Moshe, A History of Palestine, 634–1099, 201, 204, 335
- Gilath, Itzchak, R. Eliezer Ben Hyrcanus, 511
- Gilbert, Arthur, The Vatican Council and the Jews, 113
- Gilbert, Martin, Atlas of the Holocaust, 521
- Gilbert, Martin, The Holocaust, 259
- Gilbert, Martin, The Illustrated Atlas of Jewish Civilization, 521
- Gilbert, Martin, Jerusalem, 309
- Gilbert, Martin, Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century, 309
- Gilbert, Martin, Jewish History Atlas, 521
- Giller, Pinchas, The Enlightened Will Shine, 648
- Giller, Pinchas, Recovering the Sanctity of the Galilee, 610
- Gillman, Neil, Conservative Judaism, 121
- Gilman, Sander, Freud, Race, and Gender, 518
- Gilman, Sander, The Jew's Body, 29, 90, 517
- Gilman, Sander, Yale Companion to Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture, 1096–1996, 285
- Ginsburg, Christian D., Cohemoth, 153
- Ginsburg, Christian D., Introduction to the Massoretico-Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible, 398
- Ginsburg, Christian D., Jacob ben Chajim's Introduction to the Rabbinic Bible, 398
- Ginsburg, Elliot K., The Sabbath in the Classical Kabbalah, 332, 580
- Ginsburg, Elliot K., Sod ha-Shabbat/The Mystery of the Sabbath, 331
- Ginzberg, Eli, Keeper of the Law, 210, 545
- Ginzberg, Eli, Studies in the Economics of the Bible, 156
- Ginzberg, Louis, Geonica, 204
- Ginzberg, Louis, The Legends of the Jews, 409
- Ginzberg, Louis, The Responsa of Professor Louis Ginzberg, 210
- Ginzberg, Louis, Students, Scholars and Saints, 161, 194, 545
- Ginzburg, Simon, The Life and Works of Moses Hayyim Luzzatto, Founder of Modern Hebrew Literature, 384
- Gitelman, Zvi, The Quest for Utopia, 52, 543
- Gitenstein, R. Barbara, American-Jewish Poetry, 488
- Gitenstein, R. Barbara, Apocalyptic Messianism and Contemporary Jewish-American Poetry, 488
- Giveon, Raphael, The Impact of Egypt on Canaan, 98
- Glatzer, Nahum N., Baeck-Buber-Rosenzweig Reading the Book of Job, 61
- Glatzer, Nahum N., The Passover Haggadah, 224
- Glazer, Nathan, Beyond the Melting Pot, 452
- Glenn, Susan A., Daughters of the Shtetl, 626
- Globe, Leah Ain, The Dead End, 11
- Gluckman, Ann, Identity and Involvement, 50
- Gluckman, Laurie, Identity and Involvement, 50
- Godbey, Allen H., The Lost Tribes a Myth, 599
- Goitein, Shelomo Dov, Contemporary Letters on the Capture of Jerusalem by the Crusaders, 130
- Goitein, Shelomo Dov, Jews and Arabs, 297
- Goitein, Shelomo Dov, A Mediterranean Society, 125, 201, 255, 322, 390, 395, 454, 638
- Goitein, Shelomo Dov, Moses Maimonides, Man of Action, 422
- Golb, Norman, Jewish Proselytism, 339
- Golb, Norman, The Jews in Medieval Normandy, 638
- Golb, Norman, Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century, 339
- Golb, Norman, New Light on the Persecution of French Jews at the Time of the First Crusade, 504
- Golb, Norman, Sixty Years of Genizah Research, 202
- Gold, Leonard S., A Sign and a Witness, 91
- Goldberg, Ellen S., The Last Jews of Cochín, 117
- Goldberg, Harvey E., Cave Dwellers and Citrus Growers, 372
- Goldberg, Harvey E., Jewish Life in Muslim Libya, 372
- Goldberg, Hillel, Between Berlin and Slobodka, 568, 622
- Goldberg, Hillel, Israel Salanter, Text, Structure, Idea, 229, 430
- Golden, Peter B., Khazars, 339
- Golden, Peter B., Khazar Studies, 339
- Goldenberg, Esther, Hebrew Language, 235
- Goldhagen, Daniel Jonah, Hitler's Willing Executioners, 259
- Goldin, Judah, The Classic Midrash, 412
- Goldin, Judah, The Fathers According to Rabbi Nathan, 409
- Goldin, Judah, On the Sleuth of Slobodka and the Cortez of Kabbalah, 622
- Goldin, Judah, The Song at the Sea, 412, 590
- Goldingay, John E., Daniel, 135

- Goldish, Matt, Newtonian, Converso and Deist, 453
- Goldman, Eric A., Visions, Images, and Dreams, 186
- Goldman, Lazarus Morris, The History of the Jews in New Zealand, 50
- Goldman, S., Samuel, 542
- Goldman, Solomon, The Ten Commandments, 141
- Goldscheider, Calvin, Jewish Continuity and Change, 552
- Goldscheider, Calvin, The Transformation of the Jews, 256
- Goldschmidt, E.D., The Passover Haggadah, 224
- Goldsmith, Arnold L., The Golem Remembered, 1909–1980, 218, 324
- Goldsmith, Emanuel S., The American Judaism of Mordecai M. Kaplan, 334
- Goldstein, Bernard R., The Astronomy of Levi ben Gerson (1288–1344), 363
- Goldstein, David, The Ashkenazi Haggadah, 392
- Goldstein, Jonathan A., 1 Maccabees, 239
- Goldstein, Jonathan A., 2 Maccabees, 239
- Goldstein, Joseph, Jewish History in Modern Times, 552
- Goldstein, Sidney, Lithuanian Jewry, 377
- Goldstein, Sidney, Suicide in Rabbinic Literature, 577
- Goldwurm, Hersh, Succos, 579
- Goldwurm, Hersh, The Talmud/Talmud Bavli, 586
- Goldy, Robert G., The Emergence of Jewish Theology in America, 568, 576
- Golinkin, David, Introduction to The Responsa of Professor Louis Ginzberg, 210
- Golka, Friedemann W., The Leopard's Spots, 506
- Gonen, Rivka, Burial Patterns and Cultural Diversity in Late Bronze Age Canaan, 102
- Goodblatt, David, The Monarchic Principle, 345, 373, 496
- Goodblatt, David, The Place of the Pharisees in First Century Judaism, 472
- Goodblatt, Morris, Jewish Life in Turkey in the Sixteenth Century, as Reflected in the Legal Writings of Samuel de Medina, 554
- Goode, A.D., The Exilarchate in the Eastern Caliphate, 637–1258, 172
- Goodenough, Erwin R., By Light, Light, 474
- Goodenough, Erwin R., An Introduction to Philo Judaeus, 474
- Goodenough, Erwin R., Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, 43, 284, 580
- Goodenough, Erwin R., The Politics of Philo Judaeus, 474
- Goodman, David, Jews in the Japanese Mind, 29
- Goodman, Lenn Evan, The Book of Theodicy, 537
- Goodman, Lenn Evan, Monotheism, 214
- Goodman, Lenn Evan, Neoplatonism and Jewish Thought, 447
- Goodman, M., Sadducees and Essenes after 70 C.E., 539
- Goodman, Martin, The Roman State and the Jewish Patriarch in the Third Century, 465
- Goodman, Naomi, The Challenge of Shalom, 613
- Goodman, Philip, The Passover Anthology, 224
- Goodman, Philip, The Sukkot and Simhat Torah Anthology, 579
- Goodman, Saul, The Faith of Secular Jews, 552
- Gopin, Marc, The Religious Ethics of Samuel David Luzzatto, 384
- Gordis, Robert, The Biblical Text in the Making, 398
- Gordis, Robert, The Book of God and Man, 316
- Gordis, Robert, Koheleth, 153
- Gordis, Robert, The Song of Songs, 187
- Gordon, Barry, Economic Analysis in Talmudic Literature, 156
- Gordon, Cyrus H., The Bible and the Ancient Near East, 20
- Gordon, H.L., The Maggid of Caro, 101
- Gordon, Robert P., Wisdom in Ancient Israel, 617
- Goren, Arthur A., New York Jews and the Quest for Community, 452
- Gorni, Yosef, The State of Israel in Jewish Public Thought, 285
- Goshen-Gottstein, Moshe, Foundations of Biblical Philology in the Seventeenth Century Christian and Jewish Dimensions, 367
- Goshen-Gottstein, Moshe, Tanakh Theology, 77
- Gottwald, Norman K., The Hebrew Bible, 75
- Gould, Eric, The Sin of the Book, 307
- Gowan, Donald E., Eschatology in the Old Testament, 165
- Grabbe, Lester L., Can a "History of Israel" Be Written?, 250
- Grabbe, Lester L., Etymology in Early Jewish Interpretation, 459
- Grabbe, Lester L., Ezra-Nehemiah, 176
- Grabbe, Lester L., Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian, 237, 319, 539
- Grabbe, Lester L., Priests, Prophets, Diviners, Sages, 345, 495
- Gradenwitz, Peter, The Music of Israel, 432, 441
- Graetz, Heinrich, History of the Jews, 101, 164, 248, 318
- Graetz, Heinrich, The Structure of Jewish History, and Other Essays, 220
- Graetz, Michael, The Jews in Nineteenth-Century France, 190
- Graetz, Michael, Tradition and Enlightenment, 1600–1780, 205
- Graf, David Frank, Palestine in Transition, 250
- Graham, Matt P., The Chronicler as Historian, 115
- Granskou, David, Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity, 25
- Gray, John, The Canaanites, 98
- Gray, John, I and II Kings, 344
- Grayzel, Solomon, The Avignon Popes and the Jews, 504
- Grayzel, Solomon, The Confession of a Medieval Jewish Convert, 504
- Grazi, Richard V., Be Fruitful and Multiply, 529
- Green, Arthur, Introduction to Upright Practices by Menahem Nahum of Chernobyl, 527
- Green, Arthur, Keter, 331
- Green, Arthur, The Language of Truth, 527
- Green, Arthur, Seek My Face, Speak My Name, 527
- Green, Arthur, Tormented Master, 445, 516
- Green, Nancy L., The Pletzl of Paris, 313
- Green, William Scott, What's in a Name?, 511
- Greenbaum, Masha, The Jews of Lithuania, 377
- Greenberg, Blu, How to Run a Traditional Jewish Household, 185
- Greenberg, Blu, On Women and Judaism, 11, 183
- Greenberg, Eliezer, Introduction to Selected Stories [of I.L. Peretz], 471
- Greenberg, Irving, Confronting the Holocaust, 616
- Greenberg, Irving, The Jewish Way, 185, 538
- Greenberg, Irving, Religious Values after the Holocaust, 263
- Greenberg, Louis, The Jews in Russia, 533
- Greenberg, Moshe, Ezekiel 1–20, 174
- Greenberg, Moshe, Ezekiel 21–37, 174
- Greenberg, Moshe, Studies in the Bible and Jewish Thought, 78, 85, 336
- Greenberg, Moshe, Understanding Exodus, 173
- Greenfield, Jonas C., The Genesis Apocryphon, 357
- Greenstein, Edward L., Humour and Wit, 272
- Greenstein, Edward L., Medieval Bible Commentaries, 83
- Greenstein, Edward L., The State of Jewish Studies, 315
- Greenstein, Michael, Third Solitudes, 100
- Greil, Arthur L., Gender and the Experience of Conversion, 58
- Grinstein, Hyman B., The Rise of the Jewish Community of New York, 1654–1860, 452

- Grizzard, Nigel, Jews in an Inner London Borough, 381
- Groner, Tsvi, The Legal Methodology of Hai Gaon, 204, 227
- Grose, Peter, Israel in the Mind of America, 477
- Gross, John, Shylock, 370
- Grossman, Avraham, The Historical Background to the Ordinances on Family Affairs Attributed to Rabbenu Gershom Me'or ha-Golah ("The Light of the Exile"), 209
- Grossman, Grace Cohen, Judaica at the Smithsonian, 42
- Grossman, Susan, Daughters of the King, 581, 630
- Grotte, Alfred, Tombstones, 103
- Grözinger, Karl Erich, Mysticism, Magic, and Kabbalah in Ashkenazi Judaism, 387
- Gruber, Mayer I., Rashi's Commentary on Psalms, 508
- Grunfeld, Isidor, The Jewish Dietary Laws, 146
- Grunfeld, Isidor, Shemittah and Yobel, 10
- Guède, Norina Lami, No More for Ever, 15
- Guggenheimer, Eva H., Jewish Family Names and Their Origins, 459
- Guggenheimer, Heinrich W., Jewish Family Names and Their Origins, 459
- Gunkel, Hermann, The Legends of Genesis, 200
- Gunn, David M., Compromising Redemption, 535
- Gunn, David M., The Fate of King Saul, 500
- Gunn, David M., Narrative in the Hebrew Bible, 82
- Gurary, Natan, The Thirteen Principles of Faith, 179
- Gurney, O.R., The Hittites, 98
- Gurock, Jeffrey S., A Modern Heretic and a Traditional Community, 334
- Gurock, Jeffrey S., When Harlem Was Jewish, 1870–1930, 452
- Gutman, Israel, The Jews of Poland between Two World Wars, 489
- Gutmann, Joseph, Beauty in Holiness, 42
- Gutmann, Joseph, The Dura-Europos Synagogue, 43
- Gutmann, Joseph, Hebrew Manuscript Painting, 91, 392
- Gutmann, Joseph, No Graven Images, 284
- Gutmann, Joseph, Sacred Images, 43
- Guttmann, Alexander, Akiba, "Rescuer of the Torah," 14
- Guttmann, Allen, The Jewish Writer in America, 18
- Guttmann, Julius, Establishing Norms for Jewish Belief, 148
- Guttmann, Julius, Philosophies of Judaism, 4, 41, 277, 422, 478, 480
- Haas, Peter J., A History of the Mishnaic Law of Agriculture, 10, 597
- Haas, Peter J., Responsa: The Literary History of a Rabbinic Genre, 228
- Haase, Wolfgang, Religion: Hellenistisches Judentum in Römischer Zeit, 474
- Habel, Norman C., The Book of Job, 316
- Habel, Norman C., Literary Criticism of the Old Testament, 469
- Haberman, Jacob, Kaufmann Kohler and His Teacher Samson Raphael Hirsch, 243
- Haberman, Jacob, Maimonides and Aquinas, 422
- Hachlili, Rachel, Ancient Jewish Art and Archaeology in the Diaspora, 43
- Hachlili, Rachel, Ancient Jewish Art and Archaeology in the Land of Israel, 43
- Hachlili, Rachel, Jewish Funerary Customs during the Second Temple Period, in the Light of the Excavations at the Jericho Necropolis, 102
- Hackett, Jo Ann, The Balaam Text from Deir 'Alla, 455
- Hadda, Janet, Isaac Bashevis Singer, 561
- Haddad, Heskel M., Flight from Babylon, 293
- Hailperin, Herman, Rashi and the Christian Scholars, 110, 566
- Hakak, Lev, Equivocal Dreams, 236
- Hakohen, Mordechai, The Book of Mordechai, 372
- Halamish, Mosheh, An Introduction to the Kabbalah, 332
- Halbertal, Moshe, Idolatry, 287
- Halio, Hank, Ladino Reveries, 352
- Halio, Jay, Daughters of Valor, 634
- Halkin, Abraham, Ibn 'Aqin's Commentary on the Song of Songs, 17
- Halkin, Abraham, Judeo-Arabic Literature, 328
- Halkin, Abraham, Zion in Jewish Literature, 300
- Halkin, Simon, Modern Hebrew Literature, 236, 487
- Hallo, William W., The Ancient Near East, 20
- Halper, Jeff, Musica Mizrahit, 440
- Halperin, David J., The Faces of the Chariot, 212, 332
- Halperin, David J., Seeking Ezekiel, 174
- Halperin, Irving, Messengers from the Dead, 261
- Halpern, Baruch, The Constitution of the Monarchy in Israel, 345
- Halpern, Baruch, The Emergence of Israel in Canaan, 98
- Hals, Ronald M., The Theology of the Book of Ruth, 535
- Hammer, Reuven, The Classic Midrash, 412
- Hammer, Reuven, The Jerusalem Anthology, 309
- Hammer, Reuven, Sifre, 411, 412
- Hamori, Andras, Lights in the Heart of the Sea, Some Images of Judah Halevi's, 322
- Hamori, Andras, On the Art of Medieval Arabic Literature, 485
- Hamori, Andras, Rhetoric and the Succession of Themes in a Poem by Samuel Hanagid, 283
- Hampshire, Stuart, Spinoza, 573
- Handler, Andrew, Ararat, 273
- Handler, Andrew, Dori, 241
- Handler, Andrew, From the Ghetto to the Games, 273
- Hanfmann, George M.A., Sardis from Prehistoric to Roman Times, 38
- Hankoff, Leon D., Judaic Origins of the Suicide Prohibition, 577
- Hanson, Paul D., The Dawn of Apocalyptic, 30, 165
- Haran, Menahem, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel, 495, 585, 593
- Harden, Donald B., The Phoenicians, 98
- Harel, Yaron, Changes in Syrian Jewry, 1840–1880, 582
- Hareuveni, Nogah, Ecology in the Bible, 155
- Harford-Battersby, G., The Hexateuch According to the Revised Version, 469
- Harmon, Lawrence, The Death of an American Jewish Community, 565
- Harrelson, Walter J., The Ten Commandments and Human Rights, 141
- Harrington, Daniel J., The Maccabean Revolt, 33
- Harrington, Daniel J., The Sabbath in Jewish and Christian Traditions, 538
- Harris, David A., The Jokes of Oppression, 272
- Harris, Errol E., Spinoza's Philosophy, 573
- Harris, Errol E., The Substance of Spinoza, 573
- Harris, Jay, How Do We Know This?, 161
- Harris, Jay, Nachman Krochmal, 347
- Harris, Jay, Rabbi Abraham ibn Ezra, 279
- Harris, Monford, The Theologico-Historical Thinking of Samuel Luzzatto, 384
- Harris, Scott L., Proverbs 1–9, 506
- Harris, Tracy K., Death of a Language, 357
- Harshav, Benjamin, The Meaning of Yiddish, 641
- Hartley, John E., Leviticus, 366
- Hartman, Ann, Celebration and Negotiation, 65
- Hartman, David, A Living Covenant, 568
- Hartman, David, Maimonides, 422
- Hartman, Geoffrey, Holocaust Remembrance, 261
- Hartman, Geoffrey, Midrash and Literature, 409

- Harvey, Warren Zev, Hebraism and Western Philosophy in H.A. Wolfson's Theory of History, 622
- Hary, Benjamin, Multiglossia in Judeo-Arabic, 328
- Hasel, Gerhard F., The Flowering of Old Testament Theology, 78
- Hasel, Gerhard F., Understanding the Book of Amos, 502
- Haskell, Guy, Crypto-Jews of the American Southwest, 131
- Hauptman, Judith, Rereading the Rabbis, 147, 183, 253, 630
- Hauschild, Thomas, Auschwitz Jokes, 272
- Haut, Irwin, Divorce in Jewish Law and Life, 11
- Haut, Rivka, The Agunah and Divorce, 11
- Haut, Rivka, Daughters of the King, 581, 630
- Haut, Rivka, Women in Bondage, 11
- Hayes, John H., A History of Ancient Israel and Judah, 250
- Hayes, John H., Isaiah, the Eighth-Century Prophet, 295
- Hayes, John H., Israelite and Judaeon History, 250
- Haynes, Stephen R., To Each Its Own Meaning, 82
- Hayward, Robert, The Jewish Temple, 593
- Healey, John F., The Early Alphabet, 234
- Heaton, Eric William, The School Tradition of the Old Testament, 69
- Hecht, Neil S., An Introduction to the History and Sources of Jewish Law, 85, 225
- Heilman, Samuel C., Cosmopolitans and Parochials, 417
- Heilman, Samuel C., Defenders of the Faith, 229, 640
- Heilman, Samuel C., Synagogue Life, 417, 581
- Heinemann, Joseph, Prayer in the Talmud, 379
- Heller, Bernhard, Ginzberg's Legends of the Jews, 210
- Heller, James, Isaac M. Wise, 619
- Heller, Joseph, Maimonides' Theory of Miracle, 414
- Heller Wilensky, Sarah, Isaac Arama on the Creation and Structure of the World, 36
- Hellig, Jocelyn, The Jewish Community in South Africa, 571
- Helmreich, William B., The World of the Yeshiva, 229, 640
- Hemsi, Alberto, Cancionero Sefardí, 352, 352
- Hengel, Martin, Judaism and Hellenism, 237, 252
- Hengel, Martin, Paul between Damascus and Antioch, 217, 467
- Hengel, Martin, The Pre-Christian Paul, 467
- Henningsen, Gustav, The Inquisition in Early Modern Europe, 393
- Henry, Sondra, Written Out of History, 626
- Heppner, Ernest G., Shanghai Refuge, 108
- Herbst, Marion, Selected Works of Mendele Moykher-Sforim, 403
- Herculano, Alexandre, History of the Origin and Establishment of the Inquisition in Portugal, 492
- Herford, R. Travers, Pirke Aboth, 564
- Herford, R. Travers, The Ethics of the Talmud, 564
- Herlitz, G., Three Jewish Historians, 220
- Herman, Menahem, Tithe as Gift, 597
- Hernández, Frances, The Secret Jews of the Southwest, 131
- Herr, Moshe David, Midreshei Halakhah, 412
- Herring, Basil F., Euthanasia, 171
- Hershkowitz, Leo, Wills of Early New York Jews, 1704-1799, 452
- Hershman, Abraham M., Rabbi Isaac ben Sheshet Perfet and His Times, 15
- Herskowitz, William K., Judeo-Christian Dialogue in Provence as Reflected in Milhemet Mitzva of R. Meir Hameili, 504
- Hertzberg, Arthur, The French Enlightenment and the Jews, 163, 190
- Hertzberg, Arthur, The Jews in America, 606
- Hertzberg, Arthur, Judaism, 325
- Hertzberg, Arthur, The Zionist Idea, 71
- Herzl, Theodor, The Diaries of Theodor Herzl, 643
- Herzl, Theodor, The Jewish State, 643
- Herzl, Theodor, Old-New Land, 643
- Herzog, Elizabeth, Life Is with People, 558
- Herzog, Isaac, The Main Institutions of Jewish Law, 225
- Heschel, Abraham J., God in Search of Man, 127, 481
- Heschel, Abraham J., Israel, 300
- Heschel, Abraham J., Maimonides, 422
- Heschel, Abraham J., A Passion for Truth, 400
- Heschel, Abraham J., Prophetic Inspiration after the Prophets, 499
- Heschel, Abraham J., The Prophets, 499
- Heschel, Abraham J., The Sabbath, 185, 325, 538
- Heschel, Susannah, Abraham Geiger and the Jewish Jesus, 197, 621
- Heschel, Susannah, Moral Grandeur and Spiritual Audacity, 527
- Heschel, Susannah, On Being a Jewish Feminist, 183, 628
- Heskes, Irene, Passport to Jewish Music, 435
- Heskes, Irene, Yiddish American Popular Songs, 1895 to 1950, 436
- Hess, Richard S., I Studied Inscriptions from before the Flood, 128
- Hilberg, Raul, The Destruction of the European Jews, 259
- Hill, Brad S., Books Printed on Vellum in the Collections of the British Library, 498
- Hill, Brad S., Hebraica (Saec. X ad Saec. XVI), 498
- Hill, Brad S., Incunabula, Hebraica and Judaica, 497
- Hill, Brad S., Miscellanea hebraica bibliographica, 91
- Hillel, Shlomo, Operation Babylon, 293
- Hillers, Delbert R., Lamentations, 355
- Himmelfarb, Milton, The Jews of Modernity, 168
- Hirsch, S.A., A Book of Essays, 243
- Hirschberg, Haim Zeev, A History of the Jews in North Africa, 454
- Hirschfeld, Hartwig, Literary History of Hebrew Grammarians and Lexicographers, 367
- Hirschler, Gertrude, The Jews of Czechoslovakia, 104, 313
- Hirshberg, Jehoash, Music in the Jewish Community of Palestine, 1880-1948, 433, 440
- Hoberman, J., Bridge of Light, 186
- Hochberg, Reuven, I Kings, 344
- Hochman, Baruch, The Fiction of S.Y. Agnon, 9
- Hoening, Sidney B., Jewish Identity, 301
- Hoffman, Anne Golomb, Between Exile and Return, 9
- Hoffman, Eva, Shtetl, 558
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., Beyond the Text, 257
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., The Canonization of the Synagogue Service, 379, 483
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., The Changing Face of Jewish and Christian Worship in North America, 380
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., Covenant of Blood, 116
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., Gates of Understanding, 380
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., The Land of Israel, 300
- Hoffman, Lawrence A., The Making of Jewish and Christian Worship, 379
- Hoffman, Louise, Hebrew, Israelite, Jew, 50
- Hoffmann, N.D., Book of Memoirs, 571
- Hoglund, Kenneth G., Achaemenid Imperial Administration in Syria-Palestine and the Missions of Ezra and Nehemiah, 176
- Hoglund, Kenneth G., The Chronicler as Historian, 115
- Holladay, William L., Jeremiah, 308
- Hollander, John, The Question of Jewish American Poetry, 488

- Holtz, Barry, Back to the Sources, 325, 588, 590
- Holtz, Barry, Best Practices Project, 65
- Homolka, Walter, Jewish Identity in Modern Times, 61
- Homolka, Walter, Not by Birth Alone, 124
- Hoobler, Dorothy, The Jewish American Family Album, 180
- Hooke, S.H., Babylonian and Assyrian Religion, 59
- Hopkins, Simon, Judaeo-Arabic Papyri, 327
- Hopkins, Simon, On Early Judaeo-Arabic Orthography, 327, 356
- Horkheimer, Max, Dialectic of Enlightenment, 48
- Horovitz, Saul, Midrash-Halakah, 412
- Horowitz, Amy, Performance in Disputed Territory: Israeli Mediterranean Music, 440
- Horowitz, Sara R., Voicing the Void, 261
- Horwitz, Rivka, Buber's Way to "I and Thou," 93
- House, Paul R., Forming Prophetic Literature, 500
- House, Paul R., The Unity of the Twelve, 502
- Howe, Irving, The Immigrant Jews of New York, 1881 to the Present, 452
- Howe, Irving, Introduction to Selected Stories [of I.L. Peretz], 471
- Howe, Irving, World of Our Fathers, 452
- Hrushovski, Benjamin, Note on the Systems of Hebrew Versification, 484
- Hsia, R. Po-chia, In and Out of the Ghetto, 206
- Hsia, R. Po-chia, The Myth of Ritual Murder, 27, 369
- Huberman, Ida, Living Symbols, 284
- Humphreys, W. Lee, Crisis and Story, 75
- Hundert, Gershon D., Essential Papers on Hasidism, 229
- Hundert, Gershon D., The Jews in Poland and Russia, 377, 533
- Hurwitz, Deena, Walking the Red Line, 613
- Husik, Isaac, A History of Mediaeval Jewish Philosophy, 277, 422, 479
- Husik, Isaac, Philosophical Essays, Ancient, Mediaeval and Modern, 422
- Huss, Boaz, Sefer ha-Zohar as a Canonical, Sacred and Holy Text, 648
- Hyman, Arthur, Philosophy in the Middle Ages, 479
- Hyman, Mavis, Jews of the Raj, 62
- Hyman, Naomi, Biblical Women in the Midrash, 527
- Hyman, Paula E., The Emancipation of the Jews of Alsace, 163, 191
- Hyman, Paula E., From Dreyfus to Vichy, 190
- Hyman, Paula E., Gender and Assimilation in Modern Jewish History, 198, 256
- Hyman, Paula E., The Introduction of Bat Mitzvah in Conservative Judaism in Postwar America, 65
- Hyman, Paula E., The Jewish Family, 180
- Hyman, Paula E., Jewish Women in America, 521, 626
- Hyman, Paula E., The Jews of Modern France, 191
- Idel, Moshe, Golem, 218
- Idel, Moshe, Hasidism, 6, 231, 387
- Idel, Moshe, Kabbalah, 6, 332
- Idel, Moshe, Language, Torah, and Hermeneutics in Abraham Abulafia, 6
- Idel, Moshe, The Mystical Experience in Abraham Abulafia, 6
- Idel, Moshe, Mystical Union and Monotheistic Faith, 447
- Idel, Moshe, One from a Town, Two from a Clan, 556
- Idel, Moshe, Studies in Ecstatic Kabbalah, 6
- Idelsohn, A.Z., Jewish Liturgy and Its Development, 379
- Idelsohn, A.Z., Jewish Music in Its Historical Development, 432, 440, 441
- Idelsohn, A.Z., Thesaurus of Oriental Hebrew Melodies, 431, 440
- Iggers, Wilma Abeles, The Jews of Bohemia and Moravia, 104, 313
- Ilan, Tal, Jewish Women in Greco-Roman Palestine, 374
- Infield, Henrik, Cooperative Living in Palestine, 341
- Insdorf, Annette, Indelible Shadows, 266
- Irvine, Stuart A., Isaiah, the Eighth-Century Prophet, 295
- Isaac, E., Circumcision as a Covenant Rite, 116
- Isaacs, Ronald H., Ascending Jacob's Ladder, 22
- Isaacs, Ronald H., The Jewish Sourcebook on the Environment and Ecology, 155
- Isbell, Charles David, Malachi, 564
- Isenberg, Shirley Berry, India's Bene Israel, 67
- Ishida, Tomoo, The Royal Dynasties in Ancient Israel, 345
- Israel, Benjamin Jacob, The Bene Israel of India, 67
- Israel, Jonathan I., European Jewry in the Age of Mercantilism, 1550-1750, 46, 211, 313
- Israel Museum, Architecture in the Hanukkah Lamp, 42
- Isser, Edward, Stages of Annihilation, 594
- Ivry, Alfred L., Remnants of Jewish Averroism in the Renaissance, 4
- Jackson, Bernard, Essays in Jewish and Comparative Legal History, 85
- Jackson, Bernard, An Introduction to the History and Sources of Jewish Law, 225
- Jackson, Bernard, The Jewish Law Annual, 225
- Jackson, Bernard, Jewish Law in Legal History and the Modern World, 226
- Jackson, Bernard, Modern Research in Jewish Law, 226
- Jackson, Kenneth T., The Encyclopedia of New York City, 452
- Jackson, Stanley, The Sassoons, 62
- Jacob, Benno, The Second Book of the Bible, 173
- Jacob, Walter, Conversion to Judaism in Jewish Law, 124
- Jacob, Walter, Not by Birth Alone, 124
- Jacobs, Joseph, Catalogue of the Anglo-Jewish Historical Exhibition, Royal Albert Hall, London, 1887, 42
- Jacobs, Louis, Faith, 179
- Jacobs, Louis, Hasidic Prayer, 231
- Jacobs, Louis, Holy Living, 45, 257
- Jacobs, Louis, Introduction to The Palm Tree of Deborah by Moses Cordovero, 383
- Jacobs, Louis, Jewish Biblical Exegesis, 82, 83
- Jacobs, Louis, Jewish Ethics, Philosophy and Mysticism, 479
- Jacobs, Louis, The Jewish Religion, 521
- Jacobs, Louis, Principles of the Jewish Faith, 148, 179
- Jacobs, Louis, Studies in Talmudic Logic and Methodology, 590
- Jacobs, Louis, The Talmudic Argument, 590
- Jacobs, Louis, Theology in the Responsa, 228
- Jacobs, Louis, A Tree of Life, 5
- Jacobson, David C., Does David Still Play before You?, 487
- Jacobson, Joshua R., Ta'amey Hamikra, 431
- Jaffee, Martin S., Early Judaism, 253, 325
- Jaffee, Martin S., Mishnah's Theology of Tithing, 10, 597
- Jakovovits, Immanuel, Jewish Medical Ethics, 87, 88, 171, 529
- Japhet, Sara, I and II Chronicles, 115
- Jarick, John, Gregory Thaumaturgos' Paraphrase of Ecclesiastes, 153
- Jason, Heda, Studies in Jewish Ethnopoetry, 272
- Jerusalmi, Isaac, From Ottoman Turkish to Ladino, 357
- Jhirad, Ralph E., Demographic and Socio-Economic Characteristics of Jews in India, 288
- Johnson, Barbara C., 'Our Community' in Two Worlds, 117
- Johnson, Barbara C., Ruby of Cochín, 117, 628

- Jonge, M. de, Outside the Old Testament, 33
- Jordt Jørgensen, K.E., Encyclopedia of Bible Creatures, 188
- Joselit, Jenna Weissman, New York's Jewish Jews, 417
- Joseph, Norma Baumel, Hair Distractions, 182
- Joseph, Norma Baumel, Jewish Education for Women, 181
- Joseph, Norma Baumel, Mehitza, 181
- Joseph, Norma Baumel, Separate Spheres, 181
- Josephus, Flavius, Works, English and Greek, 45
- Jouon, Paul, A Grammar of Biblical Hebrew, 235
- Jung, Leo, Jewish Leaders, 1750–1940, 229
- Kadish, Sharman, Building Jerusalem, 40
- Kadushin, Max, The Rabbinic Mind, 589
- Kagan, Andrew, Marc Chagall, 107
- Kaganoff, Benzion C., A Dictionary of Jewish Names and Their History, 459
- Kaganoff, Nathan, Judaica Americana, 521
- Kahle, Paul, The Cairo Geniza, 398
- Kahn, Nancy E., The Adult Bat Mitzvah, 65
- Kalechofsky, Roberta, The Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook, 609
- Kalechofsky, Roberta, Judaism and Animals Rights, 24, 609
- Kalechofsky, Roberta, Rabbis and Vegetarianism, 609
- Kalechofsky, Roberta, Vegetarian Judaism, 609
- Kalmin, Richard, Genealogy and Polemics in Rabbinic Literature of Late Antiquity, 374
- Kalmin, Richard, Patterns and Developments in Rabbinic Midrash of Late Antiquity, 409
- Kalmin, Richard, Relationships between Rabbis and Non-Rabbis in Rabbinic Literature of Late Antiquity, 374
- Kalmin, Richard, The Sage in Jewish Society of Late Antiquity, 253
- Kamen, Henry, The Spanish Inquisition, 289, 572
- Kamenetz, Rodger, The Jew in the Lotus, 527
- Kamenetz, Rodger, Stalking Elijah, 527
- Kamenskii, Aleksandr Abramovich, Chagall, 107
- Kamin, Sarah, Secundum Salomonem, 566
- Kaminska, Ida, My Life, My Theater, 594
- Kampf, Avram, Contemporary Synagogue Art, 40
- Kanarfogel, Ephraim, Jewish Education and Society in the High Middle Ages, 209, 230, 638
- Kanarfogel, Ephraim, On the Assessment of R. Moses b. Nahman and His Literary Oeuvre, 427
- Kanarfogel, Ephraim, Rabbinic Authority and the Right to Open an Academy in Medieval Ashkenaz, 638
- Kanof, Abram, Jewish Ceremonial Art and Religious Observance, 42
- Kanof, Abram, Jewish Symbolic Art, 580
- Kanter, Kenneth A., The Jews on Tin Pan Alley, 435
- Kaplan, Aryeh, The Light Beyond, 303, 364
- Kaplan, Aryeh, Meditation and Kabbalah, 6
- Kaplan, Aryeh, Until the Mashiah, 445
- Kaplan, Aryeh, Waters of Eden, 413
- Kaplan, Edward K., Holiness in Words: Abraham Joshua Heschel's Poetics of Piety, 242
- Kaplan, Lawrence, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook and Jewish Spirituality, 346
- Kaplan, Lawrence, The Religious Philosophy of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, 568
- Kaplan, Marion A., The Jewish Feminist Movement in Germany, 463
- Kaplan, Mordecai M., The Future of the American Jew, 519
- Kaplan, Mordecai M., Judaism as a Civilization, 481
- Kaplan, Mordecai M., The Meaning of God in Modern Jewish Religion, 214
- Kaplan, Steven, The Beta Israel (Falasha) in Ethiopia, 170
- Kaplan, Yosef, From Christianity to Judaism, 554
- Kaplan, Yosef, The Intellectual Ferment in the Spanish-Portuguese Community of Seventeenth Century Amsterdam, 492
- Kaplan, Yosef, Menasseh ben Israel and His World, 401
- Kapstein, Israel, Pesikta de-Rab Kahana, 409
- Karády, Viktor, A Social and Economic History of Central European Jewry, 104, 273
- Karas, Joza, Music in Terezín, 1941–1945, 433
- Karo, Joseph ben Ephraim, The Kosher Code of the Orthodox Jew, 146
- Karp, Abraham J., From the Ends of the Earth, 91
- Karp, Abraham J., Haven and Home, 606
- Karp, Abraham J., A History of the Jews in America, 606
- Karp, Abraham J., Jewish Continuity in America, 545
- Karsh, Efraim, In Search of Identity, 301
- Kasher, Aryeh, The Jews in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt, 159
- Kasher, Menahem M., The Western Wall, 615
- Kasimow, Harold, Divine-Human Encounter, 242
- Kasimow, Harold, No Religion Is an Island, 242
- Kates, Judith A., Reading Ruth, 535
- Kats, Yosef, Between Jerusalem and Hebron, 341
- Katsh, Abraham, Judaism in Islam, 429
- Katz, David S., The Jews in the History of England, 1485–1850, 221, 477
- Katz, David S., Philo-Semitism and the Readmission of the Jews to England, 1603–1655, 401
- Katz, Israel J., Judeo-Spanish Ballads from Oral Tradition, 351
- Katz, Israel J., Judeo-Spanish Traditional Ballads from Jerusalem, 438
- Katz, Israel J., Pre-Expulsion Tune Survivals Among Judeo-Spanish Ballads?, 438
- Katz, Jacob, Exclusiveness and Tolerance, 34, 146, 203, 255
- Katz, Jacob, From Prejudice to Destruction, 29, 163
- Katz, Jacob, Out of the Ghetto, 163, 233, 256, 552, 598
- Katz, Jacob, The "Shabbes Goy," 203, 538
- Katz, Jacob, Tradition and Crisis, 52, 404
- Katz, Nathan, The Last Jews of Cochim, 117
- Katz, Nathan, Studies of Indian Jewish Identity, 288
- Katz, Shmuel, Lone Wolf, 647
- Katz, Solomon, The Jews in the Visigothic and Frankish Kingdoms of Spain and Gaul, 572
- Katz, Stephen, The Centrifugal Novel, 9
- Katz, Steven T., Jewish Ideas and Concepts, 214
- Katz, Steven T., Jewish Philosophers, 478
- Katz, Steven T., Post-Holocaust Dialogues, 93
- Katzburg, Nathaniel, Hungary and the Jews, 273
- Katznelson, Ira, Paths of Emancipation, 162, 552
- Kaufman, Debra Renee, Rachel's Daughters, 58, 628
- Kaufman, Jonathan, Broken Alliance, 89
- Kaufmann, Yehezkel, The Biblical Account of the Conquest of Canaan, 336
- Kaufmann, Yehezkel, Christianity and Judaism, 337
- Kaufmann, Yehezkel, The Religion of Israel, 78, 85, 216, 287, 336, 469, 499
- Kautsky, Karl, Are the Jews a Race?, 517
- Kautzsch, E., Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, 235
- Kauvar, Elaine M., Cynthia Ozick's Fiction, 462

- Kaye/Kantrowitz, Melanie, The Issue Is Power, 628
- Kaye/Kantrowitz, Melanie, The Tribe of Dina, 628
- Kayser, Rudolf, The Life and Time of Jehudah Halevi, 322
- Kee, Howard Clark, American Bible Society Symposium Papers on The Bible in the Twenty-first Century, 73
- Keel, Othmar, The Symbolism of the Biblical World, 508
- Kehimkar, Haem Samuel, The History of the Bene Israel of India, 67
- Kelley, Page H., The Masorah of Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, 398
- Kellner, Menachem, Dogma in Medieval Jewish Thought, 148, 479
- Kellner, Menachem, Gersonides and His Cultured Despisers, 36, 414
- Kellner, Menachem, Gersonides on Miracles, the Messiah and Resurrection, 414
- Kellner, Menachem, Gersonides on the Problem of Volitional Creation, 414
- Kellner, Menachem, Introduction to Principles of Faith/Rosh Amanah by Isaac Abravanel, 2
- Kenyon, Kathleen, Archaeology in the Holy Land, 36
- Kepnes, Steven, The Text as Thou, 93
- Keren, Zvi, Contemporary Israeli Music, 433
- Kermode, Frank, The Literary Guide to the Bible, 80
- Kessner, Thomas, The Golden Door, 452
- Kielsky, Vera Emuna, Inevitable Exiles, 462
- Kiener, Ron, The Early Kabbalah, 331
- Kieval, Hillel J., The Making of Czech Jewry, 104, 494
- Kieval, Hillel J., Pursuing the Golem of Prague, 218
- Killebrew, Ann, Jewish Funerary Customs during the Second Temple Period, in the Light of the Excavations at the Jericho Necropolis, 102
- Kimhi, Joseph, The Book of the Covenant, 343
- Kimhi, Moses, Commentary on the Book of Job, 343
- Kimmerling, Baruch, Zionism and Economy, 341, 645
- King, Philip, Amos, Hosea, Micah, 502
- Kirschenbaum, Aaron, Equity in Jewish Law, 5
- Kisch, Guido, Jewry-law in Medieval Germany, 206
- Kisch, Guido, The Jews in Medieval Germany, 206
- Kitchen, K.A., Pharaoh Triumphant, 464
- Ki Tov, Elyahu, The Book of Our Heritage, 185
- Klagsbald, Victor, Jewish Treasures from Paris, 42
- Klausner, Samuel Z., How to Think about Mass Religious Conversion, 34
- Kleeblatt, Norman L., Too Jewish?, 90, 518
- Klein, Isaac, A Guide to Jewish Religious Practice, 121, 140, 538
- Klein, Lillian R., The Triumph of Irony in the Book of Judges, 329
- Klein, Ralph W., Ezekiel, 174
- Kleinberger, Aaron Fritz, The Didactics of Rabbi Loew of Prague, 324
- Klenicki, Leon, Toward a Theological Encounter, 113
- Klepfsiz, Irena, The Tribe of Dina, 628
- Kligman, Mark, Modes of Prayer, 440
- Klima, Cynthia Ann, A Tricultural Theatrical Tradition, 594
- Klirs, Tracy Guren, The Merit of Our Mothers/Bizkhus imohes, 633
- Kloomok, Isaac, Marc Chagall, 107
- Klorman, Bat-Zion Eraqi, The Jews of Yemen in the Nineteenth Century, 637
- Klugman, Elyahu Meir, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, 516
- Knibb, Michael A., Israel's Prophetic Tradition, 30
- Knierim, Rolf, The Task of Old Testament Theology, 78
- Knight, Douglas A., The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, 74
- Knobel, Peter, The Aramaic Bible, 153
- Knobel, Peter, Gates of the Seasons, 185
- Knohl, Israel, The Sanctuary of Silence, 257, 337, 366, 469, 495
- Knox, Israel, Rabbi in America, 619
- Kober, Adolf, Jewish Converts in Provence (and Comptat-Venaissin) from the Sixteenth to the Eighteenth Century, 504
- Kobler, Franz, The Vision Was There, 477
- Kobrin, Nancy H., Holocaust Literature in Judeo-Spanish, Portuguese and Spanish, 352
- Kochan, Lionel, Beyond the Graven Image, 284
- Kochan, Lionel, Jews, Idols and Messiahs, 287
- Koehler, Ludwig, The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament, 235
- Kohlenberger, John R., The NRSV Concordance Unabridged, 74
- Kohlenberger, John R., The Parallel Apocrypha, 32
- Kohler, Kaufmann, Cemetery, 103
- Kohler, Kaufmann, The Origins of the Synagogue and the Church, 379
- Kohn, Murray, The Voice of My Blood Cries Out, 487
- Kolatch, Alfred J., Complete Dictionary of English and Hebrew First Names, 459
- Koltun, Elizabeth, The Jewish Woman, 183
- Komlosch, Yehudah, The Etymological Basis of Certain Translations in the Targum Jonathan to the Twelve Prophets, 357
- Komoróczy, Géza, Jewish Budapest, 273
- Koningsveld, P. Sj. van, Yemenite Authorities and Jewish Messianism, 637
- Konvitz, Milton R., Judaism and the American Idea, 269
- Kornberg, Jacques, At the Crossroads, 13
- Kornberg, Jacques, Theodor Herzl, 241
- Korros, Alexandra Shecket, American Synagogue History, 581
- Kosmin, Barry A., Jewish Identity in an Anglo-Jewish Community, 381
- Kosmin, Barry A., Jews in an Inner London Borough, 381
- Kottek, Samuel S., Medicine in Bible and Talmud, 399
- Kraabel, A.T., The Disappearance of the "God-Fearers," 217
- Kraeling, Emil G., The Brooklyn Museum Aramaic Papyri, 160
- Kraemer, David Charles, The Jewish Family, 180
- Kraemer, David Charles, The Mind of the Talmud, 589
- Kraemer, David Charles, Reading the Rabbis, 589
- Kraemer, Ross, Jewish Women in the Diaspora World of Late Antiquity, 253
- Kraft, Robert A., Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters, 237, 252
- Krämer, Gudrun, The Jews in Modern Egypt, 1914-1952, 159
- Kramer, Samuel Noah, From the Tablets of Sumer, 20
- Kramer, Samuel Noah, History Begins at Sumer, 20
- Kramer, Simon, God and Man in the "Sefer Hasidim," Book of the Pious, 230
- Kranzler, George, Hasidic Williamsburg, 544
- Krassen, Miles, The Generations of Adam, 331
- Kraut, Benny, From Reform Judaism to Ethical Culture, 168
- Kravitz, Leonard S., The Hidden Doctrine of Maimonides' "Guide for the Perplexed," 422
- Kravitz, Leonard S., The Revealed and the Concealed, 422
- Kremer, S. Lillian, Witness through the Imagination, 18, 261
- Krentz, Edgar, The Historical-Critical Method, 82
- Krinsky, Carol Herselle, Synagogues of Europe, 38, 40
- Kripke, Myer S., Solomon Schechter's Philosophy of Judaism, 545

- Kristeva, Julia, Strangers to Ourselves, 48
 Krolloff, Charles A., When Elijah Knocks, 564
 Kronfeld, Chana, On the Margins of Modernism, 487
 Kronish, Amy, World Cinema, 186
 Krupnick, Eliyahu, The Gateway to Learning, 587
 Kugel, James, The Bible as It Was, 409
 Kugel, James, The "Bible as Literature" in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages, 17
 Kugel, James, The Idea of Biblical Poetry, 484
 Kugel, James, In Potiphar's House, 409
 Kugel, James, Traditions of the Bible, 409
 Kuhnen, Hans-Peter, Palästina in Griechisch-Römischer Zeit, 252
 Kührt, Amélie, The Ancient Near East, c. 3000-330 BC, 20
 Kulka, Otto Dov, Comenius and Maharal, 324
 Kurzman, Dan, Ben-Gurion, 68
 Kushner, Gilbert, Immigrants from India in Israel, 117
 Kushner, Harold S., When Bad Things Happen to Good People, 595
 Kushner, Lawrence, God Was in This Place and I, I Did Not Know, 527
 Kutscher, Edward, Aramaic, 357
 Kutscher, Edward, Hebrew and Aramaic Studies, 357
 Kuzmack, Linda Gordon, Woman's Cause, 419
- Lachower, Yeruham Fischel, The Wisdom of the Zohar, 331, 648
 Lacocque, André, Daniel in His Time, 135
 Laffey, Alice L., An Introduction to the Old Testament, 76
 Lambert, Wilfrid G., The Background to Jewish Apocalyptic, 30
 Lamm, Maurice, The Jewish Way in Death and Mourning, 103, 140
 Lamm, Maurice, The Jewish Way in Love and Marriage, 395
 Lamm, Norman, Faith and Doubt, 179
 Lamm, Norman, The Ideology of the Neturei Karta, 451
 Lamm, Norman, Judaism and the Modern Jewish Attitude to Homosexuality, 268
 Lamm, Norman, Torah Lishmah, 161
 Landau, David, Piety and Power, 451
 Landau, Jacob M., Jews in Nineteenth-Century Egypt, 159
 Landau, Yehezkel, Violence and the Value of Life in Jewish Tradition, 613
 Lander, Janice, Comparison of Ring Block, Dorsal Penile Nerve Block, and Topical Anesthesia for Neonatal Circumcision, 116
 Landes, Daniel, Confronting Omnicide, 613
- Landis, Joseph C., Aspects of I.B. Singer, 562
 Landshut, S., Jewish Communities in the Muslim Countries of the Middle East, 407
 Lang, Berel, Writing and the Holocaust, 261
 Langer, Lawrence L., Admitting the Holocaust, 261
 Langer, Lawrence L., The Holocaust and the Literary Imagination, 261
 Langer, Lawrence L., Versions of Survival, 261
 Langer, Ruth, To Worship God Properly, 379
 Langermann, Y. Tzvi, Maimonides' Repudiation of Astrology, 49
 Langermann, Y. Tzvi, Some Astrological Themes in the Thought of Abraham Ibn Ezra, 49
 Langmuir, Gavin I., History, Religion, and Antisemitism, 255
 Langmuir, Gavin I., Toward a Definition of Antisemitism, 27, 111, 255, 369
 Langton, Edward, Essentials of Demonology, 22
 Laqueur, Walter, A History of Zionism, 643, 647
 Larkin, Katrina J.A., Ruth and Esther, 166, 535
 Lasker, Daniel J., Chasdai Crescas, 129
 Lasker, Daniel J., Jewish Philosophical Polemics against Christianity in the Middle Ages, 479
 Lasker, Daniel J., The Refutation of the Christian Principles by Hasdai Crescas, 129
 Laskier, Michael M., The Alliance Israélite Universelle and the Jewish Communities of Morocco, 1862-1962, 421
 Laskier, Michael M., From Hafsia to Bizerte, 602
 Laskier, Michael M., The Jews of Egypt, 1920-1970, 159
 Laskier, Michael M., North African Jewry in the Twentieth Century, 454
 Laskin, Martin, Secular Holidays in Modern Israel, 185
 Lassner, Jacob, Demonizing the Queen of Sheba, 198
 Lauterbach, Jacob, Mekilta de-Rabbi Ishmael, 411, 412
 Lauterbach, Jacob, She'elot u-Teshubot, 228
 Lawee, Eric, On the Threshold of the Renaissance, 2
 Lazard, G., Judeo-Persian: Language, 357
 Lea, Henry Charles, A History of the Inquisition of Spain, 572
 Lea, Henry Charles, A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages, 289
 Leaman, Oliver, Evil and Suffering in Jewish Philosophy, 150, 316, 596
 Leaman, Oliver, History of Jewish Philosophy, 277, 478
- Leaman, Oliver, Moses Maimonides, 422
 Lehmann, Hartmut, In and Out of the Ghetto, 206
 Leibowitz, Nehama, Studies in Bereshit (Genesis) in the Context of Ancient and Modern Jewish Bible Commentary, 200
 Leibowitz, Yeshayahu, Judaism, Human Values, and the Jewish State, 301
 Leifer, Daniel I., On Writing New Ketubot, 338
 Leiter, S., Bialik, Hayyim Nahman, 72
 Leneman, Helen, Bar/Bat Mitzvah Education, 65
 Lenowitz, Harris, The Jewish Messiahs, 193
 Leon, Dan, Chaim Weizmann, 614
 Leon, Dan, The Kibbutz, 341
 Leoni, Aron di Leone, Mendes, Benveniste, De Luna, Micas, Nasi, 446
 Lerner, Anne Lapidus, Gender and Text in Modern Hebrew and Yiddish Literature, 634
 Lerner, Michael, Jewish Renewal, 527
 Leslau, Wolf, Falasha Anthology, 170
 Lesley, Arthur M., The Place of the Dialoghi d'amore in Contemporaneous Jewish Thought, 4
 Lesley, Arthur M., Proverbs, Figures, and Riddles, 4
 Leslie, Donald Daniel, The Survival of the Chinese Jews, 108
 Lesser, Jeffrey, Welcoming the Undesirables, 361
 Levenson, Jon D., Creation and the Persistence of Evil, 128, 150
 Levenson, Jon D., The Death and Resurrection of the Beloved Son, 396
 Levenson, Jon D., Esther, 166
 Levenson, Jon D., The Hebrew Bible, the Old Testament, and Historical Criticism, 78
 Levenson, Jon D., The Hermeneutical Defense of Martin Buber, 93
 Levenson, Jon D., Sinai and Zion, 76, 78, 127, 257, 593
 Levenson, Jon D., Yehezkel Kaufmann and Mythology, 337
 Levertoff, Paul P., Midrash Sifre on Numbers, 411
 Levertoff, Paul P., The Zohar, 331
 Levi, Leo, Halachic Times for Home and Travel, 97
 Levi, Leo, Jewish Chronology, 97
 Levias, C., Gematria, 456
 Levi ben Gershom, The Commentary of Levi ben Gerson (Gersonides) on the Book of Job, 363, 596
 Levi ben Gershom, Commentary on Song of Songs, 363
 Levi ben Gershom, The Wars of the Lord, 363
 Levin, Nora, The Jews in the Soviet Union since 1917, 533

- Levin, Shalom, History of Chabad in the Holy Land, 223
- Levin, Shalom, History of Chabad in the U.S.A., 223
- Levin, Shalom, History of Chabad in the U.S.S.R., 223
- Levinas, Emmanuel, In the Image of God, according to Rabbi Hayyim Volozhiner, 430
- Levinas, Emmanuel, Nine Talmudic Readings, 365
- Levinas, Emmanuel, Totality and Infinity, 481
- Levinas, Emmanuel, Useless Suffering, 430
- Levine, Aaron, Economic Public Policy and Jewish Law, 156
- Levine, Aaron, Economics and Jewish Law, 156
- Levine, Aaron, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law, 156
- Levine, Amy-Jill, Women Like This, 626
- Levine, Baruch A., Leviticus/Va-yikra, 366
- Levine, Baruch A., Numbers 1–20, 455, 495
- Levine, Hillel, The Death of an American Jewish Community, 565
- Levine, Joseph A., Synagogue Song in America, 432, 435
- Levine, Lee I., Ancient Synagogues Revealed, 36, 39
- Levine, Lee I., The Rabbinic Class of Roman Palestine in Late Antiquity, 19, 465
- Levine, Lee I., The Synagogue in Late Antiquity, 43
- Levine, Molly Myerowitz, The Gendered Grammar of Ancient Mediterranean Hair, 125
- Levine, Robert M., Tropical Diaspora, 361
- Levinson, Bernard M., Deuteronomy and the Hermeneutics of Legal Innovation, 85
- Levitats, Isaac, The Jewish Community in Russia, 1844–1917, 533
- Levitt, Laura, Jews and Feminism, 183, 630
- Levitt, Laura, Judaism since Gender, 183
- Levitz, Irving N., Crisis and Continuity, 180
- Levy, Caren, Jewish Identity in an Anglo-Jewish Community, 381
- Lévy, Isaac Jack, And the World Stood Silent, 352
- Levy, Raphael, The Astrological Works of Abraham Ibn Ezra, 49
- Levy, Raphael, The Beginning of Wisdom, An Astrological Treatise by Abraham Ibn Ezra, 49
- Lewis, Bernard, The Jews of Islam, 429
- Lewis, I.M., Descent, 374
- Lewis, Theodore J., Cults of the Dead in Ancient Israel and Ugarit, 138
- Lewittes, Mendell, Principles and Development of Jewish Law, 101
- Leydesdorff, Selma, We Lived with Dignity, 449
- Liberles, Robert, Champion of Orthodoxy, 243
- Liberles, Robert, Religious Conflict in Social Context, 243
- Libowitz, Richard, Methodology in the Academic Teaching of the Holocaust, 263
- Libowitz, Richard, Mordecai M. Kaplan and the Development of Reconstructionism, 334
- Lichtenstein, Aharon, The Ideology of Hesder, 640
- Lichtenstein, Aharon, Joseph Soloveitchik, 568
- Lichtenstein, Diane, Writing Their Nations, 634
- Lieberman, Stephen J., A Mesopotamian Background for the So-Called Aggadic “Measures” of Biblical Hermeneutics, 456
- Liebes, Yehuda, Studies in Jewish Myth and Jewish Messianism, 332, 556
- Liebes, Yehuda, Studies in the Zohar, 648
- Liebman, Charles S., Aspects of the Religious Behavior of American Jews, 519
- Liebman, Charles S., Religion and Politics in Israel, 301
- Lieu, J.M., The Race of the God-Fearers, 217
- Lieu, Judith, Image and Reality, 112
- Lifson, David S., The Yiddish Theatre in America, 594
- Lightstone, J., Sadducees versus Pharisees, 539
- Lindemann, Albert S., The Jew Accused, 370, 477
- Linzer, Norman, Crisis and Continuity, 180
- Lipiner, Elias, Two Portuguese Exiles in Castile, 492
- Lipman, V.D., Social History of the Jews in England, 1850–1950, 221
- Lipshitz, Abe, The Commentary of Rabbi Abraham Ibn Ezra on Hosea Edited from Six Manuscripts and Translated with an Introduction and Notes, 278
- Liptzin, Solomon, Germany’s Stepchildren, 208
- Liptzin, Solomon, The Jew in American Literature, 488
- Liptzin, Solomon, The Maturing of Yiddish Literature, 641
- Littell, Franklin H., The Crucifixion of the Jews, 263
- Litvin, Baruch, Jewish Identity, 301
- Litvinoff, Barnet, Weizmann, 614
- Liver, Jacob, “The Sons of Zadok the Priests” in the Dead Sea Sect, 496
- Lloyd, Genevieve, Routledge Philosophy Guidebook to Spinoza and the Ethics, 573
- Lloyd Jones, G., The Discovery of Hebrew in Tudor England, 110
- Lockman, Zachary, Comrades and Enemies, 645
- Locks, Gutman G., The Spice of Torah-Gematria, 456
- Lockshin, Martin I., Rabbi Samuel ben Meir’s Commentary on Genesis, 84
- Loeb, Laurence D., Outcaste, 292
- Loewe, H., Isaac Abravanel, 2
- Loewe, Raphael, Hebraists, Christian, 110
- Loewe, Raphael, Ibn Gabirol, 281
- Loewe, Raphael, The Spanish Supplement to Nieto’s Esh Dath, 453
- Loewenthal, Naftali, Communicating the Infinite, 223, 232
- Loewenthal, Robyn Kay, Elia Carmona’s Autobiography, 352
- Long, V. Philips, The Reign and Rejection of King Saul, 500
- Longman, Tremper, The Book of Ecclesiastes, 153
- Lord, J. Henry, The Jews in India and the Far East, 117, 288
- Loshitzky, Yosefa, Spielberg’s Holocaust, 266
- Low, Alfred D., Jews in the Eyes of the Germans, 598
- Lowenstein, Steven M., The Berlin Jewish Community, 404
- Lowenthal, Marvin, Henrietta Szold, 583
- Lowenthal, Marvin, The Memoirs of Glückel of Hameln, 626
- Lowin, Joseph, Cynthia Ozick, 462
- Lowth, Robert, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, 484
- Luckert, Yelena, Soviet Jewish History, 1917–1991, 533
- Lüdemann, Gerd, Heretics, 312
- Lüdemann, Gerd, Ketzer, 312
- Luz, Ehud, Parallels Meet, 301
- Lyman, Stanford M., The Lost Tribes of Israel as a Problem in History and Sociology, 599
- Maccoby, Hyam, Judaism on Trial, 112
- MacDonald, Malcolm, Schoenberg, 547
- Macht, Jiri, Prague Ghetto, 313
- Mack, Burton L., Wisdom and the Hebrew Epic, 70
- Mack, Hananel, The Aggadic Midrash Literature, 409
- MacLennan, Robert S., Early Christian Texts on Jews and Judaism, 25
- Madison, Charles A., Yiddish Literature, 402
- Mahadevan, Meera, Apana Ghara, 67
- Mahadevna, Meera, Shulamith, 67
- Maher, Michael, The Aramaic Bible, 592
- Mahler, Raphael, Hasidism and the Jewish Enlightenment, 489
- Maimonides, Moses, The Book of Agriculture, 108
- Maimonides, Moses, The Code of Maimonides, 97, 140

- Maimonides, Moses, The Commandments, 120
- Maimonides, Moses, The Guide of the Perplexed, 422, 596
- Maimonides, Moses, The Responsum of Maimonides (1135–1204) Concerning Music, 441
- Maimonides, Moses, Sanctification of the New Moon, 97
- Malamat, Abraham, The Period of the Judges, 329
- Malbim, Meir Loeb ben Jehiel Michael, Malbim on Mishley, 506
- Malino, Frances, The Jews in Modern France, 191
- Malka, Eli S., Jacob's Children in the Land of the Mahdi, 159
- Malter, Henry, Saadia Gaon, 204, 513, 537
- Manasseh Ben Israel, The Hope of Israel, 401
- Mandel, Arthur, The Militant Messiah, 193
- Mandel, George, Why Did Ben-Yehuda Suggest the Revival of Spoken Hebrew?, 71
- Mandelbaum, David, Social Stratification among the Jews of Cochín in India and Israel, 117
- Mandelbaum, Irving, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Agriculture, 10
- Manekin, Charles H., The Logic of Gersonides, 363
- Mann, Jacob, The Collected Articles of Jacob Mann, 204
- Mann, Jacob, The Jews in Egypt and in Palestine under the Fatimid Caliphs, 159
- Mann, Jacob, The Responsa of the Babylonian Geonim as a Source of Jewish History, 228
- Mann, Jacob, Texts and Studies in Jewish History and Literature, 172, 202, 335, 390
- Mantel, Hugo, Studies in the History of the Sanhedrin, 465, 543
- Marcus, Abraham, The Middle East on the Eve of Modernity, 582
- Marcus, Ivan G., From Politics to Martyrdom, 130, 396
- Marcus, Ivan G., Piety and Society, 230, 255
- Marcus, Jacob Rader, The Concise Dictionary of American Jewish Biography, 521
- Marcus, Jacob Rader, United States Jewry, 1776–1985, 163, 606
- Marcus, Ralph, Philo in Ten Volumes (and Two Supplementary Volumes), 474
- Margalit, Avishai, Idolatry, 287
- Margolies, Morris B., Samuel David Luzzatto, Traditionalist Scholar, 384
- Margolis, Max L., The Theological Aspect of Reformed Judaism, 148
- Marks, Richard G., The Image of Bar Kokhba in Traditional Jewish Literature, 64
- Marmorstein, Arthur, The Old Rabbinic Doctrine of God, 214, 216
- Marmorstein, Emile, Heaven at Bay, 451
- Maron, Stanley, Kibbutz in a Market Society, 341
- Marrus, Michael R., The Politics of Assimilation, 34, 191
- Marrus, Michael R., Vichy France and the Jews, 191
- Martens, Elmer, The Flowering of Old Testament Theology, 78
- Martin, Bernard, Contemporary Reform Jewish Thought, 524
- Marx, Alexander, Dr. Lieberman's Contribution to Jewish Scholarship, 373
- Marx, Alexander, Essays in Jewish Biography, 545
- Mason, Richard, The God of Spinoza, 214, 573
- Matt, Daniel C., Ayin, 447
- Matt, Daniel C., The Essential Kabbalah, 331, 527
- Matt, Daniel C., Zohar, 331, 527
- Matt, Herschel, Sin, Crime, Sickness or Alternative Life-Style?, 268
- Matthews, Victor H., Old Testament Parallels, 74
- May, Max, Isaac Mayer Wise, the Founder of American Judaism, 619
- Mayes, Andrew David Hastings, Deuteronomy, 142
- Maynard, Isabelle, China Dreams, 108
- Mazar, Amihay, Archaeology of the Land of the Bible, 10,000–586 B.C.E., 36
- Mazar, Benjamin, The Mountain of the Lord, 593
- McBride, Alfred, Heschel, 242
- McCagg, William O., Jr., Jewish Nobles and Geniuses in Modern Hungary, 273
- McCarter, P. Kyle, I Samuel, 542
- McCarter, P. Kyle, II Samuel, 542
- McCarthy, Carmel, The Tiqqune Sopherim and Other Theological Corrections in the Masoretic Text of the Old Testament, 550
- McCarthy, D., Treaty and Covenant, 127
- McConville, J.G., Law and Theology in Deuteronomy, 142
- McGinn, Bernard, Mystical Union and Monotheistic Faith, 447
- McKane, William, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Jeremiah, 308
- McKane, William, Proverbs, 506
- McKane, William, Selected Christian Hebraists, 110
- McKeating, Henry, Ezekiel, 174
- McKenzie, Steven L., The Chronicler as Historian, 115
- McKenzie, Steven L., The Chronicler's Use of the Deuteronomistic History, 115
- McKenzie, Steven L., To Each Its Own Meaning, 82
- McNamara, Martin, The Aramaic Bible, 592
- Méchoulan, Henry, Menasseh ben Israel and His World, 401
- Meeks, Wayne A., Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries of the Common Era, 25
- Meier, John P., A Marginal Jew, 311
- Melamed, Abraham, Medieval and Renaissance Jewish Political Philosophy, 490
- Melamed, Ora, Annals of Iraqi Jewry, 293
- Melammed, Renée Levine, Judaizing Women in Castile, 289
- Memmi, Albert, The Pillar of Salt, 602
- Mendelsohn, Ezra, Modern Jews and Their Musical Agendas, 441
- Mendelsohn, Isaac, Slavery in the Ancient Near East, 562
- Mendelson, Alan, Philo's Jewish Identity, 474
- Mendelssohn, Moses, Jerusalem, or, On Religious Power and Judaism, 481
- Mendenhall, George, Covenant Forms in Israelite Tradition, 127
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul, Divided Passions, 530
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul, From Mysticism to Dialogue, 93
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul, Gershom Scholem, 548
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul, The Jew in the Modern World, 256
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul, The Philosophy of Franz Rosenzweig, 530
- Menes, Abraham, The Yeshivot in Eastern Europe, 640
- Mergui, Raphaël, Israel's Ayatollahs, 333
- Mergui, Raphaël, Meir Kahane, 333
- Merhav, Peretz, The Israeli Left, 645
- Merkle, John C., The Genesis of Faith, 242
- Mersand, Joseph, Traditions in American Literature, 488
- Messer Leon, Judah ben Jehiel, The Book of the Honeycomb's Flow/Sepher Nopheth Suphim, 405
- Mettinger, Tryggve N.D., In Search of God, 459
- Metzger, Bruce M., The New Oxford Annotated Bible with the Apocrypha, 32
- Metzger, Mendel, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, 91, 392
- Metzger, Thérèse, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, 91, 392
- Meyer, Franz, Marc Chagall, 107
- Meyer, Michael A., Ideas of Jewish History, 244, 246
- Meyer, Michael A., Jewish Religious Reform and Wissenschaft des Judentums, 197
- Meyer, Michael A., The Origins of the Modern Jew, 233, 404, 621
- Meyer, Michael A., Response to Modernity, 54, 197, 380, 419, 524, 619

- Meyer, Michael A., Universalism and Jewish Unity in the Thought of Abraham Geiger, 197
- Meyer, Peter, The Jews in the Soviet Satellites, 63
- Meyers, Carol, Discovering Eve, 624
- Meyers, Carol, Families in Ancient Israel, 180
- Meyers, Eric M., Archaeology, the Rabbis, and Early Christianity, 36
- Meyers, Eric M., Jewish Ossuaries, 102
- Michman, Jozeph, The History of Dutch Jewry during the Emancipation Period, 1787–1815, 313, 449
- Mielziner, Moses, Introduction to the Talmud, 590
- Milburn, A.R., Leone Ebreo and the Renaissance, 4
- Milgrom, Jacob, Leviticus 1–16, 366, 495, 560
- Milgrom, Jacob, Numbers/Ba-midbar, 455
- Millar, Fergus, Gentiles and Judaism, 217
- Miller, Chaim, The Rich Go to Heaven, 108
- Miller, David Neal, Fear of Fiction, 562
- Miller, David Neal, Recovering the Canon, 562
- Miller, James Maxwell, A History of Ancient Israel and Judah, 250
- Miller, James Maxwell, Israelite and Judaeon History, 250
- Miller, Patrick D., Sin and Judgment in the Prophets, 560
- Miller, Philip E., Karaite Separatism in Nineteenth-Century Russia, 335
- Miller, Ronald Henry, Dialogue and Disagreement, 531
- Mintz, Alan, The Boom in Contemporary Israeli Fiction, 236
- Mintz, Alan, Hurban, 261, 375
- Mintz, Alan, Prayer and the Prayerbook, 167
- Mintz, Jerome R., In Praise of the Baal Shem Tov [Shivhei ha-Besht], 302
- Mirel, James L., Stepping Stones to Jewish Spiritual Living, 527
- Mirelman, Victor A., Jewish Buenos Aires, 1890–1930, 361
- Miron, Dan, Shalom Aleichem, 557
- Miron, Dan, Sholem Aleykhem: Person, Persona, Presence, 557
- Miron, Dan, Tales of Mendele the Book Peddler, 403
- Miron, Dan, A Traveler Disguised, 403, 641
- Mirrer, Louise, Adultery, Intermarriage, and the Theme of Group Destruction in the Judeo-Spanish Ballad Tradition of Seattle and Los Angeles, 352
- Mirrer, Louise, Reinterpreting an Ancient Legend, 352
- Miscall, Peter D., Isaiah, 295
- Mitchell, Stephen, The Book of Job, 527
- Mitchell, Stephen, Into the Whirlwind, 527
- Miyazawa, Masanori, Jews in the Japanese Mind, 29
- Modrzejewski, Joseph M., The Jews of Egypt, 159, 237
- Moldenke, Alma L., Plants of the Bible, 188
- Moldenke, Harold Norman, Plants of the Bible, 188
- Møller-Christensen, Vilhelm, Encyclopedia of Bible Creatures, 188
- Momigliano, Arnaldo Dante, Essays on Ancient and Modern Judaism, 419
- Montagu, Lilian Helen, The Faith of a Jewish Woman, 420
- Montagu, Lilian Helen, Spiritual Possibilities of Judaism Today, 419
- Montagu, Lilian Helen, Thoughts on Judaism, 419
- Montefiore, Claude Goldsmid, Judaism and St. Paul, 467
- Montgomery, James A., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel, 135
- Montgomery, James A., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Kings, 344
- Montgomery, James A., The Samaritans, the Earliest Jewish Sect, 540
- Moore, Bob, Victims and Survivors, 449
- Moore, Carey, Judith, 239
- Moore, Deborah Dash, At Home in America, 452
- Moore, Deborah Dash, Jewish Women in America, 521, 626
- Moore, Donald, Martin Buber, 93
- Moore, George Foot, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, 589
- Moore, Tracy, Lesbiot, 268, 628
- Morais, Sabato, Italian Hebrew Literature, 384, 532
- Moreen, Vera Basch, Iranian Jewry's Hour of Peril and Heroism, 292
- Morgenstern, Julian, The Ark, the Ephod and the "Tent of Meeting," 585
- Morgenstern, Julian, The 'Bloody Husband' (?) (Exod. 4:24–26) Once Again, 116
- Morrell, Samuel, The Constitutional Limits of Communal Government in Rabbinic Law, 52
- Morris, Jenny, The Jewish Philosopher Philo, 474
- Mosès, Stéphane, System and Revelation, 531
- Moss, Lisa, Circumcision, 116
- Mosse, George L., Confronting the Nation, 643
- Mosse, George L., Germans and Jews, 208
- Mosse, George L., Jews and Non-Jews in Eastern Europe, 1918–1945, 273
- Mosse, Werner E., Revolution and Evolution, 163
- Mossenson, David, Hebrew, Israelite, Jew, 50
- Motte, Warren F., Questioning Edmond Jabès, 307
- Mowinckel, Sigmund Olaf Plytt, He That Cometh, 165
- Moynihan, Daniel P., Beyond the Melting Pot, 452
- Muffs, Yochanan, Studies in the Aramaic Legal Papyri from Elephantine, 160
- Mulder, Martin Jan, Mikra, 80, 239, 550
- Mundill, Robin, England's Jewish Solution, 221
- Muneles, Otto, Prague Ghetto in the Renaissance Period, 494
- Munk, Eliyahu, Aqaydat Yitzchaq, 36
- Munk, Reinier, The Rationale of Halakhic Man, 568
- Muroff, Melvin, Anna O., 463
- Murphy, Roland E., Ecclesiastes, 153
- Murphy, Roland E., The Tree of Life, 506, 617
- Murphy, Roland E., Wisdom Literature, 316
- Musleah, Ezekiel N., On the Banks of the Ganga, 62
- Musleah, Rahel, Songs of the Jews of Calcutta, 62
- Myer, Isaac, Qabbalah, 281
- Myers, David N., Re-Inventing the Jewish Past, 315
- Myers, J.M., Ezra, Nehemiah 176
- Myers, J.M., I Chronicles, 115
- Myers, J.M., II Chronicles, 115
- Mynatt, Daniel S., The Masorah of Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, 398
- Nadich, Judah, Rabbi Akiba and His Contemporaries, 14
- Nadler, Allan, The Faith of the Mithnagdim, 161, 229
- Nahon, Gérard, From New Christians to the Portuguese Jewish Nation in France, 492
- Naor, Mordechai, The Western Wall, 615
- Nar, Albertos, Una pastora yo ami, 352
- Narkiss, Bezalel, Hebrew Illuminated Manuscripts, 91, 392
- Narkiss, Bezalel, Index of Jewish Art, 284
- Nash, Robert N., The Bible in English Translation, 73
- Nathan, Hans, Israeli Folk Music, 436
- Naveh, Joseph, Alphabet, Hebrew, 234
- Naveh, Joseph, Early History of the Alphabet, 234
- Near, Henry, The Kibbutz Movement, 341
- Neher, André, Jewish Thought and the Scientific Revolution of the Sixteenth Century, 494
- Nelson, John Charles, Renaissance Theory of Love, 4
- Nelson, Richard D., Joshua, 321
- Nemoy, Leon, Karaite Anthology, 335
- Neriah, Moshe Zvi, Celebration of the Soul, 346

- Ness, Lester John, Astrology and Judaism in Late Antiquity, 49
- Netanyahu, Benzion, Don Isaac Abravanel, 2, 513
- Netanyahu, Benzion, The Marranos of Spain, 393, 554
- Netanyahu, Benzion, The Origins of the Inquisition in Fifteenth Century Spain, 289, 572
- Netanyahu, Benzion, Toward the Inquisition, 289
- Netzer, Amnon, Irano-Judaica, 357
- Neugroschel, Joachim, The Shtetl, 558
- Neuman, Abraham, The Jews in Spain, 638
- Neusner, Jacob, The Canonical History of Ideas, 412
- Neusner, Jacob, The Components of the Rabbinic Documents, 411, 413
- Neusner, Jacob, Death and Birth of Judaism, 256
- Neusner, Jacob, Development of a Legend, 318, 511
- Neusner, Jacob, Economics of the Mishnah, 156
- Neusner, Jacob, First Century Judaism in Crisis, 318, 511
- Neusner, Jacob, A History of the Jews in Babylonia, 59, 172, 253
- Neusner, Jacob, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Purities, 257, 414
- Neusner, Jacob, How Judaism Reads the Torah, 141
- Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to Midrash, 588, 589, 590
- Neusner, Jacob, Invitation to the Talmud, 588, 589, 590
- Neusner, Jacob, The Judaic Law of Baptism, 414
- Neusner, Jacob, A Life of Rabban Yohanan ben Zakkai, ca. 1–80 C.E., 318, 511
- Neusner, Jacob, Mekhilta According to Rabbi Ishmael, 411, 412
- Neusner, Jacob, Oral Tradition in Judaism, 460
- Neusner, Jacob, The Rabbinic Traditions about the Pharisees before 70, 472
- Neusner, Jacob, The Reformation of Reform Judaism, 524
- Neusner, Jacob, Scriptures of the Oral Torah, 120
- Neusner, Jacob, Sifra, 411
- Neusner, Jacob, Sifra in Perspective, 412
- Neusner, Jacob, Sifre to Deuteronomy, 411, 412
- Neusner, Jacob, Sifre to Numbers, 411
- Neusner, Jacob, The Social Study of Judaism, 565
- Neusner, Jacob, Symbol and Theology in Early Judaism, 580
- Neusner, Jacob, Talmudic Judaism in Sasanian Babylonia, 245
- Neusner, Jacob, The Talmud of Babylonia: An Academic Commentary, 586
- Neusner, Jacob, The Talmud of Babylonia: An American Translation, 586
- Neusner, Jacob, The Talmud of the Land of Israel, 586
- Neusner, Jacob, Tsedakah, 108
- Neusner, Jacob, The Way of Torah, 325
- Neusner, Jacob, Why There Never Was a "Talmud of Caesarea," 373
- Newby, Gordon, A History of the Jews of Arabia, 429, 637
- The New Interpreter's Bible*, 32
- Newman, David, The Impact of Gush Emunim, 301
- Newman, Jacob, Semikha, 543
- Newman, Louis E., Contemporary Jewish Ethics and Morality, 564
- Newman, Louis E., The Sanctity of the Seventh Year, 10
- Newsom, Carol A., Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, 22
- Newsom, Carol A., Woman and the Discourse of Patriarchal Wisdom, 506
- Nicholson, E.W., God and His People, 127
- Nicholson, E.W., The Meaning of the Expression am ha-aretz in the Old Testament, 19
- Nicholson, E.W., Preaching to the Exiles, 308
- Nickelsburg, George W.E., Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters, 237, 252
- Nickelsburg, George W.E., Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah, 33, 239
- Nielsen, Eduard, The Ten Commandments in New Perspective, 141
- Nielsen, Kirsten, Ruth, 187
- Nigal, Gedalyah, Magic, Mysticism, and Hasidism, 57, 387
- Nini, Yehuda, The Jews of Yemen, 1800–1914, 637
- Nirenberg, David, Communities of Violence, 504
- Nogalski, James, Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve, 502
- Nogalski, James, Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve, 502
- Norich, Anita, Gender and Text in Modern Hebrew and Yiddish Literature, 634
- Norris, Christopher, Spinoza and the Origins of Modern Critical Theory, 573
- Noth, Martin, The History of Israel, 250
- Noth, Martin, A History of Pentateuchal Traditions, 469
- Novak, David, The Election of Israel, 110
- Novak, David, The Image of the Non-Jew in Judaism, 203
- Novak, David, Jewish-Christian Dialogue, 531
- Novak, David, Jewish Social Ethics, 564, 565
- Noveck, Simon, Great Jewish Thinkers of the Twentieth Century, 13
- Noveck, Simon, Kaplan and Milton Steinberg, 576
- Noveck, Simon, Milton Steinberg, 576
- Oates, Joan, Babylon, 59
- Oberman, Heiko, The Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Age of Renaissance and Reformation, 27
- O'Brien, Mark, Sources of the Pentateuch, 469
- Odeberg, Hugo, 3 Enoch; or, The Hebrew Book of Enoch, 22
- Oesterreicher, John M., The New Encounter, 113
- Ofer, Dalia, Women in the Holocaust, 626
- Offenberg, A.K., Bibliotheca Rosenthaliana, 91
- Offenberg, A.K., A Choice of Corals, 498
- Offenberg, A.K., Hebrew Incunabula in Public Collections, 498
- Offenberg, A.K., The Spread of Hebrew Printing, 498
- Ohrenstein, Roman, Economic Analysis in Talmudic Literature, 156
- Ollenburger, Ben, The Flowering of Old Testament Theology, 78
- Olmo Lete, Gregorio del, Canaanite Religion, 98
- Olson, Dennis T., Deuteronomy and the Death of Moses, 142
- Olson, Dennis T., Numbers, 455
- Olyan, Saul M., Ben Sira's Relationship to the Priesthood, 496
- Olyan, Saul M., A Thousand Thousands Served Him, 22
- Omer-Man, Jonathan, Worlds of Jewish Prayer, 527
- Onians, John, Tabernacle and Temple and the Cosmos of the Jews, 585
- Oppenheim, A. Leo, Ancient Mesopotamia, 20
- Oppenheim, Micha Falk, Jewish Reference Sources, 521
- Oppenheimer, Aharon, The 'Am Ha-Aretz, 19
- Oratz, Ephraim, And Nothing but the Truth, 400
- Orenstein, Debra, Lifecycles, 527
- Orlinsky, Harry M., A History of Bible Translation and the North American Contribution, 73
- Ornan, Uzzi, Hebrew Grammar, 235
- Ornan, Uzzi, Hebrew Language, 235
- Overholt, Thomas W., The Threat of Falsehood, 308
- Ozick, Cynthia, Sholem Aleichem's Revolution, 557
- Pacernick, Gary, Sing a New Song, 488
- Pagis, Dan, Hebrew Poetry of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, 485
- Paper, Herbert H., Jewish Languages, 357
- Pardes, Ilana, Countertraditions in the Bible, 624

- Parfitt, Tudor, The Beta Israel in Ethiopia and Israel, 170
- Parfitt, Tudor, The Great Transition, 236
- Parfitt, Tudor, Journey to the Vanished City, 599
- Parfitt, Tudor, The Road to Redemption, 637
- Parker, Simon, Ugaritic Narrative Poetry, 484
- Parkes, James, The Conflict of the Church and the Synagogue, 27
- Parkes, James, A History of Palestine from 135 A.D. to Modern Times, 298
- Passamaneck, Stephen, An Introduction to the History and Sources of Jewish Law, 225
- Patai, Jennifer, The Myth of the Jewish Race, 517
- Patai, Raphael, Hayyim Shmuel Falck, 57
- Patai, Raphael, The Hebrew Goddess, 287
- Patai, Raphael, Jadid al-Islam, 292
- Patai, Raphael, The Jewish Alchemists, 387
- Patai, Raphael, The Jews of Hungary, 104, 273
- Patai, Raphael, The Myth of the Jewish Race, 517
- Patai, Raphael, On Jewish Folklore, 132
- Patai, Raphael, The Seed of Abraham, 407
- Patai, Raphael, Tents of Jacob, 46, 144, 313
- Patai, Raphael, The Vanished Worlds of Jewry, 313
- Patterson, David, The Shriek of Silence, 261
- Patterson, David, Tradition and Trauma, 9
- Paucker, Arnold, Revolution and Evolution, 163
- Pawel, Ernst, The Labyrinth of Exile, 241
- Pawel, Ernst, The Nightmare of Reason, 494
- Paxton, Robert O., Vichy France and the Jews, 191
- Pearl, Chaim, The Medieval Jewish Mind, 36
- Pearl, Chaim, Rashi, 84
- Pellegrini, Ann, Performance Anxieties, 518
- Peperzak, Adriaan Theodoor, To the Other, 365
- Perdue, Leo G., Families in Ancient Israel, 180
- Perdue, Leo G., The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, 617
- Perdue, Leo G., Wisdom and Creation, 506, 618
- Peretz, I.L., The I.L. Peretz Reader, 471
- Peretz, I.L., Selected Stories, 471
- Perlman, Lawrence, Abraham Heschel's Idea of Revelation, 242
- Perlman, Robert, Bridging Three Worlds, 273
- Perlmutter, Haim, Tools for Tosafos, 587
- Perry, T. Anthony, Dialogues with Kobelet, 153
- Perry, T. Anthony, Erotic Spirituality, 4
- Perry, T. Anthony, Introduction to Dialogues d'amour by Leo Ebreo, 4
- Person, Raymond Franklin, In Conversation with Jonah, 502
- Peskowitz, Miriam B., Judaism since Gender, 183
- Peskowitz, Miriam B., Spinning Fantasies, 183, 253, 630
- Petersen, David, Interpreting Hebrew Poetry, 484
- Petsonk, Judy, Taking Judaism Personally, 527
- Petuchowski, Jakob J., Haham David Nieto and Deistic Trends in Eighteenth-Century Judaism, 453
- Petuchowski, Jakob J., New Perspectives on Abraham Geiger, 197
- Petuchowski, Jakob J., The Poetry of the Synagogue, 483
- Petuchowski, Jakob J., Prayerbook Reform in Europe, 380
- Petuchowski, Jakob J., Theology and Poetry, 483
- Petuchowski, Jakob J., The Theology of Haham David Nieto, 453
- Phillips, Anthony, Ancient Israel's Criminal Law, 141
- Phillips, Anthony, Israel's Prophetic Tradition, 30
- Philo of Alexandria, Works, English and Greek, 45
- Piatelli, Daniella, An Introduction to the History and Sources of Jewish Law, 225
- Pick, Shlomo, The Jewish Communities of Provence before the Expulsion of 1306, 638
- Piechotka, Maria, Wooden Synagogues, 40
- Piercy, Marge, The Art of Blessing the Day, 527
- Piercy, Marge, He, She, and It, 527, 628
- Pinchuk, Ben-Cion, Shtetl Jews under Soviet Rule, 558
- Pines, Shlomo, Introduction to The Guide of the Perplexed by Moses Maimonides, 422
- Pines, Shlomo, The Jewish Christians of the Early Centuries According to a New Source, 312
- Pines, Shlomo, Medieval Doctrines in Renaissance Garb?, 4
- Pines, Shlomo, Shi'ite Terms and Conceptions in Judah Halevi's Kuzari, 322
- Pinkus, Benjamin, The Jews of the Soviet Union, 533
- Pinney, Roy, The Animals in the Bible, 188
- Pinsker, Leon, Auto-Emancipation, 643
- Pinsker, Sanford, The Uncompromising Fictions of Cynthia Ozick, 462
- Pitzele, Peter, Our Fathers' Wells, 527
- Plaskow, Judith, Standing Again at Sinai, 183, 527
- Plaut, W. Gunther, The Growth of Reform Judaism, 380
- Plaut, W. Gunther, The Rise of Reform Judaism, 380
- Plaut, W. Gunther, Teshuvot for the Nineties, 564
- P'nai Or Religious Fellowship, Or Chadash, 527
- Pogrebin, Letty Cottin, Deborah, Golda, and Me, 628
- Pók, Attila, The Holocaust in Hungary, 273
- Poliakov, Leon, Harvest of Hate, 259
- Polish, David, Give Us a King, 345
- Poll, Solomon, The Hasidic Community of Williamsburg, 452, 544
- Pollak, Michael, The Jews of Dynastic China, 108
- Pollak, Michael, Mandarins, Jews, and Missionaries, 108
- Polliack, Meira, The Karaite Tradition of Arabic Bible Translation, 335
- Polner, Murray, The Challenge of Shalom, 613
- Polzin, Robert, Moses and the Deuteronomist, 142
- Poma, Andrea, The Critical Philosophy of Hermann Cohen, 118
- Pope, Marvin H., Job, 317
- Pope, Marvin H., Song of Songs, 570
- Popkin, Richard, Menasseh ben Israel and His World, 401
- Popper, William, The Censorship of Hebrew Books, 498
- Porges, Nathan, Gebhardt's Book on Uriel da Costa, 7
- Porten, Bezael, Archives from Elephantine, 160
- Porter, Jack Nusan, Women in Chains, 12
- Porton, Gary, Understanding Rabbinic Midrash, 590
- Porush, Israel, The House of Israel, 50
- Posner, Raphael, The Hebrew Book, 91
- Potok, Chaim, The Mourners of Yehezkel Kaufmann, 337
- Prager, Marcia, The Path of Blessing, 527
- Prawer, Joshua, The History of the Jews in the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, 130
- Preil, Gabriel, Israeli Poetry in Peace and War, 487
- Prell, Riv-Ellen, Prayer and Community, 581
- Preuss, Julius, Julius Preuss' Biblical and Talmudic Medicine, 87, 399
- Preuss, Walter, The Jewish Labour Movement in Palestine, 645
- Preuss, Walter, The Labour Movement in Israel, 645
- Primack, Karen, Jews in Places You Never Thought Of, 599
- Primus, Charles, Aqiva's Contribution to the Law of Zera'im, 14
- Pritsak, Omeljan, Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century, 339

- Pritsak, Omeljan, Khazars, 339
- Pritz, Ray A., Nazarene Jewish Christianity, 312
- Provan, Iain, Lamentations, 355
- Pullan, Brian, The Jews of Europe and the Inquisition of Venice, 1550-1670, 611
- Pullan, Brian, Rich and Poor in Renaissance Venice, 611
- Pummer, Reinhard, A Companion to Samaritan Studies, 540
- Purvis, James D., The Samaritan Pentateuch and the Origin of the Samaritan Sect, 541
- Quirin, James, The Evolution of the Ethiopian Jews, 170
- Rabello, Alfredo, An Introduction to the History and Sources of Jewish Law, 225
- Rabinovich, Izrail, The Jokes of Oppression, 272
- Rabinowicz, Tzvi, A Guide to Life, 140
- Rabinowitz, Abraham Hirsch, Taryag, 120
- Rabinowitz, Louis, Far East Mission, 288
- Rabinowitz, Louis, Torah and Flora, 155
- Rad, Gerhard von, Genesis, 200
- Rad, Gerhard von, The Message of the Prophets, 499
- Rad, Gerhard von, Old Testament Theology, 78
- Rad, Gerhard von, Studies in Deuteronomy, 142
- Rad, Gerhard von, Wisdom in Israel, 506, 618
- Radest, Howard B., Toward Common Ground, 168
- Radice, Roberto, Philo of Alexandria, 474
- Reif, Joseph A., These Are the Names, 459
- Rajak, Tessa, Josephus, the Historian and His Society, 319
- Raphael, Chaim, A Feast of History, 224
- Raphael, David, The Expulsion 1492 Chronicles, 492
- Raphael, Lev, Journeys and Arrivals, 268
- Raphael, Marc Lee, Profiles in American Judaism, 519
- Raphael, Simcha Paull, Jewish Views of the Afterlife, 527
- Rapoport, Nessa, A Woman's Book of Grieving, 527
- Rapoport-Albert, Ada, Essays in Jewish Historiography, 246
- Rappaport, Solomon, Jew and Gentile, 477
- Rasiel, Rosa, The Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook, 609
- Raul-Friedman, A Rebuttal: Circumcision, 116
- Rausch, David A., Messianic Judaism, 34
- Ravid, Benjamin, Economics and Toleration in Seventeenth Century Venice, 611
- Ravid, Benjamin, From Yellow to Red, 125
- Ravid, Benjamin, The Jews of Venice, 525
- Ravid, Benjamin, Money, Love and Power Politics in Sixteenth Century Venice, 446
- Ravid, Benjamin, The Prohibition against Jewish Printing and Publishing in Venice and the Difficulties of Leone Modena, 416
- Ravid, Benjamin, The Socioeconomic Background of the Expulsion and Readmission of the Venetian Jews, 1571-1573, 611
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, The Anthropological Theory of Miracles in Medieval Jewish Philosophy, 414
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism, 301, 406
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, Samuel Ibn Tibbon and the Esoteric Character of The Guide of the Perplexed, 422
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, The Secrets of The Guide of the Perplexed, 423
- Raz, Simcha, The Sayings of Menahem Mendel of Kotsk, 400
- Refael, Shmuel, The Judeo-Spanish "Romance", 352
- Reichert, Victor, Ecclesiastes, 153
- Reif, Stefan C., Judaism and Hebrew Prayer, 379, 380
- Reimer, Gail Twersky, Reading Ruth, 535
- Reines, Alvin J., Maimonides and Abrabanel on Prophecy, 2
- Reines, Alvin J., Maimonides' Concept of Miracles, 414
- Reines, Alvin J., Reform Judaism, 148
- Reines, Ch.W., The Jewish Attitude toward Suicide, 577
- Reingold, Edward M., Calendrical Calculations, 97
- Reinharz, Jehuda, Chaim Weizmann, 614, 643
- Reinharz, Jehuda, Essential Papers on Zionism, 643
- Reinharz, Jehuda, The Jew in the Modern World, 256
- Reinharz, Jehuda, The Jewish Response to German Culture, 643
- Rejwan, Nissim, The Jews of Iraq, 293
- Rendsburg, Gary A., The Bible and the Ancient Near East, 20
- Rendsburg, Gary A., Linguistic Evidence for the Northern Origin of Selected Psalms, 508
- Rendsburg, Gary A., The Redaction of Genesis, 200
- Rendtorff, Rolf, The Old Testament, 76
- Rendtorff, Rolf, The Problem of the Process of Transmission in the Pentateuch, 469
- Rhine, Abraham Benedict, Leon Gordon, 219
- Richards, Kent, Interpreting Hebrew Poetry, 484
- Richardson, H.G., The English Jewry under Angevin Kings, 221
- Richardson, Peter, Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity, 25
- Richler, Binyamin, Guide to Hebrew Manuscript Collections, 91
- Richler, Binyamin, Hebrew Manuscripts, 551
- Riemer, Jack, Jewish Reflections on Death, 140
- Riley-Smith, Jonothan, The First Crusade and the Persecution of the Jews, 130
- Ringer, Alexander L., Arnold Schoenberg, 433, 547
- Rischin, Moses, The Promised City, 452
- Riskin, Shlomo, Women and Jewish Divorce, 12
- Ritmeyer, Kathleen, Secrets of Jerusalem's Temple Mount, 593
- Ritmeyer, Leon, Secrets of Jerusalem's Temple Mount, 593
- Rittner, Carol, From the Unthinkable to the Unavoidable, 113
- Rivkin, Ellis, Leon da Modena and the Kol Sakhal, 416
- Rivkin, Ellis, The Shaping of Jewish History, 393
- Rivkin, Ellis, The Utilization of Non-Jewish Sources for the Reconstruction of Jewish History, 393
- Rodrigue, Aron, The Jews of the Balkans, 63
- Rogerson, John, Beginning Old Testament Study, 74
- Ro'i, Yaacov, Jews and Jewish Life in Russia and the Soviet Union, 533
- Roland, Joan G., The Jewish Communities of India, 62, 67
- Roland, Joan G., Jews in British India, 62, 67
- Romanelli, Samuel, Travail in an Arab Land, 421
- Romberg, Rosemary, Circumcision, 116
- Rome, David, Canadian Jewish Archives, 100
- Romero, Elena, Literary Creation in the Sephardi Diaspora, 352
- Ronnen Safdie, Michal, The Western Wall, 615
- Roof, Wade Clark, A Generation of Seekers, 54
- Rose, Andy, Twice Blessed, 268, 526
- Rose, Aubrey, Judaism and Ecology, 155
- Rose, Gillian, Judaism and Modernity, 257
- Rose, Norman, Chaim Weizmann, 614
- Rosen, Gladys, The Jewish Family and Jewish Continuity, 180
- Rosen, Haim B., Contemporary Hebrew, 235
- Rosen, Tova, The Hebrew Mariner and the Beast, 283
- Rosen-Ayalon, Myriam, The Early Islamic Monuments of Al-Haram Al-Sharif, 593

- Rosenbaum, Irving J., The Holocaust and Halakhah, 263
- Rosenbaum, Jonathan, Making a Life, Building a Community, 605
- Rosenbaum, Max, Anna O., 463
- Rosenbaum, Samuel, A Guide to Haftarah Chanting, 431
- Rosenbaum, Samuel, A Guide to Torah Reading, 431
- Rosenberg, A.J., The Book of Joshua, 321
- Rosenberg, A. J., The Five Megilloth, 355
- Rosenberg, A.J., I Kings, 344
- Rosenberg, A.J., II Kings, 344
- Rosenberg, A.J., Samuel I, 542
- Rosenberg, A.J., Samuel II, 542
- Rosenberg, Joel, King and Kin, 17
- Rosenberg, Liz, Total Immersion, 414
- Rosenberg, Louis, Canada's Jews, 100
- Rosenberg, Shalom, Good and Evil in Jewish Thought, 150
- Rosenblatt, Samuel, The Book of Beliefs and Opinions, 537
- Rosenblatt, Samuel, The High Ways to Perfection of Abraham Maimonides, 390
- Rosenbloom, Joseph R., Conversion to Judaism, 124
- Rosenbloom, Noah H., Luzzatto's Ethico-Psychological Interpretation of Judaism, 384
- Rosenbloom, Noah H., Tradition in an Age of Reform, 243
- Rosenblum, Yonason, The Vilna Goan, 161
- Rosenfeld, Alvin H., Confronting the Holocaust, 616
- Rosenfeld, Alvin H., A Double Dying, 261
- Rosenstock, Morton, Economic and Social Conditions among the Jews of Algeria, 1790-1848, 15
- Rosenstock, Morton, The Establishment of the Consistorial System in Algeria, 15
- Rosenstock, Morton, The House of Bacri and Busnach, 15
- Rosenthal, E.I.J., Judaism and Islam, 429
- Rosenthal, Gilbert S., Contemporary Judaism, 519
- Rosenzweig, Franz, Franz Rosenzweig: His Life and Thought, 531
- Rosenzweig, Franz, On Jewish Learning, 531
- Rosenzweig, Franz, Revelation and Law, 127
- Rosenzweig, Franz, Scripture and Translation, 530
- Rosenzweig, Franz, The Star of Redemption, 481
- Rosett, Arthur, A Living Tree, 101
- Roskies, David G., Against the Apocalypse, 261, 375
- Roskies, David G., A Bridge of Longing, 641
- Roskies, David G., Sholem Aleichem, 557
- Roskies, David G., The Shtetl Book, 558
- Roskies, Diane K., The Shtetl Book, 558
- Rosman, Murray Jay, Founder of Hasidism, 57, 303, 489
- Rosner, Fred, Euthanasia, The End of Life, 171
- Rosner, Fred, Jewish Bioethics, 87
- Rosner, Fred, Medicine and Jewish Law, 182
- Rosner, Fred, Medicine in the Bible and the Talmud, 399
- Rosner, Fred, Modern Medicine and Jewish Ethics, 87, 88, 529
- Rosner, Fred, Modern Medicine and Jewish Law, 87
- Rosner, Fred, Suicide in Biblical, Talmudic and Rabbinic Writings, 577
- Rosowsky, Solomon, The Cantillation of the Bible, 431
- Rost, Leonhard, The Succession to the Throne of David, 500
- Rotenstreich, Nathan, Jewish Philosophy in Modern Times, 118, 348
- Rotenstreich, Nathan, Jews and German Philosophy, 119
- Roth, Cecil, Encyclopaedia Judaica, 97
- Roth, Cecil, Essays and Portraits in Anglo-Jewish History, 453
- Roth, Cecil, The Great Synagogue, London, 1690-1940, 382
- Roth, Cecil, The History of the Jews of Italy, 304, 384, 532
- Roth, Cecil, A History of the Marranos, 393
- Roth, Cecil, The House of Nasi: Dona Gracia, 446
- Roth, Cecil, The House of Nasi: The Duke of Naxos, 446
- Roth, Cecil, Jewish Art, 42
- Roth, Cecil, The Jews in the Renaissance, 304
- Roth, Cecil, A Life of Menasseh ben Israel, 401, 514
- Roth, Cecil, The Sassoon Dynasty, 62
- Roth, Cecil, The Spanish Inquisition, 289, 572
- Roth, Cecil, The World History of the Jewish People, 209
- Roth, Joel, The Halakhic Process, 228
- Roth, John K., From the Unthinkable to the Unavoidable, 113
- Roth, Leon, Back to, Forward from, Ahad Ha-am?, 13
- Roth, Leon, David Nieto and the Orthodoxy of Spinozism, 453
- Roth, Leon, The Guide for the Perplexed, 423
- Roth, Norman, Conversos, Inquisition, and the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain, 34
- Rothmüller, Aron Marko, The Music of the Jews, 432
- Rottenberg, Dan, Middletown Jews, 605
- Rowland, Christopher, Christian Origins, 312
- Rowley, Harold H., The Relevance of Apocalyptic, 31
- Rozen, Minna, The Leghorn Merchants in Tunis and Their Trade with Marseilles at the End of the 17th Century, 602
- Rubens, Alfred, A History of Jewish Costume, 125
- Rubenstein, Jeffrey L., The History of Sukkot during the Second Temple and Rabbinic Periods, 579
- Rubenstein, Richard L., After Auschwitz, 263
- Rubin, Barry, Assimilation and Its Discontents, 285
- Rubin, Israel, Satmar, 544
- Rubin, Miri, Gentile Tales, 369
- Rubin, Ruth, A Treasury of Jewish Folksong, 436
- Rubinstein, Aryeh, Isaac Mayer Wise, 619
- Rubinstein, Hilary L., The Jews in Australia, 50
- Rubinstein, Hilary L., The Jews in Victoria, 1835-1985, 50
- Rubinstein, Hilary L., Philosemitism, 477
- Rubinstein, W.D., A History of the Jews in the English-speaking World, 382
- Rubinstein, W.D., The Jews in Australia, 50
- Rubinstein, W.D., Philosemitism, 477
- Rudavsky, David, Emancipation and Adjustment, 194
- Rudavsky, David, Modern Jewish Religious Movements, 194
- Rudavsky, T.M., Gender and Judaism, 183, 198
- Ruderman, David B., Jewish Thought and Scientific Discovery in Early Modern Europe, 548
- Ruderman, David B., Jewish Thought in Newtonian England, 453
- Ruderman, David B., Kabbalah, Magic, and Science, 387, 525
- Ruderman, David B., Preachers of the Italian Ghetto, 267
- Ruderman, David B., The World of a Renaissance Jew, 514
- Rudin, A. James, Twenty Years of Jewish-Catholic Relations, 113
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford, Faith and Fratricide, 25, 29, 263
- Runia, David T., Exegesis and Philosophy, 474
- Runia, David T., Philo in a Single Volume, 474
- Runia, David T., Philo of Alexandria, 474
- Runia, David T., Philo of Alexandria and the Timaeus of Plato, 474
- Rürup, Reinhard, Emancipation and Crisis, 163
- Rürup, Reinhard, German Liberalism and the Emancipation of the Jews, 163
- Rürup, Reinhard, Jewish Emancipation and Bourgeois Society, 163

- Rürup, Reinhard, Revolution and Evolution, 163
- Rürup, Reinhard, The Tortuous and Thorny Path to Legal Emancipation, 163
- Rush, Barbara, The Book of Jewish Women's Tales, 189
- Russell, David S., The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic, 200 B.C.–A.D. 100, 31
- Rutland, Suzanne D., Edge of the Diaspora, 50
- Sabar, Shalom, Ketubbah, 338, 392, 395
- Sabar, Shalom, Mazal Tov, 338
- Sachar, Howard M., The Course of Modern Jewish History, 256
- Sachar, Howard M., A History of the Jews in America, 606
- Sack, B.G., History of the Jews in Canada, 100
- Sacks, Jonathan, Orthodoxy Confronts Modernity, 417
- Sacks, Jonathan, Will We Have Jewish Grandchildren?, 123
- Sacks, Maurie, Active Voices, 626
- Sadan, J., Yemenite Authorities and Jewish Messianism, 637
- Sadeh, Pinhas, Jewish Folktales, 189
- Sadek, Vladimír, Prague Ghetto, 313
- Sáenz-Badillos, Angel, A History of the Hebrew Language, 235
- Safanov, Anatol, Cemetery, 103
- Safir, Marilyn P., Calling the Equality Bluff, 630
- Safrai, Shemuel, The Literature of the Sages, 588
- Safran, Bezalel, Hasidism, 324
- Saggs, H.W.F., Babylonians, 59
- Saggs, H.W.F., The Greatness That Was Babylon, 59
- Salama, Messod, Rabbinical Exegesis in the Judeo-Spanish Romancero, 352
- Salbstein, M.C.N., The Emancipation of the Jews in Britain, 163
- Saldarini, Anthony J., Jesus and Passover, 464
- Saldarini, Anthony J., Pharisees, Scribes, and Sadducees in Palestinian Society, 472, 539
- Salkin, Jeffrey K., Putting God on the Guest List, 65
- Salomon, H.P., Examination of Pharisaic Traditions, 7
- Salomon, H.P., Mendes, Benveniste, De Luna, Micas, Nasi, 446
- Salter, Robert B., Jonah and Lamentations, 355
- Saltman, Avrom, Secundum Salomonem, 566
- Salzman, Jack, Struggles in the Promised Land, 89
- Salzman, Marcus, The Chronicle of Ahimaaz, 57
- Samarra'i, Qasim, Yemenite Authorities and Jewish Messianism, 637
- Samely, Alexander, Artifact and Text, 91
- Samuel, Maurice, Prince of the Ghetto, 471
- Samuel ben Meir, The Commentary of R. Samuel ben Meir, Rashbam, on Qoheleth, 153
- Samuel ha-Nagid, Jewish Prince in Moslem Spain, 554
- Samuelson, Norbert M., Causation and Choice in the Philosophy of Ibn Daud, 277
- Samuelson, Norbert M., Gersonides' The Wars of the Lord, Treatise 3, 363
- Samuelson, Norbert M., Ibn Daud's Conception of Prophecy, 277
- Samuelson, Norbert M., An Introduction to Modern Jewish Philosophy, 119
- Samuelson, Norbert M., Judaism and the Doctrine of Creation, 548
- Sandberg, Neil C., Jewish Life in Los Angeles, 605
- Sanders, E.P., Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 B.C.E.–66 C.E., 472
- Sanders, E.P., Paul and Palestinian Judaism, 467
- Sanders, E.P., Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People, 467
- Sanders, E.P., R. Akiba's View of Suffering, 14
- Sanders, Ivan, Jewish Revival in Central Europe, 273
- Sanders, Jack T., Ben Sira and Demotic Wisdom, 70
- Sanders, Jack T., The Jews in Luke-Acts, 25
- Sanders, Jack T., Schismatics, Sectarians, Dissidents, Deviants, 25
- Sanders, Ronald, The Americanization of Isaac Bashevis Singer, 562
- Sanders, Ronald, The Downtown Jews, 452
- Sandmel, Samuel, Anti-Semitism in the New Testament?, 25
- Sandmel, Samuel, The Genius of Paul, 467
- Sandmel, Samuel, Philo of Alexandria, 474
- Sandrow, Nahma, Vagabond Stars, 594
- Santner, Eric L., Stranded Objects, 266
- Santos, Richard G., Chicanos of Jewish Descent in Texas, 132
- Saperstein, David, Jewish Dimensions of Social Justice, 564
- Saperstein, David, Preventing the Nuclear Holocaust, 613
- Saperstein, Marc, Decoding the Rabbis, 17
- Saperstein, Marc, Essential Papers on Messianic Movements and Personalities in Jewish History, 406
- Saperstein, Marc, Jewish Preaching, 1200–1800, 267
- Saperstein, Marc, Martyrs, Merchants and Rabbis, 446
- Saperstein, Marc, Your Voice Like a Ram's Horn, 267
- Sarachek, Joseph, Faith and Reason, 389
- Sarason, Richard S., A History of the Mishnaic Law of Agriculture, 10
- Sarna, Jonathan D., American Synagogue History, 581
- Sarna, Jonathan D., A Great Awakening, 157
- Sarna, Jonathan D., The Jews of Boston, 605
- Sarna, Jonathan D., The Secret of Jewish Continuity, 123
- Sarna, Nahum M., Exodus/Shemot, 173
- Sarna, Nahum M., Exploring Exodus, 173, 464
- Sarna, Nahum M., Genesis/Be-reshit, 200
- Sarna, Nahum M., Songs of the Heart, 508
- Sarna, Nahum M., Understanding Genesis, 128, 200
- Sartre, Jean-Paul, Anti-Semite and Jew, 48
- Sasson, Jack M., Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, 20
- Sasson, Jack M., Ruth, 535
- Sassoon, David Solomon, A History of the Jews in Baghdad, 293
- Sassoon, David Solomon, The History of the Jews of Basra, 293
- Sassoon, I.S.D., Examination of Pharisaic Traditions, 7
- Sassoon, I.S.D., The Relevance for Today of Uriel da Costa's Exame das tradições fariseas, 7
- Satlow, Michael L., Reconsidering the Rabbinic Ketubah Payment, 338
- Satlow, Michael L., Tasting the Dish, 555
- Sawdayee, Maurice M., The Baghdad Connection, 293
- Sawdayee, Max, All Waiting to Be Hanged, 293
- Scalamonti, John David, Ordained to Be a Jew, 124
- Schacter, Jacob J., A Modern Heretic and a Traditional Community, 334
- Schacter, Jacob J., Rabbi Jacob Emden, 164
- Schachter-Shalomi, Zalman, Paradigm Shift, 527
- Schaeder, Grete, The Hebrew Humanism of Martin Buber, 93
- Schäfer, Peter, Ashkenazic Hasidism, 230
- Schäfer, Peter, The Hidden and Manifest God, 22, 212
- Schatzberg, Walter, The Jewish Response to German Culture, 643
- Schatz Uffenheimer, Rivka, Hasidism as Mysticism, 232
- Schauss, Hayim, The Jewish Festivals, 579
- Schechter, Solomon, The Child in Jewish Literature, 116
- Schechter, Solomon, The Dogmas of Judaism, 148
- Schechter, Solomon, Safed in the Sixteenth Century, 101
- Schechter, Solomon, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, 560, 589
- Schechter, Solomon, Studies in Judaism, 161, 348, 383

- Schechtman, Joseph B., History of the Revisionist Movement, 647
- Schechtman, Joseph B., On Wings of Eagles, 408
- Schechtman, Joseph B., The Vladimir Jabotinsky Story, 647
- Scheiber, Alexander, Jewish Inscriptions in Hungary, from the 3rd Century to 1686, 273
- Schein, Jeffrey, Mediating the Tensions of Bar/Bat Mitzvah, 66
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Contrasting Religious Experience in the Liturgical Poems of Ibn Gabirol and Judah Halevi, 322
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., The Gazelle, 483, 485, 554
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Ibn Gabirol's Religious Poetry and Arabic Zuhd Poetry, 281
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Ibn Gabirol's Religious Poetry and Sufi Poetry, 281
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Poet and Patron, 281
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Rabbi Moshe Ibn Ezra on the Legitimacy of Poetry, 280
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Wine, Women, and Death, 375, 485, 554
- Scheindlin, Raymond P., Yehuda Abravanel to His Son, 4
- Scherman, Nossou, Reb Moshe, 181
- Schiffman, Lawrence H., From Text to Tradition, 253
- Schiffman, Lawrence H., Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls, 136, 239
- Schiffman, Lawrence H., Sectarian Law in the Dead Sea Scrolls, 136
- Schindler, Pesach, Hasidic Responses to the Holocaust in the Light of Hasidic Thought, 263
- Schippers, Arie, Spanish Hebrew Poetry and the Arab Literary Tradition, 485
- Schirmann, Jefim, The Function of the Hebrew Poet in Medieval Spain, 485
- Schirmann, Jefim, Introduction to Otsar ha-shirah veha-piyut by Israel Davidson, 486
- Schirmann, Jefim, Problems in the Study of Post-Biblical Hebrew Poetry, 486
- Schirmann, Jefim, Samuel Hannagid, The Man, The Soldier, The Politician, 283
- Schmelzer, Menahem, Hebrew Printing in Germany, 212
- Schmidt, Brian B., Israel's Beneficent Dead, 138
- Schmidt, Gilya Gerda, Martin Buber's Formative Years, 93
- Schnall, David J., Crisis and Continuity, 180
- Schochet, Elijah J., Animal Life in Jewish Tradition, 24
- Schochet, Elijah J., The Hasidic Movement and the Gaon of Vilna, 161
- Schoem, David, Ethnic Survival in America, 157
- Schoenburg, Nancy, Lithuanian Jewish Communities, 377
- Schoenburg, Stuart, Lithuanian Jewish Communities, 377
- Schoenfeld, Joachim, Shtetl Memoirs, 558
- Schoenfeld, Stuart, Folk Judaism, Elite Judaism and the Role of Bar Mitzvah in the Development of the Synagogue and Jewish School in America, 66
- Schoenfeld, Stuart, Integration into the Group and Sacred Uniqueness, 66
- Schoenfeld, Stuart, Interpreting Adult Bar Mitzvah, 66
- Schoenfeld, Stuart, Recent Publications on Bar/Bat Mitzvah, 66
- Schoenfeld, Stuart, Ritual and Role Transition, 66
- Schoenfeld, Stuart, Some Aspects of the Social Significance of Bar/Bat Mitzvah Celebrations, 66
- Schoeps, H.J., Paul, 467
- Schöffler, I., The History of the Jews in the Netherlands, 449
- Scholem, Gershom G., Frank, Jacob, and the Frankists, 193
- Scholem, Gershom G., Gematria, 456
- Scholem, Gershom G., Jewish Gnosticism, 212
- Scholem, Gershom G., Kabbalah, 6, 332
- Scholem, Gershom G., Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism, 6, 216, 230, 232, 332, 383, 556, 648
- Scholem, Gershom G., Martin Buber's Conception of Judaism, 93
- Scholem, Gershom G., The Messianic Idea in Judaism and Other Essays on Jewish Spirituality, 5, 93, 193, 232, 556
- Scholem, Gershom G., The Name of God and the Linguistic Theory of the Kabbalah, 216
- Scholem, Gershom G., On Jews and Judaism in Crisis, 48
- Scholem, Gershom G., On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism, 17, 218, 332
- Scholem, Gershom G., On the Mystical Shape of the Godhead, 332
- Scholem, Gershom G., Origins of the Kabbalah, 1, 332
- Scholem, Gershom G., Sabbatai Sevi, 406, 499, 556
- Scholem, Gershom G., Zohar, 331
- Schoors, Antoon, Qohelet in the Context of Wisdom, 153
- Schorr, Yisroel Simcha, The Talmud/Talmud Bavli, 586
- Schorsch, Ismar, From Text to Context, 245, 315, 621
- Schorsch, Ismar, Introduction to Die Konstruktion der jüdischen Geschichte by Heinrich Graetz, 220
- Schorsch, Ismar, The Philosophy of History of Nachman Krochmal, 348
- Schorsch, Ismar, Zacharias Frankel and the European Origins of Conservative Judaism, 194
- Schorsch, Ismar, Zunz as Krochmal's Editor, 348
- Schottroff, Luise, Feminist Interpretation, 80
- Schrekenberg, Heinz, The Jews in Christian Art, 369
- Schroeder, Gerald L., Genesis and the Big Bang, 128, 548
- Schroer, Silvia, Feminist Interpretation, 80
- Schroeter, Daniel J., Merchants of Essaouira, 421
- Schürer, Emil, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.–A.D. 135), 252, 496
- Schussman, Aviva, An Iraqi Judeo-Arabic Version of Ma'aseh Avraham, 357
- Schwartz, D.R., Josephus and Nicolaus on the Pharisees, 472
- Schwartz, Richard H., Judaism and Vegetarianism, 527, 609
- Schwartz, Seth, Josephus and Judaeae Politics, 319, 496
- Schwarz, Leo W., Great Ages and Ideas of the Jewish People, 337
- Schwarz, Leo W., Wolfson of Harvard, 622
- Schwarz, Samuel, The Crypto-Jews of Portugal, 132
- Schwarzfuchs, Simon, A Concise History of the Rabbinate, 543
- Schwarzfuchs, Simon, Napoleon, the Jews, and the Sanhedrin, 163
- Schwarzschild, Stephen, The Pursuit of the Ideal, 119
- Schweid, Eliezer, Feeling and Speculation, 414
- Schweid, Eliezer, Mysticism and Judaism According to Gershom G. Scholem, 548
- Schwemer, Anna Maria, Paul between Damascus and Antioch, 217, 467
- Scrivano, Riccardo, Platonic and Cabalistic Elements in the Hebrew Culture of Renaissance Italy, 4
- Scult, Mel, The American Judaism of Mordecai M. Kaplan, 334
- Scult, Mel, Judaism Faces the Twentieth Century, 334
- Sears, Dovid, The Path of the Baal Shem Tov, 303
- Sedinová, Jirina, Prague Ghetto, 313
- Sed-Rajna, Gabrielle, The Hebrew Bible in Medieval Illuminated Manuscripts, 92
- Sed-Rajna, Gabrielle, Jewish Art, 42
- Seeskin, Kenneth, Jewish Philosophy in a Secular Age, 478
- Segal, Agnes Romer, Yiddish Works on Women's Commandments in the Sixteenth Century, 633
- Segal, Alan, Paul the Convert, 467
- Segal, Alan, Two Powers in Heaven, 150

- Segal, Ben-Zion, The Ten Commandments in History and Tradition, 141
- Segal, David Simha, Ben Tehillim of Shmuel Hanagid and the Book of Psalms, 283
- Segal, J.B., A History of the Jews of Cochín, 117
- Segal, Lester A., Historical Consciousness and Religious Tradition in Azariah de' Rossi's Me'or 'Einayim, 532
- Segal, M.H., A Grammar of Mishnaic Hebrew, 235
- Seidel, Esther, Not by Birth Alone, 124
- Seidel, Jonathan Lee, Studies in Ancient Jewish Magic, 387
- Seiden, Morton Irving, The Paradox of Hate, 370
- Seidman, Naomi, A Marriage Made in Heaven, 198
- Seitz, Christopher R., Zion's Final Destiny, 295
- Sells, Michael A., Mystical Languages of Unsayings, 447
- Seltzer, Robert M., The American Judaism of Mordecai M. Kaplan, 334
- Seltzer, Robert M., Jewish People, Jewish Thought, 248, 478
- Seltzer, Robert M., Judaism, 325
- Seltzer, Sanford, When There Is No Other Alternative, 147
- Semi, Emanuela Trevisan, The Beta Israel in Ethiopia and Israel, 170
- Sendrey, Alfred, Music in Ancient Israel, 441
- Sendrey, Alfred, The Music of the Jews in the Diaspora (up to 1800), 432
- Seow, Choon-Leong, Ecclesiastes, 153
- Septimus, Bernard, Hispano-Jewish Culture in Transition, 389, 513, 572
- Sered, Susan Starr, Women as Ritual Experts, 628
- Serels, M. Mitchell, A History of the Jews of Tangier in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 421
- Serels, M. Mitchell, The Non-European Holocaust: The Fate of Tunisian Jewry, 602
- Seroussi, Edwin, Cancionero Sefardi, 438
- Seroussi, Edwin, Mizimrat Qedem, 438
- Seroussi, Edwin, Musica Mizrahit, 440
- Seroussi, Edwin, New Directions in the Music of the Sephardi Jews, 438
- Seroussi, Edwin, Sephardic Music, 438, 440
- Seroussi, Edwin, Spanish-Portuguese Synagogue Music in Nineteenth-Century Reform Sources from Hamburg, 438
- Seroussi, Edwin, The Turkish Makam in the Musical Culture of the Ottoman Jews, 440
- Setzer, Claudia, Jewish Responses to Early Christians, 112
- Shafer, Byron E., Religion in Ancient Egypt, 20
- Shafir, Gershon, Land, Labor, and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882-1914, 341, 645
- Shahak, Israel, Jewish History, Jewish Religion, 203
- Shaham, David, The Jews from the Konkan, 67
- Shain, Milton, The Roots of Antisemitism in South Africa, 571
- Shaked, Gershon, The Shadows Within, 236
- Shaked, Gershon, Shmuel Yosef Agnon, 9
- Shaked, Shaul, Irano-Judaica, 292, 357
- Shalev, Michael, Labour and the Political Economy in Israel, 645
- Shamir, Michal, Kach and the Limits to Political Tolerance in Israel, 333
- Shamir, Shimon, The Jews of Egypt, 159
- Shanks, Hershel, Jerusalem, 309
- Shanks, Hershel, Understanding the Dead Sea Scrolls, 136
- Shapira, Anita, Essential Papers on Zionism, 643
- Shapiro, Ann, Jewish American Women Writers, 634
- Shapiro, Edward S., A Time for Healing, 606
- Shapiro, Marc B., Between the Yeshiva World and Modern Orthodoxy, 516
- Shapiro, Marc B., Maimonides' Thirteen Principles, 148
- Shapiro, Marc B., Suicide and the World-to-Come, 577
- Shapiro, Rami, Wisdom of the Jewish Sages, 527
- Shapiro, Robert D., A Reform Rabbi in the Progressive Era, 620
- Shapiro, Sidney, Jews in Old China, 108
- Shapiro, Yonathan, The Road to Power, 647
- Sharfman, Daphna, Living without a Constitution, 269
- Shargel, Baila R., Lost Love, 583
- Shargel, Baila R., Louis Ginzberg as Apologist, 210
- Sharkansky, Ira, Israel and Its Bible, 491
- Sharoni, Simona, Gender and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 628
- Sharot, Stephen, Judaism, 552, 565
- Sharot, Stephen, Messianism, Mysticism, and Magic, 387
- Sharvit, Uri, Chassidic Tunes from Galicia, 436
- Sharvit, Uri, Jewish Musical Culture, 442
- Sharvit, Uri, The Musical Realization of Biblical Cantillation Symbols (Te'amim) in the Jewish Yemenite Tradition, 440
- Shatz, David, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook and Jewish Spirituality, 346
- Shatzmiller, Joseph, Contacts et échanges entre savants juifs et chrétiens à Montpellier vers 1300, 504
- Shatzmiller, Joseph, Tumultus et Rumor in Sinagoga: An Aspect of Social Life of Provençal Jews in the Middle Ages, 504
- Shavit, Jacob, Jabotinsky and the Revisionist Movement, 1925-1948, 647
- Shaw, Stanford J., The Jews of the Ottoman Empire and the Turkish Republic, 63
- Shea, William H., The Sabbath in Jewish and Christian Traditions, 538
- Shear, Eli M., The Rich Go to Heaven, 108
- Shechner, Mark, After the Revolution, 18
- Sheeley, Steven M., The Bible in English Translation, 73
- Shelemay, Kay Kaufman, Let Jasmine Rain Down, 435, 440, 582
- Shelemay, Kay Kaufman, Music, Ritual, and Falasha History, 170, 440
- Shenhar-Alroy, Aliza, Jewish Moroccan Folk Narratives from Israel, 189
- Shermis, Michael, Introduction to Jewish-Christian Relations, 113
- Sherwin, Byron L., The Golem Legend, 218
- Sherwin, Byron L., How to Be a Jew, 326
- Sherwin, Byron L., In Partnership with God, 66
- Sherwin, Byron L., Mystical Theology and Social Dissent, 324, 514
- Sherwin, Byron L., No Religion Is an Island, 242
- Sherwood, Yvonne, The Prostitute and the Prophet, 502
- Shiblak, Abbas, The Lure of Zion, 293
- Shiloah, Amnon, The Dimension of Music in Islamic and Jewish Culture, 440
- Shiloah, Amnon, Jewish Musical Traditions, 438, 440, 442
- Shiloah, Amnon, The Musical Tradition of Iraqi Jews, 440
- Shimoni, Gideon, Jews and Zionism, 571
- Shinan, Avigdor, Live Translation, 592
- Shohat, Ella, Israeli Cinema, 186
- Shohet, David Menahem, The Jewish Court in the Middle Ages, 206
- Showstack, Gerald, Suburban Communities, 524
- Shrage, Barry, A Communal Response to the Challenges of the 1990 CJP National Jewish Population Survey, 123
- Shrock, Abe Tobie, Rabbi Jonah ben Abraham of Gerona, 389
- Shulman, Sidney, The Book of Joshua, 321
- Shulvass, Moses A., Between the Rhine and the Bosphorus, 46
- Shulvass, Moses A., The Jews in the World of the Renaissance, 304
- Shy, Hadassa, Taqdir and Its Counterparts in Mediaeval Judeo-Arabic, 357
- Sicher, Efraim, Breaking Crystal, 261
- Sicker, Martin, The Judaic State, 543
- Sidorsky, David, Essays on Human Rights, 269

- Siegel, Ben, Daughters of Valor, 634
 Siegel, Danny, Family Reunion, 613
 Siegel, Rachel Josefowitz, Celebrating the Lives of Jewish Women, 628
 Siegel, Richard, The Jewish Catalog, 326
 Siegel, Seymour, Religion: A Jewish View, 577
 Sigal, Phillip, The Scholarship of Saul Lieberman, 373
 Silber, Michael K., Jews in the Hungarian Economy, 1760–1945, 273
 Silberschlag, Eisig, Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, 71
 Silberstein, Laurence, Martin Buber's Social and Religious Thought, 94
 Silman, Yochanan, Philosopher and Prophet, 322
 Silver, Daniel Jeremy, Maimonidean Criticism and the Maimonidean Controversy, 1180–1240, 1, 389
 Silverman, David P., Ancient Egypt, 21
 Silverman, David Wolf, The Seminary at 100, 121
 Silverman, Joseph H., The Judeo-Spanish Ballad Chapbooks of Yacob Abraham Yoná, 351
 Silverman, Joseph H., Judeo-Spanish Ballads from Oral Tradition, 351
 Silverman, Joseph H., Sefhardic Folklore and Eastern Mediterranean Oral Tradition, 351
 Silverman, Michael H., Religious Values in the Jewish Proper Names at Elephantine, 160
 Silverman, R.M., Baruch Spinoza, 573
 Silverstein, Alan, Alternatives to Assimilation, 54, 524, 619
 Simon, Leon, Abad Ha-am, Asher Ginzberg, 13
 Simon, Marcel, Verus Israel, 112
 Simon, Maurice, Midrash Rabbah, 409
 Simon, Maurice, The Zohar, 331
 Simon, Rachel, Change within Tradition among Jewish Women in Libya, 372
 Simon, Uriel, Four Approaches to the Book of Psalms, 84, 278, 508
 Simonsohn, Shlomo, The Apostolic See and the Jews, 304
 Simpson, William Kelly, The Ancient Near East, 20
 Singer, Charles, The Legacy of Israel, 477
 Singerman, Robert, Judaica Americana, 521
 Sirat, Colette, A History of Jewish Philosophy in the Middle Ages, 36, 41, 49, 277, 281, 322, 479
 Skehan, Patrick W., The Wisdom of Ben Sira, 70
 Sklare, David, Samuel ben Hofni Gaon and His Cultural World, 204
 Sklare, Marshall, Conservative Judaism, 121
 Sklare, Marshall, The Jewish Community in America, 565
 Skoss, Solomon L., A Chapter on Permutation in Hebrew from David ben Abraham Al-Fasi's Dictionary Jami 'Al-Alfaz, 367
 Skoss, Solomon L., Saadia Gaon, the Earliest Hebrew Grammarian, 367, 537
 Slapak, Orpa, The Jews of India, 62, 67, 117, 288
 Sloan, Jacob, The Passover Haggadah, 224
 Slobin, Mark, Chosen Voices, 432, 435
 Slobin, Mark, Old Jewish Folk Music, 436
 Slobin, Mark, Tenement Songs, 435
 Slonim, Rivkah, Total Immersion, 414
 Slotki, I.W., Kings, 344
 Slotki, Judah J., Introduction and Commentary on Judges, 329
 Slouschz, Nahum, The Jews of North Africa, 454
 Slouschz, Nahum, The Renaissance of Hebrew Literature (1743–1885), 219
 Slouschz, Nahum, Travels in North Africa, 454
 Slymovics, Peter, Romantic and Jewish Orthodox Influences in the Political Philosophy of S.D. Luzzatto, 384
 Smallwood, E.M., High Priests and Politics in Roman Palestine, 496
 Smidt van Gelder-Fontaine, Theresia Anna Maria, In Defence of Judaism: Abraham Ibn Daud, 277
 Smith, Charles, Palestine and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 298
 Smith, Ellen, The Jews of Boston, 605
 Smith, George Adam, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, Commonly Called the Minor, 502
 Smith, Joan Allen, Schoenberg and His Circle, 547
 Smith, Mark S., The Early History of God, 287
 Smith, Mark S., The Ugaritic Baal Cycle, 98
 Smith, Morton, Palestinian Judaism in the First Century, 472
 Smith, Steven B., Spinoza, Liberalism, and the Question of Jewish Identity, 573
 Snell, Daniel C., Life in the Ancient Near East, 3100–332 B.C.E., 21
 Snowman, Jacob, The Surgery of Ritual Circumcision, 116
 Sobel, Zvi, A Small Place in Galilee, 301
 Sobel, Zvi, Tradition, Innovation, Conflict, 301
 Soggin, J. Alberto, Judges, 329
 Sokoloff, Michael, Notes on the Vocabulary of Galilean Aramaic, 357
 Sokoloff, Naomi, Gender and Text in Modern Hebrew and Yiddish Literature, 634
 Solomon, Norman, The Analytic Movement, 640
 Solomon, Norman, Judaism and World Religion, 406
 Solomon, Sally Luddy, Hooghly Tales, 62
 Solomon, Victor M., Nahalat Shafrab, 139
 Solomons, Israel, David Nieto and Some of His Contemporaries, 453
 Soloveitchik, Haym, Can Halakic Texts Talk History?, 146
 Soloveitchik, Haym, Rabad of Posquières, 1
 Soloveitchik, Haym, Religious Law and Change, 396
 Soloveitchik, Haym, Rupture and Reconstruction, 417
 Soloveitchik, Haym, Three Themes in the Sefer Hasidim, 230
 Soloveitchik, Joseph, The Lonely Man of Faith, 128
 Sommer, Benjamin, Did Prophecy Cease? Evaluating a Re-evaluation, 499
 Sonne, Isaiah, Da Costa Studies, 7
 Sonne, Isaiah, Leon Modena and the da Costa Circle in Amsterdam, 7
 Sonsino, Rifat, Finding God, 214
 Sorin, Gerald, A Time for Building, 606
 Sorin, Gerald, Tradition Transformed, 606
 Sorkin, David, Moses Mendelssohn and the Religious Enlightenment, 404
 Sorkin, David, The Transformation of German Jewry, 1780–1840, 233, 598
 Soroudi, Sorour, Jews in Islamic Iran, 292
 Sosevsky, Moshe Ch., Samuel II, 542
 Sparks, H.F.D., The Apocryphal Old Testament, 32
 Speiser, E.A., Genesis, 200
 Sperber, Alexander, The Bible in Aramaic, 592
 Sperber, Daniel, Magic and Folklore in Rabbinic Literature, 387
 Sperling, Harry, The Zohar, 331
 Spicehandler, Ezra, Bialik, Hayyim Nahman, 72
 Spicehandler, Ezra, The Modern Hebrew Poem Itself, 375
 Spiegel, Shalom, Hebrew Reborn, 219
 Spiegel, Shalom, Introduction to Legends of the Bible by Louis Ginzberg, 210
 Spiegel, Shalom, The Last Trial, 396, 409
 Spiegel, Shalom, Me-agadot ha'akedah, 396, 409
 Spiegel, Shalom, On Medieval Hebrew Poetry, 483
 Spier, Arthur, The Comprehensive Hebrew Calendar, 97
 Spinoza, Benedictus de, The Chief Works of Benedict de Spinoza, 481
 Spiro, Pinchas, Haftarah Chanting, 431
 Sprinzak, Ehud, The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right, 333
 Sprinzak, Ehud, Brother against Brother, 301
 Spronk, Klaas, Beatific Afterlife in Ancient Israel and in the Ancient Near East, 138
 Squires-Kidron, Pamela, Musica Mizrahit, 440

- Stamelman, Richard, The Graven Silence of Writing, 307
- Stamm, Johann Jakob, The Ten Commandments in Recent Research, 141
- Stanislawski, Michael, For Whom Do I Toil? Judah Leib Gordon and the Crisis of Russian Jewry, 219
- Staub, Jacob J., The Creation of the World According to Gersonides, 363
- Staub, Jacob J., Exploring Judaism, 519
- Stegemann, Hartmut, The Library of Qumran, 136
- Steiman, Sidney, Custom and Survival, 513
- Steinberg, Michael P., The Presence of the Historian, 419
- Steinberg, Milton, Anatomy of Faith, 576
- Steinberg, Milton, As a Driven Leaf, 511
- Steingroot, Ira, Keeping Passover, 224
- Steinsaltz, Adin, The Essential Talmud, 588
- Steinsaltz, Adin, The Talmud: The Steinsaltz Edition, 586, 587, 590
- Steinsaltz, Adin, The Thirteen Petalled Rose, 560
- Steinschneider, Moritz, An Introduction to the Arabic Literature of the Jews, 328
- Stemberger, Günter, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, 409, 413, 588
- Stemberger, Günter, Jewish Contemporaries of Jesus, 252
- Stendahl, Krister, The Apostle Paul and the Introspective Conscience of the West, 467
- Sterling, Gregory E., Philo of Alexandria Commentary Series, 474
- Stern, David, Parables in Midrash, 409
- Stern, Ephraim, The New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, 36
- Stern, Josef, The Fall and Rise of Myth in Ritual: Maimonides versus Nahmanides on the Huqqim, Astrology and the War against Idolatry, 49
- Stern, Josef, Problems and Parables of Law, 17
- Stern, Menahem, Aspects of Jewish Society, 496
- Stern, Menahem, Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism, 25
- Stern, S.M., Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry, 486
- Stern, S.M., Isaac Israeli, 447
- Stern, Susan, Speaking Out, 208
- Sternberg, Ghitta, Stefanesti, 558
- Sterne, Colin C., Arnold Schoenberg, 547
- Sternharz, Nathan, Tzaddik, 445
- Stillman, Gerald, Selected Works of Mendele Moykher-Sforim, 403
- Stillman, Norman A., The Jews of Arab Lands, 248, 255, 297, 408
- Stillman, Norman A., The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times, 297, 408, 582
- Stillman, Norman A., The Language and Culture of the Jews of Sefrou, Morocco, 328, 421
- Stone, Ira, Reading Levinas/Reading Talmud, 365
- Stone, Michael E., Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, 33, 239
- Stone, Michael E., Scriptures, Sects and Visions, 31
- Stow, Kenneth, Alienated Minority, 255
- Strack, Hermann Leberecht, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, 409, 413, 587, 588
- Strandberg, Victor, Greek Mind/Jewish Soul, 462
- Strange, James F., Archaeology, the Rabbis, and Early Christianity, 36
- Strassfeld, Michael, The Jewish Catalog, 326
- Strassfeld, Sharon, The Jewish Catalog, 326
- Strauss, Leo, How to Begin to Study The Guide of the Perplexed, 423
- Strauss, Leo, On Abravanel's Philosophical Tendency and Political Teaching, 423
- Strauss, Leo, Persecution and the Art of Writing, 322, 423
- Strauss, Leo, Philosophy and Law, 423
- Strauss, Leo, Spinoza's Critique of Religion, 573
- Strizower, Schifra, The Bene Israel of Bombay, 67
- Strizower, Schifra, The Children of Israel, 67
- Strong, James, The Tabernacle of Israel in the Desert, 585
- Stuckenschmidt, H.H., Arnold Schoenberg, 547
- Stuckenschmidt, H.H., Schoenberg, 547
- Sufott, E. Zev, A China Diary, 109
- Suttner, Immanuel, Cutting through the Mountain, 571
- Sutton, Joseph A.D., Aleppo Chronicles, 582
- Sutton, Joseph A.D., Magic Carpet, 582
- Swartz, Michael D., Scholastic Magic, 387
- Sweeney, Marvin A., Isaiah 1-39, 295
- Swirski, Barbara, Calling the Equality Bluff, 630
- Syme, Daniel B., Finding God, 214
- Syrtaf, John, Religion and Culture in Canadian Family Law, 12
- Szajkowski, Zosa, The Comtadin Jews and the Annexation of the Papal Provence, 504
- Szajkowski, Zosa, The Decline and Fall of Provençal Jewry, 504
- Szajkowski, Zosa, Relations among Sephardim, Ashkenazim and Avignonese Jews in France from the 16th to the 20th Centuries, 46, 504
- Szajkowski, Zosa, Socialists and Radicals in the Development of Anti-Semitism in Algeria (1884-1900), 15
- Szajkowski, Zosa, The Struggle for Jewish Emancipation in Algeria after the French Occupation, 15
- Tabor, James D., A Noble Death, 396, 577
- Tabory, Joseph, These Are the Names, 459
- Tadmor, Hayim, II Kings, 344
- Tagger, Mathilde A., Printed Books on Jewish Cemeteries in the Jewish National and University Library in Jerusalem, 103
- Taitz, Emily, Written Out of History, 626
- Tal, Abraham, A Companion to Samaritan Studies, 540
- Talmage, Frank, Apples of Gold, 17, 84
- Talmage, Frank, Apples of Gold in Settings of Silver, 84, 343
- Talmage, Frank, David Kimhi, 84, 343, 389, 513
- Talmon, Shemaryahu, Yehezkel Kaufmann's Approach to Biblical Research, 337
- Tamari, Meir, The Challenge of Wealth, 156
- Tamari, Meir, With All Your Possessions, 156
- Tanenbaum, Adena V., Poetry and Philosophy, 280, 281
- Tanenbaum, Marc H., Twenty Years of Jewish-Catholic Relations, 113
- Tarnor, Norman, A Book of Jewish Women's Prayers, 633
- Tasat, Ramon Alberto, The Cantillations and the Melodies of the Jews of Tangier, Morocco, 440
- Ta-Shema, Israel, The Hebrew Book, 91
- Tate, Marvin E., Psalms 51-100, 508
- Taylor, Joan E., Christians and the Holy Places, 312
- Taylor, Miriam S., Anti-Judaism and Early Christian Identity, 25
- Tcherikover, Avigdor, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews, 237
- Tchernowitz, Chaim, Maimonides as Codifier, 423
- Tec, Nechama, In the Lion's Den 34
- Tedeschi, John A., The Inquisition in Early Modern Europe, 393
- Telford, W.R., Review of Mark's Treatment of the Jewish Leaders by M. Cook, 472
- Temkin, Sefton, Creating American Reform Judaism, 619
- Temkin, Sefton, Isaac Mayer Wise, 619
- Tenenbaum, Shelly, Feminist Perspectives on Jewish Studies, 183
- Teveth, Shabtai, Ben-Gurion, 68
- Teveth, Shabtai, Ben-Gurion and the Holocaust, 68
- Teveth, Shabtai, Ben-Gurion and the Palestinian Arabs, 68
- Thiele, Edwin R., The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 344

- Thoma, Clemens, Parable and Story in Judaism and Christianity, 311
- Thompson, Henry O., Biblical Archaeology, 74
- Tigay, Jeffrey, Empirical Models for Biblical Criticism, 469
- Tigay, Jeffrey, You Shall Have No Other Gods, 337, 459
- Timberg, Thomas A., Jews in India, 288
- Tirosh-Rothschild, Hava, Between Worlds, 405
- Tischler, Alice, A Descriptive Bibliography of Art Music by Israeli Composers, 433
- Tishby, Isaiah, The Wisdom of the Zohar, 331, 648
- Toaff, Ariel, Love, Work, and Death, 304
- Tobi, Jacob, West of Aden, 637
- Tobin, Thomas H., The Creation of Man, 474
- Toorn, Karel van der, Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible, 22
- Torrey, Charles C., The Jewish Foundation of Islam, 429
- Torrey, Charles C., Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy, 174
- Tov, Emanuel, Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible, 550
- Towner, W. Sibley, New Interpreter's Bible, 153
- Toy, Crawford H., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Proverbs, 506
- Trachtenberg, Joshua, The Devil and the Jews, 27, 369
- Trachtenberg, Joshua, Jewish Magic and Superstition, 216, 387
- Trend, John Brande, Isaac Abravanel, 2
- Trible, Phyllis, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality, 624
- Trible, Phyllis, Texts of Terror, 624
- Tromp, Nicholas J., Primitive Conceptions of Death and the Nether World in the Old Testament, 138
- Troper, Harold, None Is Too Many, 100
- Tsedaka, Benyamin, Samaritan Holidays and Festivals, 541
- Tsumura, David, I Studied Inscriptions from before the Flood, 128
- Tubb, Jonathan N., The Canaanites, 98
- Tucker, Gene M., The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, 74
- Tulchinsky, Gerald, Branching Out, 100
- Tulchinsky, Gerald, Taking Root, 100
- Twerski, Abraham J., Generation to Generation, 189
- Twersky, Isadore, Aspects of the Social and Cultural History of Provençal Jewry, 504
- Twersky, Isadore, Introduction to the Code of Maimonides (Mishneh Torah), 423
- Twersky, Isadore, Rabad of Posquières, 1, 389, 513
- Twersky, Isadore, Rabbi Abraham ibn Ezra, 279
- Twersky, Isadore, Rabbi Moses Nahmanides (Ramban), 427
- Udovitch, Abraham L., Jews among Arabs, 454
- Udovitch, Abraham L., The Last Arab Jews, 602
- Ulrich, Eugene, The Community of the Renewed Covenant, 136
- Umansky, Ellen M., Four Centuries of Jewish Women's Spirituality, 626
- Umansky, Ellen M., Liberal Judaism in England, 420
- Umansky, Ellen M., Lily Montagu, 420
- Umansky, Ellen M., Lily Montagu and the Advancement of Liberal Judaism, 420
- Urbach, Efraim E., The Halakhah, 226
- Urbach, Efraim E., The Laws Regarding Slavery as a Source for Social History of the Period of the Second Temple, the Mishnah and Talmud, 562
- Urbach, Efraim E., The Rabbinical Laws of Idolatry in the Second and Third Centuries in the Light of Archaeological and Historical Facts, 43
- Urbach, Efraim E., The Sages, 406, 414, 589
- Urian, Dan, In Search of Identity, 301
- Urman, Dan, Ancient Synagogues, 581
- Urofsky, Melvin I., American Zionism from Herzl to the Holocaust, 643
- Urofsky, Melvin I., A Voice That Spoke for Justice, 620
- Vago, Bela, The Holocaust in Hungary, 273
- Vago, Bela, Jews and Non-Jews in Eastern Europe, 1918–1945, 273
- Vainstein, Yaacov, The Cycle of the Jewish Year, 185
- Valensi, Lucette, The Last Arab Jews, 602
- van der Horst, Pieter W., Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible, 22
- VanderKam, James, The Community of the Renewed Covenant, 136
- VanderKam, James, The Dead Sea Scrolls after Fifty Years, 136
- VanderKam, James, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today, 136, 252
- van der Wall, Ernestine G.E., Jewish-Christian Relations in the Seventeenth Century, 401
- van Dijk-Hemmes, Fokkelien, On Gendering Texts, 506, 624
- Van Leeuwen, Raymond, New Interpreter's Bible, 506
- Van Seters, John, In Search of History, 245
- Vaux, Roland de, Ancient Israel, 102
- Veltri, Giuseppe, The Humanist Sense of History and the Jewish Idea of Tradition, 532
- Verman, Mark, The Books of Contemplation, 331
- Vermès, Géza, The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English, 136
- Vermès, Géza, The Religion of Jesus the Jew, 311
- Vermès, Pamela, Buber, 94
- Vermès, Pamela, Buber on God and the Perfect Man, 94
- Vidakovic Petrov, Krinka, Sephardic Folklore and the Balkan Cultural Environment, 352
- Vidakovic Petrov, Krinka, The Sephardim in Yugoslavia: Playwrights, Plays, and Performances, 352
- Vilnay, Zev, Atlas Tav Shin Kaf Het, 521
- Vilnay, Zev, The New Israel Atlas, 521
- Vinaver, Chemjo, Anthology of Hassidic Music, 436
- Visotzky, Burton L., The Midrash on Proverbs, 506
- Vital, David, The Origins of Zionism, 643
- Vital, David, Zionism: The Crucial Phase, 643
- Vital, David, Zionism: The Formative Years, 643
- Vogel, Stewart, Celebration and Negotiation, 65
- Vorspan, Albert, Jewish Dimensions of Social Justice, 564
- Voss, Carl Hermann, The Lion and the Lamb, 620
- Voss, Carl Hermann, Rabbi and Minister, 620
- Voss, Carl Hermann, Stephen S. Wise, 620
- Wacker, Marie-Theres, Feminist Interpretation, 80
- Wald, Stephen G., The Doctrine of the Divine Name, 331
- Walden, Daniel, The World of Cynthia Ozick, 462
- Walerstein, Marcia S., Public Rituals among the Jews from Cochin, India, in Israel, 117
- Walfish, Barry Dov, Esther in Medieval Garb, 84, 166
- Waller, Harold, Maintaining Consensus, 100
- Wallerstein, Edward, Circumcision, 116
- Walsh, James J., Philosophy in the Middle Ages, 479
- Walsh, Jerome T., 1 Kings, 344
- Walzer, Michael, Exodus and Revolution, 491
- Washofsky, Mark, Teshuvot for the Nineties, 564
- Waskow, Arthur, Down-to-Earth Judaism, 527
- Waskow, Arthur, Godwrestling, 527
- Waskow, Arthur, Seasons of Our Joy, 185, 527
- Waskow, Arthur, Tales of Tikkun, 526
- Waskow, Arthur, These Holy Sparks, 527

- Wasserstein, Bernard, The Jews in Modern France, 191
- Wasserstein, David, The Rise and Fall of the Party-Kings, 283, 572
- Wasserstrom, Steven M., Between Muslim and Jew, 172, 297, 429
- Watson, Wilfred G.E., Classical Hebrew Poetry, 484
- Watt, W. Montgomery, Muhammad at Medina, 429
- Watts, James W., Forming Prophetic Literature, 500
- Watts, John D.W., Isaiah 1–33, 295
- Watts, John D.W., Isaiah 34–66, 295
- Waxman, Meyer, A History of Jewish Literature, 219, 375
- Waxman, Mordecai, Tradition and Change, 121
- Weber, Sally, Celebration and Negotiation, 65
- Wechter, Pinchas, Ibn Barun's Arabic Works on Hebrew Grammar and Lexicography, 367
- Weems, Renita, Battered Love, 624
- Wegner, Judith Romney, Chattel or Person?, 198, 630
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, Adaptations and Borrowings in the Balkan Sephardic Repertoire, 438
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, Judeo-Spanish Moroccan Songs for the Life Cycle, 438
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, The Music of the Judeo-Spanish Romancero, 438
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, Musico-Poetic Genres in the Repertoire of the Saloniki Sephardic Jews, 352
- Weich-Shahak, Susana, Stylistic Features of the Sephardi Copla, 352
- Weil, Daniel Meir, The Masoretic Chant of the Bible, 431
- Weil, Shalva, Bene Israel Indian Jews in Lod, Israel, 67
- Weil, Shalva, Beyond the Sambatyon, 599
- Weil, Shalva, Ethiopian Jews in the Limelight, 170
- Weinbaum, Laurence, A Marriage of Convenience, 647
- Weinberg, David H., A Community on Trial, 191
- Weinberg, Joanna, The Voice of God, 532
- Weinberger, Leon, Jewish Hymnography, 483
- Weinfeld, Moshe, Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School, 85, 142
- Weinfeld, Moshe, Deuteronomy 1–11, 142
- Weingreen, J., Introduction to the Critical Study of the Text of the Hebrew Bible, 550
- Weingrod, Alex, The Saint of Beersheba, 610
- Weinreich, Beatrice Silverman, Yiddish Folktales, 189
- Weinreich, Max, History of the Yiddish Language, 46, 357
- Weinryb, Bernard D., The Jews of Poland, 489
- Weinstein, Sara, Piety and Fanaticism, 5
- Weiss, John, Ideology of Death, 259
- Weiss, M., The Bible from Within, 82
- Weisser, Albert, The Modern Renaissance of Jewish Music, 433
- Weissler, Chava, Voices of the Matriarchs, 527, 626, 633
- Weitzman, Lenore J., Women in the Holocaust, 626
- Weizmann, Chaim, Trial and Error, 614
- Wellhausen, Julius, Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel, 85, 469
- Wenger, Beth S., New York Jews and the Great Depression, 452
- Werblowsky, R.J. Zwi, Joseph Karo, Lawyer and Mystic, 101, 514
- Werblowsky, R.J. Zwi, The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, 521
- Werner, Eric, Hebrew Music, 442
- Werner, Eric, The Sacred Bridge, 432
- Werner, Eric, A Voice Still Heard, 432
- Werth, Karen Bonnell, Stepping Stones to Jewish Spiritual Living, 527
- Wertheim, Aaron, Law and Custom in Hasidism, 232
- Wertheimer, Jack, The American Synagogue, 581
- Wertheimer, Jack, A People Divided, 54, 519
- West, Cornel, Struggles in the Promised Land, 89
- Westerholm, Stephen, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith, 467
- Westermann, Claus, Lamentations, 187, 355
- Westermann, Claus, Roots of Wisdom, 506, 618
- Westermann, Claus, The Structure of the Book of Job, 317
- Wexler, Paul, Recovering the Dialects and Sociology of Judeo-Greek in Non-Hellenistic Europe, 357
- Whaley, Joachim, Religious Toleration and Social Change in Hamburg, 1529–1819, 212
- Whitaker, G.H., Philo in Ten Volumes (and Two Supplementary Volumes), 474
- White, L. Michael, Building God's House in the Roman World, 39, 43
- White, L. Michael, Texts and Monuments for the Christian Domus Ecclesiae in Its Environment, 43
- White, William Charles, Chinese Jews, 109
- Whitelam, Keith, The Just King, 345
- Whybray, R.N., The Book of Proverbs, 506
- Whybray, R.N., The Composition of the Book of Proverbs, 506
- Whybray, R.N., The Making of the Pentateuch, 469
- Wickes, William, A Treatise on the Accentuation of the Twenty-One So-Called Prose Books of the Old Testament, 431
- Wickes, William, Two Treatises on the Accentuation of the Old Testament, 398
- Wieder, Naphtali, The Judean Scrolls and Karaism, 335
- Wiener, Max, Abraham Geiger's Conception of the Science of Judaism, 621
- Wiener, Max, The Ideology of the Founders of Jewish Scientific Research, 621
- Wiener, Shohama, The Fifty-Eighth Century, 527
- Wiener, Theodore, The Writings of Leo Baeck, 61
- Wiesel, Elie, Night, 263
- Wiesel, Elie, Souls on Fire, 364
- Wieseltier, Leon, Kaddish, 140
- Wiesenthal, Simon, The Sunflower, 263
- Wigoder, Geoffrey, The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, 521
- Wigoder, Geoffrey, The Story of the Synagogue, 39, 40
- Wilcock, Evelyn, Pacifism and the Jews, 613
- Wildavsky, Aaron, Assimilation Versus Separation, 491
- Wildavsky, Aaron, The Nursing Father, 491
- Wilken, Robert L., Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries of the Common Era, 25
- Wilken, Robert L., John Chrysostom and the Jews, 112
- Williams, Jay G., Ten Words of Freedom, 141
- Williams, Bill, The Making of Manchester Jewry, 582
- Williams, James G., Those Who Ponder Proverbs, 506
- Williamson, H.G.M., The Book Called Isaiah, 295
- Williamson, H.G.M., Ezra, Nehemiah, 176
- Williamson, H.G.M., 1 and 2 Chronicles, 115
- Williamson, H.G.M., Wisdom in Ancient Israel, 617
- Wills, Lawrence M., The Jew in the Court of the Foreign King, 135
- Wills, Lawrence M., The Jewish Novel in the Ancient World, 33, 239
- Wilson, Robert R., Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel, 499, 500
- Wilson, Stephen G., Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity, 25
- Wilson, Stephen G., Ideology and Experience, 191
- Wilson, Stephen G., Related Strangers, 25, 112, 312
- Winkler, Gershon, The Golem of Prague, 218

- Winkler, Gershon, Sacred Secrets, 527
 Winston, David, Logos and Mystical Theology in Philo of Alexandria, 475
 Wirth-Nesher, Hana, What Is Jewish Literature?, 18
 Wischnitzer, Rachel, The Architecture of the European Synagogue, 40
 Wischnitzer, Rachel, Synagogue Architecture in the United States, 40
 Wise, Michael, The Dead Sea Scrolls, 136
 Wise, Stephen S., Challenging Years, 620
 Wise, Stephen S., The Personal Letters of Stephen Wise, 620
 Wiseman, James, Stobi, 39
 Wisse, Ruth R., I.L. Peretz and the Making of Modern Jewish Culture, 471
 Wisse, Ruth R., Introduction to The I.L. Peretz Reader, 471
 Wisse, Ruth R., The Schlemiel as Modern Hero, 641
 Wistrich, Robert, Antisemitism, 29
 Wolf, Leonard, Yiddish Folktales, 189
 Wolf, Lucien, Catalogue of the Anglo-Jewish Historical Exhibition, Royal Albert Hall, London, 1887, 42
 Wolf, Lucien, Menasseh Ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell, 401
 Wolfson, Elliot R., Along the Path, 332
 Wolfson, Elliot R., By Way of Truth, 427
 Wolfson, Elliot R., Circle in the Square, 198, 332
 Wolfson, Elliot R., From Sealed Book to Open Text, 307
 Wolfson, Elliot R., Letter Symbolism and Merkavah Imagery in the Zohar, 456
 Wolfson, Elliot R., Rending the Veil, 216
 Wolfson, Elliot R., Through a Speculum That Shines, 212, 332
 Wolfson, Harry A., Crescas' Critique of Aristotle, 129
 Wolfson, Harry A., Philo, 17, 447, 475
 Wolfson, Harry A., The Philosophy of Spinoza, 573
 Wolfson, Harry A., Studies in the History of Philosophy and Religion, 129
 Wolfson, Ron, Shall You Teach Them Diligently?, 157
 Wolitz, Seth, Chagall's Last Soviet Performance, 107
 Wolowelsky, Joel B., Jewish Law and the New Reproductive Technologies, 529
 Woocher, Jonathan, Sacred Survival, 123
 Wouk, Herman, This Is My God, 326
 Wright, David Pearson, The Disposal of Impurity, 366
 Wright, G. Ernest, Joshua, 320
 Würthwein, Ernst, The Text of the Old Testament, 550
 Wurzbarger, Walter S., Symposium: The State of Orthodoxy, 417
 Wyner, Susan, Mediating the Tensions of Bar/Bat Mitzvah, 66
 Wyschogrod, Michael, The Body of Faith, 110
 Wyschogrod, Michael, Parable and Story in Judaism and Christianity, 311
 Yadin, Yigael, Bar-Kokhba, 64
 Yadin, Yigael, Jerusalem Revealed, 309
 Yahalom, Joseph, Diwan and Odyssey, 322
 Yahil, Leni, The Holocaust, 259
 Yardeni, Ada, The Book of Hebrew Script, 551
 Yaron, Baruch, Jews and Judaism in East European Publications, 1945–1970, 273
 Yaron, Reuven, Introduction to the Law of the Aramaic Papyri, 160
 Yehuda, Zvi, Asian and African Jews in the Middle East, 1860–1971, 407
 Yeivin, Israel, Introduction to the Tiberian Masorah, 398, 550
 Yellin, David, Maimonides, 423
 Yeroushalmi, David, The Judeo-Persian Poet 'Emrani and His "Book of Treasure," 292
 Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim, From Spanish Court to Italian Ghetto, 393, 554
 Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim, Haggadah and History, 224
 Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim, The Lisbon Massacre of 1506 and the Royal Image in the Shebet Yehudah, 492
 Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim, Zakhor, 245, 246, 253
 Yonge, C.D., The Works of Philo, 475
 York, Anthony D., The Targum in the Synagogue and in the School, 592
 Young, Brad H., Jesus and His Jewish Parables, 311
 Young, James, Writing and Rewriting the Holocaust, 261
 Yovel, Yirmiyahu, Spinoza and Other Heretics, 573
 Yudkin, Leon Israel, Jewish Writing and Identity in the Twentieth Century, 285
 Zafrani, H., Judeo-Berber, 357
 Zahavy, Tzvee, Studies in Jewish Prayer, 379
 Zakovitch, Yair, "And You Shall Tell Your Son—", 173
 Zakutinsky, Ruth, Techinas, 633
 Zamir, Israel, Journey to My Father, Isaac Bashevis Singer, 562
 Zamir, Itzhak, Public Law in Israel, 269
 Zannoni, Arthur E., Introduction to Jewish-Christian Relations, 113
 Zannoni, Arthur E., Jews and Christians Speak of Jesus, 311
 Zborowski, Mark, Life Is with People, 558
 Zeitlin, Solomon, The Am Haarez, 19
 Zemer, Moshe, Conversion to Judaism in Jewish Law, 124
 Zenner, Walter P., Global Community, 582
 Zenner, Walter P., Jewish Societies in the Middle East, 407
 Zenner, Walter P., Jews among Muslims, 407, 582
 Zerubavel, Yael, Recovered Roots, 64, 298
 Ziegler, Aharon, Halakhic Positions of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, 568
 Zimmels, H.J., Ashkenazim and Sephardim, 46, 554
 Zimmer, Eric, Men's Headcovering, 125
 Zimmerli, Walther, Ezekiel 1, 174
 Zimmerli, Walther, Ezekiel 2, 175
 Zimmerli, Walther, Old Testament Theology in Outline, 74
 Zinberg, Israel, A History of Jewish Literature, 376
 Zipes, Jack, Yale Companion to Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture, 1096–1996, 285
 Zipperstein, Steven J., Elusive Prophet, 13, 301
 Zlotnick, Dov, Iron Pillar–Mishnah, 460
 Zlotnick, Dov, The Tractate "Mourning" (Semahot), 138
 Zohary, Michael, Plants of the Bible, 188
 Zolli, Eugenio, Before the Dawn, 34
 Zollschan, Ignaz, Jewish Questions, 517
 Zorattini, P.C. Ioly, The Jews and the Inquisition of Aquileia and Concordia, 289
 Zuck, Roy B., Reflecting with Solomon, 153
 Zuckerman, Alan S., The Transformation of the Jews, 256
 Zuckerman, Marvin, Selected Works of Mendele Moykher-Sforim, 403
 Zucrow, Solomon, Women, Slaves, and the Ignorant in Rabbinic Literature, and Also the Dignity of Man, 563
 Zweig, Ronald W., David Ben-Gurion, 68
 Zysblat, Allen, Public Law in Israel, 269

This page intentionally left blank

GENERAL INDEX

Page numbers in bold indicate subjects with their own entries.

- Aaron, 92
Abisha', Scroll of, 541 abortion, 88–89, 181, 564
Abraham, 18, 201, 250, 397
Abraham bar Hiyya, 49
Abraham ben David of Posquières, 1–2, 389–90, 513
Abramovitsh, Sholem Yankev, see Mendele Moykher Sforim
Abravanel, Isaac, 2–3, 65, 492, 513; philosophy of, 179, 416, 480
Abravanel, Judah, 3–5 abrogation of law and custom, 5–6 abstinence, 89
Abudiente, Moses ben Gideon, 368
Abulafia, Abraham, 6–7, 333, 457
Abulafia, Meir ben Todros ha-Levi, 487, 514, 572, 649
Abulafia, Moses, 583
Abu Sa'id Halfon ben Nethanel ha-Levi, 323
Accident, 616
acculturation, 565, 606
Acheans, 99
Achron, Joseph, 434
Acosta, Uriel, 7–8, 575
Acre, 131
Acts, Book of, 26–27, 217–18
Adam, 92
Aden, 637–38
Adler, Felix, 168
adoption, 181
Adversus Judaeos literature, 25–27, 112–13
Aesthetics of Pure Feeling, 119 affective faith, 180 affirmative action, 89–90
Afghanistan, 292–93
Afro-Asian languages, see Semitic languages afterlife, 139
afternoon school, 158
Against Apion, 319–20
aggadah, see midrash aggadah
Agnon, Shmuel Yosef, 9–10, 72, 236–37, 635 agricultural laws, 10–11, 146, 597–98
Agudat Harabbonim, see Union of Orthodox Rabbis
Agudat Hasocialistim Ha'ivriim beLondon, 382
Agudat Israel, 230, 451, 490
Aguilar, Moses Raphael, 368
agunah, 11–13
Ahad Ha'am, 13–14, 72, 300, 301, 488, 644
Aher, see Elisha ben Abuya
Ahimaaz ben Paltiel of Capua, 57
akedah, 201, 397, 410
Akedat Yitshak, 36
Akiba ben Joseph, 14–15, 511
Akkadians, 60
Aksumite Kingdom, 170
Alalakh, 22
Al-Aqsa, Mosque of, 593–94
Albalag, Isaac, 415
Albo, Joseph, 179, 479–80
alchemy, 388
Aleppo, 582–83
Alfes, Ben-Zion, 633
Algazi, Isaac, 439
Algeria, 15–16, 454–55, 602
Algerian War of Independence, 16
Alhambra, 282, 283
allegory, 17–18, 84, 187, 476
Allen, Woody, 186, 272
Alliance Israélite Universelle, 192, 354, 421–22
Almog, Aharon, 237
Almog, Ruth, 236
Almosnino, Moses, 353
Alon, Gedalia, 14
alphabet, Hebrew, see Hebrew alphabet
Alsace, 164, 192
Alter, Judah Leib, 528
Alterman, Nathan, 237
Amenemope, Instruction of, 507
America, La, 353
American Jewish Congress, 69
American literature, 18–19, 635, 642
Am Ha'arets, 19–20
Amichai, Yehuda, 236, 488
Amoraim, see rabbinic biography: talmudic
Amos, Book of, 502–03
Amsterdam, 314, 402, 438, 450, 493
amulets, 57, 126, 388–89
Anan ben David, 172, 336
Anatoli, Jacob, 267
Anatolia, 21
ancient Near East, see Near East, ancient Ancona, 447
Andalusia, 283, 486–87, 639
Angel of Death, 22
angels and demons, 22–24, 213, 388–89, 540 animals, 24–25, 189
Anna O., see Pappenheim, Bertha
Answer to the Jews, 27
anti-Christianity, 245 anti-Judaism, 25–29; in Central Europe, 105; in late antiquity, 25–27, 238; in the Middle Ages, 27–29; in the New Testament, 265. See also antisemitism Antioch, 26
antirationalism, 3
antisemitism, 29–30, 113–14; and assimilation, 48; in France, 191–92; in Germany, 208–09, 260, 272; history of, 245, 249, 255, 256–57, 369–70; in North Africa, 16; in

- North America, 90, 101, 606; in Russia, 533–34; and secularism, 553; in South Africa, 571; in Spain, 290–91; and Zionism, 644. See also anti-Judaism
- antithetical parallelism, 484
- anusim, 132
- Apocalypse of Gorgorios*, 170
- apocalyptic, 30–32, 34, 70, 135, 137–38, 139, 165–66, 239
- Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, 31, 32–34, 81, 239; introductions to, 33–34, 77; translations of, 32–33
- apologetics, see under Christian-Jewish relations
- apophasis, 448
- apostasy, 34–35
- Appelfeld, Aharon, 10
- Aqhat, Tale of, 99
- Aquinas, Thomas, 426
- Arabian literature, 57, 280, 486–87
- Arabian Peninsula, 249, 408, 429, 637–38
- Arabic language, 359, 368
- Arab-Jewish relations, 69, 342, 644, 646
- Arama, Isaac, 36
- Aramaic language, 234, 358, 368
- Aramaic literature see languages, Jewish; Targum
- Arameans, 60
- archaeology, 36–38, 75, 251, 509; of Israel, 298; of the Temple, 594
- architecture, general, 252, 594
- architecture, synagogue, 38–41, 105, 314, 581; art in, 43–44, 580; in late antiquity, 38–40; medieval and modern, 40–41
- Arenhof, 234
- Argentina, 47, 362
- Ari, see Luria, Isaac
- Aristotelianism, 41–42, 50, 323, 343, 424; and economic theory, 156
- Aristotle, 41–42
- Ark of the Covenant, 585
- art, 42–44, 105, 284; ceremonial, 42–43, 104; of the ketubbah, 395; in late antiquity, 43–44; and symbolism, 580. See also manuscript illumination
- artificial insemination, 530
- art music, 433–35, 441
- Asa, Abraham, 355
- As a Driven Leaf*, 576–77
- asceticism, 6, 45–46, 91
- Ascher, Saul, 233
- Asherah, 287
- Ashkenazim, 46–48; history of the, 64, 207, 450; music of the, 436–38, 442; mysticism and magic of the, 388, 457; rituals of the, 103, 140; scholarship of the, 368, 639; and Sephardim, 236, 555; and women, 631
- Ashurbanipal, 60
- Asia, 29–30. See also Central Asia
- Asia Minor, 112
- assimilation, 48–49, 181, 256–57, 326, 565; and gender, 199–200; and identity, 286; portrayals of, 186, 462; in Prague, 494; and secularism, 553; to Western culture, 192, 606–07
- Assumption of Moses, 397
- Assyria, 60–61
- Assyriology, 21–22
- astral worship, 50
- astrology, 49–50, 279
- astronomy, 98, 363, 549
- athletics, 105, 274
- atlases, 75, 522–23
- atonement, see festivals and fasts; sin and atonement
- Auckland, 51
- Augsburg, 207
- Auschwitz, 260, 264
- Austin, John, 641
- Australia and New Zealand, 50–51, 256
- Australian Jewish Historical Society Journal*, 51
- Austria, 105–06, 207, 261
- authority, rabbinic and communal, 51–54, 491, 543
- autonomy, 54–55, 159
- Averroism, 5, 36, 130
- Avicenna, 130, 323
- Avignon, 48, 504
- Avot (tractate), 120, 411, 355, 564, 588
- Azerbaijan, 293
- Azriel of Gerona, 448
- Ba'al, 99, 100, 501
- Ba'alei ha-Nefesh*, 2
- ba'alei shem, 57–58
- ba'alei teshuvah, 58–59, 587
- Ba'al Shem Tov, Israel ben Eliezer, see Israel ben Eliezer Ba'al Shem Tov
- Baba'ot, 373
- Babata, 64
- Babel, Tower of, 201
- Baby Boomers, 54
- Babylonia, 21, 59–61, 537; communites in, 53, 254
- Babylonian Talmud, 20, 205, 254, 586–88, 590–91; humor in the, 272; scholarship on, 373; and yeshivot, 638–39
- Bacri family, 16
- badeken, 125
- Baeck, Leo, 61–62
- Baghdad, 294
- Baghdadi Jews of India, 62–63, 67, 288–89, 294
- Bahir*, 332
- Bahya ben Asher, 649
- Bais Chana, 59
- bakkashot, 583
- Balaam, 456
- Balkans, 63–64
- Balkh, 292
- ballads, see Sephardi ballads
- Ballas, Shimon, 236
- Bal Makhshoves, 558
- Barcelona Disputation, 113
- Bar Kokhba, Simeon, 14, 64–65
- Bar Kokhba Revolt, see Second Jewish Revolt
- Bar Mitzvah, 65–67, 98
- Baron, Devorah, 634
- Barros Basto, Arturo Carlos de, 132
- Barth, Karl, 79, 569
- Bashyazi, Elijah, 336
- Basra, 294
- Batavian Republic, 450
- Bat Mitzvah, 65–67, 98
- Batna, 16
- Battani, al-, 97
- Begin, Menahem, 648
- Beginning of Wisdom*, 383
- Beilis, Mendel, 371
- Beit Simchat Torah Congregation, 268
- Beit Yosef*, 101
- Bejerano, Maya, 634
- Bellow, Saul, 19, 72, 595, 642
- Belmonte, 132
- ben Asher, Aaron, 368, 398
- Bene Israel of India, 62, 67–68, 288–89
- Ben-Gurion, David, 68–69, 270, 644, 645
- Ben-Naphtali, Moses, 398
- Benrubi, Isaac, 354
- ben Sira, Simeon ben Jesus, 70, 150
- Ben Sira, Wisdom of, 34, 69–70, 496
- Ben Tehillim*, 283
- Ben-Yehuda, Eliezer, 71–72, 369
- Berab, Jacob, 543–44
- Berakhot (tractate), 589, 591
- Berbers, 602
- Berdugo, Raphael, 611
- Berdyczewski, Micha Josef, 548
- Beregovskii, Moshe, 437
- Bereshit Rabbah*, 358
- Berger, Maurice, 91, 519
- Berit 'Ahuvice, see Covenant for Lovers
- berit milah, see circumcision
- Berkson, Carmela, 68
- Berlin, Irving, 435–36
- Bernstein, Leonard, 93, 435
- Bertinoro, Obadiah de, 600
- Besht, see Israel ben Eliezer Ba'al Shem Tov
- Beta Israel, 170–71, 441
- Bet Din, see sanhedrin, semikhah, and rabbinat
- Bettelheim, Bruno, 263
- Bialik, Hayyim Nahman, 72–73, 376, 488
- Bible, 73–87; allegorical interpretation of the, 17, 187; archaeology of the, 38, 586; criticism of the, 81–83, 197, 337, 550; gender in the, 199, 556, 624; and hermeneutics, 80–81, 111; as a historical source, 250; introductions to the, 75–77; law in

- the, 85–87, 578; medieval exegesis of the, 83–85, 410; reference tools for the, 74–75; social and community issues in the, 155, 188–89, 272, 287, 491–92; theology of the, 77–80, 151, 165, 214–15, 596; translations of the, 73–74, 94, 111, 353. See also masorah; midrash aggadah; wisdom literature
- bibliographies, 92, 521–22
- Bibliotheca Rosenthaliana, 93
- Billikopf, Jacob, 89
- bioethics, 87–88, 139
- birth control, 88–89, 556
- Biton, Erez, 237
- Biur haGra*, 162
- Black Death, 554
- black-Jewish relations in the United States, 30, 89–90, 565–66, 629
- Blaser, Isaac, 430
- Blidstein, Gerald, 53
- Bloch, Ernest, 435
- blood libel, 369
- Bloodshed and Other Novellas*, 462
- B'nai B'rith, 606
- B'nai Yeshurun of Cincinnati, 619
- body, 90–91, 517, 556
- Boerne, Ludwig, 208
- Book of Beliefs and Opinions*, 513, 538
- Book of Commandments*, 425
- Book of Comparison between the Hebrew and the Arabic Languages*, 368
- Book of Definitions*, 448
- Book of Discussion and Conversation*, 280
- Book of Remembrances*, 28, 131
- Book of Spirit and Soul*, 448
- Book of Substances*, 448
- Book of the Correct Syllogism*, 363
- Book of the Covenant*, 343
- Book of the Eloquence of the Language of the Hebrews*, 538
- Book of the Honeycomb's Flow*, 405
- Book of Tradition*, 277
- books and libraries, 91–93
- Bombay, 62–63, 67–68
- Bomberg, Daniel, 498, 612
- Borges, Jorge Luis, 219
- Boris III (king of Bulgaria), 64
- Borochof, Ber, 644
- Borowitz, Eugene, 524
- Borowski, Tadeusz, 263
- Boston, 553, 565, 606
- botany, see flora and fauna
- Brahe, Tycho, 494
- brain-stem death, 88
- Brandeis, Louis D., 645
- Bransk, 559
- Brazil, 132, 362
- Brazile, Donna, 90
- Brecht, Berthold, 595
- Breslau school, 194–95
- Bridal Canopy*, 9
- Brief Tales of Benjamin the Third*, 403
- Brod, Max, 208
- Broida, Simhah Zissel, 430
- Bronze Age, 250
- Brooklyn, New York, 583
- Brooks, Mel, 186
- Brundibar*, 434
- Buber, Martin, 82, 93–95, 208–09, 548
- Bubis, Ignatz, 208
- Budapest, 275
- Buenos Aires, 362
- Bukhara, 408, 441
- Bulgaria, 64
- burial, see cemeteries; death, burial, and mourning
- Burnt House, 310
- Busnach family, 16
- Byzantine Empire, 28, 63, 335–36
- Cahan, Abraham, 19
- Calcutta, 62–63
- calendar, 97–98, 185, 549
- calligraphy, 551
- Calvin, Jean, 325
- Camus, Albert, 617
- Camp Ramah, 122
- Canaan, 21, 38, 102, 251, 330
- Canaanites, 98–100
- Canada, 12, 100–01, 256, 438–39
- Canadian Jewish Congress, 100
- Cannibal Galaxy*, 462
- cantillation, 431–32
- cantorial music, 432–33, 436
- capitalism, 156, 256
- capital punishment, 80, 564
- Capon, Abraham, 352
- Cardoso, Isaac, 555
- Cardozo, Miguel, 557
- Caribbean, 361–62
- Carmona, Elia, 353–54
- Caro, Joseph, 101–02, 146, 514–15
- Carpentras, 504
- Carthage, 99
- Castilian dialect, 359
- catcombs, 103
- Catalonia, 332
- Caucasia, 47, 408
- causality, 480
- Cave of Letters, 64
- cave tombs, 102–03
- Celan, Paul, 262
- celestial mechanics, 130
- celibacy, 46
- cemeteries, 102–104; in antiquity, 102–03; medieval and modern, 103–04
- censorship, 498
- Central Asia, 292–93
- Central Europe, 104–06, 644
- Chagall, Marc, 106–08, 376
- Chaldeans, 60
- Chapter on the Elements*, 448–49
- charity, 108, 202
- Chayevsky, Paddy, 595
- cherubim, 585
- Chicago, 605
- childbirth, 91, 116, 530
- childhood, 180–81
- child sacrifice, 397
- China, 108–10
- Chmielnicki massacres, 401
- chosen people, 110, 265, 363, 477, 482–83
- Chotzner, Joseph, 272
- Chouraqui, André, 16
- Christian Hebraists, 110–11, 255
- Christiani, Pablo, 28, 35, 427
- Christianity, 313; anti- and philosemitism in, 29, 477; art of, 44; history of, 137, 338, 390; and the Holocaust, 265; philosophy of, 2, 151, 480; theology of, 179, 500
- Christian-Jewish relations, 111–14, 268; and anti-Judaism, 25–29, 30; apologetics and polemics in, 62, 111–13, 480–81; dialogue in, 113–14, 402, 531; history of, 206, 221, 255, 304, 525
- Chronicle of Abimaaz*, 57
- Chronicle of Rabbi Eliezer bar Nathan*, 28, 131
- Chronicle of Solomon bar Simson*, 28, 131
- Chronicles, 85, 115–16
- Chrysostom, John, 26, 112
- Chuetas, see crypto-Jews, contemporary
- circumcision, 116–17
- citizenship, 553
- civil law, 226
- Clement of Alexandria, 17
- Cochin Jews, 67, 117–18, 288–89
- codicology, 552
- Coen, Giuseppe, 633
- cognitive faith, 180
- Cohen, Alfred, 24
- Cohen, Hermann, 110, 118–20, 483
- coitus interruptus, 88–89
- comedy, 595
- Comenius, Johann, 325
- commandments, 49–50, 54, 120–21. See also Decalogue
- communal enactment, 53
- communism, 156
- community, 52–54, 145
- Compendio de gramatica hebrea*, 368
- Compendium Kabbalae*, 402
- competition, 157
- Comtat Venaissin, 505
- concentration camps, see death camps, Holocaust
- Concept of Religion in the System of Philosophy*, 119
- concordance, 75
- condoms, 88–89
- Connecticut, 605
- conquest of labor, 646
- Conservative Judaism, 121–22, 140, 150, 194
- Consistoire centrale, 192
- Constantinople, 336
- continuity, 44, 123, 145, 181, 482
- conversion, forced, 504–05
- conversion to Judaism, 123–25, 340, 406

- conversos, 35, 290–92, 450, 492–93, 554–55
 coplas, 354–55
 Cordovero, Moses, 101, 333, 383, 457 cosmic dualism, 151
 cosmogony, 279
 cosmology, 41, 549, 618 costume, 125–27
Course of the Paths of Knowledge, see Mahalakh shevilei ha-da'at covenant, 114, 127–28, 481–82; in the Bible, 78, 143, 173; differing theologies of, 468, 477; and political theory, 492
 Covenant Code, 85–87, 143
 Covenant for Lovers, 184 creation, 31, 36, 128–29, 201; and evolution, 549; in philosophy, 42, 151, 425, 448; in wisdom literature, 618 creation ex nihilo, 150 creed, see dogmas
 cremation, 103
 Crescas, Hasdai, 4, 42, 129–130, 415, 480
 Crimea, 408
 criminal justice, 564 criticism, see under Bible. See also specific types of criticism: e.g., historical criticism; reader-response criticism
 Cronbach, Abraham, 613 crucifixion, 376
 Crusades, 28, 29, 47, 130–31, 207, 256, 407
 crypto-Jews, contemporary, 131–33, 493, 554 Cuba, 362
 cuneiform law, 86
 cuneiform script, 21
 Curaçao, 362
 Cyrenaica, 372
 Czech-Jewish movement, 105–06
 Czech Republic, 105–06, 266, 314. See also Prague da Costa, Uriel, see Acosta, Uriel

 Dagestan, 441
Dal sefatayim, 368
 Damascus, 583
 Damascus Pentateuch, 552
 dance, 442, 529
 Daniel, Book of, 31, 34, 135–36, 137, 397
 Daniel, Brother, 35
 Daniel, Ruby, 118
Darash Moshe, 182
Darke no'am, 368
 David, King, 83, 92, 251, 501
 David ben Abraham al-Fasi, 368
 David ben Saul, 389
 David ben Zakkai, 537
David's Praise, 406
 Dead Sea Scrolls, 135, 136–38, 240, 253; apocalyptic in the, 31, 139; and archaeology, 38; and dualism, 150; and Karaism, 336; legal traditions of the, 83; script of the, 551; Zadokites and the, 496 death, burial, and mourning, 102, 104, 138–41, 529; biblical and talmudic, 138–39; medieval and modern, 139–41 death camps, see Holocaust
Death of Moses, 170
 Decalogue, 120, 127, 141–42
 deconstructionist criticism, 80–81 defilement laws, 139, 456
 del Bene, Judah, 268
 Delmedigo, Elijah, 5
 Delmedigo, Joseph Solomon, 515 democracy, 52, 270
 demonization, 204
 demons, 22–24, 213, 388–89, 540
 Derrida, Jacques, 365, 448
 Desert Storm, 523
 Deuteronomic Code, 144
 Deuteronomists, 308
 Deuteronomy, 85–87, 115, 127, 142–44, 411–12
 Deutsch, Babbette, 489 devotional literature, see ethical and devotional literature dhimmis, 126
Dialogue with Trypho a Jew, 27
Dialogues of Love, 3, 4–5 diaphragm, as birth control method, 88 diaspora, 144–45; communal life of the, 39, 44, 466; identity in the, 123, 285; Sephardim in the, 555; Zionism in the, 644
Dibrot Moshe, 182
 dictionaries, 75, 522
 dietary laws, 145–47, 366
 Dik, Isaac Meir, 642
 Dilthey, Wilhelm, 95
 disease, 400
 Displaced Persons' camps, 208 displacement, 236
 disposal, rules of, 366
 divine election, see election, divine divine revelation, see revelation, divine divorce, 12, 147–48, 210, 564, 632
 Djaen, Shabbetai, 352
 Djerba, 602–03
 Djuzemo, see Ladino literature; languages, Jewish Dobruschka, Moses, 194
 doctors, see physicians Doctors' Plot, 534
 documentary film, 266 documentary hypothesis, 85, 470
 dogmas, 3, 148–50, 480
 Dome of the Rock, 594
 Dominican friars, 573
 douches, 89
 dreams, 389
 Dreyfus affair, 16, 191–92, 241, 371, 643 dualism, 150–51
 Dunash ben Labrat, 368
 Dura-Europos, 39–40, 43–44

 Duran, Simeon ben Zemah, 16, 480 dynamic translations, 74
 dyanstic governments, 346

 East End (London), 382
 Eastern Europe, 54, 181, 336, 559
 Eastern Orthodox Church, 63, 516
 Ebla, 22
 Ebstein, Bernie, 90
 Ebstein, Roz, 90
 Ecclesiastes, 80, 153–55, 187, 618, 624
 Ecclesiasticus, see Ben Sira, Wisdom of Eckhart, Meister, 448
 ecology, 155–56, 400
 economic ideologies, 156–57, 646–47
 Edels, Samuel, 326
 Eden, Garden of, 18 education, 157–59; in Hebrew language, 66; in Iraq, 294; and Jewish studies, 315–16; in Poland, 490; of women, 632
 Eger, Akiba, 230
 Egypt, 21–22, 159–60, 408; and the Canaanites, 99; culture of, 126, 441; history of, 202, 238, 255, 391
 Eichhorn, Johann Gottfried, 76
Ein ha-Kore, see Eye of the Reader
 Einhorn, David, 119
Einleitung in das Alten Testament, 76
 Eisenmenger, Johann Andreas, 30
 Eisenstein, Ira, 520
 Elamites, 60
 Eldad ha-Dani, 599
 Eleazar ben Judah of Worms, 231 election, divine, 110, 346
 Elephantine, 160–61
 Eliezer ben Hyrkanos, 512
 Elijah, 501
 Elijah ben Solomon Zalman of Vilna, 161–62, 230, 308
 Elijah of Chelm, 57
 Eliot, T.S., 72
 Elisha, 501
 Elisha ben Abuya, 512
 Elon, Menahem, 53
 Emancipation, 48, 162–64, 233, 256, 481; in France, 192–93; and identity, 286, 327; in the Netherlands, 450; and secularism, 553; of women, 632
 Emar, 22
 Emden, Jacob, 164–65, 516
 Emden-Eybeschütz Controversy, 164–65, 516
Emet V'Emunah, 122
 emigration, see migration
 Emrani, 293
 encyclopedias, 522
Enemies, A Love Story, 562
 Engel, Joel, 434
 England, see Great Britain
 English language, 74, 111
 Enlightenment, 29, 327, 575, 598
 Enlightenment, Jewish, see Haskalah
 1 Enoch, 70, 137
 3 Enoch, 23–24

- Enuma Elish*, 128–29, 151
 environment, see ecology epigraphy, see Hebrew alphabet
Epistle of Barnabas, 27
Epistle on Love, 4
Epitome de grammatica hebraica, 368
 Epstein, Leslie, 19
 Epstein, Moses Mordecai, 623
 Eriugena, John the Scot, 448
 Esarhaddon, 60
 eschatology, 31, 165–66, 390, 541
Esh Dat, 454
 Essaouira, 422
Essence of Judaism, 61
 Essenes, 45, 136–38
Ester, 352
 Esther, Book of, 81, 85, 136, 166–67, 187–88, 625 ethical and devotional literature, 167–68 Ethical Culture, 168–69 ethical wills, 169–70 ethics, see social ethics
Ethics (Spinoza), 574
Ethics of Pure Will, 119
 Ethiopia, 170–71
 ethnology, see race, Jews as eulogy, 140, 268
 Europe, 203, 257; antisemitism in, 28, 29; Emancipation in, 553; and Jewish studies, 316; rabbinic authority in, 53; synagogues of, 40; Zionist movements of, 644. See also Central Europe euthanasia, 140, 171–72
 Eve, 92, 625 evil, 150, 317, 389, 589; in the creation, 128; in literature, 262; origins and sources of, 31, 366 evolution, 549
Exalted Faith, 41, 278
Examination of Pharisaic Traditions, 8 excavations, 37, 310 exclusion, 206
 excommunications, 54
 exegesis, 17–18, 80, 83–85
 exilarchate, 172–73, 346, 375
 existentialism, 119, 617
 Exodus, 81, 141–42, 173–74; midrash on, 412–13; and Passover, 464; and political theory, 491
 exorcism, 57, 387
 expulsions, 28, 493, 505, 573; from England, 221, 382
 Eybeschütz, Jonathan, 164–65, 267, 516
Eye of the Reader, 406
 Ezekiel, Book of, 174–76, 625
 Ezra, 176–77
 Ezra and Nehemiah, Books of, 115, 176–77
 Fagius, Paul, 111
 faith, 179–80, 264, 553
 Falashas, see Beta Israel
 Falk, Samuel, 58
 falsehood, 309
 family, 2, 66, 180–81, 255, 526, 632
 Farissol, Abraham ben Mordechai, 515
 Farrakhan, Louis, 90
 fascism, 372
 fasts, see festivals and fasts
 Fatimids, 131, 160
 feature films, 266
 Feiffer, Jules, 595
 Feinstein, Moses, 172, 181–82, 640
 Feldman, Irving, 489 feminism, 182–84, 269, 528; and ba'alei teshuvah, 59; in Christian-Jewish relations, 114; and the Conservative movement, 122; and family life, 181; in Germany, 463. See also women feminist criticism, 80–81, 167, 634; of Proverbs, 508; of Ruth, 535
 Ferdinand (king of Spain), 290–91
 Ferrara, 532
 fertility, see reproductive technologies festivals and fasts, 185–86, 187, 529, 593, 610
 Feuerbach, Ludwig, 179
 Fez, 421
 Ficino, Marsilio, 4–5
Fiddler on the Roof (film), 186
 Figo, Azariah, 268
 film, 186–87, 266–67, 629
 Finkas, Hizkiahu, 170
 First Crusade, 130–31, 207, 256
 First Jewish Revolt, 77, 319–20
 First Temple period, 180, 593
Fishke the Lame, 403
 Five Scrolls, 187–88
 flood, 201
 flora and fauna, 188–89, 580 folk music, 354, 436–38
 folktales, 189–90
Folk Tales (I. L. Peretz), 472 forgotten sheaves, 597
 form criticism, 80
 Formstecher, Solomon, 348, 483
Fountain of Life, 282
 Fourth Lateran Council, 126
 France, 47, 190–93; Algeria's relations with, 16; antisemitism in, 29; Christian-Jewish relations in, 35; Emancipation in, 163–64; films of, 266–67; Portuguese communities in, 493. See also Provence
 Franciscan friars, 573
 Franco-German communities, 206, 397
 Frank, Anne, 262, 450
 Frank, Jacob Joseph, 193–94
 Frank, Leo, 371
 Frankel, Zacharias, 194–95, 198
 Frankism, 194, 490
 Frankl, Viktor, 263
 Frederick the Great, 598 freedom, 278
 free will, 50, 129, 278
 French Revolution, 164, 505
 frescos, 580
 Freud, Sigmund, 519
 Frey, Junius Brutus, see Dobruschka, Moses
 Friedländer, David, 233
From the Fair, 558
 funerary practices, 102–03, 140
 Gabès, 602
 Gabler, Johann, 78
 Gadamer, Hans-Georg, 95
 Gadol, Moise, 353
 Galicia, 437, 560
 Galilee, 466
 Galinski, Heinz, 208
 Gamaliel, House of, 375, 465
 Gans, David, 494
 gaonate, 204
Gates of Light, 332
 Gauss, Karl Friedrich, 97
 Geiger, Abraham, 197–98, 622
Gei Hizzayon, 526
 Gemara, 587
 gematria, 457
 gender, 184, 198–200, 257, 556, 624; and ba'alei teshuvah, 59; in literature, 236; in pagan religions, 287; and race, 519; in the Renaissance, 526. See also women
 Genesis, 81, 128, 200–01, 470, 549
 Genesis Apocryphon, 358
 Genizah, Cairo, 159, 201–03, 455, 551; marriage law in the, 148, 396 gentiles, 137, 203–04, 238
Gentleman's Agreement (film), 186 geonim, 204–05, 537; and liturgy, 381, 484; responsa of the, 228
 Georgia, 408, 535
 German Pietists, see Hasidei Ashkenaz
 Germany, 205–09; antisemitism in, 29, 272, 517–18; Emancipation in, 163; films and plays of, 267, 595; and the Holocaust, 260–61; medieval, 205–07, 370, 388; modern, 62, 208–09, 316, 644
 Gerondi, Jonah, 389–90
 Gershom ben Judah, 209–10
 Gershwin, George, 435–36
 Gersonides, see Levi ben Gershom get, 12, 147–48
 Gethsemane, Garden of, 310
 Ghardaia, 16
 Gharian, 372
 ghettos, 29, 314, 504
 Gikatilla, Joseph, 457
 Gikatilla, Moses, 84, 279
 Gilboa, Amir, 236
 Gilgamesh, Epic of, 625
 Ginzberg, Asher, see Ahad Ha'am
 Ginzberg, Louis, 15, 210–11, 584
 gleanings, 597
 Glikl of Hameln, 211–12, 627
 Gniessen, Michael, 434
 gnosis and early mysticism, 23, 81, 151, 168, 212–13

- God, 214–17, 501; attributes of, 130, 406, 480, 535; body of, 91, 425; in Christian-Jewish relations, 114; covenant with, 127, 264, 482; doctrines and concepts of, 78, 83, 129, 213–14, 214–15, 265, 426, 481, 524, 575–76; and evil, 317, 596–97; existence of, 130, 577; names of, 23, 216–17, 460; in talmudic theology, 589
- God-fearers, 217–18
- Goldberg, Leah, 488
- Golden Age, 255, 484, 494
- Goldin, Sidney, 186
- golem, 218–19, 324
- Golem*, 219
- Gomorrah, 201
- Good, Edwin M., 272
- goodness, 150
- Gordon, Aharon David, 300, 644
- Gordon, Judah Leib, 219–20
- Gospels, 26, 311
- gossip, 418, 564
- Gra, see Elijah ben Solomon of Vilna
- Graetz, Heinrich, 220–21, 248, 644
- grammarians, see lexicographers and grammarians
- Grammaticae in sanctam Christi linguam institutiones*, 369
- Grammatica Hebraicae linguae*, 369
- Gratz, Rebecca, 158
- gravestones, 103–04
- Great Britain, 47, 221–22, 402; anti- and philosemitism in, 29, 477–78; anti-Zionist policies of, 647; assimilation in, 553; Baghdad Jews in, 63; continuity in, 123; Emancipation and liberalism in, 163–64, 420–21. See also London
- Greater Israel, see Zionism, Revisionist
- Great Synagogue (London), 382
- Great Synagogue (Sydney), 51
- Greece, 25, 37, 64
- Green, David Joseph, see Ben-Gurion, David
- Greenberg, Irving, 114
- Greenberg, Jack, 90
- Greenberg, Uri Zvi, 376, 488
- Gregorian calendar, 97–98
- Grodzinski, Hayyim Ozer, 230
- Grodzisko, 559
- Guidacerio, Agathio, 368–69
- Guide of the Perplexed*, 3, 406, 415, 423–26
- Gush Emunim, 302
- gymnastics, 105
- Habad, 223–24, 232, 407
- Habermas, Jürgen, 95
- Habima (acting company), 594–95
- Hacohen, Israel Meir, 230
- hadash, 146
- Hadassah, 583
- Hadrian, 65
- Hagahot haGra*, 162
- Haganah, 341
- Haggadah, Passover, 18, 224–25, 392, 464
- Haggai, Book of, 165
- Hagiz, Moses, 557
- Hai Gaon, 205, 229
- hair, 125
- halakhah, 225–29; abrogation of, 5–6; arrangement of, 15, 587; and family life, 89, 148; introductions to, 225–27; in Qumran, 137–38; Reform Judaism's view of, 524; in responsa, 88, 124, 227–29; sexuality and women in, 556, 632
- hallah, 146
- Hamadan, 361
- Hamburg, 439
- Hamman-Lif, 39
- Hammerstein, Oscar, 436
- Hammurabi, Code of, 86–87
- handwriting, 552
- Hanina ben Teradyon, 578
- Hannover, Nathan, 216
- Hannukah, see festivals and fasts
- Hannukah lamp, 43
- Haredim, 229–30, 641
- Hareven, Shulamith, 236
- Harnack, Adolf von, 62
- Harris, Charles, 436
- Harris, John, 613
- Hart, Lorenz, 436
- Hartford, Connecticut, 605
- Hartman, David, 114
- hash'alah, 18
- Hasidei Ashkenaz, 218, 230–31, 256
- Hasidism, 7, 57, 180, 231–33, 388, 472; and the Book of Daniel, 135; Essene association with, 45; and the Holocaust, 265; and the Kabbalah, 333; and messianism, 407; music of, 437; in Poland, 490; rejection of, 162; scholarship on, 94, 347, 445, 548; stories of, 190, 303; women's status in, 631
- Haskalah, 162, 220, 233–34, 490; Frankism's relation with the, 194; Mendelssohn's role in the, 404–05; and the shtetl, 559; and Yiddish literature, 642
- Hasmoneans, 238, 497
- hassagot literature, 1–2, 390
- havurah communities, 582, 631
- Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 462
- Hayyei Yehudah*, see Life of Judah
- Hayyim of Volozhin, 230, 640
- Hayyug, Judah, 368
- Hazaz, Haim, 236
- Hazut Kashah*, 36
- headgear, 125–26
- Head of the Jews, see nagid
- Hebraeische Grammatik*, 235
- Hebrew alphabet, 7, 234–35, 457, 551
- Hebrew Bible, see Bible
- Hebrew language, 199, 235, 368; revival of the, 13, 71; teaching the, 158
- Hebrew literature, 71, 236–37, 353, 403; poetry in, 486; printing of, 498
- Hebrew Palaeography Project, 551
- Hebrew University, 316
- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 348
- Heine, Heinrich, 208, 316
- Hejaz, 638
- Hekhalot literature, 213–14, 387–89
- Hekhalot Rabbati, 24
- Hekhalot Zutarti, 24
- Hellenic languages, see Judeo-Greek language
- Hellenism, 44, 70, 91, 237–39, 252, 475
- Hellenistic literature, 239–40
- Hellman, Lillian, 595
- Hemsi, Alberto, 354
- Herat, 292
- Herberg, Will, 577
- Hermann of Cologne, 35
- hermeneutics, 80–81, 82, 476, 590–91
- Herut Party, 648
- Herzl, Theodor, 208, 240–41, 300
- Heschel, Abraham Joshua, 242–43, 613
- hesder yeshivot, 641
- Hess, Moses, 208, 300
- Hexateuch, 470
- Hezekiah's tunnel, 310
- High Holidays, 185
- Higid Mordekhai*, 372
- Hildesheimer, Eziel, 230, 244, 516
- Hillel II, 97
- Hillesum, Etty, 262
- Hirsch, Samson Raphael, 146, 230, 243–44, 348, 516
- Hirschman, Jack, 489
- His Excellency* (film), 186
- Histadrut, 647
- Historia de' riti hebraici*, 417
- historical consciousness, 247
- historical continuity, 245
- historical criticism, 76–77, 82
- Historical Judaism*, 197
- historiography, 245–48
- history, 244–57; and apocalypse, 31; of biblical Israel, 250–52, 258; general histories, modern authors of, 248–50; general histories, premodern authors of, 202, 246–48; ideas of, 244–46; medieval, 254–56; modern, 256–57; and philosophy, 348; of the Second Temple period, 252–53; of the talmudic period, 253–54; teaching of, 158
- Hitler, Adolf, 259
- Hittites, 99, 127
- Hiwi of Balkh, 537
- Hoffenstein, Samuel, 489
- Hofshi, Natan, 613
- Hofsteyn, David, 107
- Hokhmat Yisrael, 316
- holiness, 146, 257–59, 300, 529
- Holiness, Spirit of, 481

- Holiness Code, 85–86, 143, 258, 367, 495–96
- Hollander, John, 219, 489
- Hollywood, 186
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell, 641
- Holocaust, 29, 105, 259–67, 613; and antisemitism, 113; film and dramatic treatments of the, 266–67, 595; histories of the, 256, 259–61, 627; in Hungary, 273; and Jewish identity, 114, 286; literature and memoirs of the, 19, 261–63, 354, 376, 616, 635; in Poland, 495; responses to the, 263–66, 528; in Russia, 534–35; suffering in the, 151
- holy land, see Israel, land of
- Holy Nothingness, 265
- Holy of Holies, 585
- holy places, 610–11
- Holy Scriptures*, 73
- homelessness, 564–65
- homiletics, 267–68
- homosexuality, 122, 268–69, 520, 529, 561
- Honor of Scholars*, 406
- Hope of Israel*, 402, 515
- Horeb*, 243–44
- Horkheimer, Max, 95
- Hormuz, 292
- Horowitz, Marcus, 230
- Horowitz family, 170
- Hosea, Book of, 501, 503, 625
- host desecration, 370
- Hukkei ha-Torah*, 640
- hukkim, 50
- humanism, 95
- human rights, 269–71, 534
- humor, 272
- Humour and Irony in the Bible*, 272
- Hungary, 106, 273–75
- Husserl, Edmund, 242
- Hutner, Yitzchok, 640
- I and Thou*, 94
- ibn Adret, Solomon, 54
- ibn Barun, Isaac, 368
- ibn Daud, Abraham, 41–42, 277–78
- ibn Ezra, Abraham, 49, 278–80; biblical scholarship of, 82, 84, 508; grammatical work by, 368; philosophy of, 150
- ibn Ezra, Moses, 280–81, 487
- ibn Falaquera, Shem Tov, 415
- ibn Gabirol, Solomon, 281–82, 324, 448, 480, 487
- ibn Habib, Levi, 543–44
- ibn Habib, Moses, 368
- ibn Janah, Jonah, 368
- ibn Kaspi, Joseph, 17, 170
- ibn Kureish, Judah, 368
- ibn Lutf, Babai, 293
- ibn Nagrela, Samuel, 282–84, 368, 487, 554, 572
- ibn Shaprut, Hasdai, 340
- ibn Tibbon, Moses, 17
- ibn Yahya, David ben Joseph, 368
- ibn Yahya, David ben Solomon, 368
- iconography, 40, 44, 284–85
- identity, 285–86, 519; and secularism, 553; in the State of Israel, 302
- idolatry, 286–88
- Iggerot Moshe*, 182
- illumination, manuscript, see manuscript illumination
- immanence, 327
- Immanuel of Rome, 17
- immigration, see migration
- immortality, 8
- impurity, 366
- Incas, 601
- incorporeality, 425
- India, 288–89, 523. See also Baghdadi Jews of India; Bene Israel of India; Cochin Jews
- industrialization, 647
- infertility, 148, 400, 530
- Inquisition, 289–92, 304, 394–95, 447; and censorship, 498; in Portugal, 394–95, 493; in Spain, 554, 573; in Venice, 526, 612
- Innocent III (pope), 126
- inspiration, 279
- Institutiones grammaticae Hebraicae linguae*, 369
- instrumental music, 442
- intelligence, divine and human, 5
- intermarriage, 114, 176, 374, 396, 520
- Intifada, 523
- intramural burials, 102
- in vitro fertilization, 530
- Iran, 47, 292–93, 361, 408; history of, 21, 132; music of, 441; women's status in, 631
- Iraq, 47, 293–94, 408, 455
- Iron Age, 37, 102–03, 139
- irony, 262, 330
- Irony in the Old Testament*, 272
- Isaac, 201, 397
- Isaac, Solomon, 170
- Isaac ben Jedaiah, 18
- Isabella (queen of Spain), 290–91
- Isaiah, Book of, 82, 165, 295–97
- Isfahan, 293
- Islamic-Jewish relations, 297–98, 408, 429–30; in Aden, 637; in Africa, 16, 372, 421, 455, 603; at holy places, 611; during the Middle Ages, 173; and Muslim philosophy, 480
- Israel, Kingdom of, 346
- Israel, land of, 298–301, 522; art and archaeology of the, 37–38, 44, 187, 252; history of the, 180, 250–51, 254, 257, 298–99; Jewish thought about the, 300–01, 644; literature of the, 19, 263; music of the, 434; settlement of the, 248, 646
- Israel, Reuben Eliyahu, 353
- Israel, State of, 110, 256, 301–02, 346, 491, 523, 614; communities in the, 118, 171; family life in the, 13, 181; and Jewish identity, 286; Jewish and constitutional law in the, 227, 270–71; leadership of the, 68–69, 346, 543; national security of the, 646; and Palestine, 630; political economy of the, 647; religious life of the, 524, 528, 553; Soviet relations with the, 534; yeshivot in the, 641
- Israel ben Eliezer Ba'al Shem Tov, 57–58, 302–04, 388, 487, 490. See also Ba'alei Shem
- Israel Defence Forces, 646
- Israel Folktale Archives, 189
- Israeli, Isaac, 448, 479
- Israelite Society of Religion, 244
- Israel Museum, 43
- Isserlein, Israel, 207
- Isserles, Moses, 140, 146, 490
- Italy, 304–05, 498; history of, 48, 163, 268, 385, 525–26; Sephardim in, 554–55. See also Venice
- Jabès, Edmond, 307–08
- Jabotinsky, Vladimir Ze'ev, 647
- Jacob, 201
- Jacob ben Leib, see Frank, Jacob Joseph
- Jacob ben Moses ha-Levi Molin of Mainz, 514
- Jacobs, Louis, 382
- Jacob Staff, 363
- Jaffe, Mordecai, 490
- James, Henry, 462
- James, William, 179
- Japan, 30
- jar burial, 103
- Jehoseph ha-Nagid, 283
- Jeremiah, Book of, 165, 308–09, 507, 625
- Jerome, 110
- Jerusalem, 298, 309–10, 316; in the Crusades, 131; destruction of, 165, 188; restoration of, 21
- Jerusalem Talmud, see Palestinian Talmud
- Jesus, 179, 198, 311–12, 406
- Jesus, Society of, 568
- Jesus Seminar, 311
- Jewish Antiquities*, 319–20, 473, 497
- Jewish Christians, 27, 312–13
- Jewish Council (Hungary), 274
- Jewish Defence League, 334
- Jewish Enlightenment, see Haskalah
- Jewish Feminist Bund, 463
- Jewish League for Woman's Suffrage, 420–21
- Jewish Museum (New York), 122
- Jewish Museum of Prague, 105–06
- Jewish Press*, 334
- Jewish Quarter, 106, 313–14
- Jewish Question: A Confession*, 119
- Jewish Religious Union, 420

- Jewish Revolt*, see First Jewish Revolt;
 Second Jewish Revolt
Jewish State, 241
 Jewish studies, 184, 315–16, 548; by German Jews, 208
 Jewish Theological Seminary, 122
Jewish War, 319–20, 473, 497
Jew of Malta, 371
 jihad, 298
 Job, Book of, 316–17, 618; criticism of the, 82–83; dualism in the, 151,
 596; interpreting the, 62, 460, 528,
 538
 Joel ben Simeon Fayvesh, 552
 Johanan ben Zakkai, 317–19, 465, 512
 John, Gospel of, 26
 John XXII (pope), 504
 Jona, Jacob Abraham, 353
 Jonah, Book of, 503
 Jong, Erica, 635
 Jordan, 37
 Joseph, 201, 410, 491
 Joseph II (Holy Roman Emperor), 598
 Joseph ben Shalom Ashkenazi, 649
 Joseph the Sexton, see Juspa Shammash of Worms
 Josephus, Flavius, 252–53, 301, 319–20,
 397; Pharisees portrayed by, 473;
 Sadducees portrayed by, 540
 Joshua, Book of, 143, 320–22
 Jost, Isaak Markus, 221 jubilee, 11, 156, 528
 Judah, Kingdom of, 251
 Judah ben Barzillai, 49
 Judah ben Samuel, 58, 230–31
 Judah ben Yehiel Rofeh, see Messer Leon
 Judah Halevi, 179, 322–24, 415, 487
 Judah Loew ben Bezalel, 324–25, 326, 515; legends of, 219, 314; in
 Prague, 494
 Judah the Patriarch, 466
 Judaism, introductions to, 325–27
 Judenhut, 126
 Judeo-Arabic language, 358–59, 361, 637
 Judeo-Arabic literature, 327–29
 Judeo-Berber language, 361
 Judeo-Greek language, 359
 Judeo-Iranian languages, 361
 Judeo-Persian language, 361
 Judeo-Spanish language, 359–61
 Judeo-Spanish literature, see Ladino literature
 Judeo-Tajik language, 361
 Judges, Book of, 143, 329–30
 Judith, Book of, 81, 240
 jukaniyya, 126
 Julian the Apostate, 26
 jurisprudence, 544, 641
 Juspa Shammash of Worms, 515 justice, see sanhedrin, semikhah, and rabbinat
- interpretation of, 17–18, 61;
 introductions to, 332–33; Lurianic,
 383, 490, 557; in philosophy, 102,
 448; and Sabbatianism, 557;
 scholarship on, 347, 548; sexuality and gender in, 45, 199, 633; symbolism of, 581; translations of,
 331–32
 Kabul, 292
 Kael, Pauline, 635
 Kafka, Franz, 494–95, 594–95
 Kahana-Carmon, Amalia, 236
 Kahane, Meir, 333–34
 Kahler, Erich, 208
 Kaifeng Jews, 109
 Kaminska, Esther Rachel, 595
 Kant, Immanuel, 179
 Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem, 334–35,
 519–20, 576
 Karaites, 159, 335–36, 391, 408; biblical exegesis of the, 84, 279; liturgy of the, 508
 Karo, Joseph, see Caro, Joseph
 kashrut, see dietary laws
 Kassites, 60
 Kaufmann, Yehezkel, 336–38
 Kaunas, 378
 kavannot, 388
 kedushah, see holiness
Kedushat Levi, 364
 keftsat ha-derekh, 57, 388
 Kelm school, 430
 Kelsen, Hans, 641
 Keneset Yisrael, 640
 Kerala, 117–18
 Kern, Jerome, 435–36
 ketib, 399
 ketonet, 125
 ketubbah, 148, 202, 338–39, 392, 395, 632
Kevod Hakhmamim, see Honor of Scholars
 Khazars, 339–40
 Khorasan, 292
 kibbush karka', 342
 kibbutz, 341–43, 632, 646–47
 Kibbutz Artzi-Hashomer Hatzair, 341
 kiddush ha-Shem, 396
 Kierkegaard, Søren, 179, 401, 569
Kifayat al-'Abidin, 391
 kilayim, 146
 Kilayim (tractate), 11
 Kimhi, David, 84–85, 343–44, 368, 390, 513
 Kimhi, Joseph, 343
 Kimhi, Moses, 343–44
 Kimhi family, 82, 343–44, 368
 kingdom of heaven, 312
 Kings, Book of, 81, 115–16, 344–45, 500
 kingship, 345–46, 375, 544
Kitab al-Muhadara wa-al-Mudhakara,
 280–81
 Kitab-i Anusi, 293
Kitvei ha-Ari, 383
 klezmer music, 436
 Knesset, 227
 Knibb, M.A., 31
 Kofino, Moshe Shemuel, 353
 kohanim, see priesthood
 Kohelet, see Ecclesiastes
 Kohler, Kaufmann, 168, 244
 Kolmar, Gertrud, 263
Kol Sakhal, 6, 8, 416–17, 525
 Kook, Abraham Isaac, 300, 346–47
 Kotler, Shneur, 640
 Kotsk, Menahem Mendel of, see Menahem
 Mendel of Kotsk
 Krein, Alexander, 434
 Kret, Tale of, 99
 Krochmal, Nachman, 347–49, 483, 644
 Kung, 292
 Kuran, 429–30
 Kurdistan, 294, 408
Kutim (tractate), 541
Kuzari, 300, 323
 labor, see social ethics labor movement, 314, 342, 452, 627–28,
 632. See also Zionism, Labor
 Labor Zionism, see Zionism, Labor Ladino language, see Judeo-Spanish language
 Ladino literature, 351–53
 Lamentations, 187–88, 355–56
 Landauer, Gustav, 94 language, Hebrew, see Hebrew language languages, Jewish, 356–61. See also Hebrew language
 Lapid, Shulamith, 236
 Last Supper, 464
 late antiquity, 49, 180, 580, 626
 Late Bronze Age, 251
 Latin America, 361–62, 502
 Lavater, Johann Caspar, 233
 Lavon Affair, 69
 law, 85–87, 566; abrogation of, 5–6;
 Conservative view of, 122; history of, 203, 207, 424; and martyrdom, 396; Philo's interpretation of, 476; and political theory, 491; of the Qumran sect, 138; and renewal,
 528. See also halakhah; talmudic
 literature
 Lazarus, Emma, 489, 634
 Lazarus, Moritz, 483 leadership, see authority, rabbinic and communal leavened bread, 146
 Lebanon, 408, 441
 Leeser, Isaac, 73, 93, 267
Legends of the Jews, 211
 Leghorn, 602
 Lehman, Herbert, 89
 Leibowitz, Yeshayahu, 270
 Lemba, 601
 L'Empereur, Constantijn, 402
 Leningrad Codex B19, 398
 Leone Ebreo, see Abravanel, Judah
 Lepers' Plot, 504
 lesbianism, 269, 629
- Kabbalah, 7, 325, 331–33; and asceticism,
 91; concept of God in, 214, 216;

- Leshon limmudim*, 368
 Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim, 599
 Lessing, Theodor, 208
Letter of Consolation, 391
 Levant, 103
 Levi, Primo, 263
 Levi, Salli, 434
Leviathan; or, On Religion with Respect to Judaism, 233
 Levi ben Gershom, 84, 363–64; allegorical commentaries of, 17; philosophy of, 129, 150, 415–16, 480
 Levi Isaac of Berdichev, 364
 Levin, Meyer, 19
 Levinas, Emmanuel, 242, 365–66, 448, 531
 Levites, 495–96
 Leviticus, 366–67, 412–13, 561
 Lewenthal, Salmen, 260
 lexicographers and grammarians, 367–69, 538
 Libanius, 26
 libels, anti-Jewish, 369–71; medieval, 369–70; modern, 370–71 liberalism, 256, 575, 632, 644 liberation, 77
 libraries, 91–93
 Libya, 371–73, 455
 Lieberman, Saul, 373
Life of Judah, 417, 525–26
Light of the Lord, 129–30
 Likud party, 648
 Lincoln Square Synagogue, 59
 lineage, 373–75
 Lisbon, 493
 literary criticism, 82–83
 literature, 286, 375–77, 580; American, 18–19, 635, 642; ethical and devotional, 167–68; Hebrew, 71, 236–37, 353, 403; Hellenistic, 239–40; of the Holocaust, 19, 261–63, 354, 376, 616, 635; Judeo-Arabic, 327–29; Ladino, 351–53; talmudic, 586–91; wisdom, 70, 81, 154, 167, 485, 617–19; women's, 632–35, 637; Yiddish, 403, 472, 557–58, 634, 641–42
 Lithuania, 335, 377–79
 liturgy, history of, 197–98, 379–80, 581; and atonement, 561; music in, 441; poetry in, 486
 liturgy, reform, 380–81
Livro da gramatica hebrayca e chaldayca, 368
 Lod, 68
 Lodz, 437
 logos, 476
 London, 40, 222, 381–82
Lonely Man of Faith, 569
 Lopez, Robert Sabatino, 52
 Los Angeles, 606
 Loter, see Rhineland
 Lubavitch, see Habad
 Lublin, Meir, 490
 Luke, Gospel of, 26
 Lull, Ramon, 28
 Lumet, Sidney, 186
 Luria, Isaac, 101–02, 383
 Luria, Solomon, 88, 490
 Lusitanus, Amatus, 353
 Lusitanus, Zacutus, 549
 Luzzatto, Moses Hayyim, 384, 549
 Luzzatto, Samuele Davide, 384–85
 Luzzatto, Simone, 549

Ma'aseh Abraham, 359
Ma'aseh Merkabah, 24, 214
Ma'asei Nissim, 515
 ma'aserot, 146
 Ma'aserot (tractate), 598
 Ma'aser Sheni (tractate), 598
 Maccabean revolt, 34, 237–38
 Maccabees, 34, 237
 Maccabees, Books of the, 240, 397
Maggid Mesharim, 515
 Maghreb, 454–55
 magic, 369, 387–89, 415
 Magnes, Judah, 584, 613
Mahalakh shevilei ha-da'at, 343
 Maharal, see Judah Loew ben Bezalel
 Maharam, see Meir of Rothenburg
 Maharashtra, 67
 Maharil, see Jacob ben Moses ha-Levi Molin of Mainz Maharsha, see Edels, Samuel
 mahzor, see liturgy, history of; liturgy, reform
 Maimonidean Controversy, 368, 389–90
 Maimonides, see Moses ben Maimon
 Maimonides, Abraham, 391
 Maimonides, David ben Joshua, 391
 Maimonides, Obadiah, 391
 Maimonides family, 390–91
 Mainz Anonymous, see Narrative of the Old Persecutions
Making of the Modern Jew, 576
 Malabar, 118
 Malacca, 292
 Malachi, 564
 Malamud, Bernard, 19, 72
 Malle, Louis, 267
 Manasseh ben Israel, see Menasseh ben Israel
 Manchester, 583
 Manger, Itzik, 642
 Manito, 133
 Manosque, 505
 mantological exegesis, 81
 Mantua, 314
Mantua Text, see Chapter of the Elements
 Manuel I (king of Portugal), 493 manuscript illumination, 92–93, 225, 392 manuscripts, Hebrew, 92–93, 391–93, 551–52
 Mapai party, 647
 maps, 522
Maqalat al-badiqa, 280
 Marais, 314

 Mari, 22
 Mark, Gospel of, 473 market economy, 156–57, 275
Marpe lashon, 368
 Marranism, 291, 382, 393–95, 450, 575
 marriage, 181, 375, 395–96, 564; of homosexuals, 269; laws concerning, 183, 632; as metaphor, 625; of New Christians, 446; sexual relations in, 88. See also agunah; divorce
 Marshall, Louis, 89
 Martini, Raymond, 28, 255
 martyrdom, 396–97, 578
 masculinity, 200
 mashal, 18
 maskilim, 516
 masorah, 398–99
Masorah Gedolah, 398
Masorah Ketanah, 398
 Masorettes, 550
 masoretic accents, 399
 Masorti Judaism, see Conservative Judaism
 Masorti movement, 122
 massacres, see pogroms Massada, 299 mathematics, 98, 549
 matrilineality, 374
 Matthew, Gospel of, 26
 Mazursky, Paul, 186
 McCoy, Rhody, 90
Me'am Lo'ez, 353–55
 Mecca, 429
 medicine, 389, 399–400. See also bioethics; physicians Medina, 429
 meditation, 6, 529
 Meijer, Jaap, see Messel, Saul van
 Meir of Rothenburg, 52–53, 401, 514
 Meir Simhah ha-Kohen of Dvinsk, 451
 Mekhilta, 141–42, 409, 413, 591
 Melbourne, 51
 Memar Markah, 541
 Menahem ben Saruk, 368
 Menahem Mendel of Kotsk, 230, 400–01
 Menahem Nahum of Chernobyl, 528
Menakhem Mendl, 558
 Menasseh ben Israel, 368, 401–02, 515
 Mendele Moykher Sforim, 402–04, 472, 642
 Mendelssohn, Moses, 54–55, 149, 233, 404–05, 482–83
 Mendes, Diogo, 446
 menorah, 44
 menstruation, 91 mental illness, 88
Meor Enayim, 532
Merchant of Venice, 371
 mercy seat, 585
 merkabah mysticism, 24, 213–14, 216, 333, 457
 Meshhed, 293
 Mesopotamia, 21–22, 161, 563
 Messel, Saul van, 93
 Messer Leon, David ben Judah, 405–06
 Messer Leon, Judah ben Jehiel, 405–06

- Messer Leon family, 405–06
 messiah and messianism, 165, 168, 406–07, 557; and history, 3, 245, 402; in literature, 489; and political theory, 491; in Qumran writings, 31, 138; in Yemen, 638 Messiah of Stockholm, 462 messianic banquet, 406
 Messianic Judaism, 35. See also Jewish Christians Metatron, 23, 213
 meturgeman, 592
 Mexico, 132–33
 Micah, Book of, 503
 Michael, Sami, 236
 Middle Ages, 249, 254–56, 301; anti-Judaism in the, 27–29; costume of the, 125; interactions with Christians and Muslims during the, 203, 297; literature of the, 485, 512–14; pilgrimages during the, 610; “prophecy” in the, 500; symbolism in the, 580; trade in the, 147
 Middle Arabic, 328. See also Arabic language; Judeo-Arabic language
 Middle Bronze Age, 76
 Middle East, 298, 407–09; antisemitism in the, 29; archaeology of the, 37–38; music of the, 440–41; yeshivot in, 639
 midrash aggadah, 124, 409–11, 413, 528, 532
 midrash halakhah, 411–13; introductions to, 412–13, 588–89, 591; translations of, 411–12
 Midrash Rabbah, 411
Mifa’lot Elohim, 416 migration, 47, 523, 553; to China, 109; to Israel, 294, 372, 638; to the United States, 274, 452–53, 606–07
 mikveh, 413–14
 milah, see circumcision
 Milhaud, Darius, 435
Milhemet Mitsvah, 505
 Mill, John Stuart, 591
 millenarianism, 388, 402
 Miller, Arthur, 595
 Milner, Moses, 434
Minhagim Kehillah Kedoshah Warmaisa, 515 minor prophets, see prophets, twelve minor minorities, 564
 Mintz, Alan, 13
 Mir (yeshivah), 640
 miracles, 57, 414–16
 Mirandola, Giovanni Pico della, see Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni
 Mishnah, 156, 301, 461, 587–88; as revelation, 120–21; sociology in the, 563, 565; on tithing, 597; women’s status in the, 199
 Mishnaic Hebrew, 235
Mishneh Torah, 1–2, 390, 423–25, 498
 Mitnaggedim, 162, 229–30
 mitsvah, see commandments
 mitsvot nashim, 634
 Modena, Leone, 6, 416–17, 515; and the Renaissance, 268, 525–26; and science, 549
 Modern Orthodox Judaism, 59, 125, 417–19, 630 modernization, 257
 Moise, Penina, 489
 Momigliano, Arnaldo, 419
 monarchy, see kingship moneylending, 612 monopoly, 157
 monotheism, 215, 287, 337
 Montagu, Lily, 419–21
 Montefiore, Claude, 420 morality, 6, 14
 Moravian Brethren, 325
 Mordecai, 166
Moreh Nevukhei ha-Zeman, 348
 Moriah, Mount, 593
 Morocco, 387, 408, 421–22, 454–55, 602; liturgical music of, 441; worship in, 387, 611 mosaics, 580
 Moscato, Judah, 268
 Moses, 491; in Deuteronomy, 143; images of, 92; as prophet, 426; women surrounding, 625
 Moses ben Isaac of Vienna, 125
 Moses ben Maimon, 389–90, 391, 422–27; on astrology, 49–50; biblical commentaries of, 18; on charity, 108; on history, 245; philosophy of, 41–42, 157, 415–16, 448, 480; theology of, 110, 129–30, 179
 Moses ben Nahman, 113, 390, 427–28, 513; on astrology, 49–50; biblical scholarship of, 82
 Moses de León, 448, 457, 649 moshav, 118
 motherhood, 180, 199, 530
Motl the Cantor’s Son, 558
 mourning, 138–41, 529
Mr. Klein (film), 267
 Muhammad, 255, 428–30
 mukhlaf, 126
 Muncie, Indiana, 606 murder, 171
Murshid ila al-tafarrud, 391
 Musar, 46, 430–31, 490, 516–17
 music, 431–43; art music, 433–35; of the Ashkenazim, 436–38; cantillation, 431–32; cantorial, 432–33; in the Middle East, 440–41; and poetry, 486; of the Sephardim, 438–40; in the United States, 435–36; views on, 441–43
 Mutanabbi, al-, 487
 Mu’tazilites, 205
 mysticism, 7, 168, 457, 557; history of, 1, 212–13, 216, 548; and philosophy, 448, 480; in theology, 61–62
 nagid, 159, 346
 Nahmanides, see Moses ben Nahman
 Nahman of Bratslav, 300, 307, 445–46, 516, 642
 Napoleon Bonaparte, 164
Narrative of the Old Persecutions, 28, 131 narratological criticism, 82
 Nasi, Gracia, 446–47
 Nasi, Joseph, 446
 Nasi family, 446–47
 Nathan of Gaza, 65, 557
Nathan the Wise, 599
 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 89 nationalism, 209, 245, 517, 644
 National Religious Party, 302, 451 natural history, 155 natural theology, 79 nature, 244, 576
 Nazarenes, 313
 nazirite, 45
 Nazism, 208, 248, 256; and the Holocaust, 259–61; libeling in, 370; in the Netherlands, 450
 Near East, ancient, 20–22, 74–75, 251; death in the, 139; health in the, 400; law in the, 86; religious beliefs in the, 128–29; slavery in the, 563
 necromancy, 139
 necropolis, 103
 Negro, David, 492
 Nehemiah, 176–77
 Nehemiah, Book of, see Ezra and Nehemiah, Books of Neolithic Age, 37
 Neology (Hungary), 274
 Neo-Orthodoxy, 243
 Neophytes, 505
 Neoplatonism, 41–42, 447–49
 Neot Kedumim, 155
 neta revai, 146
 Nethanel ben Isaiah, 579
 Netherlands, The, 163, 314, 449–50, 555
 Neturei Karta, 450–52
 New Christians, 290–91, 393–95
New Ghetto, 241
 New Mexico, 132–33
New Revised Standard Version (Bible), 74, 75
 New South Wales, 51
 New Testament, 31, 112, 312; anti-Judaism in the, 25–26, 265; biblical context of the, 78, 81, 82, 135; death in the, 139; as history, 253; Passover in the, 464; translations of the, 74
 New York, 418, 452–53, 583; divorce in, 12; theater in, 595
 New Zealand, 50–51, 256
 Nicholas de Lyre, 111
 niddah, 631
 Nieto, David, 453–54
 Nietzsche, Friedrich, 179
Night, 616–17

- Night and Fog* (film), 267
Nineteen Letters, 243
Nishmat Hayyim, 402
 Nitzan, Shlomo, 236
 Noah, 92
 Noah, Mordecai Manuel, 93
 nonviolent resistance, 613
Nopheth Zuphim, see Book of the Honeycomb's Flow
 Nordau, Max, 644
 North Africa, 181, 408, 454–55;
 Sephardim of, 554; yeshivot in,
 638–39
 North America, 73, 123, 555
Nostra Aetate, 114
 notarikon, 457
 nothingness, 333
 NRSV, see New Revised Standard Version nuclear weapons, 614
 Nudel, Ida, 534
 Numbers, Book of, 412–13, 455–56, 496
 numbers and numerology, 389, 456–57, 547
 numismatics, 252–53
 numskull tales, 272
- Oath*, 616
 obesity, 91 obligations, law of, 226
 occultism, 23
 O'Connor, Flannery, 462
 Odessa, 237
 Odets, Clifford, 595
 Olin, Margaret, 519
 Oliveyra, Solomon de, 368
Only Yesterday, see Temol Shilshom
 onomastics, 459–60
On the Illnesses of the Jews, 234
 Operation Moses, 523
 Ophüls, Marcel, 267
 Oppenheim, James, 489
 oral contraception, 89
 oral tradition, 460–61
 Orbio de Castro, Isaac, 555 ordinances, 210
 ordination, 544
 Oriental Jewry, 47. See also Asia; Central Asia; Middle East
 Origen, 110, 112
 orlah, 146
 Orthodox Judaism, see Haredim; Modern
 Orthodox Judaism
 Orthodox Scientists, Association of, 549
 Oshry, Ephraim, 265
 Ostia, 39–40
Otherwise than Being; or, Beyond Essence,
 365–66
 Otto, Rudolf, 569
 Ottoman Empire, 64, 353, 393, 441
 Oz, Amos, 236
 Ozick, Cynthia, 19, 461–62, 634–35
- pacifism, 613
 paganism, 337, 501
- Pagan Rabbi*, 462
 Pahlavi dynasty, 293
 painting, 392
 Pale of Settlement, 403, 459, 560
 paleography, 551
 Palestine, 202, 630, 644, 645–46;
 archaeology of, 37–38; burial in,
 103; geonim in, 205; history of, 69,
 250, 299, 465; Jewish studies in,
 316; languages of, 358; literature of,
 486; migration to, 71
 Palestinian Talmud, 6, 254, 537, 588, 590,
 638–39
 Pappenheim, Bertha, 463
 papyri, see Elephantine
Papyrus Insinger, 70 parables, 311, 410
 Paradesi, 118
 parallelism, 82, 484 paraphrases, 74
 pardes, 18, 84
Pardes Rimmonim, 457
 Paris, 192–93, 314
 Paris, Disputation of, 113
 Parks, Paul, 90
 parody, 272
 paronomasia, 84
Parteien im gegenwaertigen Judentum, 61
 Parthians, 60, 173
Partisan Guide to the Jewish Problem, 576
Paschal Homily, 27
 Passover, 118, 224–25, 464–65, 542, 593
Pastora yo ami, 355
 patriarchal narratives, 250–51
 patriarchate, 346, 465–66
 patrilineality, 374–75
 Patristics, 26
 Paulhan, Frederic, 14
 Paul of Tarsus, 25–26, 312, 467–69
 Pawlikowski, John T., 114
 Payne, John Howard, 436
 peace, see war and peace
 Peah (tractate), 11, 597
 Pentateuch, 85–87, 469–71; economic lessons in the, 156; medicine in the, 399–400; symbolism of the, 580;
 targum of the, 592
Perah Shoshan, 368
 Peretz, Isaac Leib, 471–72, 642
 Peretz, Martin, 90
 Perfet, Isaac ben Sheshet, 16
 periodization, 245
 persecution, 338, 504
 Pesaro, 447
 peshat interpretation, 84–85
 Peshitta, 81
 Pesikta de-Rab Kahana, 411
 Pesikta Rabbati, 411
Peter Schlemihl, 642
 Petrus Alfonsi, 35
 Peyrère, Isaac de la, 575
 Pharisees, 198, 472–74, 540
 Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 606 philology, 136
- Philo of Alexandria, 45, 81, 474–77, 532;
 biblical exegesis by, 460; mysticism of, 44; philosophy of, 406, 447–49; theology of, 17, 150, 301, 397 philosemitism, 209, 477–78. See also toleration
 philosophical analysis, 641
 philosophy, 478–83; and concept of God,
 214; general, 478–79; medieval, 17,
 479–80; modern, 480–83
 Phinehas of Polotsk, 162, 230
 Phoenicia, 99
 Phoenician alphabet, 234
 physicians, 172, 518
 Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni, 5
 Piercy, Marge, 489
 pietist movement, 391
 piety, 396
 pilgrimages, 610–11, 616
 Pines, Yehiel Michal, 644
Pinkas ha-Kehillah, 515
 Pinsker, Leo, 300
 Pirke Avot, see Avot (tractate), 355
 Pirke de Rabbi Eli'ezer, 411 pit burials, 102
 piyyut, 299, 441, 483–84
 pizmonim, 63, 435, 441, 583 planned economy, 156 plants, see flora and fauna
 Pletzl, see Marais
 Plotinus, 447–48
 pluralism, 114
 Po'alei Zion movement, 645
 Podhoretz, Norman, 90
 poetry, 237, 281, 376–77, 484–89;
 American Jewish, 488–89; biblical,
 82, 484–85; medieval Hebrew,
 485–87; modern Hebrew, 487–88;
 by Yemenite women, 637
 pogroms, 28, 493, 504, 533–34, 554
Point of the Yod, 220
 Poland, 378, 489–90; history of, 164, 203, 314, 401, 533; Holocaust in, 260;
 and Karaism, 335–36; shtetls in,
 559; synagogue architecture of, 40 polemics, see under Christian-Jewish relations political theory, 245, 490–92, 497, 543 polygamy, 210
 polytheism, 287
 Porete, Marguerite, 448
 pork, 147 pornography, 181
 Portugal, 394–95, 492–94
 postexilic period, 166
 poverty, 108, 597
 Prague, 104–05, 314, 494–95, 595 prayer, 379–81, 483, 633; and belief in God, 215; of crypto-Jews, 132; in Hasidism, 232; Psalms as, 508; views on, 426, 528–29 prayer mantle, 126
 pregnancy, 91, 400
 Prell, Riv-Ellen, 519

- pricing, 157
 priesthood, 495–97, 544; biblical, 495–96, 539, 586, 593; postbiblical, 496–97
 Priestly Code, 367, 400
 Prince of the Torah, 213
Principles of Faith, 3 printing, 92, 417, 497–99, 552, 612 procreation, 88, 556. See also childbirth; pregnancy; reproductive technologies proem, 13
 profanity, 258 promised land, see Israel, land of property law, 156–57, 226 prophecy, 499–500, 544; philosophy of, 3, 278, 425; poetry in, 485 prophetic exegesis, see mantological exegesis prophetic pornography, 624–25
 prophets, former and latter, 496, 500–01
 prophets, twelve minor, 502–03
 proselytes, see conversion to Judaism prostitution, 456
 Protestantism, 28–29, 477
Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, 371
 Provence, 332, 503–05, 639
 Proverbs, 506–08, 618; economics in, 156; poetry in, 82; and women, 624
 providence, 278, 363
 Psalms, 356, 508–09; commentaries on, 279, 283; exegesis of, 84; poetry of, 82–83, 485
 Pseudipigrapha, 31, 32–34, 81, 239; introductions to, 33–34, 77; translations of, 32–33
 Pseudo-Dionysius, 448
 psychoanalysis, 463
 psychoanalytic criticism, 175 psychological dualism, 150–51 psychotherapy, 19
 Ptolemaic dynasty, 238 publishing, 93
Pugio fidei, 255
 Pumbedita, 638
 punishment, see authority, rabbinic and communal; sanhedrin, semikhah, and rabbinate purification, 258, 414
 Purim, 166
 Purim Scroll, Cairene, 329
 purity, 147, 258, 456
Pyesa di Yaakov Avinu kun sus izus, 353
- Qajar dynasty, 293
 Qaro, Joseph, see Caro, Joseph
 Qohelet, see Ecclesiastes quadrate script, 360
 Qumran, 103, 136–38
Qumran Angelic Liturgy, see Shirot 'Olat Ha-Shabbat
- Raab, Esther, 488
 Rabad, see Abraham ben David of Posquières
- Rabbenu Gershom, see Gershom ben Judah rabbinate, 304, 513–14, 543–44
 Rabbinical Council of America, 418
 rabbinic authority, see authority, rabbinic and communal rabbinic biography, 511–17; early modern, 514–16; medieval, 512–14; modern, 516–17; talmudic, 511–12
 rabbinic Judaism, 38, 112; communal authority in, 52–54; and the Essenes, 45; and ethics, 385; and holiness, 258; opposition to, 6, 8, 336; during the talmudic era, 253–54, 588; views on women and sex in, 46, 88, 184, 627 rabbinic literature, 373; concept of God in, 215; hermeneutics of, 81; narrative in, 410; as revelation, 121; and women, 631–32
 Rabinovitch, Sholem, see Sholem Aleichem
 race, Jews as, 517–18
 race, views on, 518–19
 Racine, Jean, 352
 Radak, see Kimhi, David
Rafael i Miryam, 352
Railroad Stories, 558
 Raisin, Jacob, 24
 Ramah, see Abulafia, Meir ben Todros ha-Levi
 Rambam, see Moses ben Maimon
 Ramban, see Moses ben Nahman rape, 629, 632
 Raphall, Morris, 267
 Rashbam, see Samuel ben Meir
 Rashi, see Solomon ben Isaac
 Rashi script, 360
 Rathenau, Walter, 208
 rationalism, 129, 343, 385
 reader-response criticism, 80–81, 83
 Recanati, Menahem, 333
 Reconstructionist Judaism, 334–35, 519–20, 576
 redactional criticism, 80
 redactors, 470
 reference works, 520–23; for the Bible, 74–75; for talmudic literature, 587–88
- Reform Judaism, 125, 150, 168–69, 524–25, 564; conversion to, 124; origins of, 194, 197–98, 619; and personal autonomy, 54–55; ritual and liturgy in, 185, 258, 379–81; synagogue architecture of, 41
Refutation of the Christian Principles, 129
 Regensburg, 207
 regionalism, 38
 Reich, Tova, 19
 reincarnation, 388
 Reitz, Edgar, 267
 relics, 610
Religion of Reason out of the Sources of Judaism, 119
 Religionsgesellschaft, see Israelite Society of Religion
- religious freedom, 215
 remez, 84
 Renaissance, 3, 304–05, 515, 525–26; pilgrimages during the, 610; poetry of the, 486
 renewal, 526–29
 repentance, 94, 482, 561, 589
 Rephaim text, 99
 reproductive technologies, 529–30, 632
 responsa literature, 88, 204, 227–29, 265 resurrection, in Qumran writings, 31
 Reuben, Shlomo Merkado, 352
 Reuchlin, Johannes, 111
Revealing of the Secrets, 17 revelation, divine, 78, 120, 129; and faith, 180, 215; philosophy of, 279, 482; and political thought, 491; in theology, 127, 150, 242; in Torah, 244
 Revisionist Zionism, see Zionism, Revisionist
 Reznikoff, Charles, 489 rhetoric, 405
 Rhineland, 209, 360
 Rich, Adrienne, 635
 righteous gentiles, 204
Rise of David Levinsky, 19 ritual, 121, 258–59, 366, 389; abrogation of, 6; of the Sephardim, 555; in the Temple, 593 ritual murder, myth of, 29, 369–70, 583 ritual objects, 42–43
Rivista Storica Italiana, 419
 Rocker, Rudolf, 382
 Rodgers, Richard, 436
 Roiphe, Anne, 19, 635
 Roman Catholic Church, 113–14
 Romaniuk, Zbigniew, 559
 Rome, 25, 28, 29, 37, 314
 Romero, Elena, 353
 Rosenbaum, Thane, 19
 Rosenfeld, Isaac, 19
 Rosenfield, Monroe, 436
 Rosenthal, Leiser, 93
 Rosenzweig, Franz, 82, 94, 110, 119, 483, 520–31
 Rosh Hashanah, 97–98
 Rosh Hodesh, 616
 Rossi, Azariah dei, 532
 Roth, Philip, 19
 Rothenberg, Jerome, 489
 Rothschild Miscellany, 552
 Rouen, 640
 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 385
Royal Crown, 282
 Rudolf II (Holy Roman emperor), 47
 Rufeisen, Oswald, see Daniel, Brother
 Russell, Henry, 436
 Russia, 47, 163, 533–35. See also Soviet Union
 Russo, Baruchia, 194
 Ruth, Book of, 12, 81, 85, 187–88, 535–36

- Saadia ben Joseph Gaon, 84, 204–05, 359, 513, 537–38; as a grammarian, 368; philosophy of, 179, 480; scholarship of, 279, 415, 508, 640
- sabbath, 122, 185–86, 538–39; mysticism of the, 333; symbolism of the, 581
- sabbath gentile, 203
- Sabbatianism, 164–65, 388, 407, 408, 490, 548, 557, 637
- sabbatical year, 11, 146, 156
- Sacerdote, B., 352
- Sachs, Nelly, 263
- sacrifice, 258, 495–96, 561, 609. See also child sacrifice
- Sadducees, 137, 539–40
- Safah berurah*, 368
- Safavid dynasty, 293
- Safed, 101, 383
- saints, 610–11
- Salamon, Julie, 19
- Salanter, Israel, 162, 229–30, 431, 516
- Saldarini, Anthony, 31
- Salé, 421
- Salmon ben Yeroham, 279
- Salonika, 354–55, 408
- salvation, 464, 468
- salvation history, 78
- Samaritan Pentateuch, 81, 541
- Samaritans, 252, 408, 540–42, 600
- Saminsky, Lazare, 434
- Samuel, Book of, 81, 500, 542–43
- Samuel, Mar, 400
- Samuel ben Hofni, 205
- Samuel ben Kalonymos, 230–31
- Samuel ben Meir, 84
- Samuel ha-Nagid, see ibn Nagrela, Samuel
- sanctuary, 585
- sanhedrin, semikhah, and rabbinate, 466, 497, 543–44
- Saraiva, Antonio José, 393
- sarcophagi, 44
- Sardis, 39–40
- Sar-Torah, 387, 389
- Sasanian period, 60
- Sassoon, David, 62
- Satan, 22–23
- Satmar, 544–45
- Saul, King, 251, 500, 578
- Schechter, Solomon, 202, 545–46
- Schiff, Jacob, 89, 546
- Schindler's List* (film), 267
- Schneersohn, Joseph Isaac, 407
- Schneersohn, Menahem Mendel, 223–24, 407
- Schoenberg, Arnold, 434–35, 546–47
- Scholem, Gershom, 547–48, 644
- Schriften des Uriel da Costa mit Einleitung, Übertragung und Regesten*, 8
- Schutzstaffeln, see SS
- science, 128, 548–50
- scientific revolution, 549
- scribes, 550–51
- script and scribal practices, 21, 92, 551–52
- scrolls, 92
- sea-monster, 284
- secondary burials, 103
- second commandment, 43, 284
- Second Jewish Revolt, 14, 64–65, 299
- Second Temple period, 177, 252–53, 497, 593; cemeteries in the, 103; family life in the, 180; kings of the, 375; liturgy during the, 379; prophecy in the, 500
- Second Vatican Council, 113–14
- secularism, 59, 256, 552–53, 565
- Seder Tefilot u-Vakashot*, 633
- Sefer ha-Egron*, 329
- Sefer ha-Galui*, 343
- Sefer Hasidim*, 231
- Sefer ha-Yashar*, 355
- Sefer Yetsirah*, 168, 218
- Sefer Zekhirah*, see Book of Remembrances
- Sefer Zikaron*, 343
- sefirah, 102
- Sefrou, 328, 422
- Seixas, Gershom Mendes, 267
- Sekreto del mudo*, 354
- Seleucid kingdom, 238
- Seligman, Herbert, 89
- Seljuks, 131
- semantic parallelism, 484
- semikhah, 543–44
- semiotics, 461
- Semitic languages, 234, 358
- Sennacherib, 60
- separated grapes, 597
- Sephardi ballads, 353–55, 439
- Sephardim, 47, 354, 553–55; and Ashkenazim, 236; in the Balkans, 64; burial and mourning practices of the, 103–104; music of the, 438–40, 442; mysticism of the, 457; in the Netherlands, 450; women's status among the, 631–32
- Septuagint, 32, 73, 81, 239
- Seri, Dan, 236
- Sermon on the Passover*, 129
- sermons, 268
- Serrarius, Petrus, 402
- Servetus, Michael, 111
- Sétif, 16
- settlement period, 250–51
- Seventh Day Adventists, 133, 539
- sex, 45–46, 555–56, 632; as biblical imagery, 501, 570; and birth control, 88; and the body, 91; in marriage, 2. See also homosexuality; reproductive technologies
- Sforno, Obadiah, 369
- sabbath, see sabbath
- Shabbetai Tsevi, 194, 548, 556–57; and abrogation of law, 6; pseudo-messianism and mysticism of, 333, 401, 407. See also Sabbatianism
- Shabtai, Yaakov, 236
- Shalom, S., 488
- Shamosh, Amnon, 236
- Shanghai, 109
- Shapira, Moses Wilhelm, 93
- Shapiro, Karl, 489
- Shapur I, 60
- Shapur II, 60
- Shas Tehine Hadoshe*, 633
- shavuot, see festivals and fasts
- Shaw, George Bernard, 595
- Shcharanskii, Anatolii, 534
- Sheba, Queen of, 199
- Shebit (tractate), 11
- She'elot u-Teshuvot mi-Ma'amakim*, 265
- shehita, 24, 146
- shekhinah, 102, 415
- Shelah, see Two Tablets of the Covenant
- shemittah, see sabbatical year
- Shepherds' Crusade, 504
- Shevah ha-Nashim*, 406
- Shield of David*, 406
- Shi'ism, 173, 293
- Shinlung, 601
- Shiran, Haim, 187
- Shiraz, 293
- Shirot 'Olat Ha-Shabbat*, 23
- Shi'ur Komah*, 213
- shiva period, 140
- Shivhei ha-Besht*, 303
- Shlomi, 190
- Shneur Zalman of Lyadi, 224, 230
- Shoah, see Holocaust
- Sholem Aleichem, 472, 557–58, 642
- Shenei Luhot ha-Berit*, see Two Tablets of the Covenant
- shtetl, 9, 46, 558–60, 595
- Shukr Kuhayl II, 407
- Shulhan Arukh*, 64, 101, 146
- Shylock, 371
- siddur, see liturgy, history of; liturgy, reform
- Silver, Abba Hillel, 267
- Simeon ben Shetah, 338
- Simon, Neil, 595
- Sinai, Mount, 37, 174, 593
- Sinai Campaign, 69
- sin and atonement, 468, 560–61, 588
- Singer, Isaac Bashevis, 561–62, 642
- Sirach, see Ben Sira, Wisdom of
- Sirach, Jesus, see ben Sira, Simeon ben Jesus
- Sirkes, Joel, 490
- Six-Day War, 271, 294
- Sixtus IV (pope), 292
- skepticism, 179
- slaughtering of animals, 24, 146
- slavery, 156, 180, 562–63
- Slepak, Vladimir and Maria, 534
- Slouschz, Nahum, 611
- Slovakia, 105–06, 314
- Smithsonian Institution, 43
- social ethics, 481, 549, 564–65, 566; and the Musar movement, 431, 480; in theology, 180, 215

- socialism, 157, 256
social justice, 346, 528
Social Life of the Jews of Northern France in the XII–XIII Centuries, 53 sociology of religion, 249, 565–66
Sod ha-Shabbat, 332
Sodom, 201
Sofer, Moses, 230
sokol, 105
Solica, Lala, 611
solitreo script, 360
Solomon, King, 92, 251, 501
Solomon ben Abraham of Montpellier, 389
Solomon ben Isaac, 111, 566–68; biblical scholarship of, 73, 82, 84, 322, 356; on dietary laws, 147
Solomon ben Yeroham, 508
Soloveitchik, Haym, 641
Soloveitchik, Joseph Baer, 418, 568–69, 640
Some Jewish Family Scenes, 234
Song of Songs, 187–88, 570–71; commentaries on, 363, 567; interpretations of, 15, 17; literary criticism of, 81–83 songs, 354–55, 560. See also folk music Son of Man, 135
sotah, 631
soul, 476, 596
South Africa, 256, 571
South America, 256
Soviet Union, 533–34; antisemitism in the, 370; and the Balkans, 64, 378; humor in the, 272
Spain, 16, 290, 394–95, 554–55, 571–73; costume in, 125; poetry of, 486–87; yeshivot in, 639
Spanish Inquisition, see under Inquisition
Spencer, Herbert, 14
spermicides, 89
Spingarn, Arthur, 89
Spingarn, Joel, 89
Spinoza, Baruch de, 242, 573–76; and concept of God, 215; grammatical work by, 368; philosophy of, 110, 447, 481 spirit possession, 57 square script, 234
SS, 259
Star of Redemption, 531, 549 state (political concept), 481, 491
Stefanesti, 560
Stein, Edith, 262
Steinberg, Milton, 576–77
Steinschneider, Moritz, 316
St. Elmo's Fire (film), 186 stereotype, 517
St. Eustatius, 362
stewardship, 155
St. Louis, Missouri, 605
St. Louis incident (1939), 362
Stobi, 39–40
storytelling, 190
strophic poetry, 487
structuralist criticism, 80
Stutschewsky, Joachim, 434
Succession Narrative, 501
Sudan, 159–60
suffering, 15, 151, 317, 596
Sufism, 7
suicide, 397, 577–79
Sukkot, 155, 579–80
Sumeria, 21
Sunday school, 158
superstition, 28, 387–89
Supreme Court (Israel), 271
Surinam, 362
surrogate motherhood, 530
Susanna, The History of, 81
Susser, Bernard, 53
Sutians, 60 suzerainty treaties, 127
sweatshops, 627
Swet, Hermann, 434
Syberberg, Hans Jürgen, 267
symbols and symbolism, 44, 367, 580–81
synagogue, 379, 581–82, 631; education in the, 158–59; in Provence, 505. See also architecture, synagogue Synagogues, Federation of, 382 synonymous parallelism, 484
Syria, 37, 408, 441, 582–83
Syrkin, Nachman, 644
Szold, Henrietta, 583–84

ta'amim, 431–32
Tabernacle, 585–86
Tabib, Mordecai, 236
Tabriz, 293
Taubler, Eugen, 221
Tafsir, 538
Taheb, 541
takkanot, see ordinances
Tales of Rabbi Nachman, 94
talmudic literature, 150, 586–91, 641; economic lessons from, 156–57; health and life in, 88, 400, 578; hermeneutics of, 139, 590–91; as history, 247; introductions to, 197, 587, 588–89; mathematics in, 98; reference tools for, 587–88; theology in, 124, 214, 589–90, 596; translations of, 586–87; women in, 183, 631 talmudic period, 253–54, 400
Tammuz, Benjamin, 236
Tanakh: The Holy Scriptures, 73–74, 79
Tangier, 421, 441
tannaim, see rabbinic biography: talmudic
Targum, 73, 239, 358, 592–93
Targum Neofiti, 592
TaRYaG, 120 taxation, 157
taytsh humesh, 633
Tchernichowsky, Saul, 376, 488
Teatro de los Sefardies orientales, 353
Tehillah le-David, see David's Praise tehinot, 529, 627, 633–34
Teitelbaum, Joel, 545 television, 266
Tel Hai, Battle of, 299
Temol Shilshom, 10
Temple and Temple Mount, 38, 258, 310, 593–94; destruction of the, 540; rebuilding the, 176–77; in the Second Temple period, 252, 497; symbolism in the, 580; and the Tabernacle, 585–86
Ten Commandments, see Decalogue
Ten Lost Tribes, see Tribes, Ten Lost
Ten Martyrs, 396
terefah, 146
Terezin, see Theresienstadt terumot, 146
teshuvah, see repentance
tetragrammaton, 216
Tevunah, 516
Tevye the Dairyman, 558
theater, 594–95, 628
theodicy, 595–97
Theognis, 70 theological dualism, 150–51 theology, 618
Therapeutae, 45
Theresienstadt, 434
Thessaloniki, see Salonika
Third Republic of France, 191
Thirteen Principles of Faith, 149–50, 179, 480
This People Israel, 61
Tiberian Masorah, 550
Tikkunei Soferim, 550
Tiktin, Solomon, 197
Tillich, Paul, 179, 569
Timaeus, 476
Time of Death in Jewish Law, 182
Tishevits, 560
tithes, 11, 597–98
tkhines, see tehinot
Toledot ha-Emunah ha-Yisre'elit, 337
Tolerance Debate, 598–99
toleration, 48, 598–99. See also philosemitism Toleration, Edict of (1782), 598
tombs, 103, 139
Torah, 55, 74, 79, 86, 590, 640; in mysticism, 6–7, 18, 70; narratives in, 410; in oral tradition, 461; origins of, 76; philosophy of, 129, 258, 541; and renewal, 528; revelation in, 149–50, 243–44; and sex, 46, 556; and the state, 491
Tortosa Disputation (1413–1414), 113 torts, 121
Tosafot, 231, 397, 588, 639
Tosefta, 461, 588
Tostado, Alfonso de, 2
Totality and Infinity, 365
Town beyond the Wall, 616
Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, 574–75

- trade, 47–48. See also economic ideologies; moneylending
- Traditional Judaism, see Conservative Judaism
- transcendence, 327
- transmigration, 57
- Transylvania, 274
- Treatise on the Immortality of the Soul*, 8
- Trebitsch, Arthur, 208
- Trianon, Treaty of, 274
- Tribes, Ten Lost, 407, 599–602
- Tripoli, 372, 408
- Trojans, 99
- Troyer*, 107–08
- Trunk, I.I. (Yehiel Yeshaia), 642
- Trust*, 462
- tsedakah, 108
- Tunis, 602
- Tunisia, 408, 454–55, 602–03
- Turkey, 408; Emancipation in, 163; music of, 439, 441; sects in, 64, 335, 555
- Two Tablets of the Covenant*, 332
- Tyndale, William, 73
- typeface design, 551
- Ugarit, 99
- Ugaritic language, 21, 485
- Ukraine, 437
- Ulmer, George, 186
- ultraorthodoxy, see Haredim
- Umar, Pact of, 126
- Umbria, 304
- Union générale des israélites de France, 193
- Union of Orthodox Rabbis, 418
- Union Prayer Book*, 381
- United States, 47, 54–55, 605–07; antisemitism in the, 29–30; assimilation and identity in the, 110, 120, 123, 163, 286, 326, 553; black-Jewish relations in the, 89–90; community histories of the, 566, 605–06; conversion in the, 35, 124; culture and customs in the, 12, 66, 104, 181, 270; education in the, 157–58, 640; fine arts and architecture in the, 40, 186, 263, 266, 595; general histories of the, 248, 257, 267, 606–07; Israel's relations with the, 477; Jewish poetry in the, 488–89; literature in the, 18–19, 635, 642; music in the, 435–36; religious movements in the, 59, 122, 180, 418, 524; synagogues in the, 582; women in the, 183–84, 200, 627–28; and Zionism, 645
- unity, attribute of, 130
- universalism, 198
- Urbach, Ephraim, 15
- Uris, Leon, 19
- Usha, 10
- Valentius, 17
- Valmadonna Pentateuch, 552
- van Buren, Paul, 114
- Vara*, 353
- Varnhagen, Rahel, 208
- vegetarianism, 24, 529, 609–10
- veneration of saints, pilgrimages, and holy places, 421, 610–11
- Venice, 126, 314, 416, 526, 611–12
- Venta Prieta, 133
- Verein für Kultur und Wissenschaft des Judentums*, 621
- Vespasian, 318
- Vichy regime, 192, 454, 603
- Victoria (Australia), 51
- Vieira, José, 368
- Vienna, 105
- Vilna, 237, 378
- Vilna Gaon, see Elijah ben Solomon of Vilna
- violence, 302, 625, 629, 632
- Visigoths, 28, 572
- Vital, Hayyim, 65
- Voice of a Fool*, see Kol Sakhal
- Vogel, David, 237
- Volozhin (yeshivah), 640
- Voltaire, 30
- Wall, Moses, 402
- Wallant, Edward Lewis, 19
- war and peace, 564, 613–14
- Wars of the Lord*, 363–64, 416
- Washington Haggadah, 552
- Wasserstein, Wendy, 635
- water supply, 400
- Weapons of the Spirit* (film), 267
- wedding, 184
- Wege im Judentum*, 61
- Weil, Simone, 262
- Weimar Republic, 209, 517
- Weinberg, Jehiel Jacob, 517
- Weiss, Peter, 595
- Weizmann, Chaim, 69, 614–15, 645
- Wellhausen, Julius, 337
- Wessely, Naphtali Hartwig Herz, 165, 233
- Westbrook, Raymond, 86
- West Central Girls' Club, 421
- Western Australia, 51
- Western Wall, 593, 615–16
- West Semitic script, 234
- Wiesel, Elie, 243, 263, 616–17
- Williamsburg, New York, 544–45
- wine, 147
- wisdom literature, 70, 617–19; biblical, 81, 154, 167; poetry of, 485
- Wisdom of Solomon, 34
- Wise, Isaac Mayer, 267, 619–20
- Wise, Stephen Samuel, 169, 267, 547, 620–21
- Wissenschaft des Judentums, 198, 277, 315–16, 517, 621–22
- Wolf, Elcan Isaac, 234
- Wolfson, Harry, 622–23
- Words of Peace and Truth*, 165
- Worms Mahzor, 552
- writing, see script and scribal practices
- women, 199, 623–32; ancient to modern, 137, 168, 249, 254, 257, 606, 626–28; biblical, 623–26; biblical scholarship by, 528; contemporary, 522, 628–30; and leadership, 581; in Libya, 372; marriage and sexuality of 12–13, 91, 125, 396, 556; and music, 439, 442; portrayal of, 353, 508, 618; status of, 53, 59, 122, 270; 630–32. See also feminism; gender
- women's literature, 632–35, 637; early modern, 632–34; modern and contemporary, 634–35
- Working of the Chariot*, see Ma'aseh Merkabah
- World Centre for Jewish Music in Palestine, 434
- World Union for Progressive Judaism, 420
- World War I, 533
- World War II, 613; in Algeria, 16; in Calcutta, 63; French participation in, 192–93; in Russia, 534; and Spain, 573; in Tunisia, 603
- World Zionist Organization, 68
- worship, 258–59; and abrogation, 6; and Psalms, 508; of saints, 387, 421, 610–11
- Ya'ar ha-Levanon*, 388
- Yad Lashon*, 368
- Yagel, Abraham ben Hananiah, 388, 526
- Yavneh, 10, 318–19
- Yeats, William Butler, 72
- Yehoshua, Avraham B., 236–37
- Yehuda ha-Levi, 487
- Yellow Passport* (film), 186–87
- Yemen, 408, 441, 630, 637–38
- Yephet ben Ali, 279, 508
- yeshivot, 230, 638–41; medieval, 203, 638–40; modern, 58–59, 640–41
- Yeziarska, Anzia, 634
- Yiddish language, 47, 199, 360–61; and culture, 453; in film and plays, 186–87, 595; stories in, 190, 642; study of, 316
- Yiddish literature, 403, 472, 557–58, 634, 641–42
- yishuv, 434
- Yivo Institute, 316
- Yohanan ben Zakkai, see Yohanan ben Zakkai
- Yom Kippur, 414
- Yoreh Deah*, 146
- Young Women's Hebrew Association, 628
- Youth Aliyah, 584
- Yuan Dynasty, 109
- Zach, Nathan, 237
- Zacuto, Moses, 549

- Zadokites, 496
 Zechariah, Book of, 165
Zikbron Saloniki: Grandeza i Destruyicion de Yeruchalayim del Balkan, 354
 Zion, Mount, 165–66, 300, 593
 Zionism, 72, 105–06, 241, 284, 294, 553, 575, 643–45; in the diaspora, 145, 371; economics of, 342; in history, 256; leadership of, 13, 69; messianism in, 407; opposition to, 204, 452; theology of, 127, 301; women in, 583–84, 628–29
 Zionism, Labor, 69, 342, 645–47
 Zionism, Revisionist, 647–48
 zodiac, 580
 Zohar, 331, 333, 648–49; numerology in the, 457; study of the, 525, 548; theosophy of the, 18, 216–17; and views of the land of Israel, 300
 Zoroastrianism, 580
 Zunz, Leopold, 198, 316, 62

NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS

This page intentionally left blank

Howard Tzvi Adelman. Lecturer, Mofet Institute and Achva Academic College, Beer Tuvia. Contributor to The Expulsion of the Jews: 1492 and After edited by Raymond Waddington and Arthur Williamson (1994), Proceedings of the Eleventh World Congress of Jewish Studies (1994), Women of the World: Women and Jewish Writing edited by Judith Baskin (1994), Gender and Judaism edited by T. Rudavsky (1995), and American Historical Association's Guide to Historical Literature (1995). Essays: Authority, Rabbinic and Communal; Education; History: General Histories, Premodern Authors; Human Rights; Israel, Land of: History; Jewish Studies; Literature, Jewish; Marranism; Nasi Family; Renaissance.

Rebecca Alpert. Assistant Professor of Religion and Women's Studies, Temple University, Philadelphia. Author of Exploring Judaism: A Reconstructionist Approach (with Jacob Staub, 1986) and Like Bread on the Seder Plate: Jewish Lesbians and the Transformation of Tradition (1997). Editor of The Reconstructionist (1994–). Contributor to Tikkun, Shofar, Religious Institutions and Women's Leadership edited by C. Wessinger (1996), Judaism since Gender (1997), and Religion and Sex in American Public Life edited by K. Sands (1999). Essay: Homosexuality.

Eleanor Amico. Independent scholar. Editor of Reader's Guide to Women's Studies (1998). Contributor to Great Lives from History: American Women (1995), Identities in Literature (1997), On the Market: Surviving the Academic Job Search, edited by Christine Boufis and Victoria C. Olsen (1997), The Encyclopedia of Modern Social Issues (1997), and Dictionary of World Biography (1999). Essays: Chosen People; Symbols and Symbolism.

Robert Ash. Doctoral candidate, Department of Sociology, University of Leicester. Essays: Great Britain; Secularism.

Shawn Zelig Aster. Doctoral candidate in Biblical Studies, Department of Asian and Middle Eastern Studies, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Essays: Creation; Flora and Fauna of the Bible; Judges, Book of; Kings, Book of; Samuel, Book of.

Fred Astren. Associate Professor, Jewish Studies Program, San Francisco State University, San Francisco, California. Author of The Jewish Printed Book in India (1992). Editor of Papers on Islam and Judaism in Honor of William M. Brinner (forthcoming). Contributor to Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls (forthcoming) and Medieval Encounters. Essay: Karaites.

Cynthia M. Baker. Assistant Professor of Jewish Studies, Department of Religious Studies, Santa Clara University, Santa Clara, California. Editor of Engendering Knowledge, Engendering Power: Feminism as Theory and Practice (1992). Contributor to Anti-Covenant: Counter-Reading Women's Lives in the Hebrew Bible edited by Mieke Bal (1989), Shofar, Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies, The Encyclopedia of Women and World Religion edited by Serinity Young (forthcoming), and Parchments of Gender: Reading the Bodies of Antiquity edited by Maria Wyke (forthcoming). Essays: Am Ha'arets; Women: Biblical; Women: Ancient and Modern; Women: Contemporary; Women: Status.

Carol Bakhos. Visiting Instructor, Department of Religion, Middlebury College, Middlebury, Vermont. Essay: Midrash Aggadah.

Pamela Barmash. Rabbi and Assistant Professor, Department of Asian and Near Eastern Languages and Literatures, Program in Jewish and Near Eastern Studies, Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri. Essays: Covenant; Sabbath; Targum.

Judith R. Baskin. Professor, Department of Judaic Studies, State University of New York at Albany. Author of Pharaoh's Counsellors: Job, Jethro and Balaam in Rabbinic and Patristic Tradition (1983). Editor of Jewish Women in Historical Perspective (1991), Women of the Word: Jewish Women and Jewish Writing (1994), Gender and Jewish Studies: A Curriculum Guide (with Shelly Tenenbaum, 1994), and Jewish Women in Historical Perspective (2nd edition, 1998). Contributor to Jewish History, Association for Jewish Studies Review, Women in Jewish Culture edited by Maurie Sacks (1995), Where We Stand: Issues and Debates in Ancient Judaism, Judaism in Late Antiquity edited by Jacob Neusner and Alan Avery-Peck (1999), and Judaism in Practice: From the Middle Ages to the Early Modern Period edited by Lawrence Fine (1999). Essays: Divorce; Family.

Leora Batnitzky. Assistant Professor, Department of Religion, Princeton University, Princeton, New Jersey. Author of Idolatry and Representation: The Philosophy of Franz Rosenzweig

Reconsidered (forthcoming). Co-editor of German-Jewish Religious Thought (special issue of New German Critique, 1999). Contributor to Oxford Journal of Legal Studies, New German Critique, Journal of Jewish Thought and Philosophy, Journal of Religion, and Biblicon. Essay: Cohen, Hermann.

Wout Jacques van Bakkum. Professor, History Department, University of Amsterdam, and Lecturer, Hebrew Department, University of Groningen. Author of The Qedushta'ot of Yehudah according to Genizah Manuscripts (1988), A Hebrew Alexander Romance (1992, 1994), and Hebrew Poetry from Late Antiquity (1998). Contributor to Dispute Poems and Dialogues in the Ancient and Mediaeval Near East (1991), Early Christian Poetry (1993), Lexicon of Semantics in Four Traditions: Hebrew, Sanskrit, Greek, Arabic (1997), and Pre-Modern Encyclopaedic Texts (1997). Essay: Saadia ben Joseph Gaon.

Dean Bell. Associate Dean, Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies, Chicago. Associate Editor of Shofar (1997–). Contributor to Shofar and Proceedings of the Patristic, Medieval, and Renaissance Conference (1997). Essays: Anti-Judaism: Middle Ages; Germany: Medieval; Hasidei Ashkenaz; Rabbinic Biography: Medieval; Rabbinic Biography: Early Modern.

Mara Benjamin. Doctoral candidate, Department of Religious Studies, Stanford University, Stanford, California. Essays: History: Ideas of; Wissenschaft des Judentums.

Philip J. Bentley. Rabbi and Honorary President, Jewish Peace Fellowship. Contributor to Judaism, Parabola, Fellowship, The Challenge of Shalom edited by M. Polner and N. Goodman (1994), Ecology and the Jewish Spirit edited by Ellen Bernstein (1997), and Trees, Earth, and Torah edited by Arthur Waskow (1999). Essay: War and Peace.

Shulamith Z. Berger. Archivist and Curator of Rare Books and Manuscripts, Yeshiva University, New York. Contributor to Daughters of the King edited by Rivka Haut and Susan Grossman (1992), Jewish Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia edited by Paula E. Hyman and Deborah Dash Moore (1997), Conference Proceedings: Di Froyen: Women and Yiddish (1997), and Pakn-Treger. Essay: Women's Literature: Early Modern.

Ellen Birnbaum. Resource Information Coordinator, Office for Sponsored Research, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Author of The Place of Judaism in Philo's Thought: Israel, Jews, and Proselytes (1996). Editorial board member of Philo of Alexandria Commentary Series. Advisory board member of The Studia Philonica Annual. Essay: Philo of Alexandria.

Laurie Blumberg. Doctoral candidate, Department of Near Eastern and Judaic Studies, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts. Contributor to Encyclopedia of Historians and Historical Review edited by Kelly Boyd (forthcoming). Essay: Antisemitism.

Julia Bock. Librarian, Museum of Jewish Heritage, New York. Essays: Baeck, Leo; Hungary.

Philip V. Bohlman. Associate Professor of Music and Jewish Studies, University of Chicago. Author of The Study of Folk Music in the Modern World (1988), "The Land Where Two Streams Flow": Music in the German-Jewish Community of Israel (1989), and The World Center for Jewish Music in Palestine 1936–1940: Jewish Musical Life on the Eve of World War II (1992). Editor of Ethnomusicology and Modern Music History (1991), Comparative Musicology and Anthropology of Music: Essays in the History of Ethnomusicology (1991), and Land without Nightingales: Music in the Making of German-America (1999). Contributor to Ethnomusicology, Journal of Musicology, and Jahrbuch für Volksliedforschung. Essays: Music: Art Music; Music: Ashkenazi Folk Music; Music: Views on Music.

Alfredo Fabio Borodowski. Visiting Assistant Professor of Jewish Philosophy, Jewish Theological Seminary, New York. Contributor to Proceedings of the Rabbinical Assembly Convention (1994). Essay: Miracles.

S. Daniel Breslauer. Professor, Department of Religious Studies, University of Kansas. Author of A New Jewish Ethics (1983), Covenant and Community in Modern Judaism (1989), and Judaism and Civil Religion (1993). Editor of Shofar (1991–) and Sociological Inquiries (1995–). Contributing editor, The Seductiveness of Jewish Myth (1997). Contributor to Jewish Thought, Hebrew Studies, Reconstructionist, Shofar, and Jewish Spiritual Journeys edited by Lawrence A. Hoffman and Arnold J. Wolf (1997). Essays: Faith; Heschel, Abraham Joshua; Idolatry.

Shannon Burkes. Assistant Professor, Department of Religion, Florida State University, Tallahassee. Author of Death in Qoheleth and Egyptian Biographies of the Late Period (1999). Contributor to Journal for the Study of Judaism. Essays: Death, Burial, and Mourning: Biblical and Talmudic; Five Scrolls.

Deidre Butler. Doctoral candidate and assistant to Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies, Department of Religion, Concordia University, Montreal. Editor of Journal of Religion and Culture (1996–98). Contributor to Journal of Religion and Culture and Jewish Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia edited by Paula E. Hyman and Deborah Dash Moore (1998). Essays: History: General Histories, Modern Authors; History: Modern; Philosophy: Modern.

Hallie Lynn Cantor. Library assistant, Yeshiva University, New York. Co-author of Double Identity (with Mayer Bendet, 1989) and True Identity (with Mayer Bendet, 1990). Editor of Search My Heart (1986), The Shanghai Connection (1988), and The Heroic Struggle (1999). Associate editor of Jewish Reader (1989–93) and Jewish Homemaker (1990–96). Contributor to Jewish Homemaker and Association of Jewish Libraries: New York Metropolitan Area Newsletter. Essay: Menahem Mendel of Kotsk.

Havva S. Charm. Research Associate, Library of the Jewish Theological Seminary, New York. Essay: Wise, Stephen Samuel.

Judith R. Cohen. Adjunct Graduate Faculty, Department of Music, York University, Toronto. Contributor to Canadian Folk Music Journal, Musicworks, Jewish Folklore and Ethnology Review, Rivista de Musicología, Canadian Women's Studies, Women and Music in Cross-Cultural Perspective edited by Ellen Koskoff (1987), World Music, Politics and Social Change edited by Simon Frith (1989), Ballads and Boundaries edited by James Porter (1995), Active Voices: Women in Jewish Culture edited by Maurie Sacks (1995), and Hommage à Haim-Vidal Séphiha edited by Marie-Christine Varol and Winifred Busse (1996). Essay: Music: Sephardi Music.

Alan D. Corré. Emeritus Professor of Hebrew Studies, University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee. Author of Daughter of My People (1971) and Icon Programming for Humanists (1990). Editor of Understanding the Talmud (1975), The Quest for Social Justice II (1992), and A Morsel of Bread (1997). Editorial board member of Text Technology (1993–). Contributor to Journal of Jewish Studies, Jewish Quarterly Review, American Jewish Historical Quarterly, Folklore, Text Technology, Semitic Studies in honor of Wolf Leslau edited by Alan Kaye (1991), Contacts between Cultures: West Asia and North Africa edited by A. Harrak (1992), Les Juifs d'Espagne: Histoire d'une diaspora 1492–1992 edited by Henry Méchoulan (1992), and Boundaries of the Ancient Near Eastern World edited by Meir Lubetsky (1998). Essays: Caro, Joseph; Circumcision.

Andrew Davies. Lecturer in Hebrew Bible, Mattersey Hall, Nottinghamshire. Editorial assistant for Biblical Interpretation (1996–). Contributor to They Spoke from God: An Integrative Survey of the Old Testament edited by William C. Williams (1998). Essays: Bible: Criticism; Isaiah, Book of; Prophets, Former and Latter; Prophets, Twelve Minor.

Joseph M. Davis. Assistant Professor of Jewish Thought, Gratz College, Philadelphia. Contributor to AJS Review and Leo Baeck Institute Yearbook. Essays: Judah Loew ben Bezalel; Prague.

Nachum Dershowitz. Professor, Department of Computer Science, Tel-Aviv University. Author of The Evolution of Programs (1983) and Calendrical Calculations (1997). Editor of Rewriting Techniques and Applications (1989) and Conditional and Typed Rewriting Systems (1995). Contributor to IEEE Transactions on Software Engineering, Communications of the ACM, Journal of Symbolic Computation, Machine Intelligence edited by J.E. Hayes, et al. (1988), and Software—Practice and Experience. Essay: Calendar.

Eliezer Diamond. Assistant Professor, Department of Talmud and Rabbinics, Jewish Theological Seminary, New York. Contributor to The Schocken Guide for Jewish Books edited by Barry Holtz (1992), Journal for the Study of Judaism, Union Seminary Quarterly Review, Ethics of Consumption edited by David Crocker and Toby Linden (1998), and Jewish Quarterly Review. Essays: Asceticism; Talmudic Literature: Introductions; Talmudic Literature: Theology; Talmudic Literature: Hermeneutics.

Marsha Bryan Edelman. Associate Professor of Music and Dean for Academic Affairs, Gratz College, Philadelphia. Editor of Bibliography of Jewish Music (1986), Freedom and Responsibility: Exploring the Challenges of Jewish Continuity (1998), and Journal of Synagogue Music (1998–). Contributor to Musica Judaica, Shma, Jewish Women in America edited by Paula Hyman and Deborah Dash Moore (1997), The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion edited by R.J. Zwi Werblowsky and Geoffrey Wigoder (1997), and Freedom and Responsibility: Exploring the Challenges of Jewish Continuity edited by Rela Mintz Geffen and Marsha Bryan Edelman (1998). Essays: Music: Cantillation; Music: Cantorial Music.

Nehama Edinger. Doctoral candidate, Jewish Theological Seminary, New York. Essay: Piyyut.

Laurence L. Edwards. Associate Rabbi, K.A.M. Isaiah Israel Congregation, Chicago. Contributor to Cross Currents and Islamic Identity and the Struggle for Justice (1996). Essay: Maimonidean Controversy.

Avrum Ehrlich. Fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge University. Author of Leadership in the Habad Movement (forthcoming). Essays: Habad; Haredim; Sanhedrin, Semikhah, and Rabbinat.

Carl S. Ehrlich. Assistant Professor, Division of Humanities, York University, Toronto. Author of The Philistines in Transition: A History from ca. 1000–730 B.C.E. (1996). Editorial board member of Trumah: Zeitschrift der Hochschule für Jüdische Studien (1993–95). Contributor to Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins, Vetus Testamentum, The Age of Solomon edited by Lowell K. Handy (1997), World Religions: The Illustrated Guide edited by Michael D. Coogan (1998), and European Judaism (1998). Essay: Onomastics.

David Engel. Skirball Professor of Modern Jewish History, New York University. Author of In the Shadow of Auschwitz (1987), Facing a Holocaust (1993), and Between Liberation and Flight (1996). Editor of Gal-Ed: On the History of Jews in Poland (1985–), Journal of Israeli History (1997–), and Polin (1997–). Co-editor of Studies in the History of Krakow Jewry (1998). Contributor to Zion, Jewish Social Studies, Yad Vashem Studies, Jews in Eastern Poland and the USSR edited by N. Davis and A. Polonsky (1991), and The Jews of Poland edited by I. Bartal and I. Gutman (1997). Essay: Poland.

Marc Michael Epstein. Assistant Professor of Religion and Coordinator of Jewish Studies, Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York. Essays: Architecture, Synagogue: Medieval and Modern; Art: Ceremonial; Iconography; Manuscripts, Hebrew.

Peter R. Erspamer. Lecturer in German, Carroll College, Waukesha, Wisconsin. Author of The Elusiveness of Tolerance: The "Jewish Question" from Lessing to the Napoleonic Wars (1997). Contributor to The Yale Companion to Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture edited by Sander L. Gilman and Jack Zipes (1997), Literature and Ethnic Discrimination edited by Michael J. Meyer (1997), and Those Who Resisted the Persecution of the Jews edited by Ruby Rohrlach (1998). Essays: Assimilation; Emden-Eybeschütz Controversy; Haskalah; Herzl, Theodor; Toleration.

Dina Ripsman Eylon. Doctoral candidate, Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations, University of Toronto. Editor of Women in Judaism (1997–). Contributor to Military Women Worldwide edited by Reina Pennington (1998), and American National Biography (1999). Essays: Dualism; Hebrew Literature, Modern; Reference Works.

Michael V. Fox. Weinstein-Bascom Professor in Jewish Studies, Hebrew Department, University of Wisconsin. Author of The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (1985), Qohelet and His Contradictions (1987), Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (1991), The Redaction of the Books of Esther (1991), and Proverbs (forthcoming). Editor of Hebrew Studies (1982–93) and S.B.L. Dissertation Series (1994–). Editorial board member of Journal of Biblical Literature (1991–96). Co-editor of Temples, Texts, and Traditions: Essays in Honor of Menahem Haran (1996). Contributor to Hebrew Union College Annual, Journal of Biblical Literature, Vetus Testamentum, In Search of Wisdom: Essays in Memory of John Gammie (1993), and “You Are My Sister”: Essays in Honor of R.E. Murphy (1997). Essays: Ecclesiastes; Proverbs.

Arnold Franklin. Doctoral candidate, Department of Near Eastern Studies, Princeton University, Princeton, New Jersey. Essays: Exilarchate; Genizah, Cairo; Geonim; Judeo-Arabic Literature; Muhammad and Judaism; Saadia ben Joseph Gaon; Sephardim; Spain.

Lisbeth S. Fried. Doctoral candidate, Department of Hebrew and Judaic Studies, New York University. Contributor to Leviticus by J. Milgrom (forthcoming) and Eerdman's Bible Dictionary (forthcoming). Essays: Chronicles; Ezra and Nehemiah, Books of.

Dan Friedman. Doctoral candidate, Department of Comparative Literature, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut. Essays: Levinas, Emmanuel; Weizmann, Chaim.

Baruch Frydman Kohl. Senior Rabbi, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Toronto. Editorial board member of Conservative Judaism (1984–89). Contributor to Conservative Judaism, Judaism, and Maj'shavot=Pensamientos. Essays: Arama, Isaac; Priesthood: Biblical.

Esther Fuchs. Professor of Judaic Studies, University of Arizona, Tucson. Author of Encounters with Israeli Authors (1983), Cunning Innocence: Irony in the Works of S.Y. Agnon (1985), Comic Aspects in S.Y. Agnon's Fiction (1987), and Israeli Mythologies: Women in Contemporary Hebrew Fiction (1987). Editor of Women and the Holocaust: Narrative and Representation (forthcoming) and Women in Jewish Life and Culture (special edition of Shofar; forthcoming). Contributor to Who Is Hiding the Truth? Women and Deception in the Hebrew Bible edited by Adela Y. Collins (1985), Images of Love and War in Contemporary Israeli Fiction: A Feminist Revision edited by Helen Cooper, et al. (1989), and The Characterization of Mothers and Sexual Politics in the Biblical Narrative edited by Adela Y. Collins (1995). Essays: Pappenheim, Bertha; Szold, Henrietta.

Zev Garber. Professor, Department of Jewish Studies, Los Angeles Valley College, Van Nuys, California. Author of Shoah, The Paradigmatic Genocide: Essays in Exegesis and Eisegesis (1994). Editor of Teaching Hebrew Language and Literature at the College Level (1991), Perspectives on Zionism (1994), Shofar (1995–), What Kind of God? Essays in Honor of Richard L. Rubenstein (1995), Peace in Deed: Essays in Honor of Harry James Cargas (1998), and Academic Approaches to Teaching Jewish Studies (1999). Contributor to From Prejudice to Destruction: Western Civilization in the Shadow of Auschwitz edited by C. Jan Colijn and Marcia Sachs Littell (1995), Holocaust and Church Struggle: Religion, Power and the Politics of Resistance edited by Hubert G. Locke and Marcia Sachs Littell (1996), The Uses and Abuses of Knowledge edited by Henry F. Knight and Marcia Sachs Littell (1997), U.S. Holocaust Scholars Write to the Vatican edited by Harry James Cargas (1998), and Confronting the Holocaust: A Mandate for the 21st Century edited by Stephen C. Feinstein, et al. (1998). Essays: Holocaust: Responses to the Holocaust; Judaism, Introductions to; Samaritans.

Lloyd P. Gartner. Professor Emeritus of Modern Jewish History, Department of Jewish History, Tel-Aviv University. Author of A Documentary History of Jewish Education in the United States (1970), The Jewish Immigrant in England 1870–1914 (1973), History of the Jews in Cleveland (1978), and The Jewish Community in the United States (1988). Editorial board of Societas (1970–78), AJS Review (1985–), and Modern Judaism (1983–). Book review editor of American Jewish Historical Quarterly (1962–70). Contributor to American Jewish Historical Quarterly, AJS Review, Transactions of the Jewish Historical Society of England, and Jewish History. Essays: Emancipation; New York.

Jane Gerber. Professor, Department of History, Graduate School and University Center of the City University of New York. Author of Jewish Society in Fez (1980) and The Jews of Spain (1992). Editor of Jewish Social Studies (1969–93), American Jewish History (1986–96), Jewish Political Studies (1988–95), Authority, Power and Leadership in the Jewish Polity (1991), and Sephardic Studies in the University (1995). Contributor to Jewish Book Annual (1981), Humanities, Reconstructionist, History and Hate edited by D. Berger (1986), Judaism edited by R. Seltzer (1988), and The Modern Jewish Experience edited by J. Wertheimer (1993). Essays: Muhammad and Judaism; Sephardim; Spain.

Gary Gilbert. Assistant Professor, Department of Philosophy and Religious Studies, Claremont McKenna College, Claremont, California. Editor of Exploring New Understandings of Theological Scholarship (1995), and The Papers of the Henry Luce III Fellows in Theology (1996). Contributor to Union Seminary Quarterly Review, Encyclopedia of Theology edited by Leslie Houlden (1995), Putting Body and Soul Together edited by Virginia Wiles, et al. (1997), and Ancient Judaism VIII edited by Amy-Jill Levine and Richard Pervo (forthcoming). Essays: Jerusalem; Temple and Temple Mount; Western Wall.

Pinchas Giller. Assistant Professor, University of Judaism, Los Angeles. Author of The Enlightened Will Shine: Symbolization and Theurgy in the Later Strata of the Zohar (1993) and Reading the Zohar (forthcoming). Contributor to The Tu B'shvat Anthology edited by Arthur Waskow (forthcoming). Essays: Kabbalah: Translations; Kabbalah: Introductions; Luria, Isaac; Veneration of Saints, Pilgrimages, and Holy Places; Zohar.

Aubrey L. Glazer. Doctoral candidate, Department of Jewish Philosophy, Jewish Theological Seminary, New York. Contributor to Scat! and Harthouse Review. Essays: God, Names of; Jabès, Edmond.

Matthew Goff. Doctoral candidate, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Contributor to Heythrop Journal, Australian Journal of Comedy, and Millennial Prophecy Report. Essays: Cemeteries: Antiquity; Lieberman, Saul; Tabernacle.

Matt Goldish. Associate Professor of Jewish and European History, The Ohio State University. Author of Judaism in the Theology of Sir Isaac Newton (1998). Contributor to Journal of Jewish Studies, Studia Rosenthaliana, Jewish Quarterly Review, Science in Context, The Books of Nature and Scripture edited by J.E. Force and R.H. Popkin (1994), and Newton and Religion edited by J.E. Force and R.H. Popkin (1998). Essays: Acosta, Uriel; Nieto, David.

Chanita Goodblatt. Senior Lecturer, Department of Foreign Literatures and Linguistics, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. Contributing editor of Re-Soundings (1995–97). Editorial committee member of PSYART (1997–). Contributor to Jerusalem Studies in Jewish Folklore, Prooftexts, Renaissance and Reformation, Dvarim Ahadim, Exemplaria, Israeli Writers Consider the "Outsider" edited by Leon Yudkin (1993), Writing, Region and Nation edited by James A. Davies (1994), Proceedings of the Eleventh World Congress of Jewish Studies (1994), and Walt Whitman Encyclopedia edited by J.R. LeMaster and Donald D. Kummings (1998). Essay: Christian Hebraists.

Sharon Green. Lecturer, Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures, University of Toronto. Author of Love in Exile: A Key to the Work of S.Y. Agnon (forthcoming). Co-editor of And They Will Call Me: Poems from the Holocaust (1982). Contributor to Literature and Culture, Encyclopedia of the Novel edited by Paul Schellinger (1999), and The Broken Melody: Essays in Memory of Haim Brandwein edited by Miriam Brandwein (forthcoming). Essay: Poetry: Modern Hebrew.

Leonard J. Greenspoon. Philip M. and Ethel Klutznick Chair in Jewish Civilization, Creighton University, Omaha, Nebraska. Author of Textual Studies in the Book of Joshua (1983) and Max Leopold Margolis: A Scholar's Scholar (1987). Editor of Ezekiel (1979, 1983), VIII Congress of the IOSCS Paris 1992 (1995), Representations of Jews through the Ages (1996), Yiddish Language and Culture: Then and Now (1997), Religious Studies Review (1990–), and TC (1995–). Contributor to Bulletin of the IOSCS, Jewish Quarterly Review, Traditions in Transformation edited by B. Halpern and J. Levenson (1981), Bible Review, Religion and Politics in the Modern World edited by P. Markl and N. Smart (1985), Biblical Archaeologist, Hebrew Union College Annual, Septuagint, Scrolls, and Cognate Writings edited by G. Brooke and B. Lindars (1990), Anchor Bible Dictionary edited by D.N. Freedman (1992), Solomon Goldman Lectures edited by M. Gruber (1993), and Judaism. Essays: Hellenism; Hellenistic Literature; Joshua, Book of.

Kevin Edward Griffith. Doctoral candidate, Department of Religious Studies, University of Virginia, Charlottesville. Essay: Yiddish Literature.

Sheila Dugger Griffith. Doctoral candidate, Department of Religious Studies, University of Virginia, Charlottesville. Essay: Tithes.

Mayer Irwin Gruber. Associate Professor, Department of Bible and Ancient Near East, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. Author of Aspects of Nonverbal Communication in the Ancient Near East (1980), The Motherhood of God and Other Studies (1992), Women in the Biblical World (1995), and Rashi's Commentary on Psalms 1–89 (1998). Editor of Solomon Goldman Lectures (1993). Editorial board member of Annual of Rabbinic Judaism. Contributor to Biblica, Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, Vetus Testamentum, Studies in Bibliography and Booklore, Journal of Psychology and Judaism, Pomegranates and Golden Bells: Jacob Milgrom Festschrift edited by David P. Wright, et al. (1995), Civilizations of the Ancient Near East edited by Jack M. Sasson (1995), A Feminist Companion to the Later Prophets edited by Athalya Brenner (1995), Cyrus H. Gordon Festschrift edited by Meir Lubetski, et al. (1998), and Women's Roles in Ancient Civilizations edited by Bella Zweig (1998). Essays: Humor; Leviticus; Masorah; Numbers, Book of; Psalms; Solomon ben Isaac.

Peter Haas. Associate Professor, Department of Religious Studies, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee. Author of A History of the Mishnaic Law of Agriculture: Maaser Sheni, Translation and Exegesis (1980), The Talmud of Babylonia: An American Translation XXXV: Meilah and Tamid (1987), Morality after Auschwitz: The Radical Challenge of the Nazi Ethic (1988), and Responsa: Literary History of a Rabbinic Genre (1996). Editor of Biblical Hermeneutics in Jewish Moral Discourse (1985) and Recovering the Role of Women: Power and Authority in Rabbinic Judaism (1992). Book review editor of Journal of Reform Judaism (1991–94). Contributor to New Perspectives on Ancient Judaism edited by Jacob Neusner (1987), Semeia, Religious Studies Review, United Theological Seminary Journal of Theology, and Jewish Law Association Studies. Essays: Ethical Wills; Halakhah: Responsa; Reform Judaism.

Jacob Haberman. Rabbi. Author of Maimonides and Aquinas: A Contemporary Appraisal (1979). Contributor to Encyclopaedia Judaica edited by Cecil Roth (1972), Yad Le-Heman edited by Zvi Malachi (1983), Bitzaron, Journal of Jewish Studies, Judaism, What Is The Purpose of Creation? edited by Michael J. Alter (1991), Mahut, and Jewish Quarterly Review. Essays: Ahad Ha'am; Akiba ben Joseph; Death, Burial, and Mourning: Medieval and Modern; Dogmas; Ethical Culture; Frankel, Zacharias; Gordon, Judah Leib; Hirsch, Samson Raphael; ibn Daud, Abraham; Modern Orthodox Judaism; Moses ben Maimon; Neturei Karta; Schechter, Solomon; Soloveitchik, Joseph Baer; Steinberg, Milton; Wolfson, Harry; Yeshivot: Modern.

Schulamith Chava Halevy. Doctoral candidate, Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Author of Interior Castle: Poems about Being and Being Coerced (1998). Editor of Shofar (special issue, 1999). Contributor to Midstream, Tradition, Jewish Folklore and Ethnology Review, Pesefas, and Linea Directa. Essay: Crypto-Jews, Contemporary.

Eric C. Helmer. Ph.D. in Modern Religious Thought, Boston University. Essays: Aristotelianism; Gnosis and Early Mysticism; Identity; Neoplatonism; Sociology of Religion.

Geoffrey Herman. Doctoral candidate, Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Contributor to Zion and Proceedings of the Twelfth World Congress of Jewish Studies. Essay: Priesthood: Post-biblical.

Samuel Herzfeld. Assistant Rabbi, Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, New York. Essays: Costume; Dietary Laws.

Richard Hirsh. Rabbi, Executive Director of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association, and Faculty Member, Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, Wyncote, Pennsylvania. Editor of Reconstructionist. Contributor to Jewish Exponent. Essays: Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem; Reconstructionist Judaism.

Karina Martin Hogan. Doctoral candidate, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Contributor to Access Bible (forthcoming) and Journal for the Study of Judaism. Essays: Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha: Translations; Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha: Introductions; Dead Sea Scrolls; Wisdom Literature.

Leslie J. Hoppe. Professor, Biblical Literature and Languages, Catholic Theological Union, Chicago. Author of Joshua, Judges (1982), What Are They Saying about Biblical Archaeology (1984), Being Poor (1987), A New Heart (1991), and The Synagogues and Churches of Ancient Palestine (1994). Editor of Bible Today (1984-) and Old Testament Abstracts (1987-). Contributor to Biblical Theology Bulletin, Biblical Research, Eglise et Theologie, Biblical and Theological Reflections on the Challenge of Peace edited by John Pawlikowski and Donald Senior (1984), and Deuteronomium edited by Norbert Lohfink (1985). Essays: Archaeology; Bible: Introductions; Bible: Reference Tools; Decalogue; Deuteronomy; History: Biblical Israel.

Timothy J. Horner. Doctoral candidate, Wolfson College, Oxford University. Contributing editor of The Ecole Initiative. Contributor to Churchman (1996). Essays: Christian-Jewish Relations: Apologetics and Polemics; Jewish Christians.

Sara R. Horowitz. Associate Professor, Department of English, and Director, Jewish Studies Program, University of Delaware, Newark. Author of Voicing the Void: Muteness and Memory in Holocaust Fiction. Editor of Kerem, Jewish American Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical and Critical Sourcebook (1994). Contributor to Cardozo Studies in Law and Literature (1992), Holocaust Remembrance: The Shapes of Memory edited by Geoffrey Hartman (1993), Women of the World: Jewish Women and Jewish Writing edited by Judith Baskin (1994), Judaism since Gender edited by Miriam Peskowitz and Laura Levitt (1997), and Spielberg's Holocaust: Critical Perspectives on Schindler's List edited by Yosefa Loshitsky (1997). Essays: Feminism; Holocaust: Literature and Memoirs; Holocaust: Film Treatments; Women's Literature: Modern and Contemporary.

Monika Humer. Librarian, Institute for Jewish Studies, University of Vienna. Essays: Lineage; Tribes, Ten Lost.

Charles David Isbell. Instructor of Religious Studies, Louisiana State University. Author of Introduction to Hebrew (1975, 1979), Corpus of the Aramaic Incantation Bowls (1975), A Commentary on the Book of Malachi (1980), Theological Didactic Drama (forthcoming). Contributor to Journal of Near Eastern Studies, Hebrew Annual Review (1978), Journal of Central Conference of American Rabbis, Vetus Testamentum, and Art and Meaning: Rhetoric in Biblical Literature (1982). Essays: Commandments; Social Ethics.

Martin S. Jaffee. Professor, Jewish Studies and Comparative Religion, University of Washington, Seattle. Author of Mishnah's Theology of Tithing (1981), Talmud of the Land of Israel: Maaserot (1987), Talmud of Babylonia: Horayot (1987), and Early Judaism (1997). Editor of Innovation in Religious Traditions (1992) and Readings in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (1998). Contributor to Religion, Journal of Jewish Studies, Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Oral Tradition, Interpreting Judaism in a Postmodern Age edited by Steven Kepnes (1996), and Teaching Oral Tradition edited by John Miles Foley (1998). Essay: Oral Tradition.

Julian Jakobovits. Assistant Professor of Medicine, Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine, Baltimore, Maryland. Contributor to Be Fruitful and Multiply edited by Richard V. Grazi (1994) and Neurologist. Essay: Bioethics.

Barbara C. Johnson. Assistant Professor, Department of Anthropology, Ithaca College, Ithaca, New York. Author of Ruby of Cochin: An Indian Jewish Woman Remembers (with Ruby Daniel, 1995). Contributor to Jews of India edited by Thomas Timberg (1986), Four Centuries of Jewish Women's Spirituality edited by Ellen Umansky and Dianne Ashton (1992), Studies of Indian Jewish Identity edited by Nathan Katz (1995), The Jews of India: A Story of Three Communities edited by Orpa Slapak (1995), Gender and Race through Education and Political Activism edited by Dena Shenk (1995), The Jews of China edited by Jonathan Goldstein (1998), Pe'amin, and Manushi. Essays: Baghdadi Jews of India; Bene Israel of India; Cochin Jews; India.

Willis Johnson. John Nuveen Instructor, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Essays: Body; Libels, Anti-Jewish:

Medieval; Talmudic Literature: Translations; Talmudic Literature: Reference Tools.

Norma Baumel Joseph. Associate Professor, Department of Religion, Concordia University. Contributor to Celebrating the New Moon: Rosh Hodesh Anthology edited by Sue Berrin (1996), A Heart of Wisdom edited by Sue Berrin (1997), Celebrating the Lives of Jewish Women: Patterns in a Feminist Sampler edited by Rachel Siegel and Ellen Cole (1997), Creating the Jewish Future (1998), and Shofar. Essays: Agunah; Feinstein, Moses.

S. Tamar Kamionkowski. Chair, Department of Biblical Civilization, Reconstructionist Rabbinical College. Contributor to Sermons Seldom Heard edited by Annie Lally Milhaven (1991) and Jewish, Alive, and American edited by Sherry Shulewitz (1998). Essays: Esther, Book of; Exodus; Ezekiel, Book of; Ruth, Book of.

Ephraim Kanarfogel. Professor, Department of Jewish History, Yeshiva University, New York. Author of Jewish Education and Society in the High Middle Ages (1992) and "Peering through the Lattices": Mystical, Magical, and Pietistic Dimensions in the Tosafist Period (1998). Editorial board member of Jewish Book Annual (1996–). Contributor to Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, Journal of Jewish Thought and Philosophy, AJS Review, Jewish Quarterly Review, and Yale Companion to Jewish Writing and Thought in German Culture 1096–1996 edited by Sander Gilman (1997). Essays: Abraham ben David of Posquières; Gershom ben Judah; Moses ben Nahman; Yeshivot: Medieval.

Dana Evan Kaplan. Research Fellow, Center for Jewish Studies, University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee. Author of Jews and Judaism in the New South Africa (forthcoming) and American Reform Judaism Today (forthcoming). Editor of Contemporary Issues in Reform Judaism (forthcoming). Contributor to American Jewish History, Judaism, Tradition, CCAR, and American Jewish Archives. Essays: Autonomy, Personal; South Africa.

Gregory Kaplan. Doctoral candidate, Department of Religious Studies, Stanford University, Stanford, California. Essays: Abrogation of Law and Custom; Holiness.

Jonathan Karp. Visiting Instructor, Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Contributor to Romantic Russia (forthcoming). Essay: Gentiles.

Paul A. Kay. Associate Professor, Department of Environment and Resource Studies, University of Waterloo, Waterloo, Ontario. Editor of Problems of and Prospects for Predicting Great Salt Lake Levels (1985), The Professional Geographer (1988–91), and Great Plains Research (1991–). Contributor to Theoretical and Applied Climatology, International Symposium on Water Resources Management in the Middle East edited by Glenn Stout and Radwan Al-Weshah (1993), International Workshop on Regional Implications of Future Climate Change edited by Michael Graber, et al. (1993), Visions of Land and Community edited by Harold Brodsky and Robert Mitchell (1997), Hydrogeography of the Middle East at Peace edited by Aaron Wolf and Hussein Amery (1998), Climate Research, Polar Record, and Water Resources Development. Essays: Agricultural Laws; Ecology.

James A. Kelhoffer. Instructor, Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago. Contributor to Biblical Research and Ex Auditu. Essay: Art: Late Antiquity.

Menachem Kellner. Wolfson Professor of Jewish Thought, University of Haifa. Author of Dogma in Medieval Jewish Thought (1986), Must a Jew Believe Anything? (1988), Maimonides on Human Perfection (1990), Maimonides on Judaism and the Jewish People (1991), and Maimonides on the Decline of the Generations and the Nature of Rabbinic Authority (1996). Editor of Contemporary Jewish Ethics (1978, 1985), The Pursuit of the Ideal: Jewish Writings of Steven Schwarzschild (1990), and Human Freedom and Moral Responsibility: General and Jewish Perspectives (with Charles Manekin, 1997). Contributor to British Journal for the History of Science, Association for Jewish Studies Review, Jewish Political Studies Review, Hebrew Union College Annual, Torah u-Madda Journal, Interpreters of Judaism in the Late Twentieth Century edited by Steven Katz (1993), Studies in Halakha and Jewish Thought Presented to Rabbi Professor Emanuel Rackman edited by M. Beer (1994), Contemporary Jewish Ethics and Morality edited by E. Dorff and L. Newman (1995), Communication in the Jewish Diaspora edited by S. Menache (1996), and Hazon Nahum edited by J. Gurock and Y. Elman (1998). Essay: Levi ben Gershom.

Ari Kelman. Doctoral candidate, American Studies Program, New York University. Contributor to Learn Torah With, Conservative Judaism. Essays: Diaspora; Race, Jews as; Race, Views on.

Joy Kingsolver. Archivist, Chicago Jewish Archives, Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies, Chicago. Essays: United States: Community Histories; United States: General Histories.

Samuel Z. Klausner. Professor Emeritus of Sociology, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Author of Psychiatry and Religion: A Sociological Study of the New Alliance of Ministers and Psychiatrists (1964), On Man in His Environment: Social Scientific Foundations for Research and Policy (1971), Eskimo Capitalists: Oil, Politics, and Alcohol (with Edward Foulks, 1982), and Succeeding in Corporate America: The Experience of Jewish MBAs (1989). Editor of The Study of Total Societies (1967), Why Man Takes Chances: Studies in Stress Seeking (1968), Religion in the United States (1968), Society and Its Physical Environment (1970), and Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion (1964–70). Contributor to Journal of Educational Psychology, Iyun, Middle East Journal, and Archives de Sociologie des Religions. Essay: Apostasy.

Mark Kligman. Assistant Professor of Music, Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion, New York. Contributor to Yivo Annual (1996), Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (1998), Encyclopedia of Judaism edited by Jacob Neusner (forthcoming), and Aram Soba edited by Walter Zenner (forthcoming). Essay: Music: Middle Eastern Music.

Cynthia A. Klíma. Assistant Professor, Department of Foreign Languages, State University of New York, Geneseo. Contributor to Franz Kafka Society of America Yearbook and Monatshefte. Essays: Architecture, Synagogue: Late Antiquity; Ben-Gurion, David; Central Europe; Jewish Quarter; Magic and Superstition; Shtetl; Theater.

Rebecca Kobrin. Doctoral candidate, Department of History, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Essay: Israel, State of; Judaism in Israel.

Samuel S. Kottek. The Harry Friedenwald Chair for History of Medicine, Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical School, Jerusalem. Author of Medicine and Hygiene in the Works of Flavius Josephus (1994). Editor of Moses Maimonides: Physician, Scientist, and Philosopher (with F. Rosner, 1993), Medicine and Medical Ethics in Medieval and Early Modern Spain (with L. García-Ballester, 1996), Health and Disease in the Holy Land (with M. Waserman, 1996), and Korot. Editorial board member of Vesalius, Medicina nei Secoli, and Israel Journal of Medical Sciences. Contributor to Journal of the History of Biology, Bulletin of the International Society for the History of Medicine, and Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt edited by W. Haase and H. Temporini (1996). Essay: Medicine.

Diane Kriger. Doctoral candidate, Department of Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations, University of Toronto. Editor of Women in Judaism (1997–) and Introducing Tosefta (forthcoming). Contributor to Ottawa Law Review and The Historical Encyclopedia of World Slavery edited by Junius P. Rodriguez (1997). Essay: Slavery.

Gail Labovitz. Visiting Instructor, Department of Talmud and Rabbinics, Jewish Theological Seminary, New York. Editor of Mizmor Shir Birkon (1993) and Summary Index: The Committee on Jewish Law and Standards (1994). Contributor to Proceedings of the Rabbinical Assembly (1995), Shofar, and Canadian Women's Studies. Essays: Conservative Judaism; Ketubah.

Hartley Lachter. Doctoral candidate, Skirball Department of Judaic Studies, New York University. Essay: Scholem, Gershom.

Ruth Langer. Assistant Professor of Jewish Studies, Theology Department, Boston College. Author of To Worship Properly: Tensions Between Liturgical Custom and Halakhah in Judaism (1998). Editor of CCAR Journal (1991–96). Contributor to Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, Hebrew Union College Annual, Proceedings of the North American Academy of Liturgy, and Worship. Essays: Liturgy, History of; Liturgy, Reform; Synagogue.

Yaakov A. Lattes. Rabbi and doctoral candidate, Department of Jewish History, Bar-Ilan University. Contributor to Jerusalem Letter, Jewish Political Studies Review, La Rassegna Mensile di Israel, and Zakhor. Essays: Italy; Luzzatto, Moses Hayyim; Luzzatto, Samuele Davide; Rossi, Azariah dei; Shabbetai Tsevi.

Eric Lawee. Assistant Professor, Division of Humanities, York University, Toronto. Contributor to Viator, Hebrew Union Col- lege Annual, Medieval Studies, AJS Review, and Studies in Medieval Jewish History and Literature III edited by Isadore Twersky and Jay M. Harris (1998). Essay: Abravanel, Isaac.

Elliot Lefkowitz. Adjunct Professor of Holocaust Studies, Speritus Institute of Jewish Studies, Chicago, and Adjunct Professor, Department of History, Loyola University of Chicago. Author of History of Anshe Emet Synagogue (1976), The Story of Herman and Maurice Spertus (1994), and History of Temple Shalom (1995). Editor of Dimensions of the Holocaust (1990). Contributor to Encyclopedia Britannica (1975–76), World Book Encyclopedia (1990), and Journal of American History. Essay: Wise, Isaac Mayer.

Harris Lenowitz. Professor, Department of Languages, University of Utah, Salt Lake City. Essays: Bar Kokhba, Simeon; Frank, Jacob Joseph.

Arthur M. Lesley. Associate Professor, Department of Hebrew Language and Literature, Baltimore Hebrew University, Baltimore, Maryland. Contributor to Prooftexts, Seminar, Ficino and Renaissance Neoplatonism edited by Konrad Eisenbichler and Olga Zorzi Pugliese (1986), Renaissance Rereadings: Intertext and Context edited by Maryanne C. Horowitz, et al. (1988), Essential Papers on Jewish Culture in Renaissance and Baroque Italy edited by David B. Ruderman (1992), The Midrashic Imagination: Jewish Exegesis, Thought and History edited by Michael Fishbane (1993), and Storia d'Italia, Annali 11: Gli ebrei in Italia edited by Corrado Vivanti (1996). Essays: Abravanel, Judah; Messer Leon Family.

Alan Levenson. Associate Professor, Cleveland College of Jewish Studies, Cleveland, Ohio. Contributor to Shofar, Insiders and Outsiders edited by Dagmar Lorenz and Gabriele Weinberger (1995), Gender and Judaism edited by Tamar Rudavsky (1995), Jewish Social Studies, and Judaism. Essays: Buber, Martin; Rosenzweig, Franz.

Mark LeVine. Mellon Postdoctoral Fellow, Department of History, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York. Contributing editor of Tikkun. Contributor to Journal of Palestine Studies, Middle East Report, International Journal of Middle East Studies, Global Norms/Urban Forms, and National Identities. Essays: Kibbutz; Zionism, Labor.

Bernard M. Levinson. Berman Family Chair of Jewish Studies and Hebrew Bible and Associate Professor of Classical and Near Eastern Studies, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis. Author of Deuteronomy and the Hermeneutics of Legal Innovation (1997). Editor of Theory and Method in Biblical and Cuneiform Law (1994). Co-editor of Gender and Law in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (1998). Editorial board member of Journal of Biblical Literature, Zeitschrift für Altorientalische und Biblische Rechtsgeschichte. Contributor to Harvard Theological Review, Journal of Biblical Literature, "Not in Heaven": Coherence and Complexity in Biblical Narrative edited by Jason P. Rosenblatt (1991), Innovation in Religious Traditions: Essays in the Interpretation of Religious Change edited by Michael A. Williams (1992), Theory and Method in Biblical and Cuneiform Law edited by Bernard M. Levinson (1994), and Bundesdoku- ment und Gesetz: Studien zum Deuteronomium edited by Georg Braulik (1995). Essay: Bible: Law.

Justin Jaron Lewis. Doctoral candidate, Department of Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations, University of Toronto, and rabbinical student, Academy for Jewish Religion, New York. Essays: Folktales; Israel ben Eliezer Ba'al Shem Tov; Levi Isaac of Berdichev; Satmar.

Hilary Lieberman. Doctoral candidate, Department of Italian Language and Literature, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut. Contributor to Romance Languages Annual (1998). Essays: Chagall, Marc; Modena, Leone; Venice.

Christopher A. Link. Doctoral candidate, Department of Religion, Boston University. Essay: Angels and Demons.

Shari Lowin. Doctoral candidate, Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago. Contributor to Hadassah Magazine. Essays: Ba'alei Shem; Geiger, Abraham.

Edith Lubetski. Associate Professor, Library Administration, Stern College for Women, Yeshiva University, New York. Author of Writings on Jewish History (1974) and The Jewish Woman: Recent Books (1995). Co-author of Building a Judaica Library Collection (1983). Associate editor of Judaica Librarianship (1983–). Contributor to Library Resources and Technical Services, Judaica Librarianship, and Ten Da'at. Essays: Agnon, Shmuel Yosef; Ozick, Cynthia.

George Mandel. Former Fellow, Oxford Center for Hebrew and Jewish Studies. Author of Who Was Ben-Yehuda with in Boulevard Montmartre? (1984). Editor of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda's A Dream Come True (1993). Essay: Ben-Yehuda, Eliezer.

Alisa Gayle Mayor. Visiting Scholar, Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island. Contributor to Study Group on Eighteenth-Century Russia Newsletter and Slavic and East European Journal. Essays: Ashkenazim; Cemeteries: Medieval and Modern; Lithuania; Russia.

Rafael Medoff. Visiting Scholar, Jewish Studies Program, State University of New York, Purchase. Author of The Deafening Silence: American Jewish Leaders and the Holocaust, 1933–1945 (1987) and Zionism and the Arabs: An American Jewish Dilemma, 1898–1948 (1997). Editorial board of Menorah Review (1992–) and Shofar (1996–). Contributor to American Jewish History, Studies in Zionism, Holocaust Studies Annual, American Jewish Archives, and Holocaust and Genocide Studies. Essay: Zionism, Revisionist.

David Meier. Associate Professor, Department of Social Sciences, Dickinson State University, Dickinson, North Dakota. Associate editor of European Studies Journal (1995–). Contributor to Confronting the Holocaust edited by Stephen C. Feinstein (1998) and Modern Germany edited by Dieter Buse and Juergen Doerr (1998). Essays: Abulafia, Abraham; Zionism.

Marc Miller. Doctoral candidate, Department of Germanic Languages, Columbia University, New York. Essays: Bialik, Hayyim Nahman; Peretz, Isaac Leib; Sholem Aleichem; Singer, Isaac Bashevis.

Victor A. Mirelman. Professor, Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies, Chicago. Author of En Busqueda de Una Identidad (1988) and Jewish Buenos Aires, 1890–1930 (1991). Contributor to Jewish Social Studies, American Jewish Historical Quarterly, American Jewish Archives, and Sephardim in the Americas edited by Martin A. Cohen and Abraham J. Peck. Essay: Latin America and the Caribbean.

Alan Mittelman. Associate Professor, Department of Religion, Muhlenberg College, Allentown, Pennsylvania. Author of Between Kant and Kabbalah (1990) and The Politics of Torah (1996). Editor of Jewish Political Studies Review (1992–1998). Contributor to First Things (1996), The Modern Jewish Experience edited by Jack Wertheimer (1993), and European Jewry: Between America and Israel edited by S. Ilan Troen (1998). Essay: Political Theory.

Hillel C. Neuer. Associate at the law firm of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton, and Garrison, New York. Essay: Creation.

Scott B. Noegel. Assistant Professor, Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilization, University of Washington, Seattle. Author of Janus Parallelism in the Book of Job (1996) and Nocturnal Secret Ciphers: The Punning Language of Dreams in the Ancient Near East (1998–). Editor of Puns and Pundits: Wordplay in the Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near Eastern Literature (1998–). Contributor to Acta Sumerologica, Aula Orientalis, Biblica, Journal of Biblical Literature, and Zeitschrift für alttestamentliche Wissenschaft. Essays: Ancient Near East; Babylonia; Bible: Hermeneutics; Canaanites; Genesis; Song of Songs.

D.P. O'Brien. Doctoral candidate, Wolfson College, Oxford University. Contributor to Vetus Testamentum and Journal of Early Christian Studies. Essays: Josephus, Flavius; Pharisees; Sadducees.

John T. Pawlikowski. Professor, Department of Historical and Doctrinal Studies, Catholic Theological Union, Chicago. Author of Catechetics and Prejudice (1973), Sinai and Calvary (1976), Christ in the Light of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue (1982), The Challenge of the Holocaust for Christian Theology (1982), and Jesus and the Theology of Israel (1989). Editor of Biblical and the Theological Reflections on the Challenge of Peace (1984), Economic Justice (1988), The Ecological Challenge (1994), Journal of Ecumenical Studies, Shofar, New Theology Review, and Holocaust and Genocide Studies. Contributor to Journal of Ecumenical Studies, Journal of Holocaust and Genocide Studies, Theological Studies, Cross Currents, New Theology Review, The Holocaust as Interruption edited by Elisabeth Shüssler Fiorenza and David Tracy (1984), Twenty Years of Jewish-Catholic Relations edited by Eugene J. Fisher, et al. (1986), Thinking the Unthinkable edited by Roger S. Gottlieb (1990), Introduction to Jewish-Christian Relations edited by Michael Shermis and Arthur E. Zannoni (1991), and Visions of the Other edited by Eugene J. Fisher (1994). Essays: Christian-Jewish Relations: Contemporary Dialogue; Jesus and Judaism.

Sarah Pessin. Doctoral candidate, Department of Philosophy, Ohio State University. Contributor to Journal of the History of Philosophy. Essays: Astrology; Numerology and Numbers.

Sigrid Peterson. Instructor, Department of Religious Studies, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Contributor to Ioudaios Review, Religious Studies Review, and The Dead Sea Scrolls Fifty Years after Their Discovery (forthcoming). Essays: Ethical and Devotional Literature; History: Talmudic Era.

Lucy K. Pick. John Nuveen Instructor, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Contributor to Revue Bénédictine and Viator. Essay: Crusades.

Judith S. Pinnolis. Reference Librarian for Publications and Training, Goldfarb Library, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts. Contributor to Nineteenth-Century American Musical Theater. Essay: Music: American Jewish Music.

Sanford Pinsker. Shadek Professor of Humanities, Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Author of The Schlemiel as Metaphor (1971), The Comedy That "Hoits" (1975), The Uncompromising Fictions of Cynthia Ozick (1987), Understanding Joseph Heller (1991), and Jewish-American Fiction, 1917–1987 (1992). Editor of Philip Roth: Critical Essays (1982). Co-editor of Jewish-American Literature and Culture: An Encyclopedia (1992). Contributor to Studies in American-Jewish Literature. Essays: American Literature; Black-Jewish Relations in the United States.

Paul A. Rainbow. Professor of New Testament, North American Baptist Seminary, Sioux Falls, South Dakota. Contributor to Novum Testamentum, Westminster Theological Journal, Journal of Jewish Studies, and Bulletin for Biblical Research. Essays: God-Fearers; Paul and Judaism.

Eric Reymond. Doctoral candidate, University of Chicago. Essay: Elephantine.

Karyn Riegel. Media and Cultural Programs Director, Bronfman Center for Jewish Life at New York University. Sub-editor of The Latin American and Latino Annotated International Film Bibliography, 1946–1996 (1999). Essay: Film.

Ira Robinson. Professor, Department of Religion, Concordia University, Montreal. Author of Moses Cordovero's Introduction to Kabbala (1994). Editor of Cyrus Adler: Selected Letters (1985), An Everyday Miracle: Yiddish Culture in Montreal (1990), The Thought of Moses Maimonides (1990), The Interaction of Scientific and Jewish Cultures in Modern Times (1994), Renewing Our Days: Montreal Jews in the Twentieth Century (1995), and Canadian Jewish Studies (1994–). Contributor to American Jewish History, Judaism, Canadian Ethnic Studies, American Jewish Archives, and Canadian Jewish Studies. Essay: Canada.

James T. Robinson. Doctoral candidate, Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Contributor to The Encyclopedia of Medieval Hebrew Science and Philosophy edited by Steven Harvey (forthcoming). Essay: Allegory.

Fred Rosner, Professor of Medicine, Mount Sinai School of Medicine, New York, and Director, Department of Medicine, Mount Sinai Services at Queens Hospital Center, Jamaica, New York. Author of Maimonides' Treatises on Poisons, Hemorrhoids and Coliobitation (1984), Modern Medicine and Jewish Ethics (1986), Medical Aphorisms of Moses Maimonides (1989), Maimonides' Treatise on Asthma (1993), and Pioneers in Jewish Medical Ethics (1997). Editor of Jewish Bioethics (1979), Cancer Investigation (1981–), Moses Maimonides: Physician, Scientist and Philosopher (1993), Medicine and Jewish Law (1990, 1993), Primary Care Update for Ob-Gyns (1993–), and Mount Sinai Journal of Medicine (1994–). Contributor to Encyclopaedia Judaica (1972), Encyclopaedia of Bioethics (1978), Current Therapy of Infertility, and Current Hematology and Oncology. Essays: Birth Control and Abortion; Euthanasia; Reproductive Technologies.

Jeffrey L. Rubenstein. Associate Professor, Department of Hebrew and Judaic Studies, New York University. Author of The History of Sukkot in the Second Temple and Rabbinic Periods (1995). Contributor to Association of Jewish Studies Review, Hebrew Union College Annual, Jewish Quarterly Review, Harvard Theological Review, and Revue Biblique. Essays: Rabbinic Biography; Talmudic; Sukkot.

William D. Rubinstein. Professor of Modern History, University of Wales, Aberystwyth. Author of The Jews in Australia: A Thematic History, Volume II, 1945–Present (1991), Capitalism, Culture, and Decline in Britain, 1750–1990 (1993), A History of the Jews in the English-Speaking World: Great Britain (1996), and The Myth of Rescue (1997). Editor of Jews in the Sixth Continent (1986) and Journal of the Australian Jewish Historical Society (1988–95). Editorial board member Australian Journal of Jewish Studies (1987–). Contributor to Past and Present, Jewish Journal of Sociology, and Welsh History Review. Essays: Australia and New Zealand; Philo-Semitism.

Dominic Rudman. Lecturer in Old Testament, Department of Theology and Religious Studies, King's College, London. Contributor to Journal of Biblical Literature, Journal of Northwest Semitic Languages, Vetus Testamentum, Qohelet in the Context of Wisdom edited by Anton Schoors (1998), and Catholic Biblical Quarterly. Essays: Apocalyptic; Eschatology; Jeremiah, Book of.

Leonard Victor Rutgers. Research Fellow of the Royal Dutch Academy of Arts and Sciences, University of Utrecht. Author of The Jews in Late Ancient Rome (1995) and The Hidden Heritage of Diaspora Judaism (1998). Essays: Graetz, Heinrich; History: Second Temple Period; Momigliano, Arnaldo.

Suzanne Rutland. Head, Department of Semitic Studies, University of Sydney. Author of Seventy-five Years: The History of a Jewish Newspaper (1970), Take Heart Again: The Story of a Fellowship of Jewish Doctors (1983), Edge of the Diaspora: Two Centuries of Jewish Settlement in Australia (1988, 1997), Pages of History: A Century of the Australian Jewish Press (1995), and And With One Voice: A History of the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies (1998). Editor of Aus- tralian Jewish Historical Society Journal (1991–), One Land: Two Peoples (1993, 1995, 1998), and Opposite the Lion's Den: A Story of Hiding Dutch Jews (1996). Contributor to Australian Journal of Politics and History, Yad Vashem Studies, Leo Baeck Year Book, Australian Journal of Jewish Studies, Australian Jewish Historical Society Journal, The New South Wales Jewish Community: A Survey (1978), Jews in the Sixth Continent (1987), Australia's Gulf War (1992), Minorities (1995), and Precious Legacy (1998). Essays: Menasseh ben Israel; Netherlands, The.

Rachel Sabath. Rabbi and Director of Rabbinic Programs, National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership. Co-author of Preparing Your Heart for the High Holy Days (1996) and Striving Towards Virtue: A Contemporary Guide to Jewish Ethical Behavior (1996). Contributor to Shma, Tikkun, Jewish Spectator, and Cross Currents. Essays: Continuity; Musar.

Angel Sáenz-Badillos. Professor, Department of Hebrew and Aramaic Studies, Universidad Complutense, Madrid. Author of Las Tešubot de Dunaš hen Labrat (1980), Mahberet Menahem (1986), Semu'el ha Nagid, Poemas I Desde el Campo de Batalla (1988), A History of the Hebrew Language (1993), and Yehuda ha-Levi: Poemas (1994). Editor of Homenaje a D. Gonzales Maeso (1977), Miscelánea de Estudios Árabes y Hebraicos (1978), Homenaje Pérez Castro (1987), Poesía Estrófica (1989), Homenaje Díaz Esteban (1992). Contributor to Sefarad, Revista de Filología Española, Prooftexts, and La Corónica. Essays: ibn Ezra, Abraham; ibn Ezra, Moses; ibn Gabirol, Solomon; ibn Nagrela, Samuel; Judah Halevi; Poetry: Medieval Hebrew.

Ari Salkin-Weiss. Freelance writer, Chicago. Essays: Halakhah: Introductions; Reference Works.

Robert B. Salters. Senior Lecturer in Hebrew and Old Testament, University of St. Andrews. Author of The Commentary of R. Samuel ben Meir on Qohelet (with Sara Japhet, 1985) and Jonah and Lamentations (1994). Contributor to Vetus Testamentum, Zeitschrift für die Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, Expository Times, Journal of Jewish Studies, Jewish Quarterly Review, A Word in Season edited by P.R. Davies and J.D. Martin (1986), A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation edited by R.J. Coggins and J.L. Houlden (1990), and Rashi et la Culture Juive en France du Nord au Moyen Age edited by G. Nahon and C. Touati (1997). Essay: Lamentations.

Gabriel Sanders. Associate, Leo Baeck Institute, New York. Essay: Mendelssohn, Moses.

Jack T. Sanders. Professor Emeritus, Religious Studies Department, University of Oregon. Author of The New Testament Christological Hymns (1971), Ethics in the New Testament (1975, 1983), Ben Sira and Demotic Wisdom (1983), The Jews in Luke-Acts (1987), and Schismatics, Sectarians, Dissidents, Deviants: The First One Hundred Years of Jewish-Christian Relations (1993). Editor of Journal of Biblical Literature (1977–82), Gnosticism and the Early Christian World (1990) and Gospel Origins and Christian Beginnings (1990). Contributor to Journal of Biblical Literature, Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft, Hebrew Union College Annual, Luke-Acts and the Jewish People edited by Joseph Tyson (1988), and Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt edited by Wolfgang Haase (1996). Essays: Anti-Judaism: Late Antiquity; Ben Sira, Wisdom of.

Roberta G. Sands. Associate Professor, School of Social Work, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Author of Clinical Social Work Practice in Community Mental Health (1991). Associate Editor of Social Science Journal (1987–90). Contributor to Handbook of American Women's History edited by A.H. Zophy (1990), Qualitative Research in Social Work edited by E. Sherman and W. Reid (1994), Discourse Processes, Social Work in Education, Families in Society, and Clinical Social Work Journal. Essay: Ba'alei Teshuvah.

Marc Saperstein. Professor of Jewish History, Department of History, George Washington University, Washington, D.C. Author of Decoding the Rabbis (1980), Jewish Preaching 1200–1800 (1989), Moments of Crisis in Jewish-Christian Relations (1989), and “Your Voice like a Ram's Horn” (1996). Editor of Essential Papers on Messianic Movements and Personalities in Jewish History (1992). Book review editor of AJS Review (1997–). Contributor to Révue des Études Juives, Jewish Social Studies, Harvard Theological Review, The Land of Israel edited by Lawrence Hoffman (1986), Dictionary of the Middle Ages (1987), Encyclopedia of Religion (1987), Studia Rosenthaliana, Jewish Quarterly Review, Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion (1996), and History of Jewish Philosophy edited by Daniel Frank and Oliver Leaman (1996). Essays: Homiletics; Israel, Land of: In Jewish Thought.

Gad B. Sarfatti. Emeritus Professor, Department of Hebrew and Semitic Languages, University Bar-Ilan, Ramat-Gan. Author of Mathematical Terminology in Hebrew Scientific Literature of the Middle Ages (1968), Hebrew Semantics (1985), and In the Language of My People (1997). Editor of E.Y. Kutscher: Hebrew and Aramaic Studies (1977), Studies in Hebrew and Semitic Languages (1980), and Hebrew Language Studies (1983). Contributor to Leshonenu, Tarbiz, HUCA, and Maarav. Essays: Hebrew Alphabet; Hebrew Language.

Isaac Sassoon. Rabbi and Instructor of Talmud, Institute for Traditional Judaism, Teaneck, New Jersey. Author of Ve-Ha'arev Na. Editor (with H.P. Salomon) of Uriel da Costa's Examination of Pharisaic Traditions (1993) and Antonio José Saraiva's Inquisicao e Cristaos-Novos (forthcoming as The Marrano Factory). Essay: Kingship.

Michael L. Satlow. Assistant Professor, Department of Religious Studies, University of Virginia. Author of Tasting the Dish: Rabbinic Rhetorics of Sexuality (1995). Contributor to Journal of the History of Sexuality, Asceticism edited by Vincent Wimbush and Richard Valantasis (1995), Harvard Theological Review, Journal of Biblical Literature, and Journal of Jewish Studies. Essays: Gender; Marriage; Sex.

Andrew Schein. Lecturer, Netanyah Academic College. Contributor to Applied Economics, Judaism, and Tradition. Essay: Economic Ideologies.

Stuart Schoenfeld. Associate Professor, Department of Sociology, Glendon College, York University, Toronto. Editor of Essays in the Social Scientific Study of Judaism and Jewish Society (1991), and Journal of Jewish Education (1992, 1997). Contributor to Contemporary Jewry, Journal of Jewish Education, Jewish Political Studies Review, Canadian Encyclopedia (1997), and Jewish Survival: The Identification Problem at the End of the 20th Century (1998). Essay: Bar Mitzvah and Bat Mitzvah.

Rebecca Schorsch. Doctoral candidate, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Essay: Ginzberg, Louis.

Emile G.L. Schrijver. Joods Historisch Museum, Amsterdam. Essays: Books and Libraries; Printing, Early Hebrew; Scribes; Script and Scribal Practices.

Richard H. Schwartz. Professor of Mathematics, College of Staten Island, City University of New York. Author of Judaism and Vegetarianism (1982, 1988), Judaism and Global Survival (1984), and Mathematics and Global Survival (1997). Contributor to Judaism and Animal Rights edited by Roberta Kalechofsky (1992) and The Challenge of Shalom edited by Murray Polner and Naomi Goodman (1994). Essays: Animals, Treatment of; Vegetarianism.

Roberta Hanfling Schwartz. Independent scholar and lecturer, Chicago. Essay: Glikl of Hameln.

Esther I. Seidel. Lecturer in Jewish Thought, Leo Baeck College, London. Author of "Jüdische Philosophie" in nichtjüdischer und jüdischer Philosophiegeschichtsschreibung (1984). Editor of European Judaism (1995–), and Monographien zur Wissenschaft des Judentums (1995–). Contributing editor of Nicht durch Geburt allein (1995), and Not by Birth Alone (1997). Contributor to Biblioteca dell' Archivio di Filosofia: La storia della filosofia ebraica (1993), European Judaism, Jewish Identity in Modern Times: Leo Baeck (1995), Manna, Ideengeschichte und Wissenschaftsgeschichte edited by R. Dodel, et al. (1997), Leo Baeck: Zwischen Geheimnis und Gebot (1997), and Das Leben leise wieder lernen (1997). Essays: China; Conversion to Judaism; God, Doctrines and Concepts of; Philosophy: General; Philosophy: Medieval; Spinoza, Baruch de.

Marc B. Shapiro. Weinberg Chair of Judaic Studies, University of Scranton, Scranton, Pennsylvania. Author of Between the Yeshiva World and Modern Orthodoxy: The Life and Works of Rabbi Jehiel Jacob Weinberg (1999). Editor of Collected Writings of Rabbi Jehiel Jacob Weinberg (1998). Contributor to Judaism, Torah u-Madda Journal, Tradition, Henoch, and Maimonidean Studies. Essay: Rabbinic Biography: Modern.

Brenda J. Shaver. Doctoral candidate, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Essay: Daniel, Book of.

Shmuel Shepkaru. Visiting Professor, Department of History, University of Oklahoma. Essays: Martyrdom; Suicide.

Ita Sheres. Professor, English and Comparative Literature Department, San Diego State University, San Diego, California. Author of Dinah's Rebellion: A Biblical Parable for Our

Time (1990) and The Truth about the Virgin: Sex and Ritual in the Dead Sea Scrolls (1995). Contributor to Studies in American Jewish Literature, Soviet Jewish Affairs, Judaism, Centennial Review, and Shofar. Essay: Passover.

Hayim Y. Sheynin. Head of Reference Services, Gratz College Library, Philadelphia. Author of Introduction to the Poetry of Joseph ben Tanhum ha-Yerushalmi and to the History of Its Research, Catalog of Hebrew Incunabula in the Soviet Union, and Sephardi Language. Guest editor of Jewish Quarterly Review (special issue in honor of Dr. Leon Nemoy). Editor of Cataloguing Rules for Oriental Literature. Editorial board member of Jewish Quarterly Review. Contributor to Acta Orientalia Academiae Scientiarum Hungarica, Hagut Iurit Bi-Brit ha-Moazot, Jewish Quarterly Review, Sefarad, Community and Culture, and Zion. Essays: Crescas, Hasdai; Inquisition; Khazars; Ladino Literature; Languages, Jewish; Lexicographers and Grammarians; Portugal; Provence.

Colin Shindler. Author of Exit Visa: Detente, Human Rights and the Jewish Emigration Movement in the USSR (1978), Ploughshares into Swords? Israelis and Jews in the Shadow of the Intifada (1991), and Israel, Likud and the Zionist Dream: Power, Politics, and Ideology from Begin to Netanyahu (1995). Editor of Jews in the USSR (1972–75), Jewish Quarterly (1985–94), and Judaism Today (1995–). Contributor to Journalism and the Holocaust 1933–45 (1998) and Terrorism and Political Violence (1997). Essays: Kahane, Meir; London.

Adina Shoulson. Doctoral candidate, Skirball Department of Hebrew and Judaic Studies, New York University. Essays: Johanan ben Zakkai; Krochmal, Nahman.

Edward Silver. Doctoral candidate, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Essay: Sin and Atonement.

Rachel Simon. Princeton University, Princeton, New Jersey. Author of Libya between Ottomanism and Nationalism (1987) and Change within Tradition among Jewish Women in Libya (1992). Editorial board of Mideast File (1982, 1986), On History (1988), National Union Catalog of Middle Eastern Microforms (1989), MELA Notes (1995–), and Jewish Book Annual (1996–). Contributor to Alliance Review, Jewish History, Shofar, Africana Journal, Jewish Political Studies Review, Vision and Conflict in the Holy Land edited by R.I. Cohen (1985), New Horizons in Sephardic Studies edited by Y.K. Stillman and G.K. Zucker (1993), The Jews of the Ottoman Empire edited by A. Levy (1993), and Decision Making and Change in the Ottoman Empire edited by C.E. Farah (1993). Essays: Algeria; Egypt and Sudan; Iran, Afghanistan, and Central Asia; Iraq; Libya; Middle East; Morocco; North Africa; Tunisia; Yemen and the Arabian Peninsula.

Alexej Michaelovitch Sivertsev. Doctoral candidate, Skirball Department of Hebrew and Judaic Studies, New York University. Essay: Patriarchate.

Abraham Socher. Fellow in the Humanities, Stanford University, Stanford, California. Contributor to Jewish Social Studies. Essay: Elijah ben Solomon of Vilna.

Adam Sol. Doctoral candidate, Department of English, University of Cincinnati, Cincinnati, Ohio. Poetry Editor of Indiana Review (1993–95). Contributor to Response, Studies in American Jewish Literature, Judaism, Prairie Schooner, and Crazyhorse. Essay: Poetry: American Jewish.

Norman Solomon. Fellow in Modern Jewish Thought, Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies, and Lecturer in Theology, Oxford University. Author of Judaism and World Religion (1991), The Analytic Movement (1993), and A Very Short Introduction to Judaism (1996). Editorial board of Christian-Jewish Relations (1985–1991) and Jewish Journal of Sociology (1990–). Contributor to Jewish Law Annual, Maghreb Review, Contemporary Jewish Theology edited by Dan Cohn-Sherbok (1992), God, Truth, and Reality edited A. Sharma (1992), and The Jubilee Challenge edited by H. Ucko (1997). Essays: Messiah and Messianism; Science and Religion; Theodicy.

Benjamin D. Sommer. Assistant Professor, Department of Religion, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois. Author of A Prophet Reads Scripture: Allusion in Isaiah 40–66 (1998). Contributor to Journal of Biblical Literature, Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers, New Visions of Isaiah edited by Marvin Sweeney and Roy Melugin (1996), and Vetus Testamentum (1996). Essays: Bible: Theology; Kaufmann, Yehezkel; Pentateuch; Poetry: Biblical; Prophecy.

Nanette Stahl. Judaica Curator, Yale University Library, New Haven, Connecticut. Author of The First Hebrew Primer to the Bible (1980) and Law and Liminality in the Bible (1995). Essays: Haggadah, Passover; Mendele Moykher Sforim.

Leon Stein. Professor, History and Liberal Studies, Roosevelt University, Chicago. Author of The Holocaust: A Turning Point for Our Time: A Curriculum for the High Schools of Illinois (1997). Contributor to Journal of Central European History, Remembering for the Future edited by Yehuda Bauer (1988), Proteus, and Problems Unique to the Holocaust edited by H.J. Cargas (1999). Essays: Germany: Modern; Holocaust: Histories; Libels, Anti-Jewish: Modern; Wiesel, Elie.

Gillian D. Steinberg. Doctoral candidate, Department of English, University of Delaware, Newark. Essays: Nahman of Bratslav; Schoenberg, Arnold.

Simon A. Steiner. Doctoral candidate, Department of Religion, Columbia University, New York. Essay: Hasidic Thought.

Andrew E. Steinmann. Adjunct Professor, Department of Religion, Ashland University, Ashland, Ohio. Author of Are My Prayers Falling on Deaf Ears? (1997). Editor of God's Word (1995). Contributor to Journal of Biblical Literature, Vetus Testamentum, Concordia Journal, TC, and Fortunate the Eyes That See edited by Andrew H. Bartelt, et al. (1995). Essays: Bible: Translations; Job, Book of.

Dennis Stoutenburg. Director of Judaic Studies, Providence College, Otterburne, Manitoba. Essay: Festivals and Fasts.

Kenneth Stow. Department of Jewish History, University of Haifa. Author of Catholic Thought and Papal Jewry Policy

(1977), The 1007 Anonymous and Papal Sovereignty (1984), Alienated Minority (1992, 1994), and Jews in Rome (1995, 1997). Editor of Jewish History (1986–) and The Church and the Jews in the 13th Century By Solomon Grayzel, (1989). Editorial board member of Zion (1995–), Italia (1993–), and Rassegna Mensile d'Israel (1991–). Contributor to Renaissance Quarterly, American Historical Review, and Bibliothèque d'Humanisme e Renaissance. Essay: History: Medieval.

Adam Sutcliffe. Chaim Lopata Assistant Professor of European Jewish History, Department of History, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. Contributor to New Voices in Jewish Thought edited by Robert Rabinowitz (1998), The Eighteenth Century: Theory and Interpretation (1998), and Making Heroes: Exemplary Lives from History edited by Geoffrey Cubbitt and Allen Warren (1999). Essay: Golem.

Rivka B. Kern Ulmer. Visiting Scholar, Center for Jewish Studies, University of California, Los Angeles. Author of Tröstet, tröstet mein Volk (1986), Rabbinische Responen zum Synagogenaubau (1990), The Evil Eye in the Bible and in Rabbinic Literature (1994), A Synoptic Edition of Pesiqta Rabbati Based upon All Extant Manuscripts and The Editio Princeps (1997), and Talmud Yerushalmi: Ma'aserot, Ma'aser Sheni (1996). Editor of Diskussionsbeiträge aus dem Jüdischen Lehrhaus in Frankfurt am Main (1986) and Poetry of Rebecca (1986). Contributor to Juden in Kassel 1808–1933 (1986), Linguistica Biblica, Judaism, Encyclopédie Philosophique (1991), Zeitschrift für Religions und Geistesgeschichte, Proceedings of the Eleventh World Congress of Jewish Studies (1994), Theologische Realencyclopädie (1995), Journal for the Study of Judaism, Approaches to Ancient Judaism, and Annual of Rabbinic Judaism. Essays: Charity; Mikveh.

Ellen M. Umansky. Carl and Dorothy Bennett Professor of Judaic Studies, Fairfield University, Fairfield, Connecticut. Author of Lily Montagu and the Advancement of Liberal Judaism: From Vision to Vocation (1983). Editor of Lily Montagu: Sermons, Letters, Addresses and Prayers (1985), Four Centuries of Jewish Women's Spirituality: A Sourcebook (with Dianne Ashton, 1992), Response (1979–89), Reconstructionist (1989–93), Journal of Jewish Feminist Studies in Religion (1990–), and Southern Jewish History (1997–). Contributor to Choices in Modern Jewish Thought edited by Eugene B. Borowitz (1995), The Americanization of the Jews edited by Robert Seltzer and Norman Cohen (1995), Women Rabbis: Exploration and Celebration edited by Gary Zola (1996), Jewish Women in Historical Perspective edited by Judith Baskin (1998), Feminism and World Religions edited by Arvind Sharma and Katherine Young (1998), Conservative Judaism, Journal of Reform Judaism/CCAR Journal, Cross Currents, Modern Judaism, and Reconstructionist. Essay: Montagu, Lily.

Barry D. Walfish. Judaica Specialist, University of Toronto Library. Author of Esther in Medieval Garb (1993). Editor of Moses Kimhi: Commentary on the Book of Job (1992), The Frank Talmage Memorial Volume (1992–93), Yiddish Panorama (1995), and Frank Talmage's Apples of Gold in Settings of Silver (1999). Co-editor of With Reverence for the Word (forthcoming). Contributor to Eretz Israel, Israel and the Diaspora: Mutual Relations edited by Menachem Mor (1991), The Frank Talmage Memorial Volume, The Bible in Light of Its Interpreters edited by Sara Japhet (1994), With Reverence for the Word, Judaica Librarianship, Jewish Quarterly Review, Dor le-Dor, and Jewish Studies. Essays: Bible: Medieval Exegesis; Kimhi Family.

Seth Ward. Assistant Professor, Judaic Studies and History, University of Denver, Denver, Colorado. Author of Synagogues and Churches in Islamic Law (1984). Editor of Avoda and Ibada: Liturgy and Ritual in Islamic and Judaic Traditions (1999) and Covenant and Chosenness in Mormonism and Judaism (1999). Editorial board member of Shofar (1997–). Contributor to Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, Jewish Linguistic Studies, Journal of Ecumenical Studies, Medieval Encounters, Sepphoris in Galilee (1996), Islamic Legal Interpretation: Muftis and their Fatwas (1996), Yerushalayim ve-Eretz Yisrael, and Galilee, Confluence of Cultures (1999). Essays: Islamic-Jewish Relations; Maimonides Family.

Arthur Waskow. Director of the Shalom Center, Philadelphia. Author of Down-to-Earth Judaism and Godwrestling: Round 2. Co-editor of Trees, Earth and Torah: A Tu B'Shvat Anthology. Essay: Renewal.

Victoria Waters. Doctoral candidate, Divinity School, University of Chicago. Essay: Kook, Abraham Isaac.

Shalva Weil. Department of Education, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. Editor of From Cochín to Israel (1984), Religious Practices and Beliefs of Ethiopian Jews in Israel (1989), One-Parent Families among Ethiopian Immigrants in Israel (1991), Ethiopian Jews in the Limelight (1997), Roots and Routes: Ethnicity and Migration in Global Perspective (1999), Israel Social Science Research (special issue on Ethiopian Jewry, 1996), World Heritage Press's Hindu-Judaic Studies Series: Hindu-Jewish Dialogue, International Journal of Hindu Studies, South Asian Anthropology, and Journal of Indo-Judaic Studies. Contributor to Journal of Comparative Family Studies, Man, Pe'amin, Human Organization, and International Journal on Minority and Group Rights. Essay: Ethiopia.

David Weinberg. Professor, Department of History, Wayne State University, Detroit, Michigan. Author of Les Juifs en Paris de 1933 à 1939 (1974), A Community on Trial: The Jews of Paris in the 1930s (1977), and Between Tradition and Modernity: Haim Zhitlowski, Simon Dubnow, Abad Ha-Am, and the Shaping of Modern Jewish Identity (1996). Editor of Shoah (1971–73). Contributor to Encyclopedia of the Holocaust (1989), Modern Judaism, Max Nordau: Kulturkritik, Transferts culturels européens (1996), Patterns of Migration 1850–1914 (1996), and Tradition Renewed: A History of the Jewish Theological Seminary edited by Jack Wertheimer (1997). Essay: France.

Libby White. Librarian, Jewish Vocational Service, Baltimore, Maryland, and Beth Israel Synagogue, Owings Mills, Maryland. Contributor to Association of Jewish Libraries Proceedings (1999), Association of Jewish Libraries Newsletter, Magazines for Libraries edited by Bill Katz, and Funk and Wagnalls New Encyclopedia. Essay: Balkans.

Reena Zeidman. Assistant Professor, Department of Religious Studies, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario. Contributor to Approaches to Ancient Judaism, edited by Jacob Neusner (1995, 1996) and We Who Can Fly: Poems, Essays and Memories in Honor of Adele Weisman edited by Elizabeth Green (1997). Essays: Midrash Halakhah: Translations; Midrash Halakhah: Introductions.

Walter P. Zenner. Professor of Anthropology and Judaic Studies, State University of New York at Albany. Author of Minorities in the Middle (1991). Co-editor of Urban Life (with George Gmelch, 1980, 1988, 1996), Jewish Societies in the Middle East (with Shlomo Deshen, 1982), Critical Essays in Israel: Social Issues and Scholarship (with Russell Stone, 1994), Jews Among Muslims (with Shlomo Deshen, 1997), and Critical Essays on Israeli Society, Religion and Government (with Kevin Avruch, 1997). Contributor to Genocide and the Modern Age edited by Isidor Wallimann and Michael N. Dobkowski (1987), City and Society, Jewish Journal of Sociology, and Israel Affairs. Essay: Syria.